CROMWELL used this verse in his second speech to the First Parliament in 1654. 'Whilst these things were in the midst of us; and whilst the nation was rent and torn in spirit and principle from one end to the other, after this sort and manner I have now told you; family against family, husband against wife, parents against children; and nothing in the hearts and minds of men but "overturn, overturn, overturn!"' (a Scripture phrase very much abused, and applied to justify unpeaceable practices by all men of discontented spirits)—the common enemy sleeps not'.

EASY WORK

'Skilful to destroy.'—EZEKIEL XXI. 31.

I. NOTHING is so easy as to destroy. This is a truth which is often forgotten. A man is not a genius simply because he can destroy something.

1. We are entranced and fascinated by men who have immense destructive power. This is peculiarly easy work, this work of destruction in religious subjects and religious spheres. Let me tell you why. The heart wants to get rid of God. The enemy has an infinite advantage in the preparedness of the heart.

2. The very greatness of religion is a temptation towards denial. It makes denial easy, invites destructive criticism: there is so much of it; it begins with the unbeginning; it endures to the endless end; it takes a higher range than the high firmament. Nothing is so easy as contradiction. A child can contradict a father.

II. We must be a little clearer and plainer about this genius of contradiction, and this skill of destructiveness. Suppose I say, 'You have no mind; now prove the contrary, where is your mind?' You never thought of that. 'Have you ever seen it?' Never. 'Touched it?' No. 'Where do you keep it?' You don't know. You see the preacher can contradict as well as the critic and the hearer. Do not suppose that all the intellectual vigour and mental freshness and mighty transcendental genius is on the side of contradiction; it is on the side of constructiveness, elevation, moral fruition; it is on the side of practical, beneficent holiness.

III. There is no mystery in religion that has not its counterpart in human nature. The mischief is that so many people imagine that mystery begins with the Bible. If you close the Bible you will have greater mystery without it than you have with it; you would be a greater mystery to yourself. What little knowledge you have of yourself you owe directly or indirectly to such influences as constitute the Bible. It is because man is made in God's image that he represents a thousand religious mysteries, that he is often a supreme mystery to himself.

IV. Christianity has a destructive mission as well as infidelity. Christianity wields tremendous weapons. Christianity does not come to destroy the sinner, but sin. Nothing would be so easy as to destroy the sinner, but that would have no effect upon the sin; the spirit of sin would still be the unconquered spirit of the universe. Jesus Christ therefore undertakes this work—to bear away the sin of the world; not to crush the sinner, but to bear away, away—a word without an end—the sin of the world.—J. PARKER, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 42.

'Can thine heart endure, or can thine hands be strong, in the days that I shall deal with thee.'—EZEKIEL XXII. 14.

WHAT wisdom and philosophy, and perpetual experience, and revelation, and promises, and blessings cannot do, a mighty fear can; it can allay the confidences of bold lust and imperious sin, and soften our spirit into the lowness of a child, our revenge into charity of prayers, our impudence into the blushings of a chidden girl; and therefore God hath taken a cause proportionable.—JEREMY TAYLOR.

BUNYAN twice uses this verse; once in The Pilgrim's Progress, opposite the following passage: 'I looked then, and saw a man named Evangelist coming to him, and asked wherefore didst thou cry? He answered, Sir, I perceive by the Book in my hand, that I am condemned to die, and after that to come to Judgment, and I find that I am not willing to do the first, nor able to do the second.' The other reference is in The Holy War, where Captain Judgment uses it to warn the 'woeful town of Mansoul' against impenitence.

Her priests have violated My law, and have profaned My holy things: they have put no difference between the holy and the profane.'—EZEKIEL XXII. 26.

THE greater part of literature in the Middle Ages, at least from the twelfth century, may be considered as artillery levelled against the clergy—I do not say against the Church, which might imply a doctrinal opposition by no means universal. But if there is one theme upon which the most serious as well as the lightest, the most orthodox as the most heretical writers are united, it is ecclesiastical corruption.—HALLAM, Introduction to the Literature of Europe, part I. chap. ii.

'Her prophets have daubed them with untempered mortar, seeing vanity, and divining lies unto them, saying, Thus saith the Lord God, when the Lord hath not spoken. The people of the land have used oppression, and exercised robbery, and have vexed the poor and needy.'—EZEKIEL XXII. 28, 29.

COMPARE Mr. Morley's famous description of modern Britain: 'A community where the great aim of all classes and orders with power, is by dint of rigorous silence, fast shutting of the eyes, and stern stopping of the ears, to keep the social pyramid on its apex, with the fatal result of preserving for England its glorious fame as a paradise for the well-to-do, a purgatory for the able, and a hell for the poor'.

EZEKIEL XXII. 30.

THE repeated political humiliations paralysed the national spirit, and the paralysis extended itself to the people's religion and even to its morals. The nationality was exhausted; it could no more put forth out of itself a saviour to retrieve its fortunes. . . . And the national exhaustion was accompanied by religious decay, for in all the history of Israel a full tide of national life and a high faith in Jehovah were always the counterparts of one another.—Prof. A. B. DAVIDSON, The Exile and the Restoration, pp. 13, 14.

'The word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Son of man, behold, I take away from thee the desire of thine eyes with a stroke.'—EZEKIEL XXIV. 15, 16.

THE enunciation of laws or principles seems more especially to belong to Ezekiel, as the experience of personal evil and the sympathy with national sorrow belong more to the tender and womanly nature of Jeremiah. Nevertheless, Ezekiel was to be a priest in this sense also, as well as in that higher sense of beholding the glory of God and proclaiming His name. Suffering was not the destination of one prophet; it was the badge of all the tribe.—F. D. MAURICE.

To love, is to know the sacrifices which eternity exacts from life.—JOHN OLIVER HOBBS, The School for Saints, chap. xxv.

'At even my wife died.'—EZEKIEL XXIV. 18.

MR. R. H. HUTTON quotes this passage (vv. 15-27) in his essay on the poetry of the Old Testament, to show how 'this sublime characteristic of the Hebrew prophets, that they seem almost to forget their human centre of life in their effort to delineate Divine truth, is strikingly illustrated in the frequent surrender of their private lives and affections, for the purpose of sculpturing, in a living symbol, upon the mind of the nation, the lesson that no mere words could have taught. How far can any human being now, even distantly, comprehend the state of mind in which Ezekiel must have lived when he acted thus under the Divine inspiration?

REFERENCES.—XXIV. 18.—J. H. Jowett, Meditations for Quiet Moments, p. 100. XXIV. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2286.

'Ye shall pine away in your iniquities and mourn one towards another.'—EZEKIEL XXIV. 23.

'SIN will cease,' said Herbert Spencer, 'when men shall have discovered that sin is essentially fatal to happiness'.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF EZEKIEL

'Ezekiel is unto you a sign.'—EZEKIEL XXIV. 24.

Is not every man a sign? Each man is significant of much. Each man points to something beyond himself, something either beautiful or base. Every man is a living sermon. It would evangelize our lives did we realize this. How circumspectly would we walk were this always in our recollection!

All great and good men are signs. The Bible declares that the Lord Christ was and is a sign. And of Ezekiel Jehovah attests, 'Thus shall Ezekiel be unto you a sign' (R.V.).

I believe the idea to be that Ezekiel is a sign in a very special degree. Bishop Wordsworth translates my text: 'Ezekiel is unto you a wonderful portent'. No common sign, but a portent—flaming with supernatural significance. This is a strong claim to be instituted for Ezekiel. Can it be substantiated?

I. Ezekiel is a sign of the brave bearing of the ills of life.

II. Ezekiel is a sign of individuality.

III. Ezekiel is a sign of fidelity in proclaiming a message.

IV. Ezekiel is a sign of self-renouncing obedience.

V. Ezekiel is a sign of intensity.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Gospel of the Left Hand, p. 167.

'Moab and Seir do say, Behold, the house of Judah is like unto all the heathen.'—EZEKIEL XXV. 8.

ALL the heathens spake evil of Israel, and the Prophet did the same, yet the Israelites were so far from having the right to say to him, 'You speak as the heathen,' that he made it his strongest point that the heathens said the same as he.—PASCAL.

REFERENCE.—XXV. 21.—J. Baldwin Brown, The Soul's Exodus and Pilgrimage, p. 228.

'Thus saith the Lord God to Tyre; Shall not the isles shake at the sound of thy fall.'—EZEKIEL XXVI. 15.

'CONQUERORS,' says Carlyle in his essay on Burns, 'are a class of men with whom, for most part, the world could well dispense; nor can the hard intellect, the unsympathizing loftiness, and high but selfish enthusiasm of such persons inspire us in general with any affection; at best it may excite amazement; and their fall, like that of a pyramid, will be beheld with a certain sadness and awe.'

'Judah, and the land of Israel, they were thy merchants: they traded in thy market wheat of Minnith, and Pannag, and honey, and oil, and balm.'—EZEKIEL XXVII. 17.

'THAT is a remarkable verse, which I once met on a remarkable occasion, that I would also refer you to—Ezekiel xxvii. 17. Tyros may buy Judah's finest wheat; yea, her balm, and oil, and honey. What is the meaning of this? You would know what part of the parcel properly belonged to yourself.' So Erskine of Linlathen once wrote to Lady Elgin, cautioning her against hastily crediting supernatural visions and voices which appeared to possess Divine authority and insight, on the ground that even the best things of God may be appropriated sometimes by false agencies. 'I believe,' he has just said, 'that an evil spirit, or the flesh even, may speak of the deep things of God, although in a way that the true light and life in us might detect, or at least guard us from suffering by it.'

'Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters: the east wind hath broken thee in the midst of the seas.'—EZEKIEL XXVII. 26.

So rapid was the fall of Spain, that in only three reigns after the death of Philip II., the most powerful monarchy existing in the world was depressed to the lowest point of debasement, was insulted with impunity by foreign nations, was reduced more than once to bankruptcy, was stripped of her fairest possessions, was held up to public opprobrium. . . . Then, truly, did she drink to the dregs the cup of her own shame. Her glory had departed from her, she was smitten down and humbled. Well might a Spaniard of that time who compared the present with the past, mourn over his country, the chosen abode of chivalry and romance, of valour and of loyalty. The mistress of the world, the queen of the ocean, the terror of nations was gone; her power was gone, no more to return.—BUCKLE, History of Civilization, book II. chap. viii.

REFERENCE.—XXVII. 26.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1933.

'By thy great wisdom and by thy traffic hast thou increased thy riches, and thine heart is lifted up because of thy riches.'—EZEKIEL XXVIII. 5.

RICHES in a cultured community are the strongest of things; a power all-moving, yet which only the most powerless and skillless can put in motion; they are the readiest of possibilities; the readiest to become a great blessing or a great curse. 'Beneath gold thrones and mountains,' says Jean Paul, 'who knows how many giant spirits lie entombed?'—CARLYLE, Essay on Goethe's Works.

REFERENCE.—XXVIII. 13, 14.—J. M. Neale, Sermons for Some Feast Days in the Christian Year, p. 258. XXIX. 6.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. II. p. 35.

'In that day will I cause the horn of the house of Israel to bud forth.'—EZEKIEL XXIX. 21.

BECAUSE the pulse seems to intermit, we must not presume that it will cease instantly to beat. The public must never be regarded as incurable.—BURKE, First Letter on a Regicide Peace.

'The pride of her power shall come down.'—EZEKIEL XXX. 6.

THE last historian of the Jesuit Order, the one who brought down their own history of themselves to about 1652, since when it has not been continued—lived to see the suppression of the order in 1773. He has left us his opinion as to why they were put down, why the Almighty allowed so useful a society to be extinguished; and he comes to the conclusion that it is on account of their pride. 'We have been inordinately proud,' he confesses; 'we have set ourselves above everything, every institution and every office. We have assumed our own superiority, and have treated all other orders and societies with contempt. Pride has been the cause of our fall.'—DÖLLINGER.

'Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon with fair branches.'—EZEKIEL XXXI. 3.

In Proserpina, after quoting this passage, Ruskin proceeds: 'Now hear what follows. "The cedars in the Garden of God could not hide Him. The fir-trees were not like His boughs, and the chestnut-trees were not like His branches; nor any tree in the Garden of God was like unto Him in beauty." So that you see, whenever a nation rises into consistent, vital, and, through many generations, enduring power, there is still the Garden of God; still it is the water of life which feeds the roots of it; and still the succession of its people is imaged by the perennial leafage of the trees of Paradise. Could this be said of Assyria, and shall it not be said of England? How much more, of lives such as ours should be;—just, laborious, united in aim, beneficent in fulfilment, may the image be used of the leaves of the tree of Eden!'

'And it came to pass in the twelfth year . . . that the word of the Lord came unto me.'—EZEKIEL XXXII. 1, 17.

CALLING to mind my ordination this day eleven years ago, I spent some hours in the afternoon in the wood, reviewing the past, confessing sin, seeking mercy through the blood of the Lamb, who has a fold of righteousness to spread over a minister's sins. Some brokenness of heart and some power to cry for future blessing. I see Ezekiel got some of his messages in his twelfth year! May the Lord God of Ezekiel remember me!—Dr. A. A. BONAR's Diary, p. 143.

REFERENCES.—XXXII. 1.—J. Baldwin Brown, The Soul's Exodus and Pilgrimage, p. 178.

'All the bright lights of heaven will I make dark over thee, and set darkness upon thy land, saith the Lord God.'—EZEKIEL XXXII. 8.

'This in good measure,' said Newman, quoting the verse in a sermon preached in 1841, 'has fallen upon us. The Church of God is under eclipse among us. Where is our unity, for which Christ prayed? Where our charity, which He enjoined? Where the faith once delivered, when each has his own doctrine? Where our visibility, which was to be a light to the world? Where that awful worship, which struck fear into every soul? And as the Jews shortly before their own rejection had two dark tokens—the one, a bitter contempt of the whole world, and the other, multiplied divisions and furious quarrels at home—so we English, as if some abomination of desolation were coming on us also, scorn almost all Christianity but our own; and yet have, not one, but a hundred gospels among ourselves, and each of them with its own hot defenders.'

'There is Elam and all her multitude round about her grave, all of them slain, fallen by the sword, which caused their terror in the land of the living.'—EZEKIEL XXXII. 24.

THE Duke of Weimar told his friends always, To be of courage: this Napoleonism was unjust, a falsehood, and could not last. It is true doctrine. The heavier this Napoleon trampled on the world, holding it tyrannously down, the fiercer would the world's recoil against him be, one day. Injustice pays itself with frightful compound interest.—CARLYLE, Heroes, vi.

REFERENCES.—XXXIII. 1-20, 30, 33.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2286. XXXIII. 5.—Ibid. vol. iv. No. 166. XXXIII. 7.—A. Rowland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 324.

'If thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way, that wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand.'—EZEKIEL XXXIII. 8.

'My own notion is,' said Keble once, 'that clergymen generally have more to blame themselves for as to neglect in the way of example and the way of intercession than in the way of direct warning.'

'As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live: turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways; for why will ye die, O house of Israel?'—EZEKIEL XXXIII. 11.

This is the motto and text of Richard Baxter's Appeal to the Unconverted, at one part of which he braks out thus:—

'Turn ye. . . . It is the voice of every affliction to call thee to make haste and turn. Sickness and pain cry, Turn; and poverty, and loss of friends, and every twig of the chastizing rod cry, Turn; and yet wilt thou not hearken to the call? These have come near thee and made thee feel; they have made thee groan, and can they not make thee turn?

'The very frame and nature of thy being itself bespeaketh thy return. Why hast thou reason, but to rule thy flesh and serve thy Lord? Why hast thou an understanding soul, but to learn and know His will, and do it? Why hast thou a heart within thee, that can love, and fear, and desire, but that thou shouldst fear Him, and love Him, and desire after Him?'

REFERENCES.—XXXIII. 11.—Bishop E. C. S. Gibbon, Messages from the Old Testament, p. 194. J. Oswald Dykes, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 263. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1795. XXXIII. 14.—J. Baldwin Brown, The Soul's Exodus and Pilgrimage, p. 256. XXXIII. 30-33.—W. M. Punshon, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 259.

'Their heart goeth after their covetousness.'—EZEKIEL XXXIII. 31.

It is almost incredible how the soul of these Semites is bound up with the prey of pennies.—C. M. DOUGHTY, Arabia Deserta, i. p. 55.

'And, lo, Thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument: for they hear Thy words, but they do them not.'—EZEKIEL XXXIII. 32.

To seek no more than a present delight, that vanisheth with the sound of the words that die in the air, is not to desire the word as meat but as music, as God tells the Prophet Ezekiel. And, lo, Thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well upon an instrument: for they hear Thy words and they do them not. . . . If anyone's head or tongue should grow apace, and all the rest stand at a stay, it would certainly make him a monster; and they are no other, who are knowing and discoursing Christians, and grow daily in that respect, but not at all in holiness of heart and life, which is the proper growth of the children of God.—From COLERIDGE'S Aids to Reflection.

'Dr. DOVE preach'd before the King,' is an entry in Evelyn's Diary for the reign of Charles II., immediately followed by the further comment: 'I saw this evening such a scene of profuse gaming, and the King in the midst of his three concubines, as I had never before seen. Luxurious dallying and profaneness.'

REFERENCES.—XXXIII. 32.—J. H. Thom, Laws of Life (2nd Series), p. 196. XXXIII. 32, 33.—R. Winterbotham, Sermons and Expositions, p. 87.

'When this cometh to pass (behold, it cometh), then shall they know that a prophet hath been among them.'—EZEKIEL XXXIII. 33.

It seems hard to be generous, not easy even to be just to the times upon which our lot is cast. The very expression 'our present day' conveys with it something of disparagement, implying a contrast with other ages in whose very silence we find an eloquence rebuking the clamour that surrounds us. Yet much that we now look on as prosaic, and perhaps decry as unreal, if read as history would enchain our imaginations; if spoken as prophecy would stir our very souls. Future chroniclers will make it their wisdom to decipher the Runes we are now dinting, and will understand their import better than we who leave them on the rocks.—DORA GREENWELL.

As a rule, people discover a man to be worth listening to only after he is gone; their hear, hear! resounds when the orator has left the platform.—SCHOPENHAUER.

THE voice comes deepest from the sepulchre, and a great name hath its root in the dead body. If you invited a company to a feast, you might as well place round the table live sheep and oxen and vases of fish and cages of quails, as you would invite a company of friendly hearers to the philosopher who is yet living. One would imagine that the iris of our intellectual eye were lessened by the glory of his presence, and that, like eastern kings, he could be looked at near only when his limbs are stiff, by wax-light, in close curtains.—LANDOR.

'Thus saith the Lord God: Woe unto the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves! should not the shepherds feed the sheep?'—EZEKIEL XXXIV. 2.

THE keen sarcasms of Erasmus, the insolent buffoonery of Hutton, were lavished on the 'lovers of darkness' and of the cloister. In England Colet and More echoed with greater reserve the scorn and invective of their friends. As an outlet for religious enthusiasm, indeed, monasticism was practically dead. The friar, now that his fervour of devotion and his intellectual energy had passed away, had sunk into the mere beggar. The monks had become mere landowners. Most of their houses were anxious only to enlarge their revenues and to diminish the number of those who shared them. . . . It was acknowledged that about a third of the religious houses, including the bulk of the large abbeys, were fairly and decently conducted. The rest were charged with drunkenness, with simony, and with the foulest and most revolting crimes.—J. R. GREEN, Short History of the English People, chap. vi.

'Ye clothe you with the wool . . . but ye feed not the flock'—EZEKIEL XXXIV. 3.

'IN the eyes of the living generation,' wrote Mrs Browning in the preface to her poems, 'the poet is at once a richer and poorer man than he used to be; he wears better hood cloth, but speaks no more oracles.'

REFERENCE.—XXXIV. 3.—Jesse Butt, The Soul's Escape, p. 158.

'The diseased have ye not strengthened, neither have ye healed that which was sick, neither have ye bound up that which was broken, neither have ye brought again that which was driven away, neither have ye sought that which was lost.'—EZEKIEL XXXIV. 4.

'We had a chaplain at the bagnie,' says Jean Valjean the ex-convict in Les Misérables (chap. 1.), 'and one day I saw a bishop, Monseigneur, as they call him. He is the curé over the curés. He said mass in the middle of the bagnie at an altar, and had a pointed gold thing on his head, which glistened in the bright sunshine; we were drawn up on three sides of a square, with guns and lighted matches facing us. He spoke, but was too far off, and we did not hear him. 'That is what a bishop is.'

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF OFFICE

'Thus saith the Lord God: Behold, I am against the shepherds; and I will require My flock at their hand, and cause them to cease from feeding the flock; neither shall the shepherds feed themselves any more; for I will deliver My flock from their mouth, that they may not be meat for them.'—EZEKIEL XXXIV. 10.

IN ancient times, as we find in Homer, it was customary to liken the people of a nation to sheep, and their rulers and leaders to shepherds. The title in its primary sense refers to kings and great leaders, yet by implication it may be taken for all who hold office, whether secular or ecclesiastical.

1. In considering the responsibilities of office, we must have in mind the source from which all authority flows. From every point of view that source is God Himself; for when St. Paul makes the statement, 'The powers that be are ordained of God,' he deduces it from the primary truth, 'There is no power but of God'.

1. This is true because God's providence so orders the circumstances of individuals in this world as practically to determine who shall be in positions of authority.

2. The gifts of mind and advantages of circumstance which enable us to hold positions of authority are bestowed upon us by God.

We are reminded by the Prophet that God can at any time remove the unfaithful servant, and that He will do so if it seem good to Him.

There is the account to be given, 'I will require My flock at their hand'.

II. The duties of an ideal ruler are described in the latter part of the chapter, where God assumes the title of 'Shepherd' for Himself, and afterwards foretells the setting up of the kingdom of the Good Shepherd, our Lord Jesus Christ. Notice three of them:—

1. The seeking out of the sheep who are scattered.

2. Feed the flock. This does not only mean feeding of the body, but of the mind and of the soul.

3. Protecting those under our care.

III. Our attention is drawn to some of the sins of a bad ruler:—

1. His principal sin is generally selfishness. He rules for his own benefit, not for the benefit of those who are entrusted to his care.

2. Neglect of the flock.

3. Positive oppression and cruelty.—A. G. MORTIMER, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part iv. p. 276.

REFERENCE.—XXXIV. 11, 12, 16.—R. E. HUTTON, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 93.

FEEDING HIS FLOCK

'I will feed My Flock.'—EZEKIEL XXXIV. 15.

THE Lord's feeding of His children is tenderly discriminating, and to bring us to maturity He uses very varied breads. Glance at two or three of the breads which are mentioned in the Sacred Word.

I. 'I will feed thee in a good pasture,' saith the Lord. There are sweet and beautiful seasons, when life ceases to be a noisy tumultuous river, when it settles down into 'still waters,' and we are blessed with quiet visions which come as Heaven's bread. The Lord is feeding us in a 'fat pasture,' giving us meat in due season.

II. 'I will feed thee with the bread of tears.' Tears as bread: I do not think it means the tears that we shed because of our own griefs, but tears shed because of the griefs of others. These tears constitute bread, and enlarge our souls. Sympathy is feeding. It has sometimes happened that a whole family has been fed by the presence of an invalid child. 'When Jesus therefore saw her weeping, He groaned in the spirit, and was troubled.' Our Saviour was being fed with 'the bread of tears!'

III. 'I will feed thee with the bread of adversity'; not only with sympathy for the griefs of others, but with personal grief of thine own. The bread of hardness! Do we not all know the experience in common life? How often we say to one another, in describing some personal experience: 'Yes, I felt it very hard'. We were eating the bread of hardness. 'We have toiled all night, and taken nothing!' 'Endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ;' endure hardness, and so become still better soldiers of Jesus Christ.

'I will feed My flock.' The good Lord has many breads. 'Give us this day our daily bread.'—J. H. SOWETT, Meditations for Quiet Moments, p. 14.

'I will seek that which was lost, and will bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick.'—EZEKIEL XXXIV. 16.

By the River Side in the Meadow there were Cotes and Folds for sheep, an House built for the nourishing and bringing up of those Lambs, the Babes of those Women that go on Pilgrimage. Also there was here one intrusted with them who could have Compassion, and that could gather these Lambs with his Arm and carry them in his Bosom, and that could gently lead those that were with young. Now to the care of this Man Christiana admonished her four Daughters to commit their little ones, that by these waters they might be housed, harboured, suckered, and nourished, and that none of them might be lacking in time to come. This Man, if any of them go astray or be lost, he will bring them again; he will also bind up that which is broken, and will strengthen them that are sick. Here they will never want Meat and Drink and Cloathing, here they will be kept from Thieves and Robbers, for this Man will die before one of those committed to his trust shall be lost.—BUNYAN, Pilgrim's Progress, part ii.

'Seemeth it a small thing unto you . . . to have drunk of the clear waters, but ye must foul the residue with your feet?'—EZEKIEL XXXIV. 18.

Thus they went on, till they came at the foot of the Hill Difficulty, when again their good friend Mr. Greatheart took an occasion to tell them of what happened there when Christian himself went by. So he led them first to the Spring. Lo, saith he, this is the Spring that Christian drank of before he went up this Hill, and then 'twas clear and good, but now 'tis dirty with the feet of some that are not desirous that Pilgrims here should quench their thirst.—BUNYAN, Pilgrim's Progress, part ii.

'Ye thrust with side and with shoulder, and pushed all the diseased with your horns.'—EZEKIEL XXXIV. 21.

BUNYAN once more recurs to this chapter in the second part of The Pilgrim's Progress, when he is describing the reception of the pilgrims by the Shepherds of the Delectable Mountains. 'Then said the Shepherds, you are welcome to us, for we have comfort for the feeble as for the strong. Our prince has an eye to what is done to the least of these, therefore Infirmary must not be a block to our Entertainment. So they had them to the Palace-Door, and then said unto them, come in Mr. Feeble-Mind, come in Mr. Ready-to-Halt, come in Mr. Despondency, and Mrs. Much-Afraid his daughter. These, Mr. Greatheart, said the Shepherds to the Guide, we call in by name, for that they are most subject to draw back, but as for you and the rest that are strong, we leave you to your wonted liberty. Then said Mr. Greatheart, This day I see that Grace doth shine in your Faces, and that you are my Lord's Shepherds indeed, for that you have not pushed these diseased neither with side nor shoulder, but have rather strewed their way into the Palace with Flowers, as you should.'

REFERENCE.—XXXIV. 23.—R. E. HUTTON, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 293.

'There shall be showers of blessing.'—EZEKIEL XXXIV. 26.

WHEN the one Shepherd is set over them, even He who shall stand (oh how much do we lie!) and feed in the strength of the Lord, the isles (and this the greatest of them), which wait for His law, are to look for that: and I will make them and the places round about My hill a blessing; and I will cause the shower to come down in his season; there shall be showers of blessing. How desirable must every drop of such a shower be! . . . But when this shall be in Scotland (and it must be) is better to believe than prophecy; and quietly to hope and sit still (for that is yet our strength) than to quarrel with Him, that the wheels of His chariot move leisurely.—SAMUEL RUTHERFORD.

SHOWERS OF BLESSING

'There shall be showers of blessing.'—EZEKIEL XXXIV. 26.

THIS word 'blessing' is one which belongs strictly to the vocabulary of religion. Irreligious people do not speak about blessing.

I. The copiousness of the blessing. If the will and love of God could have free course, there would be showers of blessing. The obstacle which hinders is in ourselves. Have you never, when enjoying any of the simple pleasures of nature, reflected with surprise on how little they are taken advantage of? It is so with the blessing of God, so near and yet so far on account of our negligence. How few cultivate sources of blessings—prayer, study of Bible, a whiter holiness, more spiritual power.

II. Its timeliness—'to come down in its season'. This refers to the temporal blessing of the early and the latter rain, but it has a wider scope. Blessing of every kind comes in its season—in the time of need when the hearts of men are sighing for it. This is God's season for which He waits. In ordinary life it is the little extra which makes all the difference between the weak and the strong man—health, capital, art. May Christians heed this little more. It is near at hand; one act of surrender and it is yours.

III. The diffusiveness of God's blessing—'the places round about'. To be a Christian is to be so filled with the life of God that the vessel runs over, and all round about get the benefit. This is a severe test. Can you stand it?—JAMES STALKER, The Sermon Year Book, 1891, p. 317.

REFERENCES.—XXXIV. 26.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 28. J. Monro Gibson, A Strong City, p. 243. XXXIV. 27.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxv. No. 1402. XXXIV. 30, 31.—Ibid. xxx. No. 1807.

'Because thou hast had a perpetual enmity, and hast given over the children of Israel to the power of the sword in the time of their calamity, therefore, as I live, saith the Lord, I will prepare thee unto blood.'—EZEKIEL xxxv. 5, 6.

SEE Dickens's description of France, in the first chapter of The Tale of Two Cities: 'Under the guidance of her Christian pastors, she entertained herself with such humane achievements as sentencing a youth to have his hands cut off, his tongue torn out with pincers, and his body burned alive, because he had not kneeled down in the rain to do honour to a dirty procession of monks which passed within his view, at a distance of some fifty or sixty yards. It is likely enough that, rooted in the woods of France and Norway, there were growing trees, when that sufferer was put to death, already marked by the Woodman, Fate, to come down and be sawn into boards, to make a certain movable framework with a sack and a knife in it, terrible in history. It is likely enough that in the rough outhouses of some tillers of the heavy lands adjacent to Paris, there were sheltered from the weather that very day, rude carts, bespattered with rustic mire, snuffed about by pigs, and roosted in by poultry, which the Farmer, Death, had already set apart to be his tumbrils of the Revolution. But that Woodman and that Farmer, though they work unceasingly, work silently.'

FOR me there was but one sin, and that was cruelty, because I hated it; though Nature, for some inscrutable purpose of her own, almost teaches it as a virtue. All sins that did not include cruelty were merely sins against health or taste or common-sense or public expediency.—GEORGE DU MAURIER in Peter Ibbetson.

REFERENCES.—XXXV. 10.—Spurgeon Sermons, vol. ix. No. 536. XXXVI. 9.—Ibid. vol. lii. No. 3001.

THE OUTLOOK OF THE OPTIMIST

'I will do better unto you than at your beginnings.'—EZEKIEL xxxvi. 11.

To this doctrine which our text embodies might be given the name of prophetic optimism. There is an optimism that is temperamental. And then there is a very shallow optimism that is happy because it is half blind. I need hardly tell you that prophetic optimism is never based upon deliberate ignorance. It is based on the fact that underneath all change are the arms of the everlasting God.

I. This same feature—this strong and virile optimism—is found in the teaching of the Lord Jesus Christ, but the changes He wrought in it, and the new application He gave it, are a striking example of how He fulfilled the prophets. To Ezekiel, the basis of optimism is God's sovereignty; but to Jesus, the basis of optimism is God's love. To Ezekiel, the brighter future is for Israel, but in the teaching of Christ it is for one wandering child. It is because God is our Father and we are His children, that He will do better unto us than at the beginning.

II. I am quite aware that in actual experience the message of our text seems often contradicted. If our text had said, I shall make thee happier than at thy beginnings, there might have been some ground for quarrelling with Scripture; but our text says, I shall do better for thee, and that is a very different thing.

Think of the life of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is a signal instance of the fulfilment of this promise in the teeth of much that seems to contradict it. We recognize that the straight road to kingship was through the misery and woe of Calvary.

III. Notice too that here, in the sharpest manner, the leadership of evil differs from that of God. It is one strange mark of everything that is evil, that its to-morrow leaves us worse than yesterday. The truth is that sin would have no power save for the fact that its beginnings are very sweet. Had it been harsh or repulsive at the outset, the world would never have needed a Redeemer.

IV. I like to think, too, that our text holds good of all the social relationships of life when these are based on God. It is not only to us as individuals but to us in the tender comradeships of earth, that God says, I will do better unto you than at your beginnings.

Let us never forget that our whole life is really a beginning. To me life is inexplicable and meaningless—unfair, unequal, unbalanced, and unjust—unless we are to carry on elsewhere the task which here with such toil and tears we have begun.—G. H. MORRISON, The Unlighted Lustre, p. 244.

REFERENCES.—XXXVI. 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvi. No. 2125. XXXVI. 16, 17.—T. Guthrie, The Gospel in Ezekiel, p. 1. XXXVI. 17.—Ibid. pp. 24, 44. XXXVI. 18, 19.—Ibid. pp. 63, 83. XXXVI. 23, 24.—T. Guthrie, The Gospel in Ezekiel, pp. 141, 165, 171. XXXVI. 24.—Ibid. p. 190. XXXVI. 25.—Ibid. pp. 211, 231. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1921. XXXVI. 25, 26, 27.—T. De Witt Talmage, Sermons, p. 138. XXXVI. 25-31.—S. Baring-Gould, Sermon-Sketches, p. 70. XXXVI. 25-38.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture, Ezekiel, p. 19.

A NEW HEART

'A new heart also will I give you.'—EZEKIEL xxxvi. 26.

I. The Great Gift.—The heart is the nature in the sacred terminology of this text. God promises a new inner nature to His people.

1. This is a needed gift. The heart is the root and fount of all things. With what finality and power our Lord described the fundamentality of the heart! 'out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, railings'. And the Bible is equally thorough in all its teachings. Always its deep solicitude is concerning the heart. Hence all manner and types of heart are described in Scripture: a 'wicked heart,' a 'pure heart,' a 'true heart,' a 'broken heart,' a 'clean heart,' a 'perfect heart'.

We see, too, the deep necessity of this gift when we realize our sinfulness. In this very verse, God delineates our heart as it now is. He describes it as a 'stony' heart. Bishop Lightfoot in pathetic apostrophe speaks of 'my sullied heart,' and he speaks for us all.

2. A new heart can only come as a Divine gift. 'I' will give you it, saith Jehovah.

And what a precious gift this is! In a new heart lies the secret of a wealthy inner life. All generous impulses, all sublime ideals, all lofty and strenuous purposes depend upon a new heart.

The secret of a noble outer life lies here also. All outflowing of goodness is from this fountain alone.

3. It is an assured gift. God speaks without reservation. He says He 'will' give it, and He will give it 'you'. It is assured to all who desire it.

II. The Great Giver's Mode of Bestowing this Gift.

1. God delights to give by promise. Faith is God's stern and imperative and constant demand. To faith and faith alone His riches come. And yet faith itself is His gift—so entirely do we live under grace.

2. God gives this glorious gift instrumentally. He gives a new heart by means of prayer.

God gives this gift by the Holy Spirit. He says in the following verse, 'And I will put My spirit within you'. When we are 'born again' we are born of the Holy Spirit.

God gives this gift by means of His Word. But God also uses His Word as preached as an agency for the imparting of this gift. This is the supreme purpose of preaching.

Devout reading is often used of God for the giving of a new heart.

All the means of grace are sanctified of God to the same noble purpose.

By very varied means God fulfils His Word and gives His people a new heart. Do not limit the Holy One of Israel to what are accustomedly called the means of grace.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Travels of the Heart, p. 253.

REFERENCES.—XXXVI. 26.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 212; vol. viii. No. 456; vol. xix. No. 1129. Bishop J. Percival, Sermons at Rugby, p. 169. Canon Fleming, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 219. T. Guthrie, The Gospel in Ezekiel, pp. 255, 276, 295. XXXVI. 26, 27.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xviii. No. 1046. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 75. XXXVI. 27.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 251; vol. xxxvii. No. 2200; vol. liii. No. 3048. T. Guthrie, The Gospel in Ezekiel, pp. 322, 339. XXXVI. 28, 29, 30.—Ibid. p. 381.

'Then shall ye remember your own evil ways, and shall loathe yourselves in your own sight.'—EZEKIEL xxxvi. 31.

THIS I found my Soul's desire, even to cast itself at the foot of Grace, by Prayer and Supplication. But, oh! 'twas hard for me now to bare the Face, to pray to this Christ for mercy, against whom I had thus most vilely sinned. 'Twas hard work, I say, to offer to look Him in the face against whom I had so vilely sinned; and, indeed, I have found it as difficult to come to God by prayer, after back-sliding from Him, as to do any other thing.—BUNYAN, Grace Abounding, p. 175.

FOR we endure the tender pain of pardon.—MRS. MEYNELL.

REFERENCES.—XXXVI. 31.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2743. W. L. Watkinson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxix. 1906, p. 342. XXXVI. 32.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 233. XXXVI. 36.—T. Guthrie, The Gospel in Ezekiel, p. 397.

'Thus saith the Lord God; For this moreover will I be acquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them.'—EZEKIEL xxxvi. 37.

In the second part of The Pilgrim's Progress, Reliever encourages the women to proceed: 'To go back again you need not; for in all places where you shall come, you will find no want at all, for in every of my Lord's Lodgings which He has prepared for the reception of His Pilgrims, there is sufficient to furnish them against all attempts whatsoever. But as I said, He will be enquired of by them to do it for them; and 'tis a poor thing that is not worth asking for.'

REFERENCES.—XXXVI. 37.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 138. T. Guthrie, The Gospel in Ezekiel, p. 419. XXXVI. 37, 38.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1307. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 171. XXXVII. 1.—C. Brown, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 280. XXXVII. 1-10.—J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 205. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 582. XXXVII. 1-14.—A. McLaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, p. 26. J. McNeill, Regent Square Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 97.

'And behold, there were very many in the open valley; and, lo, they were very dry.'—EZEKIEL XXXVII. 2.

DEAN STANLEY, in the introduction to his Eastern Church, observes: 'It is sometimes said, that of all historical studies that of Ecclesiastical History is the most repulsive. We seem to be set down in the valley of the Prophet's vision—strewn with bones, and behold they are very many and very dry: skeletons of creeds, of churches, of institutions; trodden and traversed by the feet of travellers again and again; craters of extinct volcanoes, which once filled the world with their noise, and are now dead and cold.'

'And he said to me, Son of man, can these bones live? And I answered, O Lord God, Thou knowest.'—EZEKIEL XXXVII. 3.

THAT vision of the dry bones . . . perhaps is the best-known passage of the Old Testament. 'Son of man, can these dry bones live?' must have often been the self-questioning of Ezekiel, and when he thought on the shattered nation he could give no answer more confident than the conviction, 'O Lord God, Thou knowest.'—MISS WEDGEWOOD.

THINK of the sublimity, I should rather say the profundity, of that passage in Ezekiel, Son of man, can these bones live? and I answered, O Lord God, Thou knowest. I know nothing like it.—COLERIDGE, Table Talk.

DESCRIBING Dr. Donne's preaching in London during his last illness, Izaak Walton remarks that 'when, to the amazement of some beholders, he appeared in the pulpit, many of them thought he presented himself not to preach mortification by a living voice, but mortality by a dying body. And doubtless many did ask that question in Ezekiel, 'Do these bones live? or, can that soul organize that tongue, to speak so long time as the sand in that glass will move toward its centre, and measure out an hour of this dying man's unspent life? Doubtless it cannot.' And yet after some pauses in his zealous prayer, his strong desires enabled his weak body to discharge his memory of his preconceived meditations, which were of dying; the text being, 'To God the Lord belong the issues from death.'"

REFERENCES.—XXXVII. 3.—W. Lee, University Sermons, p. 187. G. S. Barrett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1893, p. 267. P. T. Forayth, ibid. vol. lxi. 1902, p. 312. H. P. Liddon, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 260. J. Mitchinson, Can the Dry Bones Live, Sermons, 1881-88.

'Behold a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to bone.'—EZEKIEL XXXVII. 7.

EVERY shaking among the bones, everything which seems at first a sign of terror—men leaving the churches in which they have been born, forsaking all the affections and sympathies and traditions of their childhood—infidel questionings, doubts whether the world is left to itself or whether it is governed by an evil spirit—are themselves not indeed signs of life, but at least movements in the midst of death which are better than the silence of the charnel-house, which foretell the approach of that which they cannot produce.—F. D. MAURICE.

SPEAKING, in the tenth chapter of Chartism, of the vice and misery in country districts of England, Carlyle cries: 'Ah, it is bitter jesting on such a subject. One's heart is sick to look at the dreary chaos and valley of Jehoshaphat, scattered with the limbs and souls of one's fellow-men; and no Divine voice, only croaking of hungry vultures, inarticulate, bodeful ravens, horn-eyed parrots, that do articulate, proclaiming, Let these bones live!'

REFERENCE.—XXXVII. 7.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 341.

Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live.'—EZEKIEL XXXVII. 9.

WHAT precise meaning we ought to attach to expressions such as that of the prophecy to the four winds that the dry bones might be breathed upon, and might live, or why the presence of the vital power should be dependent on the chemical action of the air, and its awful passing away materially signified by the rendering up of that breath or ghost, we cannot at present know, and need not at any time dispute. What we assuredly know is that the states of life and death are different, and the first more desirable than the other, and by effort attainable, whether we understand 'born of the spirit' to signify having the breath of heaven in our flesh, or its power in our hearts.—RUSKIN in The Queen of the Air, § 55.

'ABOUT noon, Friday 5th, I called on William Row, in Breage, on my way to Newlyn. "Twelve years ago," he said, "I was going over Gulval Downs, and I saw many people together; and I asked what was the matter; and they told me a man was going to preach: and I said, To be sure it is some mazed man, but when I saw you I said, Nay, this is no mazed man: and you preached on God's raising the dry bones; and from that time I could never rest till God was pleased to breathe on me and raise my dead soul."—WESLEY'S Journal for 1755.

REFERENCES.—XXXVII. 9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2246. H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 33. W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches

(2nd Series), p. 206. XXXVII. 9, 10.—R. C. Trench, Sermons New and Old, p. 210. W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 140.

'And the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood up on their feet, an exceeding great army.'—EZEKIEL XXXVII. 10.

WE seem to have in some degree lost a principle of cohesion between the work done and the work doing; and thus the events with which the Gospel narrative makes us acquainted, instead of being, every one of them, 'very nigh' to us, bound up and inter-leaved within the volume of our personal experience, have to be fetched, as we want them, from the remote distance where they lie, like the bones in the valley of prophetic vision, dry and sapless, detached from each other, and from all connexion with the life that we are now living upon earth. When we receive along with each of these facts the sign that was given to Moses, and learn that it is I AM which hath sent it to us, a breath of life is infused within all that has been formal and historical; across the statements of the letter, of which, taken singly and apart, we may have said that 'they are very dry,' a spirit passes, they come together, and behold they live, and stand up on their feet an exceeding great army, fighting for and with us in the battle.—DORA GREENWELL, A Present Heaven, pp. 53, 54.

'Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel: behold, they say, our bones are dried up, and our hope is lost: we are clean cut off. Therefore prophesy, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, O my people.'—EZEKIEL XXXVII. 11, 12.

No right and no power to disbelieve in the arm of Hercules or the voice of Jesus can rationally remain with those who have seen Garibaldi take a kingdom into the hollow of his hand, and not one man but a whole nation rise from the dead at the sound of the word of Mazzini.—SWINBURNE, A Study of Victor Hugo, p. 113.

REFERENCE.—XXXVII. 11, 12, 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1676.

'Behold, I will take the stick of Joseph, which is in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his fellows, and will put them with him, even with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick.'—EZEKIEL XXXVII. 19.

COMPARE the closing sentences of Tolstoy's What is Art? 'Universal art, by uniting the most different people in one common feeling, by destroying separation, will educate people to union, will show them, not by reason but by life itself, the joy of universal union reaching beyond the bounds set by life. The destiny of art in our time is to transmit from the realm of reason to the realm of feeling the truth that well-being for man consists in being united together, and to set up, in place of the existing reign of force, that kingdom of God, i.e. of love, which we all recognize to be the highest aim of human life. Possibly, in the future, science may reveal to art yet new and higher ideals, which art may realize; but, in our time, the destiny of art is clear and definite. The task for Christian art is to establish brotherly union among men.'

'Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone . . . and I will make them one nation, in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all . . . and David My servant shall be king over them . . . My tabernacle also shall be with them: yea, I will be their God, and they shall be My people.'—EZEKIEL XXXVII. 21-27.

AFTER quoting this passage, Miss Wedgwood, in The Message of Israel (pp. 231 f.) observes: 'The words belong to that region of vast soothing hope which seems akin to the influence of music. All that is pathetic, all that is tragic in history, seems gathered up in the mere existence of such aspirations, and the consciousness that they were futile as far as human eye can see. But national aspirations soar into the region where they become as it were luminous, and cast their glow even on the fate they have not had the strength to mould. "Desire of heaven itself is heaven," says a poet of our own day, and the vision of a united Israel seems almost to justify the exaggeration, if exaggeration it be. The glowing hopes expressed in this passage are evidently as the bow in the cloud—a gleam upon a gloomy background.'

VICTOR HUGO also, in his Shakespeare (chap. II.), after quoting from the prophecy of the Wind and the Bones, cites this twenty-seventh verse loosely, and then asks: 'Is not everything there? Search for a higher formula, you will not find it: a free man under a sovereign God. This visionary eater of filth is a resuscitator. Ezekiel has offal on his lips, and the sun in his eyes.'

THE first act of theft, falsehood, or other immorality, is an event in the life of the perpetrator which he never forgets. It may often happen that no account can be given of it; that there is nothing in the education, nor in the antecedents of the person, that would lead us, or even himself, to suspect it. In the weaker sort of natures, especially, suggestions of evil spring up we cannot tell how.—JOWETT.

REFERENCE.—XXXVIII. 11, 12.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 44.

'Because they trespassed against Me, therefore hid I My face from them.'—EZEKIEL XXXIX. 23.

A THOROUGHLY immoral man could not know anything at all! To know a thing, what we can call knowing, a man must first love the thing, sympathize with it; that is, be virtuously related to it. If he have not the justice to put down his own selfishness at every turn, the courage to stand by the dangerous line at every turn, how shall he know? His virtues, all of them, will lie recorded in his knowledge. Nature, with her truth, remains to the bad, to the selfish, and the pusillanimous person a sealed book: what such can know of Nature is mean, superficial, small; for the use of the day merely.—CARLYLE, Heroes, III.

EVERY duty we omit obscures some truth we should have known.—RUSKIN.

REFERENCES.—XXXIX. 25.—C. A. Marshall, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 394. XL. 2, 3.—W. W. Battershall, Interpretations of Life and Religion, p. 127.

'A man with a line of flax in his hand, and a measuring reed.'
—EZEKIEL XL. 3.

SPEAKING, in Frondees Agrestes (§ 57), of humility and love as associated with the symbolism of the reed in Scripture, Ruskin invites his readers to 'observe the confirmation of these last two images in, I suppose, the most important prophecy, relating to the future state of the Christian Church, which occurs in the Old Testament, namely, that contained in the closing chapters of Ezekiel. The measures of the Temple of God are to be taken; and because it is only by charity and humility that those measures ever can be taken, the angel has "a line of flax in his hand, and a measuring reed". The use of the line was to measure the land, and of the reed to take the dimensions of the buildings; so the buildings of the Church, or its labours, are to be measured by humility; and its territory, or land, by love.'

'To the intent that I might shew them unto thee art thou brought hither: declare all that thou seest to the house of Israel.'—EZEKIEL XL. 4.

NONE can move this world unless he stands upon another.—COVENTRY PATMORE.

THE objective element has its place, and a very large place, too, in Christian preaching; the minister of the Gospel, announces the Gospel; he has to relate not his own private history, but the wonders of God; only, he relates these with his own soul; it is on that soul, as on a living focus, that the rays of truth fall, to strike thence on other souls; and these truths, which ought to have become a part of himself, reach his hearers as an emanation of his being, real and personal at the same time, objective and subjective.—VINET.

ALL important truths have been the result of solitary effort. None have been discovered by masses of people—it is fair to suppose they never will.—BRCKFORD.

REFERENCE.—XLI. 4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1678.

'Afterward he brought me to the temple.'—EZEKIEL XLI. 1.

NEITHER Jesus Christ, nor Luther and Knox, when they proclaimed the downfall of a corrupt hierarchy, thought of establishing society, by way of reform, upon a secular basis. All alike treated the system they attacked as the perversion of something good and sacred, all alike substituted another Church for that which they destroyed. Our modern reformers who wish to hand over what they take from the Church to the State are of a different type. They are of those who do not understand that there must always be a Church, organized or not, where there is a human society. These are like children, who confound air, the most necessary of realities, with vacuum or nothing at all.—PROF. SEELEY.

Do not be misled so as to suppose that science and the intellect are or can be the sources of social progress or change. It is the moral births and outgrowths that originate; science and the intellect only give form to these. It is a common notion, and one apparently gaining ground, that science may, as it were, take society by the hand, and become its high priest, and guide to a glorious kingdom. And this to a certain extent is true. Science may become high priest, but the result of its priestly offices will entirely depend on what kind of a deity it represents—what kind of a god society worships. Science will doubtless become its guide, but whither it leads society will entirely depend on whither society desires to be led.—EDWARD CARPENTER, England's Ideal, p. 67.

REFERENCE.—XLI. 7.—H. W. Webb-Peploe, Calls to Holiness, p. 76.

'And, behold, the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east: and the earth shined with his glory.'—EZEKIEL XLIII. 2.

MR. AUGUSTUS HARE, in Memorials of a Quiet Life, quotes a passage from his mother's diary, in which, after writing down this verse, she adds: 'Yes, with the glory of the God of Israel. In itself it was dark and lifeless; but when the glory of the God of Israel arose out of the East, even as the Sun of Righteousness, then the earth reflected His bright shining, and became glorious through His light resting upon it. So have I seen on a bright sunshiny morning at Hurstmonceaux, the line of the sea lit up by the beams of the morning sun, and shining with an almost dazzling brightness in a glory not its own. . . . There is no holiness, no loveliness in man of himself—no, not in regenerate man. His beauty is a beauty wrought in him, and shining over him, through means of the Blessed Fountain of Light.'

REFERENCES.—XLIII. 2.—Newman Smith, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 243. Bishop Welldon, ibid. vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 250.

'Shew the house to the house of Israel . . . shew them the form of the house, and the fashion thereof.'—EZEKIEL XLIII. 10, 11.

'MY very dear brother,' wrote Samuel Rutherford to a young correspondent, 'ye are heartily welcome to my world of suffering, and heartily welcome to my Master's house. God give you much joy of your new Master. If I have been in the house before you, I were not faithful to give the house an ill name, or to speak evil of the Lord of the family; I rather wish God's Holy Spirit (O Lord, breathe upon me with that Spirit!) to tell you the fashions of the house. One thing I can say, that by our waiting, ye will grow a great man with the Lord of the house.'

'THE great deeds of philosophers,' says Huxley, 'have been less the fruit of their intellect than of the direction of that intellect by an eminently religious tone of mind. Truth has yielded itself rather to their patience, their love, their single-heartedness, and their self-denial, than to their logical acumen.'

'MERK culture of the intellect (and education as usually conducted amounts to little more) is hardly at all operative upon conduct. Intellect is not a power, but an instrument—not a thing which itself moves and works, but a thing which is moved and worked by forces behind it. To say that men are ruled by reason is as irrational as to say that men are ruled by their eyes. Reason is an eye—the eye through which the desires see their way to gratification, and educating it only makes it a better eye—gives it a vision more accurate and comprehensive—does not at all alter the desires subserved by it. However far-seeing you make it, the passion will still determine the directions in which it shall be turned—the objects on which it shall dwell.—SPENCER.

'If they be ashamed of all that they have done, shew them the form of the house, and the fashion thereof.'—EZEKIEL XLIII. 11.

THE idea of a spiritual society could not unfold itself to them while they were living in a heartless, divided, self-righteous state. They must be humbled before they could feel the possibility of such a society; still more before they could confess it to be real. The hindrance to the discernment of it was not an intellectual one; it was not that they wanted the intuition and the foresight of the Prophet; it was wholly moral.—F. D. MAURICE.

INSIGHT, sound, clear vision of the truth, wisdom at once piercing and comprehensive, the noblest and divinest achievements of the reason, demand serenity of soul as their imperative condition. Passion clouds the mental eye; emotion disturbs the organ of discovery; as the astronomer can only rely upon his nicest and loftiest observations when the air is still and the telescope is isolated from all the tremulous movements of terrestrial surroundings, so the thinker can only see justly and penetrate far, when all that could agitate his spirit is buried deep, or put quite away, or laid eternally to rest. The conscience must slumber either in conscious innocence or in recognized forgiveness; the aspirations and desires must be calm, simple, and chastened.—W. RATHBONE GREG.

'This is the law of the house; upon the top of the mountain the whole limit thereof round about shall be holy.'—EZEKIEL XLIII. 12.

THE once wealthy captives by the River Chebar were desiring to restore a society in which they should have the full swing of their tastes and appetites, and plenty of slaves to minister to them. And the false priests and false prophets were ready enough to encourage this opinion. They would have the fat of their sacrifices, they would have their obedient troop of female devotees to help them to hunt souls. All should come back again just as it was before; the same vanity, insolence, falsehood, devilry. That would be their mode of reviving a Divine society. But Ezekiel tells them it shall not be so at all.—F. D. MAURICE.

COMPARE Prof. Royce's satirical description (The Spirit of Modern Philosophy, p. 446) of a certain other type of mind to which 'there are no evils in society except competition and poverty, which will both cease so soon as we by chance fall to loving one another, and to owning the property of the nation in common. Crime is not a result of anything deep in human nature; selfishness is a mere incident of a defective social system. . . . Satan is mainly an invention of false theories of political economy. A single tax system, or a nationalized labour army, would end the sorrows of mankind.'

REFERENCES.—XLIII. 12.—H. W. Webb-Peploe, Calls to Holiness, p. 75. W. L. Watkinson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lli. 1897, p. 49. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1618. XLIII. 13.—J. Parker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 225; see also vol. liv. 1893, p. 262.

'Let it suffice you of all your abominations.'—EZEKIEL XLIV. 6. STILL I delayed to scorn and leave the bliss of earthly things. . . . Wretched, most wretched, I had begged chastity from Thee in my early youth, crying, 'Give me chastity, only not yet'. For I feared lest Thou shouldest hear me soon, and cure me soon of the disease of concupiscence, which I wished to have satisfied rather than extinguished.—AUGUSTINE, Confessions, viii. 7.

'They shall bear their shame, and their abominations which they have committed. But I will make them keepers of the charge of the house.'—EZEKIEL XLIV. 13, 14.

THE comparison thought, that profit accrues to a life by the wise memory of its past shortcomings, is brought out in Sir Henry Taylor's Notes on Life (p. 112): 'When the consequences of an error are irremediable, how often are those who would animadvert upon it met with the admonition to "let the past be past": as if the past had no relations with the future; and as if the experience of our errors of judgment, and the inquisition into their sources, did not, by its very painfulness, effect the deepest cultivation of the understanding—that cultivation whereby what is irremediable is itself converted into a remedy.'

'Execute judgment and justice, take away your exactions from My people, saith the Lord God.'—EZEKIEL XLV. 9.

A GREAT writer has said that 'grace was beauty in action'. I say that justice is truth in action.—BEACONSFIELD.

REFERENCES.—XLVI. 9.—J. Leckie, Sermons Preached at Ibrox, p. 210. XLVI. 16.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 54. XLVII. 1.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, p. 32. XLVII. 3, 4, 5.—F. B. Meyer, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 43.

'Afterwards he measured a thousand; and it was a river that I could not pass over; for the waters were risen; waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over.'—EZEKIEL XLVII. 5.

I TELL you, sirs, you must not trust your own apprehensions nor judgments of the mercy of God; you do not know how He can cause it to abound: that which seems to be short and shrunk up to you, He can draw out and cause to abound exceedingly. . . . This therefore is a wonderful thing, and shall be wondered at to all eternity, that the river of mercy, that at first did seem to be but ankle-deep, should so rise and rise that at last it became 'waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over'.—BUNYAN.

REFERENCES.—XLVII. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xviii. No. 1054. XLVII. 6, 12.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World

Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 337; see also Church Times, vol. lvi. 1907, p. 655. XLVII. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxi. No. 1852.

‘And it shall come to pass, that every thing that liveth, which moveth, whithersoever the rivers shall come, shall live.’—EZEKIEL XLVII. 9.

IN his famous Glasgow speech on Reform in 1866, John Bright closed by applying this passage, or reminiscences of it, to the great cause for which he pled. ‘We believe in a Supreme Ruler of the Universe. We believe in His omnipotence; we believe and we humbly trust in His mercy. We know that the strongest argument which is used against that belief by those who reject it, is an argument drawn from the misery and the helplessness and the darkness of so many of our race, even in countries which call themselves civilized and Christian. Is not that the fact? If I believed that this misery and this helplessness and this darkness could not be touched or transformed, I myself should be driven to admit the almost overwhelming force of that argument; but I am convinced that just laws and an enlightened administration of them would change the face of the country. I believe that ignorance and suffering might be lessened to an incalculable extent, and that many an Eden, beauteous in flowers and rich in fruit, might be raised up in the waste wilderness which spreads before us. . . . That is our faith, that is our purpose, that is our cry—let us try the nation.’

‘And there shall be a very great multitude of fish, because these waters shall come thither; for they shall be healed.’—EZEKIEL XLVII. 9.

Who is it that can live by grace? even none but those whose temper and constitution is suited to grace. Hence, as the grace of God is compared to a river, so those that live by grace are compared to fish; for that, as water is that element in which the fish liveth, so grace is that which is the life of the saint. Art thou a fish, man? Art thou a fish? Canst thou live in the water? Canst thou live always, and nowhere else but in the water? Is grace thy proper element.—BUNYAN.

REFERENCE.—XLVII. 9.—C. H. Parkhurst, A Little Lower than the Angels, p. 25.

‘It shall bring forth new fruit every month, because the waters thereof issue from out of the sanctuary.’—EZEKIEL XLVII. 12.

WE have been severely enough taught (if we were willing to learn) that our civilization, considered as a splendid material fabric, is helplessly in peril without the spiritual police of sentiments or ideal feelings. And it is this invisible police, which we had need, as a community, strive to maintain in efficient force.—GEORGE ELIOT, Essays of Theophrastus Such.

THERE is not a secular reform in the whole development of modern civilization which (if it is more than mechanical) has not drawn its inspiration from a religious principle. Infirmarys for the body have sprung out of pity to the soul; schools for the latter that free way may be opened to the spirit; sanitary laws, that the Diviner elements of human nature may not become incredible and hopeless from their foul environment. Nay what impulse would even science itself have had, if sustained only by the material utilities? what inspiring zeal, but for that secret wonder which feels the universe to be sacred, and is a virtual thirst for God?—MARTINEAU.

‘And by the river upon the bank thereof, shall grow all trees for meat . . . and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine.’—EZEKIEL XLVII. 12.

PART of the poetical works of Young, those of Watts, and of Cowper, have placed them among the permanent benefactors of mankind; as owing to them there is a popular poetry which has imparted, and is destined to impart, the best sentiments to innumerable minds. Works of great poetical genius that should be thus faithful to true religion, might be regarded as trees by the side of that ‘river of the water of life,’ having in their fruit and foliage a virtue to contribute to ‘the healing of the nations’.—JOHN FOSTER, On the Aversion of Men of Taste to Evangelical Religion, chap. ix.

THE IDEAL CITY

‘And the sanctuary shall be in the midst of it.’—EZEKIEL XLVIII. 8.

I. AND the sanctuary shall be in the midst of it. This need not startle us unduly; we come here somewhat suddenly upon a great philosophy: this is how all things are moulded and ruled and blessed. It is so in the case of the individual heart. It is a poor life that has not the sanctuary in the midst of it; it may be invisible: God is a Spirit, and not to be seen; to see Him is to annihilate Him. How poor a life it would be without the unseen, the invisible, the throbbing, trembling life just inside a palpitating veil. What is our life? Is the altar its main ornament and its principal force? Is the altar the centre of our life, a centre without which there would be no life? Do we take all our laws from God, now on stone, now on flowers, now on drops of April rain? Do we live and move and have our being in God? You have no life if you have not the altar or sanctuary in the midst of your very heart; without that your life is a kind of haphazard game; you will try this and plunge into that and adventure the other.

II. Think of a house without a sanctuary in the midst! Do not accept my definition of sanctuary, you are not bound to accept any man’s definition of that holy word, but you are bound as a man standing upright, with some touch of majesty about you, to have a secret sanctuary, a place of holy communion, from which you must for the moment banish your very dearest one that you may see One dearer still, and see that dearer One with the vision of the heart; then you are master of the day.

III. And so it is in life’s daily business; the sanctuary must be in the midst of it. We mistake the values and proportions of things. And a man is in such great haste to get away to his business, which only means, unless there be a high spiritual tone about the man’s very soul, that the business will one day go away from him. A curious life, a singular life, a ghostly life! Oh that men were wise! And so the altar must be in the City. The sanctuary must be in the midst of it.

IV. Did Jesus Christ ever say anything about this matter? Yes; He spoke upon every subject under heaven and above heaven. He gives you exactly this idea of the sanctuary of God being in the midst of the heart, the home, the business, and the City. He said, 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you'. What would He do? He would put the sanctuary in the midst, He would make the sanctuary and all that the word sanctuary implies the main thing in life. And I tell you that unless Christianity be the main thing it ought not to be in the life at all; it is the supreme truth, or is it an empty pretence and disappointing mockery. 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God.'—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 146.

'The Lord is there.'—EZEKIEL XLVIII. 35.

EZEKIEL, taught to feel the Divine nearness on a foreign soil, applied the words with a new meaning, and found in them a new measure of what was implied by the Divine nearness. The betrothed who delight themselves with planning the house they are to share together would settle every detail with a less loving elaboration than the exile who thus in spirit revisited his native city, and trod the courts of a new temple. To measure its walls and plan out even the out-houses that surrounded it was the pa-time of weary hours which the ebb of inspiration left empty and chill, and no civil duty or hope intervened to cheer and occupy.—MISS WEDGWOOD.

It is man's consolation that the future is to be a sunrise instead of a sunset. Time present works for time to come. Work then, and hope! Such is Ezekiel's cry. . . . As for the city built by him, he mutters above it this mysterious Name, Jehovah Shammah, which signifies 'The Eternal is there'. Then, standing silent in the darkness, he shows men, on the far horizon, an ever-widening space of azure sky.—VICTOR HUGO.

REFERENCE.—XLVIII. 35.—Silvester Whitehead, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1904, p. 56. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvii. No. 2182.

DANIEL

THE BOOK OF DANIEL

THE book of Daniel is the young man's guide-book. There were three stages in the courage of Daniel.

I. The Trial of the Flesh.—The curtain rises in Babylon. We see Daniel moving already in the higher circles. He puts a rein upon himself. He avoids all excesses. It was not that he had to resist the temptation of physical appetite. It was that he had to resist the temptation of being a man up to date. What he required was not self-restraint. It was courage. Babylon, like Rome, put a social imprimatur upon her practices; to refuse conformity was to incur ostracism. The man who resists them will require the spirit of a hero.

II. The Trial of the Intellect.—Daniel is poring over a problem. Nebuchadnezzar has had a dream. He has summoned what would now be called the Fellows of the Royal Society to interpret that dream. But he has accompanied the invitation with a threat: all who fail are to be put to death. Daniel was one of this Royal Society, and was therefore under the threat of the king. One could save the society. Daniel sets himself to solve the problem and to save his brethren. Daniel alone succeeded. Why? That which turned the scale between Daniel and his colleagues was courage. In the sphere of practical judgment humanity errs less from want of intellect than from want of nerve. There have been more prizes lost through excitement than through deficiency. But Daniel had ceased to fear for his life, because he had begun to fear for something else—the lives of others.

III. The Trial of the Spirit.—A singular decree had been promulgated by the court of Babylon. Prompted by jealousy of the rising Jewish favourite a powerful faction persuaded the weak Darius to test his loyalty by threatening his religion. They procured the passing of a law which enjoined on every man abstinence from prayer during the entire space of thirty days, and, as the penalty of transgression, sentenced every delinquent to the den of lions. Will he have any chance in the struggle? Yes, and he has won. Daniel has conquered the lions, has made them shut their mouths. By the very consciousness of superiority the meek have inherited the earth. Whence this unexpected pre-eminence? Let Daniel answer. He says that before receiving the kingdom, the form in the likeness of man 'came to the Ancient of Days'. He means that the secret of his power was an influence outside the cave—his religion. He was the only creature that made an approach to the Eternal.—G. MATHESON, Representative Men of the Bible, p. 381.

'Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem,' etc.—DANIEL 1. 2, 6.

I WAS taken captive when nearly sixteen years of age. I did not know the true God; and I was taken to Ireland in captivity with so many thousand men, in accordance with our deserts, because we departed from God and kept not His precepts.—ST. PATRICK'S Confessions.

'But Daniel purposed in his heart.'—DANIEL 1. 8.

THE strangeness of foreign life threw me back into myself.—NEWMAN, Apologia, I.

DANIEL'S SELF-DENIAL

'But Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, nor with the wine which he drank: therefore he requested of the prince of the eunuchs that he might not defile himself.'—DANIEL 1. 8.

WE are told about a great many good men in the pages of the Bible: some who were generally beloved by God, as the Prophet Daniel; some who found grace in the eyes of Jehovah, as Noah. It is instructive and interesting to investigate why these men found grace and why they were beloved.

I. The Life of Noah.—If we examine the life of Noah, we find that he had at least four characteristics:—

- (a) He was obedient to God.
- (b) He had faith in God.
- (c) He revered God.
- (d) He worshipped God.

We can thus see to some extent why he found grace in the eyes of Jehovah. The life of Noah, like every other life in the Old Testament, is meant to be an example to us, to show what our lives should be or what they ought not to be.

II. The Life of Daniel.—Again, if we investigate the life of Daniel, we can see some reasons why he was greatly beloved:—

- (a) He obeyed.
- (b) He resisted temptation.
- (c) He held fast to that which was right.
- (d) He was tempted, yet he refused to partake of the king's meat and imbibe of the king's wine.

He had his reward from God, and also in the worldly sense; for we are told that at the end of ten days after his abstinence his countenance appeared fair, and he was fatter in the flesh than all the others who did eat of the king's meat. Daniel lived at a court where there was much intemperance, much luxury, and much idolatry; and, therefore, thought it his duty in the circumstances to abstain from the king's meat and drink, as from things offered to idols. We need not necessarily suppose that Daniel was a temperance advocate. We have no reason to think that he regarded wine as a pernicious, deadly thing ; but he thought it his duty, because of the occasion and the surroundings, to do without it.

REFERENCES.—I. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2291. I. 8-21.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Daniel, p. 40.

'Give us pulse to eat, and water to drink.'—DANIEL I. 12 f.

SEE ADDISON'S Spectator (No. 195), and DANTE'S Purgatorio, xxii. 145.

'And Daniel continued even unto the first year of king Cyrus.'—DANIEL I. 21.

Most failures lie in not going on long enough. I heard a man in a meeting in the country long ago say, that one of the most encouraging verses he knew was a verse of common metre to this effect :—

Go on, go on, go on, etc.

—JAMES SMETHAM.

WHAT is commonly admired as successful talent is far more a firm realizing grasp of some great principle, and that power of developing it in all directions, and that nerve to abide faithful to it, which is involved in such a true apprehension.—NEWMAN.

REFERENCE.—II.—J. G. Murphy, The Book of Daniel, p. 85.

'Nebuchadnezzar's image.'—DANIEL II.-III.

SEE KEBLE'S lines on 'Monday in Whitsunweek'.

SUCCESSIVE MONARCHIES

DANIEL II. 1-30.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR has a dream sent him by God.

I. Strange as the vision had been it had left no clear impression upon his mind, but only a vague sense of great terror. He sent for the wise men of the kingdom, but for such a dilemma their art provided them with no expedient. The king threatens them and their families with death unless they make known to him his dream as well as its interpretation.

II. The king commands that all the wise men of Babylon shall be put to death. Among these were Daniel and his companions. Daniel lost neither his faith nor his presence of mind. He is taken into the king's presence, and time is granted him, and a respite for the rest, upon his promising to show the king on the day following his dream and its interpretation.

III. Daniel goes then to some apartment in the college at Babylon occupied by him in common with the wise men, and asks others to join him in prayer. They prayed 'concerning the secret' and 'then was the secret revealed to Daniel in a night vision'.

IV. And now, in full possession of the secret, Daniel goes to Arioch and demands an immediate audience of the king. It is a grand and noble speech which Daniel addresses to the king. He claims no special skill ; no illumination from any earthly source, that has taught him what had troubled the king upon his bed in night vision. It was a higher power that had sent the vision, and its object was to reveal what shall be in the latter days.—R. PAYNE SMITH, Daniel, p. 37.

REFERENCES.—II. 3.—Bishop Boyd Carpenter, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxvi. p. 8. II. 3-5.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. ii. p. 183. II. 21.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, p. 37.

AFTER THAT, THE DARK

'He knoweth what is in the darkness.'—DANIEL II. 22.

WHEN the Bible tells us that God knows a thing we have to widen the thought of knowledge a good deal. So much of our knowledge is merely speculative, not vitally linked with life and character, that we are apt to forget that all God's thought and love really lie latent in what He knows.

I. He knoweth what is in the darkness of the heart. In the most ordinary life are depths you cannot fathom. In your own heart is a darkness that you never penetrated. If we could only see into the gloom as God sees we should not surprise each other as we do. We are all far more mysterious than we know. 'The roots of our best and our worst are in the darkness. It is that that makes a man lean hard on God, and say He knows what is in the darkness.' Now no man can doubt God's knowledge of that realm who will seriously read the life of Jesus Christ. Few things arrest us more in that high story than how Jesus explained men and women to themselves. It was the witness and proof upon the stage of history that He knoweth what is in the darkness of the heart.

The thought has a twofold bearing upon practice.

(a) It is first a great comfort when we are misunderstood.

(b) It is a caution against judging others.

II. He knoweth what is in the darkness of the lot. Now if there is one thing on earth it is hard to understand, it is the meaning and the content of life's darkness. There is an element of surprise in all affliction. And it is then, finding that flesh is vain, and turning full-faced to the Eternal God, we hear the exquisite music of our text, 'He knoweth what is in the darkness'.

III. He knoweth what is in the darkness of the future. I think we are all agreed that it is a very merciful provision that God has hidden the to-morrow from us. Of course to a certain limited extent we do see into the darkness of to-morrow. We live in a world of most inflexible law, and as a man soweth, so also shall he reap. But after all it is a limited vision. The fact remains that in His infinite pity we are shielded and safe-guarded by our ignorance ; and the quiet thinker will waken every morning saying to his own heart 'God knows'.—G. H. MORRISON, Sun-Rise, p. 183.

'The image seen by the king.'—DANIEL II. 33.

I AM not one who in the least doubts or disputes the progress of this century in many things useful to mankind ; but it seems to me a very dark sign respecting us that we look with so much indifference upon dishonesty and cruelty in the pursuit of wealth. In the dream of Nebuchadnezzar it was only the feet that were part of iron and part of clay ; but many of us are now getting so cruel in our avarice, that it seems as if, in us the heart were part of iron, part of clay.—RUSKIN in The Two Paths.

IN Nebuchadnezzar's image, the lower the members, the coarser the metal; the further off the time, the more unfit. To-day is the golden opportunity, to-morrow will be the silver season, next day but the brazen one, and so long till at last I shall come to the toes of clay, and be turned to dust. Grant therefore that to-day I may hear Thy voice. And if this day be ob-cure in the calendar, and remarkable in itself for nothing else, give me to make it memorable in my soul, thereupon, by Thy assistance, beginning the reformation of my life.—THOMAS FULLER.

THE KINGDOM OF THE SAINTS

*The stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth.'—DANIEL II. 35.

EVEN one poor coincidence in the history of Rome, viz. of the anticipated and the actual duration of its greatness, does not fail to arrest our attention. We know that even before the Christian era it was the opinion of the Roman augurs, that the twelve vultures which Romulus had seen previous to the foundation of the city, represented the twelve centuries, assigned as the limit of its power; an anticipation which was singularly fulfilled by the event. Yet what is this solitary fact to the series of varied and circumstantial prophecies which ushered in, and were fulfilled in Christianity? Extend the twelve centuries of Roman dominion to an additional half of that period, preserve its monarchical form inviolate, whether from aristocratic or popular innovation, from first to last, and trace back the predictions concerning it, through an antecedent period, nearly of the same duration, and then you will have assimilated its history—not altogether, but in one or two of its features—to the characteristics of the Gospel Dispensation. As it is, this Roman wonder only serves to assist the imagination in embracing the marvellousness of those systematic prophecies concerning Christ's kingdom, which, from their number, variety, succession, and contemporary influence, may almost be accounted in themselves, and without reference to their fulfilment, a complete and independent dispensation.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCE.—II. 36-49.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Daniel, p. 48.

*The fourth kingdom . . . shall break in pieces and crush.'—DANIEL II. 40.

LET'S have no more dominant races; we don't want them; they only turn men into insolent brutes.—BURNE-JONES.

The toes of the feet were part of iron and part of clay.'—DANIEL II. 42, 43.

THERE be also two false Peaces, or Unities; the one, when the Peace is grounded, but upon an implicit ignorance; For all Colours will agree in the Darke. The other, when it is peeced up, upon a direct Admission of Contraries, in Fundamental Points. For Truth and Falsehood, in such things, are like the Iron and Clay in the toes of Nebuchadnezzar's Image; They may Cleave, but they will not Incorporate.—BACON.

THE image that appeared to King Nebuchadnezzar in a dream was made of gold, of silver, of iron, and of clay. The idol of this world differs from that seen by the Babylonian monarch; for it is all gold—pure gold—and does not even possess the humanity of clay.—SIR ARTHUR HELPS.

REFERENCE.—II. 44.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. I. p. 44.

'The stone brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold.'—DANIEL II. 45.

CHRIST'S religion was not a mere creed or philosophy. A creed or a philosophy need not have interfered with kingdoms of this world, but might have existed under the Roman Empire, or under the Persian. No; Christ's kingdom was a counter kingdom. It occupied ground; it claimed to rule over those whom hitherto this world's governments ruled over without rival; and if this world's governments would not themselves acknowledge and submit to its rule, and rule under and according to its laws, it 'broke in pieces' those governments.—NEWMAN.

'Then Daniel requested of the king, and he set Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, over the affairs of the province of Babylon.'—DANIEL II. 49.

WHEN Omar Khayyám was a pupil of the Imám Howaffah at Naishapur, he struck up a friendship with two other pupils who were of his own age, Hasam and Nizam. One day they made a covenant and pledge with one another that whoever should gain a high position, should share his good fortune with his less favoured companions. The vow, it seems, was kept. Nizam became vizier, and did not forget his friends, both of whom received from him or through him what they desired.

'Daniel was in the gate of the king.'—DANIEL II. 49.

BEFORE I was humbled I was like a stone lying in deep mud; and He who is mighty came, and in His own mercy raised me, and lifted me up, and placed me on the top of the wall. . . . And me—who am detested by this world—He has inspired beyond others (if indeed I be such), but on condition that with fear and reverence, and without complaining, I should faithfully serve the nation to which the love of Christ has transferred me.—ST. PATRICK'S Confessions.

'Nebuchadnezzar the king made an image of gold, whose height was threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof six cubits.'—DANIEL III. 1.

BENTLEY'S first year at Trinity is marked by at least one event altogether fortunate—his marriage. At Bishop Stillingfleet's he had met Miss Joanna Bernard, daughter of Sir John Bernard, of Brampton, Huntingdonshire. 'Being now raised to a station of dignity and consequence, he succeeded in obtaining the object of his affections,' says Dr. Monk—who refuses to believe a story that the engagement was nearly broken off owing to a doubt expressed by Bentley with regard to the authority of the book of Daniel. Whiston has told us what this alleged doubt was. Nebuchadnezzar's golden image is described as sixty cubits high and six cubits broad. Now, said Bentley, this is out of all proportion; it ought to have been ten cubits broad at least, 'which made the good lady weep'. The lovers' difference was possibly arranged on the basis suggested by Whiston—that the sixty cubits included the pedestal.—SIR R. C. JEBB'S Bentley, pp. 97, 98.

'All the people fell down and worshipped the golden image.'
—DANIEL III. 7.

WHEN he was away from his beloved Hanover, everything remained there exactly as in the prince's presence. There were eight hundred horses in the stables, there was all the apparatus of chamberlains, court-marshals, and equeries; and court assemblies were held every Saturday, where all the nobility of Hanover assembled at what I can't but think a fine and touching ceremony. A large arm-chair was placed in the assembly-room, and on it the king's portrait. The nobility advanced, and made a bow to the arm-chair, and to the image which Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up; and spoke under their voices before the august picture, just as they would have done had the king Churfürst been present himself.—THACKERAY'S The Four Georges: 'George the Second'.

'Be it known to thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods.'
—DANIEL III. 8-18.

HERE were they who formerly resolved not to defile themselves with the king's meat, and now they as bravely resolved not to defile themselves with his gods. Note—a steadfast, self-denying adherence to God and duty in lesser instances will qualify and prepare us for the like in greater.—MATTHEW HENRY.

REFERENCES.—III. 9.—J. Baines, Twenty Sermons, p. 29. III. 13-25.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Daniel, p. 55.

'Is it of set purpose that ye worship not the golden image which I have set up?'—DANIEL III. 14 f.

WHOM shall I honour, whom shall I refuse to honour? If a man have any precious thing in him at all, certainly the most precious of all gifts he can offer is his approbation, his reverence to another man. This is his very soul, this fealty which he swears to another: his personality itself, with whatever it has of eternal and Divine, he bends here in reverence before another. Not lightly will a man give this—if he is still a man. . . . Will a man's soul worship that, think you? Never; if you fashioned him of solid gold, big as Benlomond, no heart of a man would ever look on him except with sorrow and despair. To the flunky heart alone is he, was he, or can he at any time be, a thing to look upon with upturned eyes of 'transcendent admiration,' worship, or worshipship so-called.—CARLYLE, Latter-day Pamphlets: 'Hudson's Statue'.

REFERENCES.—III. 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1930. III. 16-18.—F. J. A. Hort, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 203. C. Kingsley, The Good News of God, p. 31. Bishop Harvey Goodwin, Parish Sermons (3rd Series), p. 27. H. M. Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 147. J. Baldwin Brown, The Sunday Afternoon, p. 167. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvii. No. 2217. F. Bourdillon, Plain Sermons for Family Reading (2nd Series), p. 42.

'We will not.'—DANIEL III. 18.

THE Reformer's chief business always is to destroy falsehood, to drag down the temple of imposture, where idols hold the place of the Almighty.

The growth of Christianity at the beginning was precisely this. The early martyrs . . . died, it cannot be too clearly remembered, for a negation. The last confession before the praetor, the words on which their fate depended, were not, 'We do believe,' but 'We do not believe'. 'We will not, to save our miserable lives, take a lie between our lips, and say we think what we do not think.'—FROUDE.

REFERENCES.—III. 18.—H. J. Hastings, Sermons—Trinity to Advent, p. 299. Bishop Harvey Goodwin, Parish Sermons, vol. iii. p. 17. Cecil, Works, vol. iii. p. 196. Roberts, Plain Sermons, vol. ii. p. 241. Kingsley, 'Song of Three Children,' Good News of God, Sermon IV. John Foster, Lectures (2nd Series), p. 100. W. M. Taylor, Daniel the Beloved, chap. iv. Homiletic Quarterly, vol. v. p. 517. Geikie's Hours With the Bible, vol. vi. p. 278. Kennedy, Christian World Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 260. Stanley Leathes, Christian World Pulpit, vol. iv. p. 289. Coster, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xviii. p. 101. Stanley, Jewish Church, vol. iii. p. 31. Spurgeon, Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, vol. xi. No. 662, and see Expositor (2nd Series), vol. viii. p. 223; (3rd Series), vol. i. p. 217. J. Keble, Sermons for the Sundays After Trinity, p. 251.

'Lo, I see four men loose.'—DANIEL III. 24 f.

SEE KEBLE'S lines on 'The Nineteenth Sunday After Trinity'.

'The fiery furnace.'—DANIEL III. 24, 25.

THAT Babylon has fallen; but there is another Babylon which still goes on, and always will go on, till Christ comes again to judgment. There is the overwhelming and overawing spectacle of this world, with its pomps and glories. Its look is lofty, and it speaks great things, and its vast array is ever before us. We cannot get away from it. Go where we will it follows us. It is a vision before our minds if not a sight before our eyes; it is the scene of Babylonian power and greatness still going on, though in another form, and accommodated to every age in succession. . . . Men reject everywhere the office of witnessing to Divine truth; they throw it off as an obstacle, a shackle, and a burden, something that stands in their way, and prevents them from being friends with the world, and from getting on in the world. They know the truth, but will not witness to it. They know that the world is transitory, and they act as if it were eternal. . . . Yet we may venture to say, and with certainty, that never, on any occasion, by any one of the humblest servants of God, was this office of witness to the truth executed without a reward. Never in this mixed world did a Christian soul offer to God the sacrifice of a practical confession of Him, by standing apart from the ways of the world—not accepting its voice, not yielding to its spells, or being overawed by its show: never did any one face any measure of adversity or gloom, or isolation or deprivation, as the consequence and penalty of bearing witness to the truth and expressing that truth in action, but he had, like the three witnesses, in that adversity a companion.—MOZLEY.

THE FURNACE OF AFFLICTION

‘Did not we cast three men bound into the midst of the fire? . . . Lo, I see four men loose . . . and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God.’—DANIEL III. 24, 25.

THE lessons from this wonderful story are on the surface.

I. Those who are Faithful to God must reckon on being Cast into the Furnace of Persecution.—

‘All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution.’ For a time, and along considerable tracts of their experience and intercourse with the world, it may go well with them, as it did with those good and brave Hebrew youths. But when images must be worshipped, or even spoken respectfully of, the case is altered. Slavish compliance with all the customs of the society in which you move, discreet silence, at least, over undoubted wrongdoing, worshipping of certain fashionable idols, all this is demanded by the world, and cannot be given by the faithful follower of Christ. Such collisions kindle the fiery furnace as naturally as the striking of the flint by the steel kindles sparks. It may be gross and declared persecution, it may be coarse mockery or refined sneering, it may be quiet and persistent ignoring of your claims—in one way or another the furnace will be lighted, and you will be cast into it.

II. God will Preserve Those who are Cast into that Furnace for His Sake.—One ‘like the Son of God’ will remain by their side. Nothing knits true friends together like calamity; and Jesus is the Friend that sticketh closer than a brother. The faithful follower of Christ feels his Saviour nearest when men are most estranged, and know Him kindest when the furnace is hottest.

III. Those who Remain Faithful to Christ ‘have no Hurt’.—How many are soured, made selfish and querulous and jealous and melancholy, by their troubles! But he who has the fellowship of Christ in them, standing true to his Master in spite of them, comes through them all unhurt. His nature is refined, not corroded by them. He comes forth from the furnace as gold seven times tried, a vessel meet for the use of the Master.

IV. Those who Remain Faithful to Christ have Liberty given to Them.—Only one thing was burned in that fierce furnace, and that was the fetters by which they had been bound. They were loose, walking in ‘the midst of the fire’. If we are humble and Christlike, feeling that we have Christ’s presence with us in the midst of our troubles, we shall take to them kindly and feel free in the midst of them. When self is utterly sacrificed, and compromises, which are the miserable bonds between the world and Christ, are burned in the fiery furnace, then you are Christ’s freemen, and stand in the liberty wherewith He has made you free.

REFERENCES.—III. 25.—J. C. M. Bellew, Sermons, vol. I. p. 23. Bishop Bickersteth, ibid. p. 253.

‘The fire had no power over their bodies.’—DANIEL III. 27.

‘WHEN a child,’ says Thomas Fuller, ‘I loved to look on the pictures in the Book of Martyrs. I thought that there the martyrs at the stake seemed like the three children in the fiery furnace, ever since I had known them there, not one hair more of their head was burnt, nor any smell of the fire singeing of their clothes. This made me think martyrdom was nothing. But, oh! though the lion be painted fiercer than he is, the fire is far fiercer than it is painted. Thus it is easy for one to endure an affliction, as he limns it out in his own fancy, and represents it to himself but in a bare speculation. But when it is brought indeed, and laid home to us, there must be a man, yea, there must be God to assist the man, to undergo it.’

‘And I Nebuchadnezzar was at rest in my house, and flourishing in my palace. I saw a dream which made me afraid.’—DANIEL IV. 4, 5.

‘REMEMBER,’ Mr. F. W. H. Myers once wrote to a friend, ‘that first of all a man must, from the torpor of a foul tranquillity, have his soul delivered unto war.’

REFERENCE.—IV. 4, 5, 7.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. ii. p. 183.

‘Thou art grown and become strong.’—DANIEL IV. 22-30.

CAN we believe that He whose words were so terrible against the pride of Egypt and Babylon, against that haughty insolence in men on which not Hebrew prophets only, but the heathen poets of Greece, looked with such peculiar and profound alarm,—that He will not visit it on those who, in their measure, are responsible for its words and temper, when it takes possession of a Christian nation? Can we doubt what His judgment will one day be on the cynical parade of exclusive selfishness, the cynical worship of mere dexterity and adroitness, in the sophists and tyrants of the old heathen world; and can we doubt what He will think when Christians, disciples of the Lord of truth and righteousness, let themselves be dazzled in matters of right and wrong, by the cleverness of intellectual fence? . . . We have almost elevated pride to the rank of a national virtue; so far from seeing any harm in it, we extol it as a noble and admirable thing. You see it unconsciously revealed in the look and bearing which meet you constantly in society and in the streets. You see it in that tone of insolence which seems to come so naturally to many of us in the expression of our disapproval and antipathy.—R. W. CHURCH.

‘Wherefore, O king, break off thine iniquities by shewing mercy to the poor.’—DANIEL IV. 27.

We can figure the thought of Louis that day, when, all royally caparisoned for hunting, he met, at some sudden turning in the wood of Senart, a ragged peasant with a coffin: 'For whom?'—It was for a poor brother slave, whom Majesty had sometimes noticed slaving in those quarters. 'What did he die of?'—'Of hunger':—the king gave his steed the spur.—CARLYLE.

A DECENT provision for the poor is the true test of civilization.—DR. JOHNSON.

'Is not this great Babylon which I have built for the royal dwelling place, for the glory of my majesty?'—DANIEL IV. 30.

KINGSLEY, writing of Sir Walter Raleigh's haughty temper, observes: 'Proud? No wonder if the man be proud! "Is not this great Babylon, which I have built?" And yet all the while he has the most affecting consciousness that all this is not God's will, but the will of the flesh; that the house of fame is not the house of God; that its floor is not the rock of ages, but the sea of glass mingled with fire, which may crack beneath him at any moment, and let the nether flame burst up. He knows he is living in a splendid lie.'

In the preface to his Bible in Spain, Borrow attributes Spanish cruelties in religion not to fanaticism, but to the way in which Rome worked on the predominant feeling of pride in the Spanish nature: 'It was by humouring her pride that she was induced to waste her precious blood and treasure in Low Country wars, to launch the Armada, and to many other insane actions. Love of Rome had ever slight influence over her policy; but flattered by the title of Gontaloniera of the Vicar of Jesus, and eager to prove herself not unworthy of the same, she shut her eyes, and rushed upon her own destruction with the cry of "Charge Spain".'

'Nebuchadnezzar's confession.'—DANIEL IV. 30-37.

SORROW, pain, and death are sweet to whosoever dares, instead of fighting with or flying from them, to draw near, to examine closely, to inquire humbly, into their nature and their function. He began to perceive that these three reputed enemies, hated and feared of all men, are, after all, the fashioners and teachers of humanity; to whom it is given to keep hearts pure, godly, and compassionate, to purge away the dross of pride, hardness, and arrogance, to break the iron bands of ambition, self-love, and vanity, to purify by endurance and by charity.—LUCAS MALET, Sir Richard Calmady.

THE greatest obstacle to any improvement or change in John Bull's sentiments just now is the egregious vanity of the beast. He has been so plastered with flattery, that he has become an impervious mass of self-esteem. Nothing is so difficult as to alter the policy of individuals or nations who allow themselves to be persuaded that they are the 'envy of surrounding nations and the admiration of the world'. Time and adversity can alone operate in such cases.—CORDEN to John Bright, in 1851.

REFERENCE.—IV. 34, 35.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 949.

'They shall make thee to eat grass . . . till thou know that the Most High ruleth.'—DANIEL IV. (25), 37.

THIS Nebuchadnezzar curse, that sends men to grass like oxen, seems to follow but too closely on the excess or continuance of national power and peace. In the perplexities of nations, in their struggle for existence, in their infancy, their impotence, or even their disorganization, they have higher hopes and nobler passions. Out of the suffering comes the serious mind; out of the salvation, the grateful heart; out of endurance, fortitude; out of deliverance, faith.—RUSKIN, Modern Painters.

I FOUND occasion at this time to conclude, that the Unio of our river fords secretes pearls so much more frequently than the Unionidæ and Anadonta of our still pools and lakes, not from any specific peculiarity in the constitution of the creature, but from the effects of the habitat which it is its nature to choose. It receives in the fords and shallows of a rapid river many a rough blow from sticks and pebbles carried down in times of flood, and occasionally from the feet of men and animals that cross the stream during droughts; and the blows induce the morbid secretions of which pearls are the result. There seems to exist no inherent cause why Anadon cygnea, with its beautiful silvery nacre—as bright often, and always more delicate than that of Unio margaritifera—should not be equally productive of pearls; but, secure from violence in its still pools and lakes, it does not produce a single pearl for a hundred that are ripened into value and beauty by the exposed, current-tossed Unionidæ of our rapid mountain rivers. Would that hardship and suffering bore always in a creature of a greatly higher family similar results, and that the hard buffets dealt him by fortune in the rough stream of life could be transmuted, by some blessed internal predisposition of his nature, into pearls of great price.—HUGH MILLER, My Schools and Schoolmasters.

'I Nebuchadnezzar.'—DANIEL IV. 37.

EXPRESS confessions give definiteness to memories that might more easily melt away without them.—GEORGE ELIOT.

REFERENCE.—IV. 37.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Sundays After Trinity, 262.

'Belshazzar the king made a great feast.'—DANIEL V. 1.

POMP, in our apprehension, was an idea of two categories; the pompous might be spurious, but it might also be genuine. It is well to love the simple—we love it; nor is there any opposition at all between that and the very glory of pomp. But, as we once put the case to Lamb, if, as a musician, as the leader of a mighty orchestra, you had this theme offered to you—'Belshazzar the king gave a great feast to a thousand of his lords'—. . . surely no man would deny that, in such a case, simplicity, though in a passive sense not lawfully absent, must stand aside as totally insufficient for the positive part. Simplicity might guide, even here, but could not furnish the power; a rudder it might be, but not an oar or a sail.—DE QUINCEY on Charles Lamb.

SEE BYRON'S Hebrew Melodies, 'The Vision of Belshazzar'.

'Then was the king greatly troubled.'—DANIEL v. 1-17.

FROM the words of Daniel it appears that Belshazzar had made a great feast to a thousand of his lords, and drank wine before the thousand. The golden and silver vessels are gorgeously enumerated, with the princes, the king's concubines, and his wives. Then follows—'In the same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand, and wrote over against the candlestick upon the plaster of the wall of the king's palace; and the king saw the part of the hand that wrote.' Then the king's countenance was changed, and his thoughts troubled him, so that the joints of his loins were loosened, and his knees smote one against another.' This is the plain text. By no hint can it be otherwise inferred, but that the appearance was solely confined to the fancy of Belshazzar, that his single brain was troubled. Not a word is spoken of its being seen by any one else there present, not even by the queen herself, who merely undertakes for the interpretation of the phenomena as related to her, doubtless by her husband. The lords are simply said to be astonished, i.e. at the trouble and change of countenance in their sovereign. Even the Prophet does not appear to have seen the scroll which the king saw. He recalls it only. He speaks of the phantom as past.—FROM CHARLES LAMB'S essay on The Barrenness of the Imaginative Faculty in the Productions of Modern Art.

'A great feast.'—DANIEL v. 2 f.

If men love the pleasure of eating, if they allow themselves to love this pleasure, if they find it good, there is no limit to the augmentation of the pleasure, no limit beyond which it may not grow. The satisfaction of a need has limits, but pleasure has none. . . . And, strange to say, men who daily overeat themselves at such dinners—in comparison with which the feast of Belshazzar, that evoked the prophetic warning, was as nothing—are naïvely persuaded that they may yet be leading a moral life.—TOLSTOY.

BELSHAZZAR'S FEAST

'In the same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand.'—DANIEL v. 5, 6.

I. The Awakening of a Guilty Conscience.

- (a) When least expected.
- (b) When least desired.

II. The Manner of its Awakening.

By the finger of God.

- (a) Without commotion.
- (b) Without warning.

III. The Effect of the Awakening.

Physical and mental distress.

IV. The Doom which it Foreshadowed.

In that night was Belshazzar slain.—F. J. AUSTIN, Seeds and Saplings, p. 36.

REFERENCE.—V. 6.—H. J. Wilmot-Burton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 270. V. 16.—H. Bushnell, Sermons on Living Subjects, p. 166. V. 17.—Reuben Thomas, Christian World Pulpit, 1891. V. 17-31.—A. MacLaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Daniel, p. 62.

'Thou hast not humbled thine heart.'—DANIEL v. 22.

THE late Mr. F. W. H. Myers, speaking of his early passion for the classics, confesses that they 'were but intensifications of my own being. They drew from me and fostered evil as well as good; they might aid imaginative impulse and detachment from sordid interests, but they had no check for pride.'

THE GLORY OF GOD

'The God in Whose hand thy breath is, and Whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified.'—DANIEL v. 23.

I. MAN exists for the glory of God. This is a theological assertion which no professing Christian would challenge, though few have an adequate apprehension of its truth. In what sense, then, is the glory of God the end and object of man's existence? Whatever else man can do or cannot do, it is altogether beyond his power to diminish or add to the eternal glory of the Deity. The character of God is and must be beyond our reach. And yet nothing is more plain in God's Word than that, in some way or another, we are sent into the world that we may glorify Him. How can we do this, if He is so far beyond our reach? We cannot increase God's absolute glory; but it is possible for us to pass that glory on into regions where it has not yet been realized. Thus it is the duty and blessed privilege of man to glorify God—

1. By witnessing to the power of His grace to sustain, defend, and exalt the soul that by faith commits itself to Him, Who is thus seen perfecting His strength in human weakness.

2. By the voluntary acceptance of the Divine Will as the law of human conduct. Revelation has made known to us that the authority of God has been challenged by the fallen intelligences of evil. To such a challenge the child of God responds by accepting the Will of God as the law of his life, and is himself a standing testimony to the perfection of that Will.

3. By so submitting himself here to the Divine Will that he may hereafter triumphantly bear witness, for all eternity, to the perfection of that Divine Will.

4. By the voluntary acceptance of the Divine Will; thus bearing an indirect but eloquent testimony to the perfections of the Divine character, and giving a triumphant answer to Satan—the slanderer of God to man.

II. We shall, perhaps, best understand the full force of the accusation against Belshazzar, and against many now, by considering, How it is possible for us to dishonour God, or to rob God of His glory.

1. We cannot dishonour God more than by ignoring Him altogether. The worst form of insult is, to cut a man dead, as you pass him. How many there are who are dishonouring God by ignoring Him! Ask yourselves how far would your life have been different if you had been brought up to believe that there was no God? Would you have been a very different person from what you are? You have lived many years in the world: how many of those years have you consciously spent for God's glory?—how many days?—how many hours in a single day? Have you ever definitely regarded God's glory as the thing for which you live? How far have your work and conduct been influenced by the fear and love of God and the desire to advance His glory?

2. We dishonour God when we repudiate the means of salvation which He, at an infinite cost, has provided for us. We are then acting as though we could dispense with His assistance. It is quite possible for us to dishonour God, and to decline to glorify Him, even when we are recognizing Him. We may admit the truth and beauty of those words which describe the object and scope of our Saviour's mission: 'The Son of Man has come to seek and to save that which was lost'. But, before we can understand that infinite Love, we must apprehend that sin has placed us in that position described by the terrible word 'lost'. And here our respectability cries out and protests: 'My life has been a moral and religious one, and I really do not require this provision of Divine Love'; 'My life, though not perfect, has been such a good sort of life that God cannot have much against me; and I am content to take my chance'. Thus you are practically calling the Cross of Calvary a superfluous display of Divine love, and despising the mercy of God by turning your back on His 'unspeakable gift'.

3. We dishonour God when we appropriate to some other use that which He has designed for Himself.

III. Remember—God will not be baffled. He holds your breath; all your ways belong to Him; your 'times are in His hand'; you are surrounded by God's claim, and you cannot get away from it. The everlasting God will have His meed of glory out of every man. He desires it in the voluntary offering of the whole man, body, soul, and spirit, to Him; to have it in the joyful, holy dedication of our whole nature to Him, to Whom it belongs. But, if He may not have it so, He will have it otherwise.

'Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin.'—DANIEL v. 25 f.

In describing the squalor of Vauxhall Walk, Lambeth, Wilkie Collins observes that 'in this district, as in other districts remote from the wealthy quarters of the metropolis, the hideous London vagabond—with the filth of the street outmatched in his talk, with the mud of the street out-dirtied in his clothes—lounges, lowering and brutal, at the street corner and the gin-shop door; the public disgrace of his country, the unheeded warning of social troubles that are yet to come. Here the loud assertion of modern progress—which has reformed so much in manners, and altered so little in man—meets the flat contradiction that scatters its pretensions to the winds. Here, while the national prosperity feasts, like another Belshazzar, on the spectacle of its own magnificence, is the writing on the wall, which warns the monarch, Money, that his glory is weighed in the balance, and his power found wanting.'—From No Name, scene III. i.

Describing the later days of Raleigh's career at Court, Kingsley sums up the tale of his fopperies with the words: 'But enough of these toys, while God's handwriting is on the wall above all heads. Raleigh knows the handwriting is there. . . . Tragic enough are the after-scenes of Raleigh's life; but most tragic of all are these scenes of vain-glory, in which he sees the better part, and yet chooses the worse, and pours out his self-discontent in song which proves the fountain of delicacy and beauty which lies pure and bright beneath the gaudy, artificial crust. What might not this man have been! And he knows that too. . . . Anything to forget the handwriting on the wall, which will not be forgotten.'

'Tekel'. Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting.'—DANIEL v. 27.

In the Spectator (No. 493) Addison describes a dream of a pair of golden scales which showed the exact value of everything that is in esteem among men. Among the experiments which he made with this balance was the following: 'Having an opportunity of this nature in my Hands, I could not forbear throwing into one scale the principles of a Tory, and into the other those of a Whig; but as I have all along declared this to be a Neutral paper, I shall likewise desire to be silent under this Head, also, though upon examining one of the weights, I saw the word TEKEL engraved on it in Capital Letters.'

In his Bible in Spain Borrow describes his feelings when he boldly opened a shop in Madrid for the sale of Testaments. "'How strangely times alter," said I, the second day subsequent to the opening of my establishment, as I stood on the opposite side of the street, surveying my shop, on the windows of which were painted in large yellow characters, Despacho de la Sociedad Biblica y Estrangera; "how strangely times alter. . . . Pope of Rome! Pope of Rome! look to thyself. That shop may be closed; but oh! what a sign of the times, that it has been permitted to exist for one day. It appears to me, my Father, that the days of your sway are numbered in Spain; that you will not be permitted much longer to plunder her, to scoff at her, and to scourge her with scorpions, as in bygone periods. See I not the hand on the wall? See I not in yonder letters a Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin? Look to thyself Batushea."

REFERENCES.—V. 27.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Bible Object Lessons, p. 20. H. S. Lunn, Christian World Pulpit, 3 Sept. 1890. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. II. p. 63. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 257.

'Belshazzar was slain, and Darius the Mede took the kingdom.'—DANIEL v. 30, 31.

KINGS and Emperors have long ago arranged for themselves a system like that of a magazine-rifle: as soon as one bullet has been discharged, another takes its place. Le roi est mort, vive le roi! So what is the use of killing them?—TOLSTOY.

'An excellent spirit was in him,' etc.—DANIEL VI. 3, 4.

WHATEVER the world thinks, he who hath not much meditated upon God, the human soul, and the summum bonum, may possibly make a thriving earthworm, but will most indubitably make a sorry patriot and a sorry statesman.—BERKELEY.

'Forasmuch as he was faithful.'—DANIEL VI. 4.

THAT we have little faith is not sad, but that we have but little faithfulness. By faithfulness faith is earned. When, in the progress of a life, a man swerves, though only by an angle infinitely small, from his proper and allotted path (and this is never done quite unconsciously even at first; in fact that was his broad and scarlet sin—oh, he knew of it more than he can tell), then the drama of his life turns to tragedy, and makes haste to its fifth act.—THOREAU'S Letters.

'We have more sneakers after Ministerial favour,' wrote Sir Walter Scott in 1826, 'than men who love their country and who upon a liberal scale would serve their party.'

DANIEL

'Then said these men, We shall not find any occasion against this Daniel except we find it against him concerning the law of his God.'—DANIEL VI. 5.

THE two points only in this history are the character of Daniel, which here came out like gold from the fire, and the mysterious dealings of God with him.

I. First then, with respect to Daniel's character. There are three points to be especially noticed: (a) There is his steady walk with God. He had riches and honours and everything to make this world enjoyable; but he never turned aside from the narrow way either to the right or to the left. The eyes of all were fixed upon him; many envied and hated him. They examined his public conduct; they inquired into his private character; they sifted his words and actions; but they sought in vain for any ground of accusation. He was so steady, so upright, so conscientious, that they could find no occasion of fault in him—they could not touch him except as concerning the law of his God. (b) Another point is Daniel's habit of private prayer. He was in the habit of kneeling upon his knees and praying three times a day; this was the practice of holy David, as we read in the Psalms, and this was the spirit of the centurion in the Acts, who prayed to God alway. (c) The last point to be observed in Daniel's character is his faith, his confidence in God. The decree appeared, forbidding all sorts of worship for thirty days on pain of death; and oh, how many professors of our generation would have held their peace; Daniel knew that the writing was signed—he knew that he was watched, he knew that his life was at stake—and yet he went to his home and kneeled on his knees and prayed as he did aforetime. Mark here the fruits of daily communion with God; see how a habit of prayer will produce quietness and assurance in the hour of trial and difficulty.

II. The mysterious dealings of God with His faithful and holy servant. (a) There was first a season of darkness. Who would have supposed that God would have allowed iniquity so far to triumph as to leave Daniel in the hands of enemies? Who would have thought that this pious old man would be cast into the den of lions? This hour of darkness seems a mystery. But is it not agreeable to all the dealings of God with man? (b) How the darkness was scattered and the light returned. Daniel was brought forth and honoured and exalted; while his enemies, in their turn, were cast into the den and the lions destroyed them all. So true it is that light is sown for the righteous, that God will keep them in perfect peace whose minds are stayed in Him. (c) Consider what showers of good descended from this dark cloud which at one time seemed so threatening. Think what a blessed effect this deliverance would have on Daniel! What deep views of God's love and power and goodness and wisdom he would obtain. (d) Think, lastly, What mighty good would come to the people and cause of God, how much they would be comforted by such a miracle, how much they would be encouraged to go forward; the very thing which once appeared so untoward, which threatened the destruction of Israel and the dishonour of God, would bring glory to the Lord and set forward the Kingdom of Heaven.—J. C. RYLE, The Christian Race, p. 258.

REFERENCE.—VI. 5.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Daniel, p. 68.

PRAYER AND CONDUCT

'Now when Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house; and his windows being open in his chamber toward Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed, and gave thanks before his God, as he did aforetime.'—DANIEL VI. 10.

I. The Value and Importance of Prayer.—It is natural to all men to pray. But here steps in philosophy, falsely so called, and tells us not to pray. This philosophic teacher brings all the learned and profound arguments to show that this natural instinct is mere folly and delusion, and it will end by persuading us that we may adore in praise if we will, but that to ask aught of God is absurd and even profane. Now this is a criminal, unnatural philosophy, which would condemn us to live in a fatherless world, with none to pity, none to comfort, none to help. If any one is led by his sins and worldliness to neglect prayer, let him not think that he is showing superior sagacity and penetration by so doing. Let him rather be ashamed of this, that he neglects prayer, not because he is wise, but because he has corrupted his heart, and has done violence to his own moral and even intellectual nature. How opposed to all this self-conceited, self-corrupted, prayerless character is the example of that aged and wise saint who is portrayed for us by the Holy Spirit in to-day's lesson!

II. We are to Follow this Aged Saint's Example, and be bold, honest, outspoken in our allegiance to God. It is true that none of us is likely ever to be called upon to hazard our lives as Daniel did, but yet how often have we in everyday life to take our stand openly and boldly, either on the side of Christ or of His enemies! Christ requires this of all of us. He requires it in every workshop. He requires it in every office. He requires it in every place of business. He requires of us that we should on all fit occasions declare what we think of Him; that we never from fear of man, never from shame, never from regard to worldly interest, never from fear of ridicule, shun to bear witness for Him, or shrink from avowing ourselves His disciples. It may be, or it may not be, wise or proper for us to enter into argument, or directly to rebuke. Whether it be wise or our duty to do so must always depend upon circumstances. It sometimes happens that a discreet and modest silence is the best way to meet the occasion. No certain and plain rule can be laid down as to how our Lord would have us act. Our action must be guided by our own feeling of what we ought to do. But of one thing we may be certain. On every such occasion Christ is there present. He is there noting how we act, pleased if we maintain the cause of truth and holiness, quick to see if we are in any way ashamed of Him or His words, vexed, frowning, if from cowardice or self-interest we betray His cause or allow His gainsayers to think we agree with them and feel as they do. Even in social intercourse, at times in their own families, men and women have to determine whether they will confess Christ or deny Him, whether they will be faithful to their Lord and Master or flinch from His service and disown it.

III. Not by Words only can we Confess or Deny Christ.—We may do it even more decisively by our deeds. It is very possible for men in word to confess Christ, and yet in heart and life to renounce Him. No confession of the lips can be accepted which has the lie given to it by the life. Vain is our orthodox profession of faith if we are heterodox in the feeling of our hearts. The best, the truest confession of Christ is that which is afforded by the life, by the life in which purity and holiness and charity testify, that we have been with Jesus and have learned of Him. No confession so eloquent as this because it is manifestly sincere, none which so honours our Lord or so much advances His kingdom.

THE SPIRIT OF PRAYER

'Now when Daniel knew that the writing was signed he went into his house; and his windows being open in his chamber towards Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed, and gave thanks before his God, as he did aforetime.'—DANIEL VI. 10.

It is interesting to compare the character of Daniel, 'the man greatly beloved,' with that of St. John, 'the disciple whom Jesus loved'. The likeness can be followed out also through the history of the two men. But that is not my purpose this morning; my desire is to emphasize the value of prayer. So highly was it esteemed by Daniel that he braved death to engage in it. He knew God; and, knowing Him, loved Him. He was ever communing with God. To God he turned in every hour of difficulty. The 'three times a day' were not isolated moments, but rather an integral part of what was a life of prayer. If prayer had been to Daniel what it is to too many of us he would not have risked his life in the way he did; he would have forgone the privilege or he would have prayed in secret.

I. What was it that Caused Daniel to Treat the Decree of Darius as if it were not?—Surely it was his desire after God. Prayer can be regarded in two aspects:—

- (a) As an act of honour done to God, and
- (b) As the means of supplying our own wants.

These two ideas take in prayer from two different sides, but they both proceed from the same motive, the desire to know and to love God. Let us never lower the dignity of prayer by regarding it as the mere putting forth of a request; if it be true prayer it will be actuated by a desire after God.

II. Why Did Daniel Pray towards Jerusalem?—Daniel, though favoured by Darius and raised to high position, could never forget that he was an exile where he was. He had wicked Babylon all round him; there were men ready to kill him; yet none of these things moved him. He looked towards Jerusalem; he saw the King in His beauty; his eyes beheld the land which was very far off.

III. The True Basis of Prayer is the Soul's Desire after God.—Put the privilege of prayer out of human life, and what will human life be without it? What will it be when friends disappoint, when temptations assail, when some one very near has gone into the unseen world—not to have access to God?

IV. Daniel's Prayer was Largely Intercessory for Others.—We are not told what was its subject on the occasion mentioned in the text, but we cannot doubt from Daniel's subsequent history that it was wide-embracing in its scope; and so it is with us that he who loves God best has the widest sympathy and the highest faith. Prayer is the one great service we can render to others.

A GOOD MAN

'Now when Daniel knew that the writing was,' etc.—
DANIEL VI. 10.

DANIEL was of noble birth, perhaps a member of the royal family of Judah. Born at Jerusalem; carried into captivity in his youth; became a member of the royal court; received a thorough education; acquired a high position through his power of interpreting dreams and mysteries; and, when Babylon was conquered by the united powers of Media and Persia, became premier. Distinguished above all for his piety. He was now eighty years of age. His position exposed him to the envy of his colleagues, who sought to depose him. In this chapter we have an account of their plot and its result. Several characteristics of a good man are mentioned.

I. Moral Integrity which None Could Dispute.

They 'sought to find occasion against Daniel concerning the kingdom,' etc., vv. 4, 5.

Few can stand the close scrutiny of an enemy, or even of a friend.

II. Unflinching Fidelity, which Persecution could not Destroy.

The true value of friendship is not discovered until the hour of trial.

III. A Firm Avowal of Religious Principles.

'He went into his house; and his windows being opened,' etc.

No ostentation, but no concealment.

IV. Habitual Devotion Unhindered by Business.

'As he did aforetime.' 'Three times a day.'

Prayer is one of the chief sources of support and comfort in difficulty and trouble.

V. A Recognition of Mercies in the Midst of Trial.

'And gave thanks before his God.'

'The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord.'

VI. Childlike Trust in God Amid the Vicissitudes of Life.

It is hard to stand alone; but God never deserts His people. 'I will never leave thee,' etc.—F. J. Austin, Seeds and Saplings, p. 59.

THE OPEN WINDOW

'Now his windows were open in his chamber toward Jerusalem.'—DANIEL VI. 10.

It is not easy to know where to begin the story of this man whose windows were open toward Jerusalem. Those open windows are so eloquent. They have such a tale to tell. It is a beautiful, brave, pathetic story, worthy its place in this book that records the purest heroisms, and the most lustrous fidelities, and the holiest patiences of history.

I. Those are not vain hours that a man spends at the open lattice of his heavenly hope. See what the open window did for Daniel. In the city of a thousand spurious divinities, it reminded him of a temple erected for the worship of the One God. In the city full of fascinating lures and shameless enticements, it brought home to his heart every day the sweet, stern morality of the Hebrew ethical ideal.

The breath from that open window kept his life clean. But for it he might have been drawn into the dark current of Babylonian sensuality and sinfulness. He might have become unwilling, unworthy, unable to utter in the ears of Babylon the words of his God. But the open window taught him that Babylon was a terrible place. He saw a sinister shadow in its smiles, he heard the whisper of danger in its plaudits; and three times a day he knelt with his face toward the holy city, and his heart going out unto his God: never too busy or tired for that.

II. We who live in Babylon cannot afford to spend all our time in its streets amid the traffic and the merchandise, the gains and the greetings, the weariness and the sin. If life's western window is never opened; if the breath from the hills of God plays in vain around its closed and dust-laden lattice; if morning, noon, and night the vision is the vision of Babylon and the voice is the voice of Babylon, then 'is the seal of the city set ever more broadly upon a man's forehead and its delusions and its passions make their home in his heart.'

God is near us in the babel of buying and selling, in the toil for bread, in the rush of life. But they who find Him thus in the thick of the world are they who have first found Him waiting for them, as He waited for one of old, at the window that looks toward Jerusalem, to send them forth into the day's life with the temple reverence and the temple ideal impressed afresh upon their spirit. And when the day is over, and Babylon has done its worst, they find Him there again waiting to sweep the last jangling echoes of the city right out of their hearts—that as they lie down to rest their last thought shall be laden with the peace of that other city—Jerusalem beyond the hills.

III. The men who conquer the world are the men who see beyond the world. Babylon published an interdict, and it meant for Daniel no communion at his western lattice for thirty days: thirty prayerless days! That was what the interdict said; and after it had been signed and sealed by Darius, it was unalterable. The Medes and Persians prided themselves on never going back on anything they had decreed. Babylon had challenged Jerusalem. It had pitted its powers against the powers of the God of Daniel. 'And when Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house (now his windows were open in his chamber toward Jerusalem) and he kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and gave thanks before his God as he did aforetime.' Babylon had a law that altered not. So had Daniel. He was not a Babylonian. He lived under the law of another city, and he obeyed that law, and it cast him into a den of lions, and it brought him out again and made him a splendid witness for God. History tells us that, whenever the heavenly unalterable and the earthly unalterable have met, one has always had to alter, and it has not been the heavenly one.—P. AINSWORTH, The Pilgrim Church, p. 107.

THE OPENED WINDOWS

'His windows being open in his chamber toward Jerusalem.'—DANIEL VI. 10.

It was in an hour of very sore distress that Daniel acted in the manner of which our text speaks. The crisis had come which he had long expected, and the crisis drove him to the feet of God. There was widespread irritation, rising at times into very bitter envy, among the aristocratic patrons of Babylon at the powerful eminence of foreigners like Daniel. And it was then, when Daniel fully recognized his peril, that he went into his house to pray, his windows being open to Jerusalem.

I. The Moral Significance of Indifferent Actions.

—There was nothing remarkable in opening a window, yet every time that Daniel opened that lattice it spoke of a heart that was travelling to Jerusalem. It revealed a heroism which no impending doom could shake. There are actions which are quite indifferent in themselves, yet if they reveal the trend of character and the direction that our thoughts are setting in no man dare say they are immaterial.

II. The True Relationship of the Unseen and the Seen.—When Daniel opened his window an instinct moved him to open the window towards Jerusalem. He could brook no barrier betwixt him and the unseen. Now that is like a little parable of something that happens to the truly religious man. Let him open the window of his heart on the unseen, and the life at his door grows doubly real to him. There is no such instance in history of this as the life of Jesus Christ Himself. His heart was in heaven as truly as the heart of Daniel was in Jerusalem. Yet though all the windows of His soul were opened heavenward the life round Him was infinitely precious. The meanest villager ceased to be insignificant to a heart whose lattice was thrown wide on God.

III. The Right Attitude Towards the Unattainable.—Daniel was a prisoner in Babylon. Yet though all hope of seeing Jerusalem was banished, he opened his windows toward Jerusalem. Every man who is striving to live nobly is struggling after things he cannot reach. Have the casement open toward the unattainable, and by the open casement be in prayer.—G. H. MORRISON, Sun-Rise, p. 207.

REFERENCES.—VI. 10.—Canon Duckworth, Christian World Pulpit, 1891. R. J. Campbell, Sermons Addressed to Individuals, p. 37. T. Arnold, Sermons, vol. iii. p. 175. G. W. Brameld, Practical Sermons, p. 386. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (2nd Series), p. 90. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xx. No. 1154. Ibid. vol. 14, No. 815. J. J. S. Perowne, Sermons, p. 17. VI. 13.—F. W. Farrar, Everyday Christian Life, p. 93. H. P. Hughes, Essential Christianity, p. 57. VI. 14.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons, vol. i. p. 393. VI. 16-28.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Daniel, p. 75. VI. 20.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 284. J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (2nd Series), p. 44. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2859. VI. 22.—J. H. Horton, Every Sunday, p. 467. C. Stamford, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxi. p. 328.

THE CALAMITY THAT HURTS NOT

'Daniel was taken up out of the den, and no manner of hurt was found upon him, because he believed in his God.'—DANIEL VI. 23.

It is not enough for a man to be taken out of his den. When he has been raised from his calamity the question remains, Has it hurt him? It seems a small thing to record of Daniel that after his life had been preserved from the lions 'no manner of hurt was found upon him'. But in truth the great fear in such cases is just their after-effects.

I. Calamity has not always a good influence upon a man. It changes many a soul for the worse. There are hundreds who after their liberation from the den of lions live as if they were still in the den. There are men who have risen to opulence after a hard fight with poverty and who never forget their early scars. They resent the years that the locusts have eaten.

They preserve a demeanour of frigidness, of sourness, of cynicism towards all the events of life; they damp the enthusiasm of those who are entering in.

II. It is a great thing if a man can emerge from the den not only sound in body but unharmed in mind. What enabled Daniel to come forth mentally whole? The passage states the reason explicitly—'He believed in his God'. The mental effects of calamity can only be conquered by a mental attitude. It is a great mistake to suppose that we require trust in God merely for the future; we need it as much for the past. We think of Daniel as trusting in God before he was thrown in; he required an equal faith after he had come out.

III. We doubt, not only in the hour of danger, but in the hour of retrospect. Faith may waver over the question What if this befall me? But it can also waver over the question, Why has this befallen? If I am to be free from mental gloom, I must see a bow in the cloud of yesterday as well as in the cloud of to-morrow. God must justify to my soul the shadows of last night. Nothing else will obliterate my inward scars, nothing else will enable me to come forth from the den unhurt.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 284.

REFERENCES.—VI. 23.—A. Ainger, Sermons Preached in the Temple Church, p. 1. VI. 27.—D. Swing, American Pulpit of To-day, vol. i. p. 90. VI. 28.—F. Bourdillon, Plain Sermons for Family Reading, pp. 43, 55. VI.—J. G. Murphy, The Book of Daniel, p. 119. VII.—Ibid. p. 124.

'And four great beasts came up from the sea.'—DANIEL VII. 1 & 2. I AM amusing myself with thinking of the prophecy of Daniel as a sort of allegory. All those monstrous, 'rombustical' beasts with their horns—the horn with eyes and a mouth speaking proud things, and the little horn that waxed rebellious and stamped on the stars, seem like my passions and vain fancies, which are to be knocked down one after another—until all is subdued with a universal kingdom over which the Ancient of Days presides—the spirit of Love—the catholicism of the universe—if you can attach any meaning to such a phrase.—GEORGE ELIOT to Sara Hennell

'The books were opened.'—DANIEL VII. 10.

COMPARE the reference in Tennyson's 'Sea Dreams,' and this rabbinic saying: 'Consider three things, and thou wilt not fall into the hands of transgression: know what is above thee, a seeing eye, a hearing ear, and all thy deeds written in a book'.

REFERENCES.—VII. 10.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (6th Series), p. 214. J. Keble, Sermons for Advent to Christmas Eve.

'The reign of one like the Son of man.'—DANIEL VII. 13 & 14.

By resigning His strength, by declining to appeal to force, by committing Himself into God's hand, Jesus took the direct path to supreme power and universal dominion. Such is the honour which He felt to be owing to the kingdom of the Truth, to leave it to win its own way against the suffrages of all men. 'He must reign. . . . Christ steals on and on in the world of human thought, and the enmity of one age falls before Him in the next. 'Every battle (among men) is with confused noise and garments rolled in blood;' but after quite another manner God is bringing about the unification of all nations under Christ. Truth's battle which is Love's success, steals on, like some sweet mystic fire which 'subdues all things to itself'.—DR. JOHN PULSFORD.

REFERENCE.—VIII.—J. G. Murphy, The Book of Daniel, p. 140.

'I was by the river Ulai'.—DANIEL VIII. 2.

In his Remarkable Passages of the Life and Death of Mr. John Semple, minister of Carsphairn in Gallo-way, Patrick Walker tells how 'that night after his wife died, he spent the whole ensuing night in prayer and meditation in his garden. The next morning, one of his elders coming to see him, and lamenting his great loss and want of rest, he replied: "I declare I have not, all night, had one thought of the death of my wife, I have been so taken up in meditating on heavenly things. I have been this night on the banks of Ulai, plucking an apple here and there."'

'I was in the palace . . . and I saw in the vision'.—DANIEL VIII. 2.

EVEN in a palace life may be lived well.—MARCUS AURELIUS.

SEE M. ARNOLD's Sonnet, 'Worldly Place'.

'The pageant of the beast empires'.—DANIEL VIII. 3 f. 7 f.

As I gazed out into vacancy, the grey masses began to move, to wave to and fro; it seemed as if the wind swept heavy veils away, and suddenly there lay disclosed right before me a sheet of cold, dark northern sea. A rock rose out of it, snow-covered, and carrying on its crags long icicles, which hung down to the sinister-looking water. On the top of the rock sat a huge polar bear; his paws were holding the carcass of the last animal he had found in this wilderness, and he looked triumphantly around as if to say, 'Now am I sole lord of the world'. But already the black waters moved and gurgled, and out of them arose the shining body and the huge fins of a snake-like monster; his walrus head carried a real mane, and from his mouth hung seaweed and the remnants of some small fish—the last he had found in the sea. His glassy, greenish eyes stared about, and they also seemed to say, 'Now am I quite alone, master of the world'. But suddenly the huge white bear and the sea monster caught sight of each other; the enormous fins beat the waves, the cruel paws clawed at the rock. Both were yet gorged with food, but already they were measuring one another with angry looks like future adversaries. They had devastated the whole world, and now they met in this desolate waste for the ultimate fight. . . . I believe that for a moment the clouds which ever surround us had lifted, allowing me to catch a glimpse of the history of the world; which often is a history of wild beasts.—From The Letters Which Never Reached Him.

COMPARE the closing paragraphs of Victor Hugo's Shakespeare.

REFERENCE.—VIII. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 886.

'I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it'.—DANIEL VIII. 27.

GREAT position often invests men with a second sight whose visions they lock up in silence, content with the work of the day.—JOHN MORLEY.

'I Daniel fainted, and was sick certain days, then I rose up and did the king's business'.—DANIEL VIII. 27.

THERE'S many a good bit of work done with a sad heart.—GEORGE ELIOT's Adam Bede.

REFERENCES.—IX. 1-13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2802. IX. 1-19.—Ibid. vol. iii. No. 154.

'With fasting'.—DANIEL IX. 3.

FASTING is an indispensable condition of a good life; but in fasting, as in self-control in general, the question arises, With what shall we begin? How to fast, how often to eat, what to eat, what to avoid eating? And as we can do no work seriously without regarding the necessary order of sequence, so also we cannot fast without knowing where to begin—with what to commence self-control in food. Fasting! and even an analysis of how to fast, and where to begin—the very notion of it sounds ridiculous and wild to most men. I remember how, with pride at his originality, an evangelical preacher, who was attacking monastic asceticism, once said to me, 'Ours is not a Christianity of fasting and privations, but of beefsteaks'.—TOLSTOY.

'O Lord, the great and dreadful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy'.—DANIEL IX. 4.

THE attractive aspects of God's character must not be made more apparent to such a being as man than His chastening and severer aspects. We must not be invited to approach the Holy of Holies without being made aware, painfully aware, of what Holiness is. We must know our own unworthiness ere we are fit to approach or imagine an Infinite Perfection. The most nauseous of false religions is that which affects a fulsome fondness for a Being not to be thought of without awe, or spoken of without reluctance.—BAGEHOT.

'We have sinned'.—DANIEL IX. 4 f.

For God is at hand, and the Most High rules in the children of men. . . . The same light which lets you see sin and transgression, will let you see the covenant of God, which blots out your sin and transgression, which gives victory and dominion over it, and brings into covenant with God. For looking down at sin and corruption and distraction, ye are swallowed up in it; but looking at the light, which discovers them, ye will see over them.—GEORGE FOX to Lady Claypole.

REFERENCES.—IX. 14.—J. Bolton, Selected Sermons (2nd Series), p. 229. IX. 14, 23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2860. IX. 17.—Ibid. vol. xlviii. No. 2788.

'And whilst I was . . . confessing my sin and the sin of my people Israel.'—DANIEL IX. 20.

SEE Miss ROSSETTI's lines, 'By the Waters of Babylon'.

'My sin and the sin of my people.'—DANIEL IX. 20.

Do you know, when I see a poor devil drunk and brutal, I always feel, quite apart from my æsthetical perceptions, a sort of shame, as if I myself had some hand in it.—W. MORRIS.

No man's thoughts ever fell more into the forms of a kind of litany than Mr. Maurice's. . . . They were the confessions befitting a kind of litany, poured forth in the name of human nature, the weakness and sinfulness of which he felt most keenly, most painfully, but which he felt at least as much in the character of the representative of a race by the infirmities of which he was overwhelmed, as on his own account. . . . Whenever you catch that he feels—as all the deeper religious natures have always felt—a sort of self-reproachful complicity in every sinful tendency of his age, you feel that the litany in which he expresses his shame is not so much morbid self-depreciation as a deep sense of the cruel burden of social infirmity and social sin.—R. H. HUTTON.

THOMAS BOSTON OF ETTRICK, in his Memoirs, mentions the scandal caused by a local minister having been guilty of adultery. 'I well know,' he adds, 'that many a heavy heart it made to me, and remember the place where I was wont heavily to lament it before the Lord in secret prayer.'

'At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment came forth.'—DANIEL IX. 23.

REMEMBER the rebuke which I once got from old Mr. Dempster of Denny, after preaching to his people: 'I was highly pleased with your discourse, but in prayer it struck me that you thought God unwilling to give'. Remember Daniel: 'At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment came forth'.—McCHEYNE to Bonar.

'Consider the vision.'—DANIEL IX. 23 f.

SEE KEEBLE's lines on 'Thursday Before Easter'.

REFERENCE.—IX. 24.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiii. No. 734.

'To bring in everlasting righteousness.'—DANIEL IX. 24.

NOT long after Phryne's religious performance at Eleusis came the last days, too, of the national life of the Jews, under the successors of Alexander. The religious conceptions of the Jews of those days are well given by the book of Daniel. How popular and prevalent these conceptions were is proved by their vitality and power some two centuries later at the Christian era, and by the large place which they fill in the New Testament. We are all familiar with them; with their turbid and austere visions of the Ancient of Days on His throne, and the Son of man coming with the clouds of heaven to give the kingdom to the saints of the Most High and to bring in everlasting righteousness. Here, then, is the last word of the religion of the Hebrews, when their national life is drawing to an end, when their career has been, for the most part, run; when their religion has had nearly all the development which, within the limits of their national life, belonged to it. This, we say, is its last word: To bring in everlasting righteousness.—MATTHEW ARNOLD.

See, further, Literature and Dogma, III. ad init.

REFERENCES.—IX. 24.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1681. IX. 25.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in a Religious House, vol. ii. p. 440. IX.—J. G. Murphy, The Book of Daniel, p. 162.

DIVINE APPOINTMENTS

'The time appointed was long.'—DANIEL X. 1.

ALL things are appointed. Yet it pleases our little vanity to imagine that we appoint some things ourselves. Oh the fuss of the world, and the noise, and the fruitlessness! We have deposed God from being husbandman, and have taken to growing crops of our own kind. They always fail.

The appointing God is on the throne; the Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice.

It is interesting to me as a student of the Book to see in how many aspects Divine appointment is presented in the Holy Scriptures. God has taken everything under His own care; He has allowed no one little inch of His great creation to bear any name but His own.

Let us look at some of the instances in which the Divine appointment appears as the central thought. 'Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth?' (Job vii. 1). Job found that out by sorrow.

I. Sorrow is one of the head-masters in God's school; it is the costliest department of the great school of God, is the department of sorrow. To think of it all: the child's little face all bloom waiting the sharp chisel and the heavy mallet of the sculptor. It is so that we learn really where we are, and what we are, and what we should be, and what we should do. He who made man appoints his time; all our days are in God. He never shows us tomorrow; He might do that. No, therein is the sovereignty of God. This is Sunday; might not God show us now, getting on to mid-day, just one gleam of Monday? Never! Monday is where God is; the future is as invisible and as incomprehensible as God. Men do not think of that. They chaffer about tomorrow as if they owned it.

II. Sometimes the appointments of God are associated with high joys, with royal feast and plenteousness, and the wine in which there is no drunkenness. So in Psalm LXXXI 3, I read, 'Blow up the trumpet . . . in the time appointed'. It would be a poor world without the trumpet and all that the trumpet means. The trumpet means victory, progress, thankfulness, courage, and an enemy beaten and blown off. So there is an appointed time for bright joy to come and take up the trumpet and blow a blast that will be music in the ear of God. The world shall not always be sunless. We live in these high promises; these are the vaticinations that make the future tolerable; but for such prophetic outlook and forecast who dare pray that he may awake to-morrow? God has filled His book with trumpets and shawms and cymbals and dances, and sometimes the Church even now goes wild with holy ecstasy. There is great danger in that, however, because only the ecstatic can understand ecstasy, and only those who were born full of red blood can enter into Pentecostal thunder and fury and anthem.

III. Then we come to another view in Daniel x. 1: 'The thing was true, but the time appointed was long'. What does it matter about the time if we have got the truth? Mark these wonderful words: 'The thing was true'—that is the point to stop at—'but the time was long'. A century is nothing to those who have the truth and hold it for man and God. God counts time in His own way. He does not listen to the tick of our poor pendulum; a man might stop that, a little child could stop the pendulum, but not the time, not the evolution, not the certainty of the final point.

IV. The old saints were trained by waiting. Habakkuk was; he says, 'The vision is yet for an appointed time . . . wait for it' (Hab. ii. 3). Can we go further to-day than this grand prophecy? Is not this one sentence a great philosophy of history and of time and of divinity? The vision was for an appointed time. If the Lord has said, 'I will wait,' that is enough for me; I do not ask when, nor do I ask how; He has defined my function, He says in one pregnant injunction, 'Wait for it'. Beware, however, of intellectual or spiritual indolence; it is not a question of turning your back upon the Divine word, and saying, 'Let it come, then, according to some Divine appointment,' but waiting is worshipping, waiting is hoping, waiting is praying. Do not imagine that we are remitted to a sleepy slumberous ministry of inertness or inactivity in any shape or in any degree. The highest expression of power is repose; the highest expression of energy is standing still under Divine conditions and according to the movement of the Divine inspiration.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. vi. p. 19.

'Even a great warfare.'—DANIEL x. 1 f.

THEN suddenly would come a dream of far different character—a tumultuous dream—commencing with a music such as now I often heard in sleep—music of preparation and of awakening suspense. The morning was come of a mighty day—a day of crisis and of ultimate hope for human nature, then suffering mysterious eclipse, and labouring in some dread extremity. Somewhere, but I knew not where—somehow, but I knew not how—by some beings, but I knew not by whom—a battle, a strife, an agony, was travelling through all its stages—was evolving itself, like the catastrophe of some mighty drama, with which my sympathy was the more insupportable, from deepening confusion as to its local scene, its cause, its nature, and its undecipherable issue. . . . Some greater interest was at stake, some mightier cause, than ever yet the sword had pleaded, or trumpet had proclaimed. Then came sudden alarms; hurrying to and fro, trepidations of innumerable fugitives; I knew not whether from the good cause or the bad; darkness and lights; tempest and human faces.—DR QUINCEY, Confessions of an English Opium-Eater.

REFERENCE.—X. 1.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (7th Series), p. 174.

THE UNSEEN VISION

'I Daniel alone saw the vision; for the men that were with me saw not the vision.'—DANIEL x. 7.

CYRUS had been King of Babylon three years when the revelation was vouchsafed to Daniel. He had a vision of the eternal Son. And so overpowering in its glory was it all that the comeliness of Daniel was turned into corruption, and he retained no strength.

I. The circumstances at once suggest that vision is not conditioned by locality. Daniel and his friends were all in company, but 'I Daniel alone saw the vision'. The same thing meets us in life on every hand; set down a poet on any spot on earth and he will enmantle it with gold and glory, and have his vision in it of all lovely things.

II. The same thing is very true of pioneers in social reform. Picture the first poor homeless waif who arrested the gaze of a Dr. Barnardo. Many an eye had glanced at him that night; some had bidden him move on, and some had pitied him; but 'I Daniel alone saw the vision,' a vision of that boy clothed and redeemed; a vision of the boy out on the fields of Canada, with the sunshine on his cheek. All great movements for bettering mankind have begun not in a brain that schemed, but in a heart that saw.

III. This, too, is pre-eminently true of Christ. If He was separated from His race by being sinless, He was separated not less by what He saw. He saw such heights and depths and undiscovered glories that, matched with His, the keenest eyes are blind.

IV. There is another suggestion in the words; it is that the secret of vision lies in character. Why did these men who were with Daniel see nothing of the glory in the heavens?

(a) They were not on the path of duty. It was such a smooth and easy life in Babylon that they shirked the toil and the hardship of return. Daniel was there because God willed it so.

(b) They did not see the vision because they felt not the burden and sorrow of Israel. That burden had wellnigh broken Daniel's heart, but there is no sign that it troubled them at all. Must there not always be a preparation of that kind if we are to see the vision of Christ Jesus? The man who has seen the depths of his own heart, and knows how tangled are the roots of evil, is ready for the appearing of the Lord.—G. H. MORRISON, The Wings of the Morning, p. 145.

'So I was left alone, and saw this great vision.'—DANIEL X. 8. It takes solitude to get yourself saturated by any thought, and to the great majority of men even solitude will not effect it, but only lower their thinking power to the congealing point. Nevertheless, as Mr. Darwin saw in relation to the growth and decay of species, the very condition which kills out a weak thinking power, feeds and elevates to the glowing point a strong thinking power. . . . Till the life of a thought becomes identical with the life of an emotion, it will never really dominate the minds of men. And so far as I can judge by history, this result is never attained for thought, without long, solitary brooding over it.—R. H. HUTTON.

'O Daniel, thou man greatly beloved.'—DANIEL X. 11.

AND as I walked towards the jail, the word of the Lord came to me, saying, 'My love was always to thee, and thou art in My love'. And I was ravished with the sense of the love of God, and greatly strengthened in my inward man. But when I came into the jail, where the prisoners were, a great power of darkness struck at me, and I sat still, having my spirit gathered into the love of God.—Fox's Journal, 1649.

'Stand upright.'—DANIEL X. 11.

Do you know, more people perish from lack of proper self-appreciation than from consumption.—MAXIM GORKY.

REFERENCE.—X. 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2256.

'From the first day that thou didst set thine heart to understand, thy words were heard.'—DANIEL X. 12.

It is strange to say, but it is a truth which our own observation and experience will confirm, that when a man discerns in himself most sin and humbles himself most, when his comeliness seems to him to vanish away and all his graces to wither, when he feels disgust at himself, and revolts at the thought of himself—seems to himself all dust and ashes, all foulness and odiousness, then it is that he is really rising in the kingdom of God, as it is said of Daniel, 'From the first day that thou didst set thine heart to understand and to chasten thyself before thy God, thy words were heard, and I am come for thy words'.—NEWMAN.

SEE DORA GREENWELL'S Covenant of Life, pp. 134 f.

THE PRACTICAL DIFFICULTY OF PRAYER

'For how can the servant of this my Lord talk with this my Lord.'—DANIEL X. 17.

DANIEL's difficulty is our difficulty. How can we talk with our Lord? That is the perpetual problem. It is not that prayer is impossible, or that we are unwilling to pray; it is that 'we know not how to pray as we ought'.

I. Let us contemplate the inquiry.

(a) What was the actual motive in the case before us. It was the sense of ignorance. 'This my lord' was mysterious and overwhelming to Daniel. If Daniel had known this 'Lord' more fully he could have talked with Him, but ignorance gives him a stammering tongue: ignorance almost seals his lips. That is often our difficulty in prayer.

(b) Reverence moulded Daniel's inquiry. See it repeated 'my lord'. Shall the servant utter due familiarities to the Lord? Nay verily. That, too, is our difficulty in prayer. Divineness arrests our presumption.

(c) The sense of sin prompted Daniel's cry. He felt the awful disparity between himself and the Lord to whom he spoke. To talk with One holy, harmless, and undefiled seemed impossible. Penitence arrests speech. Sinners realize the incongruity of talking with their Lord.

(d) Forgetfulness of former answers to prayer often lies at the root of this inquiry. We deem prayer beyond us, because we do not recall what it has wrought for us in the past. 'They soon forget' is true of God's Israel to-day as of Israel in the olden day.

(e) Lack of spiritual aspiration sometimes explains this inquiry. Bishop Creighton said that the greatest danger of the twentieth century would be 'the absence of high aspirations'. It is an ever-present danger with us all. And it works fatally in the world of prayer.

II. Let us suggest response to the inquiry. The practical difficulty of prayer has been abundantly resolved in Christian experience.

(a) Recollect the Lord's love. Love can be talked with, though it be 'lord'. Love is approachable, even when Divine. Love is full of sympathy, and sympathy delights to hearken when need tells its story. Could we but realize the loving sympathy of Christ we should know how to pray. He is always accessible. He desires us to talk with Him.

(b) Remember the Lord's promises. The servant can talk with the Lord when the promises of the Lord shine before his gladdened eyes. John Bunyan spoke of 'leaping into the bosom of the promise'. They find a tranquil refuge who do so. The Bible is one colossal promise to the praying soul.

(c) Plead His atonement. The greatest secret of successful prayer is an evangelical secret. To multitudes of supplicants prayer would be an insuperable difficulty were it not that they have recourse to the sacrifice Christ offered on Calvary. The cross solves the riddle of prayer. Surrender the substitutionary sacrifice, and you lose the key of prayer. Many a prayer is sore labour and ineffectual labour, because it is not bedewed with Jesus' blood.

(d) Expect the help of the Holy Spirit. We sadly multiply the practical hindrances to prayer because we so ignore the work of the Holy Spirit.

(e) Bethink you of the evil of restraining prayer. How you reflect on God—His veracity and His fidelity—by so doing. Base, too, is the ingratitude of suppressing prayer. Says John Pulsford, that noble mystic, 'sow your prayers into the heart of God'.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Enthusiasm of God, p. 192.

REFERENCES. — X. 18.—G. Mulligan, Comradeship and Character, p. 173. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1295. X. 18, 19.—Archbishop Benson, 'Boy Life,' Sundays in Wellington College, p. 219. X. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1089.

'And now I will shew thee the truth. Behold, there shall stand up three kings in Persia,' etc.—DANIEL XI. 2 f.

WHILE philosophy had for the Jews no meaning, history had a deeper significance than it had for any other people. It was the chief factor in their national unity, the source from which they drew ethical and spiritual enlightenment. Thither they turned as to living oracles inscribed with the finger of the Almighty. To history they appealed as the supreme tribunal of God's justice. The great monarchies, Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, pass across the scene. Their fortunes cross and interlock into those of the chosen race. Israel is the pivot on which their destiny turns. History, in a word, is the drama in which God Himself is the protagonist, vindicating his justice and moral government on the stage of the visible world.—BUTCHER, Harvard Lectures on Greek Subjects, pp. 29-31.

'He shall pervert by flatteries.'—DANIEL XI. 32.

CROWS pick out the eyes of the dead, when the dead no longer need their eyes. But flatterers destroy the souls of the living, and blind their eyes.—EPICURETUS.

CR. the Flatterer in the first part of the Pilgrim's Progress.

'The people that know their God shall be strong, and do exploits.'—DANIEL XI. 32.

THE course of this man's life had been very simple, and yet crowded with events, and with manifold activity. The element of his energy was an indestructible faith in God, and in an assistance flowing immediately from Him.—GOETHE upon Jung Stilling.

REFERENCE.—XI. 32, 33.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 609.

'They shall fall by the sword and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, many days.'—DANIEL XI. 33.

It is sometimes argued that religious convictions are not as strong as they were in old times. But 'that the fervour for truth is not diminished may be seen in regions outside theology. . . . At this moment hundreds of educated men are defying the whole power of the Russian Empire in the struggle for constitutional liberty. Every month sees a score or more of them consigned to a hopeless dungeon or sent to Siberia, and the ranks close up again firmer after every fresh gap. Some of us cannot have forgotten how a crowd of Poles, men and women, knelt down in 1861 in the great square of Warsaw, praying and singing hymns, as fifteen volleys of grape-shot tore through their ranks. The sacrifice was unavailing; but it is by sacrifice of this sort that national character is regenerated, and as long as the spirit of martyrdom lives, there seems no need to despair of the future of humanity.—C. H. PEARSON.

'And some of them that be wise shall fall.'—DANIEL XI. 35. SEE BROWNING's poem, 'A Lost Leader'.

'Even to the time of the end.'—DANIEL XI. 35.

IN Greek authors of classical times there is no trace of the thought that the human race as a whole, or any single people, is advancing towards a Divinely appointed goal; there is nothing of what the moderns mean by the 'Education of the World,' 'the Progress of the Race,' the 'Divine guidance of Nations'. The first germ of the thought is in Polybius¹ (circa 204-122 B.C.), whose work illustrates the idea of a providential destiny presiding over the march of Roman history, and building up the imperial power of Rome for the good of mankind.—BUTCHER's Aspects of the Greek Genius, pp. 155, 156.

'Neither shall he regard any God: for he shall magnify himself above all.'—DANIEL XI. 36 f.

OTHERS may occupy themselves, if they will, in seeking a nostrum to destroy the phylloxera; be it mine to find one that shall destroy the Christian religion.—M. PAUL BERT.

CAN there be a more dreadful delusion than to see God where He is not, or to imagine ourselves more enlightened than Jesus Christ?—DR. WILLIAM BARRY.

'He shall have power over the treasures of gold and of silver. . . . Yet he shall come to his end.'—DANIEL XI. 43-45.

I CAN never forget the inexpressible luxury and prophaneness, gaming and all dissoluteness, and as it were total forgetfulness of God (it being Sunday evening) which this day se'nnight I was witness of, the king sitting and toying with his concubines, a French boy singing love songs in that glorious gallery, whilst about twenty of the greatest courtiers and other dissolute persons were at Basset round a large table, a bank of at least 2000 in gold before them, upon which two gentlemen who were with me made reflexions with astonishment. Six days after was all in the dust!—EVELYN's Diary, Feb. 1685.

'Yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him.'—DANIEL XI. 45.

OUR physical organism was devised for existence in the atmosphere of our globe and so is our moral organism devised for existence in justice. Every faculty craves for it, is more intimately bound up with it than with the laws of gravitation, light, or heat; and to plunge into injustice is to fling ourselves head foremost into what is hostile and unknown.—MAETERLINCK, The Buried Temple.

REFERENCES.—XI.—J. G. Murphy, The Book of Daniel, p. 166. XII. 2, 3.—J. C. M. Bellew, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 166.

'And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament: and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever.'—DANIEL XII. 3.

I DO believe the station of a popular preacher is one of the greatest trials on earth: a man in that position does not stop to soberly calculate how much, or rather how little is done when there appears a great effect, nor to consider how immense is the difference between deeply affecting the feelings and permanently changing the heart. The preacher who causes a great sensation and excited feelings is not necessarily the one who will receive the reward of shining as the stars for ever and ever, because he has turned many to righteousness.—F. W. ROBERTSON.

¹ I.e. a contemporary of the Prophet who wrote the book of Daniel.

'As the stars.'—DANIEL XII. 3.

YONDER stars are rising. Have you ever noticed their order, heard their ancient names, thought of what they were, as teachers, 'lecturers,' in that large public hall of the night, to the wisest men of old? Have you ever thought of the direct promise to you yourselves, that you may be like them if you will? 'They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars, for ever and ever.' They that be wise. Don't think that means knowing how big the moon is. It means knowing what you ought to do, as man or woman; what your duty to your father is, to your child, to your neighbour, to nations your neighbours.—RUSKIN, Fors Clavigera, LXXV.

I LIKE to associate my friends with particular stars, there is something so sweet and intimate and confidential in a star. The sun and the moon, but especially the sun, are too universal and general for particular friendship; but you may consider a star as your own.—ERSKINE OF LINLATHEN.

HEINE, in his Confessions, tells of an interview he once had with Hegel. After supper the poet, looking out of the window, began to speak sentimentally of the stars as the dwelling place of the blessed. Hegel muttered, 'Hum! hum! The stars are simply a brilliant leprosy on the face of heaven'. 'In God's name,' cried the poet, 'is there then no happy place above where the virtuous may find reward after death?' Whereupon Hegel rejoined, 'So you think you deserve a pourboire for tending your sick mother, or for not poisoning your elder brother!'

'They that turn many to righteousness.'—DANIEL XII. 3.

TAKE as many to heaven with you as ye are able to draw. The more ye draw with you, ye shall be the welcomer yourself.—SAMUEL RUTHERFORD.

REFERENCE.—XII. 3.—T. Sadler, Sunday Thoughts, p. 212.

'Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.'—DANIEL XII. 4.

It is written, Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased. Surely the plain rule is, Let each considerate person have his way, and see what it will lead to. For not this man and that man, but all men make up mankind, and their united tastes the taste of mankind. How often have we seen some such adventurous and perhaps much censured wanderer light on some outlying, neglected, yet vitally momentous province; the hidden treasures of which he first discovered, and left proclaiming till the general eye and effort were directed thither, and the conquest was completed. Wise was he who counselled that speculation should have free course, and look fearlessly toward all the thirty-two points of the compass, whithersoever and howsoever it listed.—Sartor Resartus, book i. 1.

THE art of printing appears to have been providentially reserved till these latter ages, and then providentially brought into use, as what was to be instrumental for the future in carrying on the appointed course of things. The alterations which this art has already made in the face of the world are not inconsiderable. By means of it, whether immediately or remotely, the methods of carrying on business are in several respects improved, knowledge has been increased, and some sort of literature is become general.—BUTLER.

'Shut up the words and seal the book . . . till the time of the end.'—DANIEL XII. 4, 9.

My book will await its reader; has not God waited six thousand years before He has created a man to contemplate His works?—KEPLER.

REFERENCES.—XII. 4.—H. W. Beecher, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxix. p. 201. XII. 6.—J. Kerr Campbell, Christian World Pulpit, 1890, p. 131.

AUTHORITY

'And he said, Go thy way, Daniel: for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end. Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly: and none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand.'—DANIEL XII. 9, 10.

It is the manner of the Holy Spirit in sacred prophecy to pass rapidly from one future event to another foreshadowed by it. The Prophet in this Scripture having revealed the sufferings which the Hebrew Church and nation would endure in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, passes on by a quick transition to unfold the trials which await the Christian Church in the latter days. It is a subject for serious inquiry whether, in the history of the Church or world of late years, there has not been a gradual tendency towards a fulfilment of this prophecy.

I. In reviewing the past we may recognize a remarkable change in popular opinion concerning the origin and claims of authority, both civil and ecclesiastical. The belief taught by St. Paul and St. Peter that authority is derived from God, and that obedience is due to lawful authority in things not unlawful for the Lord's sake, has now been greatly weakened; and authority is commonly supposed to be derived from earth and not from heaven, and to have no other claim upon allegiance than that which depends on the voice of the people, and not on the will of God. Together with the change in popular opinion as to the claims of authority two other powers have grown up. Men crave protection, and admire strength. On one side some have almost deified the Roman Papacy, and on the other side some have been driven to defy all authority whether temporal or spiritual, and to cast away all belief in a Personal Ruler of the World, and in future rewards and punishments, and to place the people on the throne of God.

II. Our own duty in face of these events. We must endeavour to revive in the public mind a recognition of the Divine origin of authority. This feeling needs to be answered in rulers as well as in subjects. If parents, masters, and governors were resolved to act in the consciousness that their authority is received from God, and that He will call them to account at the Great Day, then they would use it as a sacred trust from heaven, and never abuse it to gratify their own selfish desires.—BISHOP WORDSWORTH, Clerical Library, vol. II. p. 262.

'They that be wise.'—DANIEL XII. 10.

GOD will not judge men by what they know; yet to have used knowledge rightly will be a staff to support and comfort us in passing through the dark valley.—JOWETT.

'But the wicked shall do wickedly.'—DANIEL XII. 10.

WHERE, if not in Christ, is the power that can persuade a sinner to return, that can bring home a heart to God? Common mercies of God, though they have a leading faculty to repentance, yet the rebellious heart will not be led by them. The judgments of God, public or personal, though they ought to drive us to God, yet the heart unchanged runs the further from God. Leave Christ out, I say, and all other means work not this way; neither the works nor the word of God sounding daily in his ear, Return, return. Let the noise of the rod speak it too, and both join together to make the cry louder yet the wicked will do wickedly.—LEIGHTON.

'For thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days.'—DANIEL XII. 13.

NATURE in her grave nobleness is not less, but more dear now, when I remember that I shall soon bid her good even, to enter into the presence of her Lord and mine. New heavens and a new earth—I cannot sever my human heart from mine own land; and who shall say that those noble countries, casting off all impurity in the fiery trial that awaits them, shall not be our final heaven?

I love to think that it may be so; I love to think that the Lord, in His humanity, looks tenderly upon the mortal soil on which He sojourned in His wondrous life, and that here, perchance, in these very lands, made holy by His grace and power, our final rest shall be. It may be but a fancy; but it comes upon me with gentle night, like the whispered comfort of an angel. A new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness—a glorified humanity which, remaining human, is mortal no longer! with the judgment and the condemnation and the wars of the Lord overpast, and the earth and the heaven one fair broad country, and Himself over all, blessed for ever! These are the old man's dreams; and they shed new glory over the pleasant places in which my lines have fallen.—From Adam Graeme of Mossgray, by MRS. OLIPHANT.

SPARE no deceit. Lay the sword upon it; go over it: keep yourselves clear of the blood of all men, either by word or writing; and keep yourselves clean, that you may stand in your throne, and every one have his lot, and stand in the lot in the Ancient of Days.—Fox's Address to the Quakers, 1656.

'Thou shalt stand in thy lot.'—DANIEL XII. 13.

JESUS, that Flower of Jesse set without hands, getteth many a blast, and yet withers not, because He is His Father's noble Rose, casting a sweet smell through heaven and earth, and must grow; and in the same garden grow the saints, God's fair and beautiful lilies, under wind and rain, and all sun-burned, and yet life remaineth at the root. Keep within His garden, and you shall grow with them, till the great Husbandman, our dear Master Gardener, come and transplant you from the lower part of His vineyard up to the higher, to the very heart of His garden, above the wrongs of the rain, sun, and wind.—SAMUEL RUTHERFORD.

GO THOU THY WAY

'But go thou thy way till the end be: for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days.'—DANIEL XII. 13.

IF there be any deep prophetic sense in these last words of God to Daniel, I do not mean to endeavour now to search them far. I wish only to accept them very practically, and very simply, as they apply to every one of us; and this is what they say to you and me.

I. Go Thou Thy Way.—'The future is wrapped in clouds; much is hidden from your view; and there are many mysteries—"But go thou thy way"; do not hesitate, do not look back, do not measure by results—go thou thine own proper way and appointed way. Do thy work, whatever it be, that God has given thee to do; fulfil thy part; execute thy mission; act out thy destiny—"Go thou thy way". And there are many of you to whom this command appears now especially to apply. I see some of you afraid to begin. Halting at the threshold, you have such a fear lest you should fall back again, and do harm by your inconsistencies, and grieve the Holy Ghost, and it would be worse for you than ever. To you it comes—"Go thou thy way". Or you have tried and failed so often that you are utterly discouraged, and you are sure that you shall never succeed; nevertheless, "Go thou thy way". Or the work which you are now called to do is very great, and it so outstretches all your strength and all your grace that you dare not touch it—"Go thou thy way". Or the differences of opinion in the Church are so apparent. It is so hard to know "what is truth"—I am drawn so many ways, I see so many contradictions, such opposites, I do not know what to believe—"Go thou thy way". Or there are such inconsistencies everywhere. I see so much that is wrong in Christian men that I feel frequently staggered—"Go thou thy way". You cannot be wrong if you are in the path of duty, that is safe; the rest will take care of itself. Only act out your convictions, and keep well in your own true line.

II. But be sure it is 'Thy Way'.—But then you must first have well ascertained that that way which you are now going to take is 'thy way'. This was the point at issue between Christ and Satan. Satan, falsely quoting, said: 'In their hands they shall bear Thee up'—leaving out the sequel, which was the hinge of the promise, 'in all 'Thy ways''. Christ saw the omission, and saw that any venture which was without that condition would be presumptuous; and therefore He answered: 'Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God'. The first thing, therefore, that you have to do is to be quite sure that the way you are taking is 'thy way'. Ask God to make this quite clear. Try it by some of the great tests. Does your conscience quite go along with it? Have you a vocation? Is it directly or indirectly to usefulness? Is there any cross in it? Does it bring you nearer to Christ? Do you believe that He is pleased with you in it? Does it advance truth and holiness? If you are quite satisfied by such proofs that it is your way, then go, nothing doubting. With the end you have nothing to do; that is God's care. He will be sure to make that right. Deal with the present, and watch for, but do not anticipate nor wish to hasten conclusions. Steadily, patiently, and perseveringly work on, wait on, believe on, till the end be. And, be that end what it may, it will be a blessed end to you; strange, perhaps, very contrary to your expectations, but a right end and a happy end. I know of no comfort in life—I know of no repose greater than this—to-day, duty; to-morrow, trust—the foot straight in the road, and the eye looking out for loving ends it cannot see.

III. The Soul's Rest.—I do not wonder that the very next words are 'thou shalt rest'—'Go thou thy way,' and 'thou shalt rest'. There is the soul's rest, increasing experience of God's faithfulness, a growing assurance of forgiveness, a greater and greater nearness to Christ, tokens for good, glances of the smile of God—all these will be 'rest,' even while you are on the road.

REST FOR GOD'S SERVANTS

'But go thou thy way till the end be: for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days.'—DANIEL XII. 13.

THESE words are addressed to Daniel, now an old man, when his work is over, and little remains for him but to die.

I. For God's servants this present life is a time of labour, and in respect of it their time of rest is not yet. They are looking forward to their rest. This is the place of labour, with its accompanying measure of weariness and pain. Rest is an eventide blessing and comes when the day ends. True, the Gospel holds out a present rest, real and wonderful, to men believing, but it is true that called to rest in God, the Christian is also called to service; and this service has in it a laboriousness, a burden-bearing, an experience of weariness and an exercise of patience.

II. But this labour has its period. While He appoints to His servants their day of work, and amid the blessings of the life of faith disciplines them with their measure of toil and pain, He will certainly (and not too late) bring them into their rest. But what can we say of it?

(a) One thing certain we may fix upon—its sinlessness. What exercise, what high employment, may be theirs, we do not know. But this wonderful rest goes through it. Sin and temptation come nigh them no more.

(b) Here we live in a continual experience of change. But then how different. For want of constancy our rest here is unquiet and precarious at best—a brief snatch of breathing: but they possess it there.

(c) We know how any great experience, religious or not, disquiets us here. The heart beats quick, and becomes too full, and joy itself becomes painful. Not so there: not so with those who are made conscious of the love that blesses them, and of the nearness of that uncreated and eternal nature.

III. At the end of the days God's servant shall find the work in which he bore a part perfected. And he shall find his own labour in it. So, when God subjects His servants to that discipline which the most eminent of them, and those that have served most faithfully, have experienced, He is not sending them away as useless servants.—R. RAINY, Sojourning With God, p. 37.

REFERENCES.—XII. 13.—C. Stanford, Penny Pulpit, No. 1033. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (10th Series), p. 54. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Daniel, p. 84. XII.—J. G. Murphy, The Book of Daniel, p. 199.

HOSEA

HOSEA

REFERENCES.—I. 4, 6, 8-10.—S. Cox, Expositor (1st Series), vol. x. p. 422. II. 1, 21, 22.—Ibid. II. 3.—G. Matheson, Sermon on the Mount, p. 193. II. 5-7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 590. II. 8.—J. Parker, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 220. F. D. Maurice, Prophets and Kings, p. 195. II. 14.—J. N. Norton, Golden Truths, p. 134. II. 14, 15.—H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 1843.

THE CHRISTIAN IN THE WILDERNESS

'Therefore, behold, I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness,' etc.—HOSEA II. 14, 15.

LITTLE as the Israelites were permanently benefited by their sufferings in the desert, they appear never to have forgotten them. Hence 'the wilderness' became another word among them for trouble and sorrow. It bears that meaning here.

I. It points out to us, in the first instance, the Author of affliction.

II. The text shows us next why God afflicts us; at least, it discovers to us one of the most frequent causes of our sorrows.

III. We learn further in the text how God sometimes afflicts us. It describes Him as doing it gradually, compassionately, tenderly.

IV. Having followed the Christian into the wilderness, consider, in the next place, the comfort the Lord imparts to him there. 'I will speak comfortably unto her.'

V. But consolation is not all that an immortal spirit needs in sorrow. Our attention is called, therefore, to the supplies which God furnishes in tribulation.

VI. The hope that God excites in affliction. The valley of Achor was situated at the very entrance of the promised land.

VII. The effect to be produced on Israel by the mercies vouchsafed to her. 'She shall sing there as in the days of her youth.'—C. BRADLEY, Sermons, p. 21.

THE VALLEY OF TROUBLING

'I will give her . . . the valley of Achor for a door of hope.'—HOSEA II. 15.

I. 'ACHOR' means 'troubling,' and the valley got its name from a great crime, a great disaster, and a great act of judicial punishment. The crime was that of Achan, who hid in his tent spoil that ought to have been consecrated to Jehovah. The disaster was the consequent defeat of the Israelites in their assault upon one of the hill cities of Canaan. The judicial act was that, by Divine command, the culprit who had troubled Israel, bringing on it defeat, was stoned to death, his body and all his possessions burned, and a great cairn piled over his ashes. Hosea is prophesying of the captivity in Babylon under the figure of a repetition of the earlier history and the experience of the Exodus. The valley of trouble is turned into a means by which hope draws nearer to the beaten and desponding host.

II. The strength of a Christian man is in his sinlessness. And so we may learn that if we have been beaten once, and again attack, and again are foiled, the shameful disaster is a Divine warning to us to look not only to our equipment, but to our temper, and see whether the reason for failure lies, not only in something wrong in the details or accompaniments of our effort, but in something lacking in the communion which we have with God Himself. But again, Hosea's imaginative use of the old story teaches us how hope may co-exist with trouble, sorrow, trial, affliction, or the like. Such co-existence is quite possible.

III. Hosea here teaches us, not only the possible co-existence of hope and trouble, but the sure issue of rightly borne trouble in a brighter hope. Assuredly if a man has accepted the providences there will follow on the darkest of them a brightening hope. Then there is another reason why the sure child of trouble patiently, Christianly borne, is a more joyful hope. And that reason is set out in full by a man that was an expert in trouble, viz. Paul, when he says, 'tribulation worketh patience'. Thus tribulation which borne in faith works patience, and patience which brings evidence of a Divine Helper, teach us to say, 'Thou hast been my help; Thou wilt be my help'. And so hope is the last blessed result of tribulation.—A. MACLAREN, The Baptist Times and Freeman, 15 August, 1902, p. 603.

REFERENCES.—II. 15.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iii. p. 337. A. Maclaren, Weekday Evening Addresses, p. 159. Bishop Lightfoot, Old Testament Outlines, p. 266. II. 21, 22.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 72. III. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 888.

EPHRAIM AND HIS IDOLS

'Ephraim is joined to idols; let him alone.'—HOSEA IV. 17.

THESE words are not intended as a threatening of the cessation of the Divine pleadings. There are no people about whom God says that they are so wedded to any sin that it is no use trying to do anything for them.

I. Ephraim is the name of the Northern Kingdom of Israel, one of the two into which the nation was divided. It is the people in the other, the neighbouring nation, that are spoken to; and what is meant by the 'letting alone' is plainly enough expressed for us in the previous verse: 'Though thou, Israel, be faithful, yet let not Judah offend. . . .

Ephraim (Israel) is joined to idols; (Judah) let him alone'. That is to say, do you not go and walk in his ways, and meet a snare to your soul.

II. Between God's Church and the contiguous world let there be a gulf. Ephraim and the idols are confused and melted together, and the world and its idols are confused and moulded together in the same fashion. So then, if you are joined to them you are joined to their idols; and if you do not let Ephraim alone, you have community with the idolatry which belongs to him.

III. It is a very bad sign of a Christian man when his chosen companions are people that have no sympathy with him in his religion. There may be a great many things about religious people that may repel religious people as religious people of other characters, yet between you, if you are a Christian man, and the most unlike you of your brethren, there is a far deeper sympathy than there is between you and the irreligious man that is most like you in all these things.—A. MACLAREN, Contemporary Pulpit, vol. vi. p. 56.

REFERENCES.—IV. 17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1140. Bishop Woodford, Occasional Sermons, vol. i. p. 32.

THE CONFESSION OF SIN

'I will go and return to My place, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek My face: in their affliction they will seek Me early.'—HOSEA V. 15.

It is the picture of a father dealing with a child who has not yet owned his fault. The father has been trying to persuade the child, but the child will not confess. Then the father says, 'I will try another way, "I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face"; my absence will be sure to bring with it sorrow and trouble: and "in their affliction they will seek me early"'. And then it is beautiful to link on the next verse. It is almost a pity that it has been thrown into another chapter. The absence has brought the affliction, and the affliction has brought confession: 'Come, and let us return unto the Lord: for He hath torn, and He will heal us; He hath smitten, and He will bind us up'. We often feel as if God was gone away from us. May it not be that there is just that difference, that distinct boundary-line between absence and presence—'till they shall acknowledge their offence'. And may not that affliction which has visited you have come upon this very errand, to say, 'Confess, confess that secret sin, which is keeping God away from you'? Confess your sins. Bring out those captive kings out of the cavern of your heart. You will find it such a relief; there will come such a sense of liberty; God will be so pleased with you; and you will begin, from that moment, to feel so much happier. There may be very little which stands between you and peace but the silence you are keeping, and the deceit you are practising about some sin. Make the effort. Determine, 'Whatever I am besides, I will be honest, be open, and confess'. But now, let us consider how this confession is to be made.

I. Confess in Humiliation.—Confession is to God, and it should be done with the deepest and most careful humiliation. Whatever can help to humiliation, do it. God requires that the relation with Himself which has been interrupted and reversed by your sin should be re-adjusted. You must go very low down into the dust, and God must go up very high. The one will not do without the other. As self goes down, Christ must go up; and as Christ goes up, self must go down. Put yourself, really and simply, at the very lowest—down into the dust—that is the essence of confession.

II. Particularize Your Sins.—To the same end let your confession to God particularize. Be very minute—as minute, let your confession be, as you can possibly make it. Mention all the little things. Make them stand out in bold relief. It is the sum of confession. Generally, persons are ready enough to confess many, nay, most of their sins—but there is one which they do not like to speak of, even when they are speaking to God. Now, your confession will be nothing at all if you only reach to that. There are a great many good suggestions and rules about confession in the book of Leviticus, 'And it shall be, when he shall be guilty in one of these things, that he shall confess that he hath sinned in that thing'—that thing. That thing do you lay out before God in all its parts—the guilty omissions which went before it—the wrong motives—the secret feelings—the aggravating circumstances, the special acts—the guilty pleasure—the resistance of the Spirit, the grievings of conscience—the miserable consequences.

III. Accept the Punishment.—When you confess sin, always do it as one who is accepting punishment. Open your breast to take punishment. Feel and say, 'Lord, I am here—no punishment can be too heavy for me'. But, Oh! Father, 'mercifully look upon our infirmities, and for the glory of Thy name, turn from us all those evils that we most righteously have deserved'. 'O Lord, correct me, but with judgment; not in Thine anger, lest Thou bring me to nothing.'

IV. Lay the Sin upon the Altar.—And at the same moment realize, and do not doubt, that you are laying your sin upon the true altar, the Lord Jesus Christ. As you speak the self-demeaning words, and as you feel the heaviest convictions, believe that you are laying all upon the head of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who shall carry all that is there laid on Him, up, far, far away into a land, not inhabited, where they shall be seen and mentioned no more.

V. Make Some Act of Devotion.—Then go and try to embody that confession, and give it all the force and substance you can, by some holy act—some self-denying labour of love—some gift of God—some special act of devotion.

But true confession to God will always be accompanied with, and will always produce, the wish to make some confession to man. If you have ever stolen anything, restore it. If you have told a lie, acknowledge it. If you have done anything that can hurt anybody's feelings, or anybody's soul, go and make what amends you can. You owe it to that man, you owe it to your own soul. It will be good evidence to all men of the reality of your faith and love.

REFERENCES.—V. 15.—J. Keble, Sermons for Sundays After Trinity, part ii. p. 289. J. Vaughan, Sermons (6th Series), p. 14. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxv. No. 1483. VI. 1.—J. Baldwin Brown, The Sunday Afternoon, p. 269. VI. 1-10.—F. Hastings, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxix. p. 261. VI. 3.—T. R. Williams, Sermons by Welshmen, p. 169. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 72. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1246.

HOSEA VI. 4.

My text is the sad Divine comment upon the apparently genuine repentance and quick return to God expressed in previous verses. But God sees how flimsy and hollow that repentance is.

I. It is a strange and awful fact that men can thwart God. The words of the text express perplexity, and it would seem as if we must accept them as implying the failure of every weapon He has. It is a mystery, but it is no less a certainty. But it is not owing to deficiency in his appliances.

II. The most dangerous of all man's ways of thwarting God is through transient impulses and resolutions.

III. Our resolutions to amend are incomplete, and usually arise from fear or pain.

IV. The Divine effort to amend us persists. What is the effect of all our unbelief upon God? It is not to make Him angry, not to make Him pause, but to heighten the energy of His efforts.—A. MACLAREN.

REFERENCE.—VI. 4.—H. W. Beecher, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xx. p. 1381.

MERCY, AND NOT SACRIFICE

'For I desire mercy, and not sacrifice, and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings.'—HOSEA VI. 6.

HOSEA conceives the relation of Jehovah to His people as a moral union.

I. Not with violence, but gently, with tender indulgence and consideration, had they been treated; Jehovah had shown towards them the love and regard of a father. Israel, as an aggregate of individual persons, is Jehovah's family; and between the members of a family governed by such a Head, mutual loyalty and kindness, mutual consideration and regard, ought instinctively to prevail, and form a natural bond regulating the intercourse of each with his fellow-man.

II. By 'knowledge of God,' Hosea here means not a merely intellectual apprehension of His nature, but a knowledge displaying itself in conduct, a knowledge of His power, His influence, and His character, resting upon spiritual experience, and resulting in moral practice.

III. The Israelites, Hosea says, had misapprehended the nature of Jehovah's demands: they were prompt, and even punctilious, in the performance of outward religious ceremonies, supposing that this would satisfy His requirements; but what He delighted in was conduct governed consistently by a moral purpose, and a life regulated by a cheerful regard for the rights and needs of other men: sacrifice was offered properly as the expression of a right state of heart, but it could not be accepted in lieu of it; it was valueless unless accompanied by sincerity of purpose and integrity of life.

IV. Mercy and not sacrifice! The knowledge of God, rather than burnt offerings! The saying is one of those pregnant ones which abound in the writings of the prophets, and which, expanded and generalized, became the basis of the teaching of Christ. Christ enforced anew the true character of religion. The citizen of the Kingdom of Heaven was recognized, not by external marks, but by Godlike dispositions, by humility, meekness, the aspiration after goodness, simplicity.—S. R. DRIVER, Sermons, p. 217.

A FALSE STANDARD

'But they like men have transgressed the covenant; there have they dealt treacherously with Me.'—HOSEA VI. 7.

IN the Old Testament the idea of covenant colours the whole history. Pious Jews looking back interpreted the past of their race by this great thought. They were the children of the promise, and the promise was the gracious relationship into which God entered with the people of Israel. To Hosea it was a figure of speech by which he expressed his interpretation of the spiritual history of Israel, stating the terms of love in which God stood towards them, and on the other side the moral obligations that lay upon them in view of that gracious attitude. Israel's privilege meant Israel's duty. The covenant was broken when they ceased to do justly and love mercy and walk humbly with God. They put themselves out of that sweet relationship, wilfully robbed themselves of the promise, when they did not perform their part of the loving contract. They took the rank and place of other men. They like men transgressed the covenant. Thus these words are more than an assertion of universal human fallibility, more than saying that it is human to err, like men to transgress. It is the assertion of a higher standard for Israel. Israel had special privileges, peculiar opportunities, and was charged with a mission. To fail, to be after all only like other men, was to come under heavier condemnation. If they are not better than others they are worse; for they have sinned against clearer light, and sinned against special love.

I. The principle of this greater condemnation is a common one, and works out in every relationship of life. Every step of progress sets a new standard; and men are judged not by what they have passed on the way, but by what they have attained. Every advance is a fresh obligation. New knowledge is new duty. The higher you rise, the higher rises the standard of judgment. Do you complain? Nay, it is the reward of efficiency. In business the capable man is not laid on the shelf as a reward for his capacity. He is promoted, advanced to harder and more responsible positions. It is the practice of life; and we recognize the principle in every sphere.

II. There is, however, a constant tendency to level down the standard, and to be content with just what is expected by the mass. It was against this tendency that the prophets ever had to strive. The higher religion with its sterner, simpler rites, with its great moral claims on life, was ever menaced by the surrounding idolatries with their appeal to sense and their laxer standard. There was also a heathen party in Israel, even in her most faithful days, a party ever ready to take advantage of every weakening of the religious conscience and ever making a strong appeal to the lower instincts of the nation. Why should they be bound to a covenant so severe? Why not be like the men of the place, like the men around them, who get on very well and have a happier time where less is expected of them? The strongest count in Hosea's indictment against them, that 'they like men transgressed the covenant' was also the strongest temptation. It is the common temptation still to accommodate oneself to environment. We excuse ourselves that we are just like men when we transgress the covenant, the covenant which our own hearts acknowledge.

III. The men who will sneer at you as a 'saint' will admire you for being what they call a man of the world. You will get plenty of help in being like others, and plenty of hindrance in attempting the exceptional or uncommon. In addition to this outside pressure of a low worldly standard, another subtle encouragement to reduce the level of conduct is due to a disillusionment which comes regarding others, sometimes in men we have admired and looked up to. We find they are like men, hampered by the same weakness, liable to the same temptations, overtaken by the same faults. We take a low estimate of human nature, and bring down our own standard of duty to suit it. On such reasoning there could be no progress at all. There would be no stainless peaks on earth; only a dreary level. We have not come to our kingdom as men till we have got past the merely social conscience, the outside standard of others, and have within ourselves a measure of right and wrong and are parties to a personal covenant in which we stand to God.—HUGH BLACK, University Sermons, p. 175.

REFERENCES.—VII. 8.—J. Baines, Sermons, p. 100. C. J. Vaughan, Lessons of Life and Godliness, p. 65. VII. 9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 830. VIII. 2.—J. N. Norton, Old Paths, p. 172. J. H. Hitchens, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxvii. p. 59. VIII. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. I. No. 15. X. 2.—Ibid. vol. v. No. 276. X. 12.—E. Blencowe, Plain Sermons to a Country Congregation (2nd Series), p. 281. XI. 1.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1675. XI. 3, 4.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 87.

SOW TO YOURSELVES

'Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy.'—
HOSEA X. 12.

Our hearts are like a field, and if we neglect them the only crop we can look for is the natural weeds of the soil; but if we get our hearts made clean and then diligently sow to ourselves in righteousness, we may hope for a gracious and holy harvest.

I. We are to sow to ourselves. Religion is personal, and our first duty is to look well to ourselves.

(a) Our own spiritual comfort is of paramount importance.

(b) In order to sow in righteousness, unrighteousness must be put away.

II. What shall we sow? We are to sow in righteousness—that is, we are to cultivate and practise the things which constitute a righteous and godly life. To sow in righteousness—

(a) We must have simple, earnest faith.

(b) We must cherish a holy dread of sin.

(c) We must seek after spiritual knowledge.

(d) We must cultivate love.

(e) We must maintain Christian habits.

What our habits should be we may easily learn from the Word of God. This sowing in righteousness must be constant.

III. If we sow we shall also reap. 'Reap in mercy.' The reaping mercy will be in this world as well as in the next. Religion bears present fruit.

(a) One result of sowing in righteousness will be strength and stability.

(b) Another result of righteous sowing will be spiritual comfort and joy.

(c) We are to reap in mercy—God's infinite everlasting mercy to His children. Mercy for all our need. Mercy for ever. Only sow to yourselves in righteousness, and you shall reap according to mercy—in the life that now is, and in that which is to come.—G. CHARLESWORTH, Sermonic Suggestions, p. 19.

SEEKING THE LORD AN IMMEDIATE DUTY

'It is time to seek the Lord.'—HOSEA X. 12.

THE state of the people of Israel was such that they had need to seek God by repentance and prayer. But the text is equally applicable to all who are not at peace with God.

I. A Great and Solemn Duty.—The duty of seeking God is the first and most pressing duty of every sinner.

(a) The text implies that God has been forsaken, or forgotten. This is true of all who have not repented and come to God.

(b) Since man, as a sinner, is estranged from God, his duty is to seek God by repentance and prayer.

(c) Seeking God implies faith in Jesus Christ.

(d) Only by seeking God can we be delivered from sin and its dreadful consequences.

II. It Is Time to Seek.

(a) That it is time to seek the Lord is clear from the plain teaching of Scripture.

(b) It is time to seek the Lord because much evil has already been committed.

(c) It is time to seek the Lord because difficulties are increased by delay.

(d) It is time to seek the Lord because life is so uncertain.—G. CHARLESWORTH, Sermonic Suggestions, p. 22.

CORDS OF A MAN

'I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love: and I was to them as they that take off the yoke on their jaws, and I laid meat before them.'—HOSEA XI. 4.

HOSEA, who lived at the decline and fall of the Northern Kingdom of Israel, had to speak mostly of doom. The Prophet, loving his country with a passionate devotion, had no hope for the future except from the mercy of God using the inevitable chastisement to bring Israel back to a purer faith and a nobler life.

I. In the earliest days of all God taught the nation to walk, holding it by the arms, with patience and affection, as a mother teaches her child, encouraging him, but not too quickly lest he should overtask his strength; and when he falls taking him up in her arms, comforting and healing him. And then as the nation grew strong and could walk, and like a child now grown to manhood was set tasks and had to bend to serious burdens, like the oxen which did all the draught work in Palestine, the figure changes from that of a loving faith or mother teaching a child to that of a considerate master driving a team of oxen. When Israel was grown up and had to carry heavy burdens, which is the lot of all men, God was to them as a considerate Master, never leaving them, making them feel that He was with them through it all, setting them to the tasks, and gently leading them, and strenuously upholding them, taking His place beside them, treating them with human sympathy, drawing them with cords of a man, with bands of love.

II. They are homely figures of a father with the patience of love towards his little child, and of a wagoner with the kindness of sympathy towards his labouring cattle; but what figures could be more expressive of the thought which Hosea is seeking to express of the constant loving providence of God? His love faileth never. He would still as of old, still even at the eleventh hour, draw them with cords of a man, with bands of love. Is not this explanation of Israel's history the true reading of our own experience. The secret of all God's dealings with us is love. Even in the experience that was hardest to understand, one day it comes to us with the force of a revelation that God has been teaching and training us. It is this that makes the religious man, and distinguishes him from the irreligious. Upon all men are laid the trials and tasks of life; to all men come the burden and the yoke. The religious man knows that God is in all his experience, ever drawing him with cords of a man, with bands of love. This consciousness of a Divine sympathy makes a man strong, and assures him that his life is worth living since it commands the interest of heaven.

III. Hosea saw the past history of Israel to be the very romance of Divine love. It was the key to explain all His dealing with them, from their childhood right on through the long years of training. The revelation of God's Divinity has been a revelation of His humanity, drawing them with the cords of a man, with bands of love. How much more clearly should the Christian Church see this than Hosea, after the greatest of all object-lessons in Jesus Christ! The whole story thrills with human tenderness, with human sympathy, sympathy with men in their joy and their sorrow, sympathy with the little child, and with all on whom the yoke pressed, the labouring and heavy-laden. Can He fail to draw all men unto Himself? With the cords of a man He is drawing men: in the bands of love He is binding the world together. Who can resist the appeal of His broken body and shed blood?—HUGH BLACK, Christ's Service of Love, p. 109.

REFERENCES.—XI. 4.—Bishop Temple, Rugby Sermons (1st Series), p. 1. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 934. XI. 8.—J. Baldwin Brown, The Sunday Afternoon, p. 261. XII. 9.—Phillips Brooks, The Law of Growth, p. 365. XII. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 206. XIII. 11.—J. H. Newman, Parochial and Plain Sermons, vol. iii. p. 29. XIII. 14.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 69. H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 1994.

REPENT AND RETURN

'O Israel, return unto the Lord Thy God.'—HOSEA XIV. 1.

HOSEA's closing appeal is full of tenderness, gracious authoritativeness, and hopefulness.

I. God's Call to Israel.—It was a call to repentance. They had gone far and for a long time from Him. It is not yet too late nor too far to return; but they must return, and not stop short of Him. The simple word 'return' speaks of hope, and may inspire confidence. They are encouraged also by the reminder that they are 'Israel,' the name so significant as their covenant name. Still further are they helped by God's name expressing the relation in which He stood to them, 'The Lord thy God'. Jehovah, their Creator, Benefactor, Redeemer, in covenant with them, and still their God, willing as ever to bless them, and with claims upon them notwithstanding their departure from Him. That which might seem to bar repentance is the very reason for its exercise. The need of repentance is pressed home. The fallen are the proper subjects of repentance.

II. The Method of Returning.—God does not leave Israel in the dark as to the style and spirit of repentance, but gives specific information regarding the acceptable and successful way of returning to Him. 'Take with you words.' Do not appear before the Lord empty or silent, yet bring no outward gifts or sacrifices; bring only words—words of penitent confession. Do not put Him off with vague longings and wistful yearnings and confused thoughts; give shape to your feelings and form your thoughts in words; be definite; say something. Of course the words must come from the heart, and be its true expression. There is to be no sullen silence, but a simple utterance of penitence. Words coming from the heart are worth more than elaborate and costly but heartless sacrifices. Words compel us to analyse our emotions and embody our desires, and fix us down to distinct statements. But such words as God thus requires are not natural to those fallen in iniquity.

God Himself gives them; He fills our mouth with arguments.

III. What Words Shall We Take?—'Say unto Him'—

(a) 'Take away all iniquity.' A great saying, involving confession of our iniquity, the need of its removal, God's power and readiness to remove it, our inability to remove it.

(b) 'Receive us graciously.' literally, 'receive good'; q.d. accept the only good thing we bring, the confession which we offer, and which Thou hast put into our heart and mouth.

(c) 'So will we render the calves of our lips.' i.e. present the prayers and praises of our lips as thankofferings. This stands for the vow of a new and changed life of devotion to God's worship and service. It is the promise of self-consecration to God—an indispensable element in true repentance, without which prayer for forgiveness becomes little else than a request for liberty to sin afresh, and with impunity.

(d) 'Asshur shall not save us; we will not ride upon horses, neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods.' These words primarily refer to two serious breaches of Israel's covenant relation. They had recourse to foreign aid in national straits, instead of calling on Jehovah. Sometimes they looked to Assyria and sometimes to Egypt, the great country for horses and chariots. They had also fallen into idolatrous worship, and gone deeper until they worshipped gods of their own making. They had, in short, depended on foreign help and on their own devices. This dependence they abjure. All other confidences than God are to be rejected; all worldly policies and refuges and helps forsaken; all trust in self, or in any work of our own hands, renounced.

(e) 'In Thee the fatherless findeth mercy.' This is to back up the whole penitential prayer. It is a revelation and assurance of the compassionate nature of God. It is an appropriate encouragement to a penitent sinner coming back to God, away from Whom he has been truly fatherless, coming back conscious of his loneliness and dependence as a desolate orphan.

PUBLIC WORSHIP

'So will we render the calves of our lips.'—HOSEA XIV. 2.

THERE is but One Priest Who in His own right can approach God; but One Mediator Who can plead His own goodness; and so there is but One propitiatory, expiatory sacrifice, even 'the One full, perfect, and sufficient Sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction,' once made upon the Cross, for the sins of the whole world. There never has been, there never will be, any other. Except for this one and only Atonement, nothing we could say, think, or do, would be acceptable to God; but for this we should remain as we were born, an accursed race.

But though this be true, yet, with respect to those who rely on the intercession of that one great Priest, and, by faith, plead and apply to their souls the merits of that One expiatory sacrifice, the Spirit teaches us that they render unto God acceptable service; God for Christ's sake will permit them to approach Him, and accept a service at their hands. And this gives us the idea of a sacrifice. For a sacrifice is something presented to God, in behalf of man, by persons Divinely appointed to 'offer gifts unto the Lord'. In this sense, the 'blood of bulls and of goats,' under the law, became a typical sacrifice; and, under the Gospel, the Eucharist is thus designated, being a commemorative sacrifice. But according to Scripture—

I. Public worship is also a sacrifice, and it is very essential to represent it as such. This doctrine is directly implied in the text by a figure of speech. As calves were offered in sacrifice, so are the lips of worshippers to be as calves; they are to offer to God the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving (Amos iv. 5; Heb. xiii. 15). St. Peter, speaking of the Christian Church, says: 'Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ' (1 Peter ii. 5). He cannot here refer to the Eucharist, because he is addressing Christians generally as a holy priesthood, and the celebration of the Eucharist requires the intervention of a special order of men separated from among the general body of believers; he must, therefore, refer to the service of public or common prayer, which he describes as a spiritual sacrifice. The sacrifice offered in public worship is the Sacrifice of Prayer and Praise. It is offered in each congregation for the Church universal, for the Church of the province, for the Church of the diocese, more especially for the Church of the parish, and for all the members of the same; it is offered by the assembled worshippers, being baptized persons, 'continuing steadfastly in the Apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers' (Acts ii. 42). Such persons are for this purpose 'an holy Priesthood,' appointed to offer up these 'spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ' (1 Pet. ii. 5, 9; Rev. i. 5, 6; v. 9, 10). As certain believers are elected from their brethren, and ordained to be priests for the higher service of the Holy Eucharist, and that they may bless the people in the Name of Him Whose ministers they are; so are the members of the Church, as their name denotes (Ecclesia), a people 'called out' of mankind, to act as priests in the general sacrifice of prayer and thanksgiving; and, although the presence of ministers is required in the conduct of the morning and evening prayers, by the responses ample provision is made for the people generally to discharge their priestly function.

It would appear, then, that we are all permitted, for the sake of a crucified Saviour, to draw nigh unto God with boldness, and to offer Him a gift, even our reasonable service, our service of prayer and praise, which, through the mediation of an Interceding Saviour, is a sacrifice acceptable to God.

II. Now let this view be taken of the public worship of the Church, and we shall discharge this, our bounden duty and service, with very different feelings from those who regard it as doing openly what they do when they pray in private. We shall not palliate neglect of public worship, if no sermon be preached, by saying that we can pray at home as well as in the Sanctuary. When we regard public worship as a sacrifice, we look off from ourselves, and on to God; we are exerting all our energies to glorify God. That our own souls will be benefited is most true; but by it we are called off from that self-contemplation which makes men 'lovers of their own selves'. Prayer is beneficial to the soul. And as God is praised, God blesses; and in the blessing which alights on the Church, each living member, each 'lively stone,' has his share.

REFERENCE.—XIV. 5.—J. H. Norton, The King's Ferry-boat, p. 135.

THE DEW AND ITS INFLUENCES

'I will be as the dew unto Israel: he shall grow as the lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon.'—HOSEA XIV. 5.

CONSIDER some of the points of analogy between dew and the work of Christ and His Spirit.

I. Dew is silent, gentle, and noiseless in its operations. The dew moves on the noiseless wing of night. The eye cannot see, the ear cannot hear its silent and secret fall. It eludes the touch. The great forces of nature which influence the being, the life, the comfort, and joy of man, work the most silently.

II. The dew is free and copious. The abundant supply of the Spirit implied in the promise which is the subject of my sermon is aptly typified in the world of nature.

How free is the grace of God! 'I will love them freely.' The believer is freely loved (Deut. vii. 7, 8); freely chosen (Eph. i. 4-8). Christ is the gift of free love (John iii. 16). The spirit is free: 'Uphold me with Thy free Spirit' (Ps. li. 12). Our justification is free (Rom. iii. 24); our adoption free (Eph. i. 5); our entire salvation free (Titus iii. 5; Acts xv. 11)—like the 'dew of the Lord that waiteth not for man, nor tarrieth for the sons of men'. 'The morning light comes unfettered by any condition, and so also descends the rain. They are like God's greatest gifts, without money and without price; and they come with an overflowing plenty, for freeness and fullness go hand in hand.'

III. Dew refreshes, revives, and invigorates. Who has not felt and seen the refreshing influences of the dew in the early summer morning, when every blade of grass and every leaf has sparkled like a diamond in the morning light?

How the Israelites, when marching through the arid desert, must have enjoyed the baptism of the cloud! When any one has experienced the fiery power of the law, or when some assault of Satan has stirred up the passions of the soul, or when some fiery trial has come upon him, how comforting and refreshing the sweet influences of the heavenly dew! 'Shall not the dew assuage the heat?' (Eccles. xviii. 16). So copious is the grace, and yet so gentle is the influence, that it does not break the bruised reed nor injure the most tender plant. It is on this account, because of its refreshing and reviving effects, that the dew symbolizes the mission of the Israel of God in the world around. The 'remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many people as a dew from the Lord'. So shall it be with Israel as a people among the nations of the earth in the time of their regeneration.

IV. I have only time to add one more analogy between the dew and the work of the Holy Spirit. Dew fructifies and matures. Rains and dews are a chief cause of all fruitfulness. In nature the quantity of the fruit as much depends upon the rain and dew as upon the sun. 'So the believer's growth and fruitfulness are equally dependent upon the Spirit of grace from Christ Jesus, as upon the glories of His person and the fullness of His work; these, indeed, are in order to the other, and the fullness of the Spirit is in His hand to give, and promised by Him to all His people.' Wherever there is much of the Spirit's influence, there, of necessity, will much fruit be brought forth to God.—J. W. BARDLEY, Many Mansions, p. 265.

GOD'S LOVE FOR ISRAEL

'I will be as the dew unto Israel.'—HOSEA XIV. 5, 6.

I. The departure of Israel from God. No figure which could be imagined could be so true of God's love for Israel; none so accurately describe that love which was stronger than her sin. The sadness of God as he looks upon Israel is given in the strongest form in this parable.

II. The ruin which follows departure from God. The sin of Israel was deep, of the darkest order, and yet the love of God is deeper, and will not be turned.

III. There are offers of mercy and restoration. It is the one great feature of this book. In every utterance of woe there is an undercurrent of the tenderest gentleness, continually breaking out into entreaty and sorrow. The application is clear. Be careful to regard the Divine order of things. The safety of home, the security of the nation is endangered when men begin to defy that Divine order, and loosen the ancient bands of morality.—H. GREENE, The Church Homilist, p. 229.

THE DEW AND THE PLANTS

'I will be as the dew unto Israel; he shall grow as the lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon. His branches shall spread, and his beauty shall be as the olive-tree, and his smell as Lebanon.'—HOSEA XIV. 5, 6.

HOSEA is eminently the Prophet of repentance and of pardoning love. The text comes from a fervent and tender appeal to Israel to come back to its God. The Prophet presses into service the lily, the cedar, the olive, and the springing corn and the blossoming vine, as symbols of what God is able and willing to do to penitents that come back and submit themselves to His influence.

I. The source of fruitfulness. The deceitful ray of prosperity is full of danger to the spiritual life, and no less cruel are the fervid beams of fiery temptation with which we have all to be tried. And where is our strength? I know but one source of it—that we shall receive the communications of that spiritual life, the gift of which is the central blessing of the Gospel. So we have to begin with confession; we have to begin with penitence; we have to receive into opening hearts the welcome of our pardoning Father, and then we may be sure that we shall receive the promised gift. And the silent influence will come stealing over the landscape, and everything that was wilting and drooping in the deadly sunshine will be freshened and restored in the cool stillness of the moist-laden night.

II. The profuse beauty which will follow the fall of the dew. 'He shall grow as the lily.' A profusion of grace ought to match the profusion with which the dew comes from God. But let Christian people remember what a great many are apt to forget, that we are bound to try to make our Christianity attractive. Grace means both a gift from God and beauty; and the double meaning of the word should always be kept in mind. There ought to be the beauty of holiness where there is the dew from the Lord.

III. The strength which should go with the beauty. To the beauty of the fragile lily we must add the strength of the stable cedar. There must be strength conjoined with beauty in a world like ours, full of conflict and strength. If you are to be beautiful you have to be strong. The only way to be strong is to 'stand fast in the Lord, and in the power of His might'. Open your hearts to God's dew, and you will have the beauty of the lily and the strength of the cedar.

IV. The fruitfulness which should crown beauty and strength. On our barren stems little that is good can grow. We must be grafted into the true Vine. Vital union with Jesus Christ through simple faith is the condition of all true goodness. A man that is apart from Christ does nothing and is nothing, and is whirled away at last before the storm.—A. MACLAREN, Christian Commonwealth, 27 April, 1899, p. 488.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 5, 6.—J. Vaughan, Sermons (10th Series), p. 181. XIV. 7.—J. Keble, Sermons for Holy Week, p. 163. XIV. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiii. No. 1339. XIV. 6.—J. M. Gibson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxii. p. 344.

JOEL

JOEL

THE MESSAGE OF THE BOOK OF JOEL

'The word of the Lord that came to Joel.'—JOEL I. 1.

THE book of Joel, as we have it, consists of two parts.

I. A violent plague of locusts had visited the land, and from this destruction the Prophet saw nothing to save the people but repentance. In his call to repentance we notice four suggestions.

(a) He discovers to the people the condition of affairs. He challenges them to say whether, in the memory of anyone living, a crisis of such importance had arisen.

(b) He bids them wait for the desolation that covers the land. He calls in the nation to weep as a virgin mourning for the spouse of her youth.

(c) He warns them that all that has happened is but the prelude of more awful judgments.

(d) But having described to them the greatness of their danger, the Prophet goes on to tell them that from this danger they can only escape by genuine contrition and sincere repentance.

II. The Prophet's call to repentance had not been in vain, and to the humble and penitent nation Joel was sent to declare the Divine promise. In this we notice that it was:—

(a) A promise of Restoration. Very shortly after refreshing showers had fallen, and the country, bare, barren, and desolate, was once more showing signs of life.

(b) A promise of Refreshment. Upon the nation penitent and restored, the gift of God's spirit was to fall, bringing with it a new revelation of God, and a new power to serve Him in the world.

(c) A promise of Deliverance. The day of the Lord, which was certainly coming, was to be a day of salvation to the Lord's people by being a day of destruction to their enemies.

(d) A promise of Rest. No more famine, no more scarcity, no more barrenness, no more conflict; but rest and peace and joy in favour of the Lord.

III. The story of the book of Joel is a story with a national bearing. The language of this book had a clear and definite meaning for those to whom it was spoken, and no doubt much in the book has been already fulfilled. But the fulfilment of the book as a whole belongs to the time of the millennial glory when Israel shall have received and enthroned as King her long rejected Messiah.

IV. But let us not lose sight of its individual bearing. It is a call to contrition and repentance. God bids us recognize, and that speedily, the sinfulness of our present lives, and bids us humble ourselves before Him because of that.—G. H. C. MACGREGOR, Messages of the Old Testament, p. 167.

REFERENCES.—II. 1.—J. Keble, Sermons for Sundays After Trinity, part II. p. 342. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, pp. 163, 272.

CONVERSION

(Ash Wednesday)

'Turn ye even to Me with all your heart, and with fasting, and with weeping, and with mourning.'—JOEL II. 12.

A GREAT national calamity, either impending or just passed, was the occasion of the prophecy of Joel. It is traceable to national sin, and its remedy is national repentance.

The words of our text bring before us a matter which is peculiarly fit for Ash Wednesday consideration—the doctrine of Conversion; for conversion is the first step in that life of penitence to which Lent calls us. But conversion is a subject about which there is much misunderstanding.

I. What Conversion is not.

(a) Many persons confound conversion with regeneration, with which it has hardly anything in common. The grace of regeneration can be given but once, for we can only be born once, but conversion may be necessary many times in our life, as often indeed as we turn away from God.

(b) Conversion is not always the same in every one. With some, like St. Paul, it is instantaneous; with others it is gradual, and so free from any special manifestation that they can hardly tell when they were converted.

(c) Conversion is not everything, it is only the first step in the life of penitence, and of little use if it does not lead to the fullness of Christian fellowship.

II. What Conversion is.—It is the turning of the will to God. By the gift of free will, which God has bestowed upon us, we are able to make our actions meritorious by doing them freely, with the love of God as their motive, and the glory of God as their end.

III. There are Many Degrees of Sin Possible in Man.

(a) We can live in open rebellion.

(b) We can compromise, and while serving God outwardly, we may fall short of conformity to His will.

IV. Conversion.

(a) Must be thorough. We must turn to God with our entire will.

(b) The accompaniments of conversion are, fasting, weeping, and mourning; these are signs of deep penitence, and all are fruits of a thorough conversion.

—A. G. MORTIMER, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, p. 161.

REFERENCES.—II. 12.—J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (1st Series), pp. 36, 38. II. 12, 13.—E. Blencowe, Plain Sermons to a Country Congregation (2nd Series), p. 138. G. W. Brameld, Practical Sermons, p. 58. Bishop How, Plain Words (1st Series), p. 33. II. 17.—J. Keble, Sermons for Septuagesima to Ash Wednesday, p. 352. II. 25.—F. W. Farrar, The Fall of Man, p. 292. J. Vaughan, Old Testament Outlines, p. 273. II. 26.—J. Keble, Sermons for Septuagesima to Ash Wednesday, p. 249. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1098. H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 1541. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (2nd Series), p. 220. II. 28.—E. Bayley, Sermons on the Work and Person of the Holy Spirit, p. 221. II. 28-32.—Ibid. p. 1.

A MESSAGE OF DELIVERANCE

(Ash Wednesday)

'And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered.'—JOEL II. 32.

THIS verse occurs three times over in the Scriptures, once here in the old dispensation, once again on the birthday of the new, and once again thirty years later, when the great Apostle was facing the problem of the admission to the Church of the Gentiles.

I. The Message Proclaimed:—

(a) By the Prophet Joel.—Nearly three thousand years ago the words were spoken first. Judea had reached a period of prosperity, but both king and people had forgotten to walk humbly with their God. And Joel tells, in language which cannot be misunderstood, what must happen to a nation which will live without God. Is there then no hope for the people? He passes on to tell them of the hope that there is in the Lord (Joel II. 12 and 13). Even the fire of prophecy burns up afresh. Joel sings a song which is full of joy (II. 24). Further still he looks to the dawn of the new dispensation. 'I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh.' Then further still, to the end of the dispensation on earth altogether. Then, even then, it shall come to pass that 'whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered'.

(b) By St. Peter.—Eight hundred years later, when the Day of Pentecost has come, St. Peter is about to preach the first Christian sermon, and our text was his text. When the sermon was over, there was such a result as proved God's blessing on his interpretation of the text: for men were moved, not in hundreds but in thousands, to ask the great question, 'What shall I do?'

(c) By St. Paul.—The world rolls on again for thirty years, steadily becoming worse, and the Apostle to the Gentiles, grasping for the first time with full force the magnificent width of the Christian Church, also takes up this text, and looking round on all the darkness of the heathen world, on the hollowness which was creeping even then into the infant Church, he declares with emphasis that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved.

II. A Message for To-day.—That was the message with which the Church went out into the world, that is the message the Church has preached ever since, and it is the message the Church delivers to-day. And to-day, as we enter upon this holy season of Lent, we do well to remember that the message has never at any time lost its force. Do not let us explain it away. Do not let us think it cannot be accepted literally. It is exactly and literally true. By that message we must be judged some day. If it be 'easy' as some say to call upon the Lord, it is only because all that was hard was taken by Him and borne for us. Do not let us think that salvation is so complicated a thing that it cannot be contained in a message like that. It is true that salvation is a very wide and deep thing, but the first thing it must mean to every soul is salvation from the wrath of God. The criminal under sentence of death must first be pardoned, and know it, before he can come out and live a life worth living. 'Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord,' aye, even now, 'shall be delivered,' shall be saved from the wrath upon him because of original sin, from the burden of the guilt which belongs to him from actual sin, shall know that he has passed from death into life, the life which Christ gives him as a gift.

III. A Personal Question.—Have you ever made one real effort to call upon the name of the Lord to be saved? This is the question I would press home upon you at this Lenten season. What does the message mean? Simply this—faith, which acknowledges Jesus as the Saviour. Faith first, which looks up to Him believing that He is able to do what I long for Him to do. Then, secondly, simple acceptance. I must be ready to take what He gives, to accept it, to believe it, to rest upon it.

REFERENCES.—II. 32.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1931. III. 14.—J. C. M. Bellew, Sermons, vol. i. p. 109. III. 21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 379. R. F. Norton, The Hidden Guest, p. 233.

AMOS

AMOS

THE PROPHET AMOS

'The words of Amos.'—AMOS I. I.

To estimate the Prophets' message we must consider something of the times in which they lived and the circumstances under which they spoke. Let us do so in the case of the Prophet Amos, from whose writings our lessons for to-day are taken. You will notice as you study the prophetic books of the Old Testament that in almost every case the writing opens with a short description of the writer and precise mention of the time during which his witness was given.

I. The Prophet Amos.—The book of Amos opens with these words: 'The words of Amos, who was among the herdmen of Tekoa, which he saw concerning Israel in the days of Uzziah King of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash King of Israel, two years before the earthquake'. We learn here one or two interesting particulars. In the first place, Amos was of humble origin. He had not been brought up in the stir and bustle of town life, but away on the open downs and pastures which stretch to the south of Jerusalem, where he had tended his flocks and pruned his sycamore-trees, far from the haunts of men, his experience of towns confined probably to the yearly journey to one of the markets of the land to sell his wool and dispose of his fruit; and so there he appeared, a mere yokel, in the midst of the festival of Bethel, and was roughly bidden by Amaziah to go about his business. 'I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son; but I was an herdman, and a gatherer of sycamore fruit: and the Lord took me as I followed the flock, and the Lord said unto me, Go, prophesy unto My people Israel.' God has His own way of preparing His servants for their work, and Amos is not the only Prophet who was in the deserts until the day of his showing unto Israel. There, in the unmitigated wilderness, as a graphic writer calls it, where life is reduced to poverty and danger, where Nature starves the imagination but excites the faculties of perception and curiosity, with the mountain tops, the sunrise in his face, but, above all, with Jerusalem so near, Amos heard the Voice calling him to be a Prophet, and gathered those symbols and figures in which his Prophet's message reaches us with so fresh and so austere an air. The time of his message was the latter part, probably, of the reign of the namesake of the founder of the kingdom, Jeroboam, the second of whom it is said that 'he departed not from all the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin'. In Amos, therefore, as most critics agree, we have the earliest recorded voice of prophecy.

II. To Whom he Spoke.—Now let us try for a moment to estimate the state of society in Israel in the reign of Jeroboam II. The record of his time is in the fourteenth chapter of the second book of Kings. It was a time of singular prosperity. But prosperity and security brought, as is too often the case, grave evils in their train, and the pages of the Prophet disclose a state of society very different from the old. The primitive simplicity had disappeared, and luxury, oppression, and vice were abounding. Partly for defence and partly for pleasure, society was congregating in the towns. Agriculture was being displaced by commerce, and rural simplicity was giving way to the dangers and conventionalities of city life. The rich were conspicuous for their luxury. They had their winter and their summer houses, sumptuously furnished, houses of ivory, and great houses, as Amos called them, where they feasted to excess. Public and private virtues alike had decayed, and, engrossed with their own pleasures, the individuals showed a callous indifference to the moral ruin of their country. 'They are not grieved for affliction of Joseph,' says the Prophet. If the outward ordinances of religion were scrupulously observed, there was no heart worship. They sought evil and not good. Now into such a state of society Amos comes, an unwelcome intruder doubtless, even a despised personality, whose countrified aspect would provoke a smile, but burdened with a message from Jehovah, which he is bold to deliver. In the first place he rudely dispels the fond idea which Israel hugged in its national pride that to the favoured nation of Jehovah no harm could happen. 'You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore, I will punish you for all your iniquities.' Such is his startling and almost paradoxical message, and then, in a series of simple figures, drawn from his desert life and shepherd experience, he strives to gain the ear of the people for himself. Having rebuked their self-delusion, he goes on to predict the coming judgment, and in clear terms he lays down what God requires of them.

III. The Message and Our Own Times.—The writings of the Prophets have a function to discharge and a moral to convey to the twentieth century. Recognize, it has been said, that the fundamental meaning of the prophecies must be that which they bore to the living generation to whom they were first addressed, and you are at once inspired by their message to the men of your own time. Yes, and how history repeats itself in the circumstances of our time! The dangers and temptations of city life, as agriculture gives place to commerce, the snare of luxury, the deadening influence of a mere pleasure-seeking existence, the falling away from the simple life, the pride of national prosperity, the bitter cry of the poor, the delusion of a worship which is merely ceremonial, are not all these things with us to-day, and do they not form a menace not only to national righteousness and justice and purity, but also to that real personal religion, to that seeking the Lord through Him Who is the Light and to Whom the Old Testament witnesses, and whom the New Testament reveals? Are there none here who feel anxious, sometimes, as to the future of their country, none who have grieved over the sins of our age in the great cities of the world, the insensate luxury, the commercial immorality, the unchastity, the callousness, dark stains on her nominal Christianity? Are there none who fear lest God might say, 'Shall I not visit for these things, shall not My soul be avenged on such a nation as this?' We need a Prophet's voice, backed by a Prophet's power. 'Seek the Lord and ye shall live. Seek good and not evil. Seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness.' We need the power which came in another, a much later Prophet's vision, when upon the dry bones lying white and bare in the valley the quickening breath of God came, vivifying them into life and activity. And so upon our beloved land, upon our great cities, upon our congregations, upon individual men and women, we want the Divine breath to come which shall quicken each soul, inducing righteousness, stimulating faith, increasing love, till a great army of true and loyal servants of Jesus Christ stands upon their feet, each one a power for righteousness working unceasingly for the conversion of fresh souls and for the regeneration of society. For it is—and we must never lose sight of the truth—through individual souls seeking for God that the awakening and regeneration must come.

REFERENCES.—II. 11, 12.—S. R. Driver, Sermons on Subjects Connected with the Old Testament, p. 99. II. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. viii. No. 466. III. 1, 2.—H. Hensley Henson, Christ and the Nation, p. 117; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxvi. 1904, p. 120. III. 2.—W. R. Inge, All Saints' Sermons, 1905-1907, p. 59. H. C. G. Moule, Fordington Sermons, p. 39. J. H. Ruslibrooke, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 259. III. 3.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 597; vol. xlv. No. 2668. W. Hay M. H. Aitken, Mission Sermons (3rd Series), p. 82. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 143. III. 3-6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 705. III. 6.—Ibid. vol. vii. No. 426. H. D. Rawnsley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 389. III. 7.—C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 150. IV. 4-13.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 150. IV. 10, 11.—Hugh Price Hughes, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lii. 1897, p. 177. IV. 11.—A. F. Winnington Ingram, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 169. IV. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 923, vol. li. No. 2965. H. P. Liddon, Advent in St. Paul's, pp. 317, 329, 343, 355. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. i. p. 287, vol. vii. p.

225. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 51. W. C. E. Newbolt, Church Times, vol. lii. 1904, p. 793. V. 4.—H. C. Beeching, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 345. V. 4-15.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 157. V. 4-27.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. li. No. 2965. V. 5.—Hugh Price Hughes, Essential Christianity, p. 179.

THE WORKS OF GOD

'Seek Him that maketh the seven stars, and Orion, and turneth the shadow of death into the morning, and maketh the day dark with night: that calleth for the waters of the sea, and poureth them out upon the face of the earth: the Lord is His name.'—Amos v. 8.

THE text brings the works of God and the name of God into one focus, and makes use of both as an argument with man to raise himself from the low and unworthy pretences of religion to Him Who sits high above the magnificence of all material forms, yet deigns to listen to the whisper of a kneeling child.

I. Seek Him because He is Immutable.—This is declared by 'the seven stars and Orion,' and by all the constellations among which the Pleiades are set. It is a wonderful thought that when we look up to the mighty heavens we see precisely what Adam and Eve saw when, through the openings among the trees of Eden, they looked on the same heavens. They beheld the Pleiades, that group of stars so beautifully likened to 'a knot of fire-flies tangled in a silver braid'. They beheld those shining orbs in which we detect the appearance of an armed warrior, and call Orion. Through all the changes of human history those celestial bodies have shone with like brilliancy, and moved with like pomp in the great spaces overhead. The continuance of those material forms may be for millenniums multiplied by millenniums, but eventually they will fade. Yet 'Thou art the same, and Thy years shall have no end'. He was before them, and when they have vanished He will be, in all the grandeur of His being, what He is at the present moment.

II. Seek Him because He is All-powerful.—This also is declared by 'the seven stars and Orion'. Many have looked on the Pleiades as but an insignificant group in the heavens; but that constellation has depths of glory which the unaided eye cannot reach. We count seven stars, but the telescope announces fourteen magnificent sun-like bodies clustered comparatively near to one of the seven. An astonishing universe; and yet we can stand beneath all that pomp of worlds; we can look on the constellations, which are but as the index of wonders far withdrawn into the depths of space, and we can say, 'My Father made them all'.

III. Seek Him because of His Beneficent Activities.—'And turneth the shadow of death into the morning, and maketh the day dark with night: that calleth for the waves of the sea, and poureth them out upon the face of the earth.' How beautiful is morning as it comes with golden sandals and rosy veil through the gates of the east! How beautiful is night! How soft and soothing the shadows with which it enwraps the earth! How beautiful the silent processes by which the rain is distilled on the thirsty ground! Think of the oceans—those mighty reservoirs of the Most High. Think of the clouds drawn from them; now white as the snows which crown a mountain's forehead; now gorgeous, as if woven of a thousand rainbows; now black as a funeral pall. Think of the rain, how it falls; not in a sudden and overpowering splash; not in a flood, tearing the leaves from the trees and the young shoots from the soil, but in a succession of gentle drops. Is not this gracious Being, Whose hand is in the pleasing changes of day and night, and in 'rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness,' One with Whom it is desirable to live in filial relationship? If we seek Him, He will turn the shadow of every trouble that may hang over us into the beautiful morning of His love; and when He makes the day of life dark with night, He will be so near us, and speak in such a strain of tender, helpful promise, that we shall not be afraid of the darkness; nor will He fail, while we stay below, to make our souls as a fruitful field with the genial, gentle rain of His Holy Spirit.

IV. Seek Him because of His name.—'The Lord is His Name.' It is not simply that He is as Jehovah, or the Self-Existent; for with the announcement of that awful name there is also the announcement of gracious qualities, which embolden us to call Him, not only Lord, but also our Father. Glance at some of those ideas which the ancient saints attached to the Divine name. Jehovah-jireh—the Lord will provide. Jehovah-nissi—Jehovah my banner. 'This was the name which Moses gave to the altar he built as a memorial of Israel's victory over Amalek. What a banner! Jehovah-shalom—the Lord is my peace. Jehovah-Tsidkenu—the Lord our righteousness. This title is specially connected with the manifestation of God in Christ Jesus. What honour, what safety, in being able to appropriate this name as the confidence of our souls! 'And be found in Him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith.'

REFERENCES.—V. 8.—B. W. Jackson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 125. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. liii. No. 3034. V. 18.—E. C. S. Gibson, Messages from the Old Testament, p. 215. V. 24.—J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 388. V. 25, 26.—T. G. Rooke, The Church in the Wilderness, p. 265.

AMOS VI. 1.

THERE is a saying which I have heard attributed to Mr. Carlyle about Socrates,—a very happy saying, whether it is really Mr. Carlyle's or not—which excellently marks the essential point in which Hebraism differs from Hellenism. 'Socrates,' this saying goes, 'is terribly at ease in Zion'. Hebraism—and here is the source of its wonderful strength—has always been serenely pre-occupied with an awful sense of the impossibility of being at ease in Zion. . . . It is all very well to talk of getting rid of one's ignorance, of seeing things in their reality, and seeing them in their full beauty; but how is this to be done when there is something which thwarts and spoils all our efforts? This something is sin.—M. ARNOLD in Culture and Anarchy.

REFERENCES.—VI. 1.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 417. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 120. VI. 1-8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lii. No. 2977. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 163. VI. 6.—A. E. Garvie, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 231. VI. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxv. No. 1470; vol. lii. No. 2977. VII. 1-6.—Ibid. vol. lii. No. 2977. VII. 7, 8.—Ibid. vol. i. No. 2904. R. Winterbotham, Sermons Preached in Holy Trinity Church, Edinburgh. VIII. 1.—J. Menzies, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 112. VIII. 1-14.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 169. VIII. 1, 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 343. VIII. 9.—W. Huntington, The Eternal Setting of the Sun, Sermons, 1781-1877. VIII. 11.—Bishop Lightfoot, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 446. H. A. Stimson, The New Things of God, p. 85. VIII. 11, 12.—J. J. Tayler, Christian Aspects of Faith and Duty, p. 1. IX. 9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 825. IX. 13.—Ibid. vol. vi. No. 296. J. Wallace, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 142.

OBADIAH

OBADIAH

POSSESSIONS POSSESSED

'The house of Jacob shall possess their possessions.'—
OBADIAH V. 17.

THEY shall not finally lack anything which is rightly theirs. Their promised inheritance shall ultimately appertain to them. God will see to it that His people have estate corresponding to their dignity of character. 'The house of Jacob shall possess their possessions.'

I. Precious Possessions.—The house of Jacob have 'their possessions'. We are informed by our scholars that the word here rendered 'possessions' is a rare word in the original. A rare word is used to describe rare possessions. So special is the quality of that which is alluded to that a unique word has to be requisitioned. 'The possessions of the people of God as singularly precious.

The possessions set forth by Obadiah are (1) vision, (2) deliverance, (3) holiness.

II. Precious Possessions Unpossessed.—'The house of Jacob shall possess their possessions.' That 'shall' is ominous. Do they not possess them now? And if not, why not?

Reason is assigned by Obadiah. The house of Jacob was enduring 'the day of their destruction' (v. 12). It was 'the day of their calamity' (v. 18).

And how had this come about? Alas! Partly as retribution for their past negligence and sin.

They did once possess their possessions, but they had been retributively dispossessed of them. They had proved unworthy of such treasure.

III. Precious Possessions Possessed.—'The house of Jacob shall possess their possessions' is a grander word far on Christian lips than on the lips which uttered it first. The channels of grace deepen as they run through Scripture. Numerous converts to the faith are a precious possession we may possess. John Bunyan said in his immortal Grace Abounding: 'I have counted as if I had goodly buildings and lordships in those places where my children were born'. And the glorious evangelist was right in his accounting. No possession is more precious than spiritual children. May Zion's converts be many! May each of us possess our possessions!

Fellowship with God is a possession we may all possess. By grace many of us do possess that precious possession. Temporal provision is another of our possessions, and God promises us we shall possess it. Hold to the promise amid all the strain and poverty of these times, my much-cumbered hearers.

Heaven is of all our possessions the most precious, and that we shall at length possess. God told Abraham that to him and to his seed after him He would give Canaan 'for an everlasting possession'. To the Christian—Abraham's seed—this promise is secured. And when the Lord willeth we shall go in and enjoy the good land for ever.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Gospel of the Left Hand, p. 179.

JONAH

JONAH

REFERENCES.—I.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. II. No. 2024. H. A. Stimson, The New Things of God, p. 233. I. 1-4.—R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. Ixiv. 1903, p. 97. I. 1-17.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 177. I. 2.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iii. p. 135. I. 3.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. I. p. 174. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 622; vol. xxxvi. No. 2171. I. 4.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iii. p. 143. I. 5.—John Kennedy, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, pp. 271, 295. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. I. No. 2903. I. 5, 6.—Ibid. vol. viii. No. 469. I. 6.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. I. p. 190. T. De Witt Talmage, Sermons, p. 231. J. Jarvie, Discourses, p. 132. I. 8.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iii. p. 152. I. 10.—H. P. Liddon, Sermons Preached on Special Occasions, 1860-1889, p. 164. I. 12.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. I. p. 202. I. 12, 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 567. I. 13.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iii. p. 158. I. 17.—G. Mouks, Pastor in Ecclesia, p. 83. II. 1.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iii. p. 166.

RENEWED CONFIDENCE

'I am cast out of Thy sight; yet I will look again toward Thy holy temple.'—JONAH II. 4.

THE Prophet is a picture of the backslider, of the man who has somehow failed to fulfil his vows of obedience and loyalty to God. Sometimes it is by reason of cowardice when confronted by duty, as in the case of Jonah; or again, by wilful sin when compelled to choice, as in the case of Judas; or yet again by neglect when enjoined by the necessities of the case as well as by the Divine Word to wholeheartedness, as with Peter, that men depart from God. No experience of life is less disputed than the difficulty of maintaining attitudes of obedience and faithfulness to spiritual vows. There are few who do not continually run the risk or becoming cast-away, and each of us needs grace not only to serve God, but to serve Him with fear. For even in the slightest defection from the plain path of His will, there lurks the certain power of eventually putting infinite distance between the soul and God. It is a solemn fact, too, that God's love, despite its strength and long-suffering, may eventually be conquered by man's sin and negligence, of which the beginning may be but trifling and insignificant. Hence the history of Jonah's fall and repentance is full of meaning to us all.

I. 'I am cast out of Thy sight'—thus he speaks when he is at last brought by adversity of circumstance to recognize his own mistake. Hitherto he has lost the sense of sin just because he has lost the sense of God, for these two are ever simultaneous processes. The extremity of need into which the Prophet has been brought has, however, brought him to a knowledge of his sin and has also produced a longing for restoration.

II. The same providential ordering which produces this sense of need and sin also creates hope. The knowledge that God is taking note inspires the wandering soul to say, 'Yet I will look again'. And here the memory of his former looking to the Lord is an encouraging impulse. Nothing was then seen but mercy and love, pity and pardon. And He is still the unchanged Lord. Jonah has found no evil in God at any time, and past experience assures him of the full welcome which awaits the repentant and returning soul. 'I will look again,' for, though far away by his own transgressions, the unfaithful servant is not beyond His help. What courage may we not gather from these words, and from this history of the disobedient messenger! However and wherever we have failed, we need not be hopeless so long as there is in us a God-created consciousness of sin and a willingness to return. The feeblest spark of desire for restoration has been kindled by the fire of His love, and conscience and memory unite in constraining us to 'look again' unto Him who is both Author and Finisher of our faith. And His restoring grace is not limited to a sevenfold experience, nor to an experience repeated seventy-fold!—J. STUART HOLDER, The Pre-Eminent Lord, p. 171.

REFERENCES.—II. 4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1813. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iii. p. 172. II. 7.—Ibid. vol. iii. p. 179. II. 8.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 184. J. Duncan, The Pulpit and the Communion Table, p. 307. II. 9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 131. III.—Ibid. vol. xliii. No. 2544. III. 1, 2.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iii. p. 187. III. 1-10.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 189. III. 4.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. I. p. 210. III. 4, 5, 10.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. I. p. 303.

REPENTANCE

(For Ash Wednesday)

'So the people of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them even to the least of them, etc.'—JONAH III. 5, 10.

AMONG all the passages in the picturesque narratives of the Old and New Testaments, there is none that, as a picture, is more wonderfully illustrative of the repentant life than is this. It brings before us three well-defined points.

I. First, as to the cause which leads a man to repentance. The people of Nineveh are here said to have believed God. I want to submit to you that this curious statement about this people strikes one more forcibly the more one contemplates it. We could imagine the people turning at the sound of the Prophet's voice and seeing there a stranger, and asking each other what it was he was saying. 'Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown? What nonsense this man says! He must be beside himself.' But they say nothing of the sort. Instead, I find that they accepted, according to this story, exactly the judgment that the Prophet foretold. They heard not his voice alone, but they caught the very voice of God, speaking through the Prophet. And, says the story, they believed God. That belief in God was, to the men of Nineveh, the start of their repentance.

II. Then, secondly, here there are recorded the characteristics of the repentant life. Now the vision of God, what is it to you and me? In one way of viewing it, it is the recognition by the mind of man of all that God means. In one very real sense it may be said that God's attributes are Himself. When we think of God, what do our minds realize but His perfect goodness, His perfect holiness? In fact, you may take every attribute, every ideal, and in that which we call God, that attribute, that ideal has its perfect existence. Now when I go and stand beneath that great life and let my mind go out to the recognition of all that God means, and I catch the vision of His perfect goodness, what does that vision do but drive my mind inwards upon itself and make me recognize my own utter badness? When I look upon God as the perfection of all that is merciful, beautiful, holy, what does it do but make me recognize my own absolute failure in His sight, and I stand in the vision of God through the Holy Spirit's agency to see myself lost, and undone, a creature without hope except what hope I have in Him, my Ideal? That vision inevitably creates the sternest sorrow that ever invades the life of a man. Repentance turns the mind from sorrow to prayer. Did you notice that the men of Nineveh, led by their king, were told to cry mightily unto God? Prayer is a characteristic of the life of repentance. We go to a trusted minister of Christ, and we open our grief to him, and tell him our fears; but all that he can do is to guide us to this. 'Cry mightily,' he says, 'to God.' Out of the depths the soul lifts up its voice to God, that He may hear its prayer; and if there is a prayer that ever comes from the soul of man and ascends to the Throne of God, that He cannot turn away from, that He must stretch out His Hand readily and immediately to help, it is the prayer of the repentant soul.

REFERENCES.—III. 5.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iii. p. 194. W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 73. III. 10.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iii. p. 202.

JONAH IV.

THESE are those, I am afraid, who would rather see their neighbours suffer than their own forebodings fail. Jonah is not the only Prophet of evil whom it has displeased exceedingly, and who has been very angry, because God is a gracious God, and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repenteth him of the evil. The beautiful apologue of the gourd is still, and, I fear ever will be applicable to many.—JULIUS HARE in Guesses at Truth.

JONAH'S CHARACTER

'But it displeased Jonah exceedingly, and he was very angry.'

—JONAH IV. 1.

Jonah's Character.—At first it seems inconsistent and contradictory; but a little consideration shows that he represents a large class in every age, a class in which good and bad traits are combined.

1. Jonah's Anger.—Several causes have been suggested for it, and perhaps almost all of them more or less entered into it.

1. Personal humiliation; that his prediction having failed he might be regarded as a false Prophet.

2. Zeal for God's honour among the heathen, which might be diminished by the failure of His Prophet's prediction.

3. The painful contrast between the conversion of Gentile Nineveh and the impenitence of his own people.

4. Patriotism; the danger to his own country of the threatening power of Nineveh. This was probably the principal cause; since, if Nineveh had been destroyed, Israel would have been safe.

His anger causes him such misery that he requests for himself that he may die. God gently rebukes Jonah's anger by the question, 'Dost thou well to be angry?' The best remedy for anger is quiet consideration of the matter, an appeal to our sense of justice, a seeing things as they are in God's sight and not merely in our own prejudiced and selfish vision.

II. God's Gift of the Gourd.—In times of trouble God prepares consolation for the relief of His people. Such a refuge was Jonah's gourd. Jonah quickly recovers his temper. He 'rejoiced with great joy' over the gourd. This reaction is a sign of his peculiar temperament, either very optimistic or very pessimistic.

The gourd, however, did not last. God, who had prepared it, prepared the worm which was to destroy it. But worse still. God prepared a vehement wind, the sirocco.

Again there is a reaction, and Jonah desires to die. God sometimes withdraws the gifts of earthly consolations that we may learn to bear our cross in reliance upon Him, and not to rest in mere amelioration of our troubles and difficulties.

III. Jonah's Character.—He was a sincerely religious man and yet very human. His temperament leads him to vacillate between extremes; first open rebellion against God, then deep penitence; afterwards perfect obedience, then discontent and despair. Throughout we see a strong trait of selfishness. A very contradictory character, and yet true to life.

A man of irascible temper, easily provoked, and then most unreasonable.

There are many lessons we may draw from Jonah's character. Let us dwell on one. Conversion does not mean complete sanctification. The one may be the act of a moment, the result of an overwhelming sense of penitence; the other is the work of many years, often of a lifetime.—A. G. MORTIMER, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, p. 233.

REFERENCES.—IV. 1.—Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 60. IV. 1, 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2544. IV. 3.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iii. p. 210. IV. 6.—Ibid. p. 216. IV. 7.—D. L. Ritchie, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 310. IV. 10, 11.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. i. p. 249. IV. 11.—R. Hislop, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 212. A. F. Winnington Ingram. Ibid. vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 200.

MICAH

MICAH

REFERENCES.—I. 1-4.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 72. I. 5-8.—Ibid. p. 109. II. 7.—A. Maclaren, Christ in the Heart, p. 305.

THE POLLUTION OF THE WORLD

'Arise ye, and depart; for this is not your rest: because it is polluted, it shall destroy you, even with a sore destruction.'—MICAH II. 10.

WE might perhaps suppose that this is an address of Micah to righteous people, and a warning to them that the world is inherently polluted. But the words are not addressed to righteous persons; they are not warnings to righteous persons to arise and depart, in the spirit at least, from the pollutions of the world; they are addressed to those who have caused the world to be polluted, those who are responsible for the pollution of the world. It is a prophetic statement that it is man that has polluted the world, not the world that has polluted man. The verses immediately preceding this are eloquent in that direction; they tell us that those persons who are thus addressed are those who have committed all sorts of crimes; they have stripped the poor man of his raiment by day, of his clothing by night, they have driven out the widows from their quiet habitation; they have gone further and have cut off the young children from the glory of the Lord for ever. These are they to whom this verse is addressed, and they are told to arise and get out, if they can—get out from the world they have polluted.

There is nothing in all this which suggests that view that in the early ages of Christianity many held, to the effect that because the world seemed so wicked, and was so wicked, it could not have been created by an absolutely pure and beneficent Being, but that it must have been created by a being in whom there is blended a great deal of good and evil. There is nothing in this which justifies that philosophic idea developed by early Christian philosophers, that there must have been something inherently bad in the world as created by God.

I. Modern Truth in Ancient Garb.—In this prophecy of Micah there is a wonderful amount of modern work, only of course in ancient dress. He tells, for instance, of great catastrophes that shall come; and this comes home to us when we hear of terrible volcanic eruptions in one part of the world and another; great railway catastrophes—Micah might have foreseen these; he speaks of great catastrophes, chariots and horses—he knew nothing of express railway trains, but he did know of horses and chariots. Cities and strong towers shall be rooted up; they seem to speak to us out of our own experience in quite recent times.

More than that, he tells that there has been a great loss of confidence as between man and man—that you can trust nobody. 'Trust ye not in a friend,' etc.

Again he says that those were times when false teaching was popular; he calls it false prophecy. As you know, prophecy has two meanings, the speaking forth, and the speaking beforehand; here he is speaking of speaking forth—what we call preaching. True, earnest, honest teaching was unpopular, and the people loved to have it so; they desired smooth things. They desired also—they had itching ears—desired new things, things invented by man, not things revealed by God. It was popular to disbelieve all that was revealed to them, to discard all earnest, honest, searching preaching.

Again they were—and this was universal in this time—they were going after idols, false gods. And it is remarkable how time after time the words silver and gold came in; idols of silver and gold. Well, we make ourselves idols of silver and gold. We do not waste the silver and gold making them into molten and graven images, but I put it to you, is it not true that on the face of things there is a great waste of silver and gold now? That as in those days they desired those images and bowed down before them, so there is now a great desire to obtain, at any cost, any sacrifice of what is right, to obtain more and more idols of silver and gold.

And there was the general dislocation of society, the breaking and bursting of social ties as though an earthquake had happened and burst up society; and that especially, Micah says, especially in the capital of the kingdom.

II. These are very Grave Warnings indeed to us.—Not that the world is inherently polluted, but that man has so polluted the world that unless somehow or other he can get himself free from these pollutions, him it will destroy. Now there is a passage very familiar to all of you, and very comforting to us who have to stand on one side and have closely brought home to us a terrible sudden destruction. That passage is where our dear Lord makes a tender revelation on this subject. 'Think you,' He said, 'that those Galileans whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices were sinners above all others? Or think ye that those thirteen on whom the tower of Siloam fell were sinners? I tell you nay; but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' These great catastrophes, our Lord Himself said, are warnings to those that survive, not punishment on those that are destroyed. That is the clear outcome, without any straining or stretching at all—that is the clear outcome of our Lord's own teaching on this which to us now is so tremendously personal a point. A warning to those who survive; not in itself a punishment on those who are destroyed. And that warning we carry about with us in the world. These dangers are always under our feet, these warnings are always ready to burst upon us.

The most recent theory formed by the physicists of the constitution of the earth and the causes of earthquakes is that the solid crust of the earth is but thin; thirty miles is the largest that I have heard it put by eminent physicists, and some put it as low as twenty miles; that inside that, is a packing of some kind, not, as we have been accustomed to believe, of molten stuff, of infinite heat, but a packing of some kind; and that an earthquake is caused by some dislocation of that packing. But I am told that whenever an earthquake is carefully examined into, it always takes the form of a subsidence of the surface, and when a dislocation has taken place in one part of the crust of the earth it is translated also to other parts, and that as time goes on there is a cycle of these until the packing of the earth has got once more into a quiescent state. So that we have always under our feet this possibility, not so very far from us, perhaps thirty miles at the outside, this possibility of displacement of the packing that causes a subsidence in the surface of the earth.

So these warnings are always with us, and we are to take them as warnings and not, surely not, that that dreadful destruction which comes upon a place in an earthquake is because the people are wicked—that it is a judgment on them. Our Lord has warned us of any such idea as that by telling us that it is a warning for us, and that unless we repent we shall all likewise perish.

REFERENCE.—II. 10.—J. Baines, Sermons to Country Congregations, p. 37. II. 13.—J. N. Norton, Every Sunday, p. 11. III. 8.—D. W. Simon, Twice Born and Other Sermons, p. 46.

THE GOLDEN AGE

‘But in the latter days it shall come to pass. . . .’—MICAH IV. 1.

THE Prophet lifts his eyes away to the latter days to gain refreshment in his present toil. Without the anticipation of a golden age he would lose his buoyancy, and the spirit of endeavour would go out of his work. What are the characteristics of the golden age to which the Prophet was looking with hungry and aspiring spirit?

I. In the golden age emphasis is to be given to the spiritual. In the latter days the spiritual is to have emphasis above pleasure, money, armaments. In whatever prominence these may be seen they are all to be subordinate to the reverence and worship of God. Military prowess and money making and pleasure seeking are to be put in their own place, and not to be permitted to leave it. First things first! ‘In the beginning, God.’ This is the first characteristic of the golden age.

II. People are to find their confluence and unity in common worship. The brotherhood is to be discovered in spiritual communion. We are not to find profound community upon the river of pleasure or in the ways of business or in the armaments of the castle. These are never permanently cohesive. Pleasure is more frequently divisive than cohesive. It is in the common worship of the one Lord. It is in united adoration of the God revealed in Christ that our brotherhood will be unburied, and we shall realize how rich is our oneness in Him.

III. The conversion of merely destructive force into positive and constructive ministries. ‘And they shall beat their swords into plow-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks.’ That is the suggestion we seek in the golden age; all destructive forces are to be changed into helpful ministries. Tongues that speak nothing but malice are to be turned into instructors of wisdom. All men's gifts and powers and all material forces are to be used in the employment of the kingdom of God.

IV. There is to be a distribution of comforts. ‘They shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree.’ To every mortal man there is to be given a little treasure, a little leisure, a little pleasure. In the golden age peace is to be the attendant of comfort, and both are to be the guests in every man's dwelling.

V. The beautiful final touches in this Prophet's dream; ‘I will assemble her that halteth, and I will gather her that is driven out and her that is afflicted’. They are all to be found in God's family. The day of grief is to be ended, mourning shall be the thing of the preparatory day which is over; ‘He shall wipe away all tears from the eyes, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away’.—J. H. JOWETT, Homiletic Review, 1904, vol. XLVIII. p. 309.

THE REIGN OF PEACE

‘In the last days it shall come to pass that the . . . Lord . . . shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into plow-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks: nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.’—MICAH IV. 1, 3.

THE Holy Ghost, we say, as we repeat our Creed, spake by the Prophets; and when we read verses like these we feel that we have here one of the great utterances thus inspired and spoken long ago. This vision of the Prophet Micah is recognized as one of the great visions of history, one of those flashes from the Divine life that remains with us as a great possession for all succeeding generations of men, illuminating, enriching, inspiring with a new spirit. But the strange and the melancholy thing is that this vision of the reign among men of the spirit of peace, a vision so noble and so beautiful, and universally recognized as expressing some of the highest and best aspirations of the human heart, still remains unrealized, even in the most advanced and the most Christian communities.

I. These facts of life may well perplex thoughtful men. Does the goddess of warfare and strife still rule the nations, even the most civilized and the most enlightened among them? Is the issue of the days still practically as far off as it was when Micah saw it in his vision? We acknowledge that, indeed, it is not so. The issue of the days is nearer to us. We see striking phenomena on the other side—great armies of peace, and self-sacrifice, and personal devotion, and charity marching to their lifelong warfare under the banner of Jesus of Nazareth; or, again, we contrast the ways of Turk and Christian, and we see that there is a great gulf separating them in all their moral and spiritual attributes, and that gulf is the witness of what you and I owe to the revelation of Jesus. That revelation has given to men a new sense of the value of each human soul. As under its influence and possessed by its spirit you look in the eyes of man, woman, or child, you are moved to a new feeling of the sacredness of human life. It has given you a new pity for human suffering—in one word, a new sense of humanity.

II. The rule of the Spirit in men's hearts, the history of moral enlightenment and progress, has been strangely partial. It has laid its redeeming hand on one nation, or race, or continent, and left another hardly touched, unmoved. It has changed one half of a man's life and not the other half; changed, for instance, our standards of private conduct but hardly those of political conduct, bringing half of our life into, at any rate, a nominal allegiance to Christ, but leaving the other half practically pagan. How marvellously inconsistent and contradictory are the phenomena of our complex Christian society! And amidst all this there comes to us day by day, little noticed it may be in the excitement of the daily life, the soothing voice of the pleading Saviour as He stands at our side, invisible, but really present with us, calling us one by one to give Him an unstinting and not a conventional or half-hearted allegiance, to make our Christianity a real power, actual and dominant, in the practical affairs of both public and private life.

III. Among the lessons of Christ we have to learn more fully is this one—that war is a weapon of barbarism, a dreadful scourge, and full of misery, and all the more because the miseries fall not on the men who make the war, but on the victims who suffer. Thus a selfish war, a war of greed, a war to satisfy the pride or the personal ambition or temper of a politician, or a really unnecessary or ill-ordered war, is a great crime. Our plain duty is to put goodwill above jealousy and enmity, and to enthrone law in the place of brute force. 'Even in thy warfare thou must be of the peace-making spirit,' said the great Augustine to the soldier of his day. It is a great and a good word for you and for me. Let us carry it with us into all the opinions and the conduct of our common life.

IV. It is because through all the clouds and the dust of politics and of war we see unmistakable signs of the growth and the spread of this love of peace among men, among men of goodwill, that we do not despair. The growing signs of brotherhood among nations, the growing conviction that war is a method of barbarism, the growing feeling that it is a crime, a national crime, to sacrifice the humble multitudes to the ambitions of the comparatively few, the growing recognition that, if the Spirit of Christ is to rule amongst us, and not to be a mere shadow of a name, our conduct must be regulated by law, and justice, and goodwill, and not by force or greed—all this makes for growing peace and extending happiness in the years that lie before us. A great orator declared that what is morally wrong cannot be politically right. It is an obvious truth as we listen to it. Well, then, let us translate it into the language of our practical politics, for it simply means that what would be indefensible or wrong for us, as individuals, to do, cannot be right for the conduct of nations or empires. And it is because of the growing hold of great truths like this upon the consciences and the lives of men that we feel ourselves to be nearer to the ultimate fulfilment of the Prophet's vision, even while what he saw be far off on the distant horizon.

REFERENCES.—IV. 1.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 249. H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 1704. IV. 7, 8, 9.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 120. IV. 8, 9.—Ibid. p. 120. V. 2.—Bishop E. H. Browne, The Messiah as Foretold and Expected, p. 56. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ii. No. 57. F. D. Maurice, Prophets and Kings, p. 324. V. 4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 560. V. 4, 5.—Archbishop Benson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxiv. p. 225. VI. 2.—R. W. Evans, Parochial Sermons, vol. iii. p. 112. VI. 3.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 167. R. W. Evans, Parochial Sermons, p. 103.

THE DIVINE REQUIREMENTS

'Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself, before the high God?'—MICAH VI. 6.

SUCH is the question which the Prophet urges upon the people of Israel. He answers it for them in words which we can hardly ever forget, 'He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?' Of these words it is sometimes said that they are the greatest words in the Old Testament. They are, indeed, golden words, and should be carried about by every one who desires to be well inspired and rightly guided in his journey through life. And yet it may be doubted whether they hold anything like the place they deserve to hold in the life and thought of most of us; for, as a rule, we give far too little attention to these writings and appeals of the Hebrew Prophets. Yet it is certain that he who neglects these inspired and inspiring utterances of the Lord's Prophets thereby impoverishes both his moral and spiritual life. This inquiry, for instance, which Micah puts before us with such emphasis—'Wherewith shall I come before the Lord?'—has within it whole departments of life which men scarcely profess to bring before God for inspiration and for guidance in regard to them, and yet it is an inquiry which should surely be repeated continually concerning all our lives by every soul that looks upward. The Divine answer is always the same, unchanging, pointing the way of the true life: 'What doth the Lord require of thee, O man, but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly'. He puts it before us, you see, as embracing the whole duty of man, and this neglect of the prophetic portion of our Bible, of its searching criticism of life and conduct, involves a great loss both to individuals and nations. Some results of it are plainly obvious in the common life.

I. The Prophets and National Life.—What gives special value to the life and work of these inspired Prophets of Israel and eternal power to their words is that they rise before us as the Divinely illuminated words to a God-fearing people, and they apply—as it should be remembered in every congregation, for it is a supremely important part of the matter—to every quarter and to every grade of the national life. These Prophets represent no class particularly—they represent the outpouring of the Spirit of God upon the heart of the people. One day it is the voice of Amos, the obscure and humble shepherd of the hill country of Judea, hearing the call of God amidst the silence of the hills. Another day it is Isaiah who speaks to us, a man at home in the presence of the royal court. Or it is Jeremiah or Ezekiel, from the heart of the priesthood, or Micah the Prophet of the poor. From every point of the compass in the field of the nation's life they come before us, awakening, assisting, arousing, questioning, appealing, and denouncing, in the name of Jehovah. They are preachers of right conduct. We should live all our life in the presence of the Lord, the righteous judge, in all public affairs as in every private relationship. These preachers of righteousness come as guides, searching national and individual conscience; they voice the will of Jehovah as of a father with his children, and their searching appeal runs through every individual and every national omission or neglect. To these men, the makers of Israel, the only true and faithful precept was that man should strive to put all his life and the life of his country into obedience to the mighty Jehovah, Who loveth righteousness. The result of their teaching, the infection of their spirit, and the power of their message is seen in the uplifting of the national life on the wings of national education, while the rest of the world was morally stagnant.

II. Teaching for Our Own Age.—Surely such teachers are our teachers through all time, and we should do well to uphold their teaching in our day as much as we can, and love this portion of our Bible wherein they are enshrined, which has, as a rule, so little influence over our common life. And in the light of such consideration we take up the grateful words of this Prophet Micah. He flung them out into the life of his countrymen 2600 years ago as the medicine then needed for their souls' good, and we, brethren, have to confess that the medicine is still needed, and the words are never dead—he still speaks as a living contemporary to every one of us in this direct and searching appeal: 'What doth the Lord require of thee? To do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly.' As we look over our lives, over our own hearts or our present habits, over our usual ways and customs, our political servitude to parties rather than to principles—a servitude which seems sometimes to endanger public morals—as we think of the vice with which a great deal of our modern life is filled, as we think of the gospel of pride and appearance which rules in so many of the departments of our life, or the gospel of amusement and self-indulgence which prevails in so many others, we can hardly deny, I think, that we need to be called back to the direct simplicity of ancient and honest faith. It is in these simplicities and sincerities that the moral power of the Hebrew Prophet is especially found. He comes to us straight from communion with God—he is simply the mouthpiece. He has no ambition in his heart but to speak as a preacher of right conduct, and he has no fear of the consequences.

III. Our Duty is Simple.—But many of us, unlike this Hebrew Prophet, are in the habit of talking much about the complexity of moral life or society, and we do not always bear sufficiently in mind that life may be very complex all round, and yet your own duty in the midst of it plain and simple. In matters of conduct or opinion, of custom or of fashion, we feel, very likely, the diversity of the manifold influences playing upon us—the force of many currents that direct us this way or that; or—to change the metaphor—we feel what a tangled web of divers threads it is in which our life is but a part, and so we make our excuses. If our life is, in the main, a purposeless thing, following no clear call of God, moved by no persistent enthusiasm or devotion, doing little or nothing for any of the greater calls that are always appealing to us—as it is all too often—is it not futile to urge as our apology that life is so very complex? This ancient man of God, with his Prophet's mission, tears off all the web of sophistry with this plain question—'What doth the Lord require of thee?' And his answer solves for us, if we are sincere, the riddle of our hesitation and uncertainty and ambiguities. The whole character of your life depends on what you seek first of all. I have said that this word of the Prophet has been called the greatest word in the Old Testament, and we feel its greatness much more when we listen to the voice of the Saviour Himself in the New Testament: 'Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled. Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.' And whoever among you carries about in his heart these inspiring words as the guide of his purpose and his conduct, by whatever name he may be called, has learned the secret of the true life in Christ, and the secret we learn from these voices of the Prophets and these words of Jesus is that the motive power of our lives and conduct, the character of it for good or ill, is in the things we think, and not merely in the things we do.

WORSHIP AND CONDUCT

'Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God? Shall I come before Him with burnt-offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams? . . . What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?'—MICAH VI. 6-8.

It is not right to say that this inspired summary of wherein true worship, true ritual, true religion consists, was a wholly new thing when Micah spoke. 'Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt-offerings as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold to obey is better than sacrifice.' The notes of this trumpet-call had never died away since Samuel uttered them to the ashamed Saul. It was, however, given to a man of the soil, a simple vine-dresser, to whom 'life was real, life was earnest,' to put into words that burn and shine for ever the noblest views as to the reality of religion ever delivered by a Prophet of Old Testament times to the world.

I. It was the crofter trouble of these old times which in part caused Micah to speak burning words. It was a time of splendid luxury up at the Capital, and the worst of it all was that the rich tyrant class felt itself so respectable that it could not think the judgment was possible. Meanwhile the great palaces at Jerusalem were rising upon the ruin of the people.

II. The patriot Micah perceives that the sin of Jerusalem is not want of zeal in worship, nor rebellion against God, but the real lack of understanding that religion to be anything must mean conduct and character, and that Jehovah, if He is God, is a God who demands that men should give Him their reason and thought as well as their emotions and desire to fulfil the minutest regulations of ritual or religious ceremonial. He urges them to believe that like as a father pitieth his children, so will God reason with their reasonable minds.

III. As one gazes back upon the Old Testament heroes, one sees that with all their faults their righteousness lay in conduct. Righteousness was for them not holiness so much as right dealing and kindly dealing between man and man as members of a nation. Not purity of heart so much as right doing—this was what the Prophets demanded. They lifted up their voices in protest against the mistaken importance given to outward forms of religion. They did not denounce sacrifice, for the idea of sacrifice was as much a matter of course as our idea of going to church on Sunday. But they did denounce the hypocrisy of all this outside show of worship when the heart refused to humble itself upon the altar by deeds of mercy and justice.

IV. Micah's voice has never been silenced. It may sound paradoxical, but the very fact that men are forsaking the ordinances of religion in all the churches in this money-seeking age of commerce and competition and unreality in religion is a sign that they feel that till our ways are more just and kind, and full of reverence in our dealings between man and man, it is mockery to attend church services, and for a pretence makelong prayers.—H. D. RAWNSLEY, Church Family Newspaper, 1907, vol. LXXII. p. 912.

REFERENCES.—VI. 6, 7.—R. Winterbotham, Sermons on Holy Communion, p. 34. J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (2nd Series), p. 50. VI. 6-8.—C. Kingsley, Sermons for the Times, p. 93.

THREE MARKS OF A TRUE MAN

'Wherewith shall I come before the Lord,' etc.—MICAH VI. 6-8.

I. A Rebuke of the Religion of Mere Outward Ceremony and Ritual.—Very few people indeed now go to a church because they have to; it is a far more healthy condition that religion is being regarded less as a ceremony and more as a life.

II. A Rebuke of the Religion of Ostentation.—Are there not gifts made to religion whose main purpose is, How will it impress the public? Can I buy God's favour with my gifts? Also, there is an ostentation in the religion of our churches. The lavish expenditure is too often not an effort to do honour to God, but an effort to advertise the particular church which can afford it.

III. A Rebuke of the Religion of Fanaticism.—The fanatic of religion is the man or woman who is carried away with a fad, who runs to extremes in some ism, who, yielding to some emotion, devotes his or her life to the propagation of some little idea in religion which, according to their view, is going to transfigure the world.

IV. A Rebuke of Exclusiveness.—The tendency is to build fences of privilege. The dominant note of false religion is railed spaces. But these ideas form the antithesis of a world-wide religion.—D. S. MACKAY, The Religion of the Threshold, p. 272.

LEVITICUS OLD AND NEW

'What doth the Lord require of thee?'—MICAH VI. 8.

If we could know that, we need not desire to know any more. Our life is best spent when spent in asking, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? We are not to consult ourselves, but to consult God; the law is written; it is not a conjecture, it is a statutory declaration, and it is to be found in the law-book: to the law and to the testimony, therefore, and to no supposition, fancy, or conjecture of mortal man.

I. Where can we begin? God has given us a thousand points at any one of which we can begin. We might, first of all, think it impossible to know the will of God, because it would be so stupendous, that is to say, so comprehensive, so vast, and so overwhelming, that it would be utterly impossible for the finite imagination to conceive what God intends us to do. The Lord delivers us from that difficulty; He has written down His will in little words, He has come right into our daily life and told us how to manage ourselves, and how to conduct the economy of life. He does not always talk theology to us, He talks about daily things in our mother tongue, and says in effect, You may begin there. And wherever we can begin God begins along with us, hears us spell a little lesson, tells us just the quantity of the syllable, the measure of the rhythmic foot, and repronounces the music to us in order to make us sure of its accent and its balance. He comes down from all the mountains of eternity and meets us at the base of the hill, and says, Little children, I will speak your language until you are able to speak Mine.

II. What doth the Lord thy God require of thee? If I could know that I should know all philosophy. You may know it, you may know it at least in parts, and you may proceed from one part to another. Revelation is progressive; moral education adds to itself increment by increment until the final topstone is put on with the acclaim of the universe. I could tell you where you could begin: 'Thou shalt not curse the deaf, nor put a stumbling-block before the blind'. Is that religion? Yes; you thought religion was talking an unknown language, but the mistake is yours, not the Bible's; you thought that religion was an act of clasping hands and turning up eyes into the immeasurable heavens and speaking into an infinite void in the hope of getting some blessing out of it. Nothing of the kind: 'Thou shalt not curse the deaf, nor put a stumbling-block in the way of the blind'. The further and implied Hebrew meaning of the word is, Thou shalt not curse the absent, and therefore by so much the deaf—that is to say, by so much deaf, because the absent cannot hear you; you shall not be slanderers, you shall not be critics of those who cannot speak to you for themselves; you shall not make anonymous attacks upon the absent and the deaf or those who are known by reputation; you shall not hide yourselves behind a hedge and sling stones at those who are walking in the open highway.

III. But this was all said by Moses, there is nothing of the kind said by Jesus Christ, some persons may insinuate. But they are utterly wrong in their sophistical if not their ignorant and criminal suggestion. Jesus Christ said every one of these things in His own way; He did not destroy the law, He fulfilled it; the law came by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ, and grace and truth are law at its best, law in blossom and in autumnal fruition. The Sermon on the Mount is the new Leviticus; the Sermon on the Mount is the nineteenth chapter of Leviticus written or spoken in Christian language. No man can fulfil the moral obligation imposed upon him by the Sermon on the Mount without repeating in solid visible conduct the whole Decalogue as written by Moses. We must, therefore, again and again insist upon the moral quality of the Gospel; that is to say, upon the moral meaning of the most abstract doctrines.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. VII p. 50.

THE MESSAGE OF MICAH

'He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?'—MICAH VI. 8.

I. The simplification of religion has always been the Prophet's vocation. These were the men of brains, the men of conscience, the men of power. They were the thinkers of their age. True, they differed in social position. Isaiah was a courtier, Micah a yeoman farmer voicing the grievances of his class. The one thing common to the man of the court and the man of the field was the faculty to see that the salvation of their times was not to come from princes but from God. Micah is a grand example of the way these heroes faced the community. At the opening of this chapter the Prophet pleads for man to use his reason. The priest seeks to suppress reason and fall back on authority, but Micah asserts God challenges us to use our reason.

II. Religion is not in the treadmill of duties, nor in the bewilderment of ritual, costly though it may be. If not in these things it is natural they should ask in what does it consist. The Prophet appeals to two things for his reply. The first is history, the second is reason. He turns their thought to the incidents of their great national history (vv. 4, 5). It told of the God who delivered them from Egypt, whom they had forgotten; then he directed them to the prophecy of Balaam.

III. Micah does not turn their thought to philosophy for relief of the people's problems. Neither does he go to Samuel or some other outstanding Prophet of the past. He went to an outsider. He went to one who even did not belong to the Church at all. Very often God gives some great truth to a messenger outside the Church rather than within. From that strange utterance against Israel they might gather the Lord had shown them what was good, not the round of their ritual, but the justice, mercy, and humble walk with God.

IV. The thing God wants before all else is not form, but qualities of the heart. These are set forth in this programme, which is good both in itself and in its results. These qualities of life are given in their right order. It is first justice. It is the fundamental principle of all great lives. The first word in heaven and earth is justice. But justice is not enough; you must also have mercy. These two qualities are things which make men Godlike. But there is one step farther. I can imagine a man saying, why bring the religious element in it at all? If a man does justice, loves mercy, what need is there for the humble walk with God? This is necessary as the inspiration and power for the two.

V. The solution of our modern problems, as those of Micah's day, will not be found in legislation or machinery, but in realizing the sufficiency of God. No great and permanent solution of social problems has ever been reached without religious influence. The only way is to get back to God, to go to the house of the Lord and there find the power to do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with our God. Then will be found the true bond of brotherhood.—S. CHADWICK, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXVII 1905, p. 317.

THE PERFECT IDEAL OF RELIGION

'He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?'—MICAH VI. 8.

I. Social Justice.—Consider the three requirements of the text; and first of all, God requires us to 'do justly'. The highest welfare of society depends upon its observance. The laws, for example, which are framed for the peace of the nation and the prosperity of the community, must be just—such as are equal and reasonable, useful and beneficial; and it was to this latter—or to social justice—that the Prophet specially referred. The immense majority of our people consider themselves the victims of social wrong—believe that their lot is much harder than it need be, than it ought to be, and are finding ways and means whereby they may be released from the galling fetters which bind them and the depressing conditions in which they are compelled to live and work. There is much to be said in favour of the social movement; but it must be remembered that in order to help the toiling millions there must be no injustice done to those who are privileged. What is wanted is not legislation, although that would help considerably, but true Christian justice, not the justice of Shylock, who pertinaciously insisted upon his pound of flesh, not the justice of Rob Roy, who maintained that 'They should take who have the power, and they should keep who can'; but the eternal justice of the Lord Jesus Christ who said, 'As ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them'.

II. Compassion.—God requires us to 'love mercy'. This is a far higher quality than mere justice. It postulates greater goodness, for while justice implies a debt, this means favour and kindness. It means pity and compassion towards the poor and needy, the fallen and oppressed. The mercy which God requires is not necessarily confined to mere charity in the commonest acceptance of the term, to mere giving of alms. It is not so much your money that is wanted, your doles of charity, though these are needful and will come in due course as God prospers you, as your mercy, your love, and sympathy; not so much, in short, yours as you.

III. Walking with God.—This third requirement of the text—the 'walking humbly with God'—alone enables us 'to do justly and to love mercy'. But how are ordinary mortals 'to do justly and to love mercy' unless and until we walk humbly with God. The Prophet Micah realizes this, as his language clearly and manifestly shows; and we realize it even more fully than he, for the sun of the Saviour's revelation which he only dimly foresaw strikes full and free upon us, and we know—for we have often tried it and failed—that it is not in human power alone and unaided to be just and merciful and all that the moral law of the New Testament requires. The best of men are but men at the best. But 'walk humbly with thy God'. Surrender your heart—therein lies the secret of power—and your all to Him, and He will work in you both to will and to do of His own good pleasure.—J. CAMERON, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII. 1907, p. 22.

'Walk humbly with thy God.'—MICAH VI. 8; PROVERBS III. 34; XVI. 19; PSALM CXXXVIII. 6.

THE absolute freedom of the Christian man is absolute allegiance to God: his independence rests in utter dependence. His freedom is from the tyranny of partial claims, individual desires and objects, from the halfnesses and weaknesses of our nature: and it is won by identification with the universal. It is, in short, here that there comes in what is called humility. To define it exactly is difficult, if not impossible; for, like all goodness, it has the defect of its quality, and to be precious it must never part with its correlative independence. Humility is the sense of solidarity and community: the controlling and regulating power of the consciousness that we are not our own, that we are God's and our neighbour's. Humility is the attitude of an individual who recognizes his individuality, his partiality, his dependence, his immanence in the whole, and his conformity with all the parts, and yet of an individual who knows himself his own, and not another's, a free man of God, a son and heir. To be genuine, it must go hand in hand with the good conscience and the faith unfeigned. —PROF. W. WALLACE, Gifford Lectures, pp. 50-57.

REFERENCES.—VI. 8.—F. D. Maurice, Sermons, vol. v. p. 279. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvi. No. 1557. H. C. Beeching, Seven Sermons to Schoolboys, p. 13. J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. vii. p. 50. F. J. A. Hort, Village Sermons (2nd Series) p. 214. H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 2125. R. Balgarnie, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxiii. p. 322. VI. 8, 9.—G. W. Brameld, Practical Sermons (2nd Series), p. 34. VII. 1.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 945. VII. 7.—Ibid. vol. xxxi. No. 1819. VII. 8.—J. Keble, Sermons for Easter to Ascension Day, p. 220.

CHASTISEMENT AND MERCY

'Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy: when I fall, I shall arise: when I sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light unto me. I will bear the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against Him.'—MICAH VII. 8, 9.

WHEN Christians have gone wrong in any way, whether in belief or in practice, scandalously or secretly, it seems that pardon is not explicitly and definitely promised them in Scripture as a matter of course; and the mere fact that they afterwards become better men, and are restored to God's favour, does not decide the question whether they are in every sense pardoned; for David was restored and yet was afterwards punished. It is still a question whether a debt is not standing against them for their past sins, and is not now operating or to operate to their disadvantage. What its payment consists in, and how it will be exacted, is quite another question, and a hidden one. It may be such, if they die under it, as to diminish their blessedness in heaven; or it may be a sort of obstacle here to their rising to certain high points of Christian character; or it may be a hindrance to their ever attaining one or other particular Christian grace in perfection—faith, purity, or humility; or it may prevent religion taking deep root within them, and imbuing their minds; or it may make them more liable to fall away; or it may hold them back from that point of attainment which is the fulfilment of their trial; or it may forfeit for them the full assurance of hope; or it may lessen their peace and comfort in the intermediate state, or even delay their knowledge there of their own salvation; or it may involve the necessity of certain temporal punishments, grievous bodily disease, or sharp pain, or worldly affliction, or an unhappy death. Such things are 'secrets of the Lord our God,' not to be pried into, but to be acted upon. We are all more or less sinners against His grace, many of us grievous sinners; and St. Paul and the other Apostles give us very scanty information what the consequences of such sin are. God may spare us, He may punish. In either case, however, our duty is to surrender ourselves into His hands, that He may do what He will.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—VII. 8, 9.—J. H. Newman, Parochial and Plain Sermons, vol. iv. p. 94. VII. 15.—R. F. Horton, The Hidden God, p. 215.

ANGER CHANGED TO COMPASSION

'He retaineth not His anger for ever.'—MICAH VII. 18.

I. We might have Expected that God would have Retained His Anger for Ever, for consider:—

(a) The nature and malignity of sin. Sin includes unbelief, rebellion, ingratitude. Does not unbelief give the lie to God? Is not ingratitude a libel on His goodness?

(b) The character of God, absolute perfection; sin has made a demand on His justice; sin must be punished, or moral equity is at an end.

(c) The demands of God's righteous law.

(d) The disinclination of man to listen to any terms of reconciliation. Man stands in the way of his own pardon and recovery.

(e) The incompetence of man to make any sufficient reparation to God.

(f) The awful example of righteous displeasure in the penal condition of the fallen angels. Thus it appears that we might have expected that He would have retained His anger for ever.

II. How is it that the Divine Anger is Reversed? —'He retaineth not His anger for ever.'

(a) Because of the infinite compassion and clemency of the Divine Redeemer. There is mercy with God.

(b) Because of the arrangements of the covenant of grace and the council of peace (Is. LIV. 10; Ezek. xxxvii. 26; 2 Tim. i. 10).

(c) Because of the effects of the undertaking of the Redeemer in assuming our nature and satisfying the demands of justice.

(d) Because of the almighty influences of the Holy Spirit by which the dispositions hostile to our recovery are subdued.

Here we see the display of the merciful character of God. How should our love be called out to that Saviour Who hath so loved us?

THE GRACE OF GOD TO SINNERS

'Who is a God like unto Thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of His heritage? He retaineth not His anger for ever, because He delighteth in mercy. He will turn again, He will have compassion upon us; He will subdue our iniquities; and Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea.'—MICAH VII. 18, 19.

I. The Sinner's Astonishment.—What is the first thing that brings out this astonishment in the Prophet's heart, and makes it heard in this eloquent way from his lips? His wonder is he has to do with a God who forgives iniquity like his. It is that that gives an everlasting freshness to the pulpit. It is when a man has an everlasting sense of God's unspeakable grace to his own soul that his message comes straight from his heart and comes hot to the heart of his people. Let our pulpits be filled with men overwhelmed with a sense of God's grace to their own souls, and you will not need to advertise singular subjects; you will fill your churches to the doors when the minister's own heart is filled as Micah's was with downright amazement at God's long-suffering and patience with the preaching Prophet himself. He begins with the very ABC of the Gospel, the offer of pardon for sin. The first thing that amazes him even to seventy and eighty years of age is that God is still forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin; and it is that that holds together his congregation in Jerusalem, that makes his own heart burn with freshness and power because of the memory and present experience of God's unspeakable salvation and adorable patience to himself a sinner.

And what makes good preaching makes good hearing. But you must go back into the past and bring a broken heart out of it again to receive afresh the ever new and ever blessed Gospel of the grace of God in Jesus Christ.

II. Remnants.—He passeth by for His own reasons the transgressions of the remnant of His heritage; He retaineth not His anger for ever for He delighteth in mercy. He retaineth it not. It does not say He delights in anger; He delights in mercy; therefore if we need a great mercy let us comfort our hearts with this, that He delights in the thing we need. Mercy and misery are made for one another. 'There would be no mercy in God if there was no misery in man. God is love, and His love becomes mercy in presence of my misery. He delighteth in mercy, and will cast all your sins in the depths of the sea—that mystical, spiritual, wonderful sea, the sea of the grace of God.'—ALEXANDER WHYTE, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXVII 1905, p. 337.

REFERENCES.—VII. 18-20.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 169. VII. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1577.

NAHUM

NAHUM

REFERENCES.—I. 2.—Paxton Hood, Dark Sayings on a Harp, p. 119. I. 3.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 36; vol. III. No. 137. I. 7.—Ibid. vol. XLIV. No. 2555. II. 11, 13.—Ibid. vol. XXXIX. No. 2322. III.—Ibid. vol. XXXIX. No. 2323.

HABAKKUK

HABAKKUK

'Art thou not from everlasting, O Lord my God, mine Holy One? We shall not die. O Lord, Thou hast ordained them for judgment; and, O mighty God, Thou hast established them for correction.'—HABAKKUK I. 12.

BISHOP DANIEL WILSON chose this passage as the text of his last sermon in Calcutta. He died six months later, on 2 January, 1858, in his eightieth year.

REFERENCES.—I. 12.—G. Matheson, Moments on the Mount, p. 46. I. 16.—G. Brooke, Outlines of Sermons, p. 170.

LENT—TEMPTATIONS TO SIN

'Thou makest men as the fishes of the sea,' etc.—HABAKKUK I. 14, 15.

OUR Lord commissioned His Apostles to become fishers of men. But if Christ, by His priests, is fishing for souls, Satan, the ape of God, is doing the same.

I. Satan's Baits.

(a) Job, robbed of his land, of his cattle, of his children, and of his health, has one consolation left—his wife. But what does she advise? Curse God and die—commit suicide to end your woes. The point of the hook peeps through the bait.

(b) Christ, hungry in the desert, what does Satan offer Him? Stones for bread. See the kingdoms of the world, all this will I give Thee! that is the bait. Where is the hook? If Thou wilt fall down and worship me.

(c) Satan tries his baits, one after another, till he rights on one to which you will rise.

II. The Hook.

(a) David, exalted to be king, has a goodly palace, abundant means, numerous servants. How is Satan going to angle for him? With a pretty woman, the wife of another man.

(b) Judas grasps at the thirty pieces of silver. The bait is flung and he seizes. Oh! the anguish as the barb cuts into his soul!

(c) The anguish that follows sin, the horror and shame in this world and in the next.—S. BARING-GOULD, Sermon-Sketches, p. 140.

THE FREE-THINKER AMONG THE PROPHETS

'I will stand upon my watch, and set me upon the tower, and will look forth to see what He will speak with me, and what I shall answer concerning my complaint.'—HABAKKUK II. 1.

TRADITION has much to tell of Habakkuk the Prophet, but history has nothing. He belongs to a class who have made history; he is the kind of man whom God sends to usher in new stages, and launch new epochs of knowledge and action. Look at the spirit of his questioning.

I. It was a temper which, with all its daring, was always reverent, and in its utter frankness was completely sincere. This man never rails against God; he is never irreverent, much less blasphemous. But he is always unmuzzled. His questions are not against God, but to God. This man cannot square his belief in a good and righteous God with the facts of life as he sees them, and he feels that he has right of inquiry when he thus finds his faith baffled by his experience. God counts no question heterodox which comes out of an orthodox life.

II. It was a temper which, amid its questionings, was steadied by a sense of personal responsibility. He feels that he is a man with a responsibility to discharge and only from the standing-ground of his own faithfulness does he feel that he has a right to ask and expect light. 'I will stand to my post.' There is no better vantage-ground for a man who watches for the dawn.

III. This is a temper which seeks the highest truth in the highest spirit. Divine verities are only revealed to the gaze of the uplifted life. High truth is not to be found on a low plane of thinking and feeling. Character is the chief condition of illumination; lofty conduct is the kindler of the light. The only house of life which can stand against storm and tide is a building whose every stone is squared to the plummet of righteousness.—T. YATES, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXIV. 1908, p. 321.

REFERENCES.—II. 1.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (6th Series), p. 109. II. 1-4.—J. Bowstead, Practical Sermons, vol. ii. p. 177. II. 2.—J. P. Chown, Old Testament Outlines, p. 275. II. 3, 4.—J. Vaughan, Sermons (9th Series), p. 229.

THE NECESSITY OF FAITH TO MORALITY

'The just shall live by His faith.'—HABAKKUK II. 4.

Is not this a singular statement? Is not the just man—the man of practical morality—the last man in the world whom we should expect to live by his faith.

I. There are classes of men whom we should expect to live by their faith. The poet lives by his faith, for he aspires after an unearthly ideal. The painter lives by his faith, for there floats before him a superhuman beauty. The musician lives by his faith, for his inner ear catches melodies which his instruments cannot express. Even the husbandman lives by his faith, for he commits the seed to a life underground. But the just man—the man of practical morality—how can he be said to live by his faith? Is he not building his trust upon definite outward acts, on obedience to a command? Yes, but whose command? To a command which is inaudible to the outer ear.

II. The voice of conscience is not uttered by anything within the world. It is not uttered by beauty; you may gaze on the woods and fields without hearing it. It is not uttered by prudence; you may study your own interests for days without meeting it. It is not uttered by law; you may be condemned by a criminal court without receiving its message. This mysterious voice is independent of places and times. It comes at the most unlikely moment; it fails to come at the most likely. It may be absent during the most solemn religious service; it may be heard in the whirl of the dance and in the vortex of gay society. The Garden of Eden may be deaf to it; the haunts of corruption may ring with it. It may elude the thunder, the earthquake, and the fire; it may breathe in the still small sound of a human word. The stars of night may fail to declare it; the streets of the garish day may resound with its solemn refrain. The man who listens to it is walking by faith. It has no mandate from the world; it has no reward from the world; it has no promise from the world. It is a message from an unearthly sphere sent for an unearthly reason and accompanied by the offer of an unearthly recompense. No poet or painter or musician lives more by faith than the man of outward virtue.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 15.

REFERENCES.—II. 4.—J. Keble, Miscellaneous Sermons, p. 428. C. Kingsley, Village Sermons, p. 34. F. D. Maurice, Prophets and Kings, p. 360. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxix. No. 1749. T. Hammond, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xx. p. 246. II. 20.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (8th Series), p. 225. III. 2.—J. N. Norton, Every Sunday, p. 129. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 725.

A PRAYER FOR MIDDLE LIFE

'In the midst of the years make known.'—HABAKKUK III. 2.

WHAT we commonly call a revival of religion is the conversion of the young on a large scale. But when youth, with its energies and hopes, is delivered from this present evil world and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son, this is not revival. It is the access of life to life. But when those who have known life—of nature and of the spirit—find it sinking in the midst of the years, to have it restored by the Divine breath—this is indeed revival.

I. In the midst of the years make known is a prayer not for a change of surroundings, but for lordship over them. And this mastery comes to us only in one way. God in Christ must disclose Himself. We must return to the Lord, and receive from Him the deep and vital power we have lost. If we seek Him we shall find Him, and all in Him. He meets us and shows us what we are, and what in Him we may be. More than the vanished splendour of the heavenly vision which quickened our youth comes back to us, and with it the spring returns.

II. To do more we must be more. To be more we must see more of God. It is the Divine Appearing that liberates and reveals the forces of the soul. It breaks the chains which bind the spirit, whatever they may be. To many the deliverance is from intellectual indolence. They have for years learned nothing and forgotten much. To look round on their books is to see that they no longer care to comprehend the difficulties of their times. To preachers this is fatal. Nor will Christian laymen, as they are called, ever do the work they ought to do for Christ in this country till they are willing to become serious students of the Bible and of theology. A beginning of days to many preachers would be to take possession of some new province of literature, as Robert Hall did when, after sixty, he studied Italian to read Dante; as Arnold did when, two years before his death, he began Sanskrit, pleading that he 'was not so old as Cato when he learned Greek'. How many weary and starved congregations listen hopelessly to a dejected preacher who will never give them a word, a phrase, or a thought they have not heard hundreds of times. An appearing of God to such a man would send him to his desk and keep him there. Even among those who by conscientious toil keep their service on a high level, many shrink too soon from the effort to face and comprehend the thought and purpose of the new time. They need not subject their hearts to this as to a thing inevitable. Those who have fresh visions of God will never lose their grasp over young minds, or their power to deal with new problems. While the promise of the young should be, and ever will be, hailed with ardent affection, there is something greater and more beautiful even than that—a spirit revived in the midst of the years—compelling those who judged it and thought themselves done with it to revise their verdict, and entering, though late, into its heritage of power and peace.

III. For others this making known means the snapping of some chain of habit. Some indulgence, some selfishness, some sin not clearly recognized by conscience, is keeping out the light. Freed from it, the soul enters into the great liberty of a new life. Perhaps it is taught for the first time the secret of Christian love. Nothing but the Divine enlargement will ever teach us this. Only the life in God makes us rich and interprets that saying, 'All things are yours'. The enlarged experience of God's love as we, 'being rooted and grounded in love,' look into the Father's face and the Saviour's heart, makes us love one another, and to him who loves all things become new.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, Ten Minute Sermons, p. 131.

REVIVALS—THEIR NECESSITY

'O Lord, revive Thy work.'—HABAKKUK III. 2.

I. In What Does Revival Consist?

- (a) In quickening believers to a higher life.
- (b) In awakening the Church to her Divinely appointed mission.

- (c) In leading sinners to Christ.

II. The Absolute Necessity for Revivals.

- (a) They heal breaches and restore harmony.
- (b) They call out all the strength of the Church.
- (c) Churches must perish without converts.
- (d) A real revival brings out the character of the wicked—they yield or rebel.

- (e) Influence on communities.

III. How Revivals may be Secured.

- (a) By the study of God's Word.
- (b) By self-examination and forsaking of sin.
- (c) By meditating on the condition of the unsaved.
- (d) By united and persevering prayer.
- (e) By faithful preaching of the gospel.—C. PERREN, Revival Sermons, p. 104.

THE HIDING OF THE DIVINE POWER

'He had rays coming forth from His hand, and there was the hiding of His power.'—HABAKKUK III. 4.

THESE words are part of a hymn on the self-revelation of God. They contain one of those flashes of insight and profound understanding which so often mark the utterances of Hebrew Psalmists and Prophets. The writer beheld a sudden unveiling of the glory of God, a glory the very light and splendour of which became the hiding-place of the Divine Power.

I. This fact is writ large in the physical universe. We do not usually realize the might behind what we see. Things are so serenely still and steady that we but vaguely apprehend the greatness of the power that holds and sustains them. If the power that silently pervades the universe were let loose without the restraints and direction of wisdom and goodness, confusion and destruction immeasurable and beyond imagination would at once ensue. And yet, even the greatest upheavals give but a faint indication of the reality behind.

II. On the field of history the same truth is illustrated. Every attentive reader recognizes the presence of a power that makes for righteousness, and against which nothing can ultimately prevail. Yet this power is usually hidden from the actors on the stage, so much so that they often imagine themselves masters of affairs. Statesmen and soldiers conceive that they are the arbiters of national and world destinies, but what is all the skill of men compared with that Unseen Power which works in silence age after age, and eventually disposes of men and nations?

III. God consistently conceals His power. What then has this well-attested fact to suggest to us? It brings home God's supreme regard for character. He could not have made Himself known by displays of might such as would have compelled submission, for that would have been contrary to His spirit and character. He would have been Master without any self-revelation, and His purpose would thus have been defeated. It was far more important that man should know Him as good, true, and loving than as infinitely powerful. By this method all that is best in the human heart is touched and called out. By concealing His power He gives scope for our freedom and thus provides for the proper discipline and development of character.

REFERENCES.—III. 16.—H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 2038. E. Paxton Hood, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxviii. p. 45. III. 17, 18.—G. A. Sowter, Sowing and Reaping, p. 73. III. 17-19.—J. P. Gledstone, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxiv. p. 51. III. 19.—A. Raleigh, Old Testament Outline, p. 277.

ZEPHANIAH

ZEPHANIAH

REFERENCES.—I. 12.—H. Hensley Henson, Christ and the Nation, p. 131; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxix. 1906, p. 136. R. F. Horton, Lyndhurst Road Pulpit, p. 211. P. H. Hall, The Brotherhood of Man, p. 97. E. A. French, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 115. C. Gore, ibid. p. 227. II. 3.—T. Sadler, Sunday Thoughts, p. 77. C. Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 245. II. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvii. No. 2235. II. 7.—Jesse Butt, The Soul's Escape, p. 82. III. 2.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 320. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1580. III. 11, 12.—C. Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 245. III. 14, 15.—Ibid. p. 261. III. 14-17.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 245. III. 16-18.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiii. No. 1990. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2720. W. C. E. Newbolt, Counsels of Faith and Practice, p. 179.

HAGGAI

HAGGAI

REFERENCES.—I. 5.—F. Bourdillon, Plain Sermons for Family Reading (2nd Series), p. 121. F. B. Woodward, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 228. I. 9.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 300. II. 4.—J. F. Bramston, Fratribus, p. 118. II. 4, 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1918. II. 5.—J. Keble, Sermons for Ascension Day to Trinity Sunday, p. 239.

CHRIST, THE DESIRE OF NATIONS

'Thus saith the Lord of hosts: Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land; and I will shake all nations, and the Desire of all Nations shall come: and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of Hosts.'—HAGGAI II. 6, 7.

THE time when our Lord was to come is here predicted.

I. This prophecy was uttered about five hundred years before the coming of our Saviour. How, then, can it be said to be a little while?

(a) It was a little while when compared with the time the people of God had already been kept waiting for the Messiah.

(b) It was short in the Almighty's own sight. It is not man's word, for things are measured in it by a standard which man never uses.

II. What is this mighty shaking? This language has been interpreted as pointing out those political convulsions and changes which agitated the world between the uttering of this prophecy and the time of our Lord's birth, one great empire giving way to another, and that in its turn yielding to a third.

There may be a further reference in it to those moral and spiritual effects which have ever attended and followed the Gospel in its progress through the world.

III. Our Lord Jesus Christ is described as 'The Desire of all Nations'. This name is justly applied to Him.

(a) It may signify that He is desirable for all nations—all need a Saviour.

(b) All would desire Him if they knew the excellence, love, and mighty power which He possesses of blessing and saving.

(c) This title may imply that some of all nations have desired Him.

IV. How was this promise fulfilled? At God's own appointed time, an Infant comes to that Temple, brought there from a stable and a manger. As a youth He listens and replies there to the learned teaching of scribes and doctors. As a man He often frequents the Holy Place. But here, in this second Temple, was that God Himself manifest in our mortal flesh, and we may perceive wherein consists the chief glory of any assemblage or congregation of worshippers.—E. J. BREWSTER, The Shield of Faith, p. 163.

REFERENCES.—II. 7.—A. K. H. Boyd, From a Quiet Place, p. 131. F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. i. p. 1. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 408. II. 9.—Bishop Wilberforce, Sermons, p. 195. Archbishop Thomson, Lincoln's Inn Sermons, p. 390. J. Bannerman, Sermons, p. 260.

ZECHARIAH

ZECHARIAH

REFERENCES.—I. and II.—Marcus Dods, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 228. I. 5.—H. Allon, ibid. vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 341. W. A. Essery, ibid. vol. xl. 1891, p. 230. I. 5, 6.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 264. I. 8-21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 598. I. 20.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 151.

THE MAN WITH THE MEASURING LINE

'I lifted up mine eyes and saw, and behold a man with a measuring line in his hand. Then said I, Whither goest thou? And he said unto me, To measure Jerusalem, to see what is the breadth thereof, and what is the length thereof.'—ZECHARIAH II. 1, 2.

THE vision.—This vision is really the protest of the Prophet against the attempt the Jews were making to narrow down the Divine purposes to the limit of their own paltry plans. In his vision the Prophet sees a young man, who stands for the Jewish people, with a measuring line in his hand. The Prophet hails the young man, and asks him whither he is going, and what is his errand. The young man answers, 'I go to measure Jerusalem, to see what is the breadth thereof, and what is the length thereof'. The young man's notion of Jerusalem was of a city strictly limited, compassable, and measurable, whose dimensions could be stated in so many yards and feet. But that was not God's Jerusalem at all. God's Jerusalem was vast, illimitable, boundless. 'That is the truth set forth in the angel's reply. 'Run and speak to this young man,' says the one angel to the other—'run and speak to this young man. Tell him he is attempting the impossible. Tell him he is trying to measure the immeasurable. Tell him he might as well try to count the stars in the midnight sky, or the grains of the sand on the sea-shore, or the drops of water in the vasty deep, as seek to measure the Holy City with his tape. Run and speak to this young man—tell him Jerusalem cannot be measured; tell him it is to be no narrow, paltry, mountain fortress; tell him it is to be inhabited as villages, without walls, by reason of the multitude of men and cattle therein; tell him it is to be a spacious, vast, illimitable city, so that no measuring line on earth is sufficient to compass it.'

The amplitude, the vastness of God's design, and the impossibility of compassing it by any human measurement, that is the superficial and obvious lesson of the text.

I. Let me illustrate the text with reference to the kingdom of God. There is need still to insist upon the wideness of the kingdom, for men are busy still trying to narrow its boundaries.

II. Next let me illustrate it with reference to the love of God. In all ages, men have been applying the measuring line to the love of God. Go back eighteen centuries, and you find the Pharisees and Scribes busy with the measuring line.

And yet, in spite of the life and witness of Jesus, men have not ceased to think God's love can be measured. They have tried to limit it by theological theories. Men preached a hateful theory of election, asserting there were some whom God loved and saved, and some on whom He visited His wrath and damned. They have preached a 'limited atonement,' as if Christ died only for a section of the race, and His blood availed to cleanse but a few. And I do not hesitate to say that that doctrine of election and that doctrine of a limited atonement are a slander and libel upon the love of God.

I know nothing of love for an 'elect few'. My gospel says, 'God so loved the world'. I know nothing of a limited atonement. My gospel says, 'He is the Propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world'. The love of God knows no limit—it is vast, boundless, infinite. It embraces every man—it endures to all eternity.

III. Let me illustrate it further with reference to man's destiny. Man's destiny is beyond the reach of any earthly measuring line. 'Beloved, now are we children of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be.' It doth not yet appear what we shall be; the splendour of our destiny is beyond the utmost reach of our imagination and thought, for we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is.

IV. We tax our imaginations to try and picture to ourselves the glory and bliss of heaven. But the measuring line of the human mind is not equal to the task. It exceeds our utmost stretch of thought. John has given us a glowing picture in the Apocalypse. But heaven is better even than John's sketch of it. Even his soaring imagination could not take in all its splendour and beauty. Heaven's glory baffles description, defies every measuring line. 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the mind of man the things which God hath prepared for those who love Him.'—J. D. JONES, The Elims of Life, p. 202.

A MAN WITH A MEASURING LINE

'I lifted up mine eyes again, and looked, and behold a man with a measuring line in his hand. Then said I, Whither goest thou? And he said unto me, To measure Jerusalem, to see what is the breadth thereof, and what is the length thereof.'—ZECHARIAH II. 1, 2.

It was a difficult time in Jewish history. People were coming back from the captivity. They had to rebuild Jerusalem, to restore the Temple, to make a new nation, as it were, out of the old fragments that were left. No wonder that hearts failed on all sides. Zechariah rises to meet these evils, vision after vision passes before his eyes, and among these visions there is this man of the measuring line, the cautious man, the prudent man, the calculating man. 'What is the good? You can do nothing. What can you poor people do to build a city like the old Jerusalem—to guard it, to fence it round, to make its ramparts strong? You must be cautious and careful, you must take heed what you are about lest you fail.' Very useful are such counsels in life, but they may be over-done. Prudent worldliness has not much room in the household of God. Small is the company of those who have begun and not been able to finish compared with those who have been scared back at the outset. As an old proverb says, 'The best is often the enemy of the good'. Because we cannot do at once in a moment all that we want to do, because we cannot always see our way to accomplish anything at all, or very little, because the task seems too much, and our abilities too small, those are the sort of feelings that unman us, that bar all progress.

I. What Faith has Done.—Take the case of the Apostles, when Jesus said unto them, 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature'; or when He added, 'beginning at Jerusalem'. I can fancy the man with the measuring line there saying, 'What can you do here in Jerusalem among the learned Scribes and righteous Pharisees, you poor Galilean fishermen? What can you do? You had better hold your tongues. You will not succeed.' Or afterwards, 'What! Do you think you will capture Rome, the greatest power in the world, the capital of the greatest empire that was ever seen? Better try humbler things, my friends, than that.' But the Twelve went on calmly, quietly, facing the odds, content to do little so long as they did it, satisfied if only they were walking in the Master's steps, laying foundation-stones for others to build on after they were gone. On they went, because all the while they felt that God was with them, and that He would not fail. Just as Zechariah the Prophet was sustained by the recollection of what God had done for Israel, so the Apostles, with the whole history of the past before their eyes, recollecting what the history of Jerusalem had been, went on calmly, quietly, just doing the work that lay straight before them, attempting no great things, hoping no great things, but just trying to fulfil their Master's command.

II. What Faith can Do.—How many of us are disposed to say, 'Well, what can we do?' We want, perhaps, to achieve a character, we would like to be good people. We want to be men of faith, like St. Paul; men of zeal, like St. Peter; men of love, like St. John, but we feel we never can attain to it. We are so ill-tempered, unbelieving, unconcerned and indifferent. What can we do? What is the use of our trying? We have not the power, the opportunities that others possess. It seems to us as if we never should win our way upwards. We want to begin at the top of the ladder and not at the bottom. We want to soar instantly to the heights without having to tramp the weary way, but God's way is not our way, nor His thoughts our thoughts. The man with the measuring line, our own doubting hearts this time, our own prudence, perhaps, suggests how little we can do, how useless it all is. Why should we attempt more? Nevertheless it is good for us to remember that the history of the saints has been the history of small things, small efforts, small hopes, of small prayers. Every prayer tells, every hope is answered, every act of faith becomes a victory, if not for ourselves for those who come after. Go on struggling, and by and by when a great crisis comes, as such crises come in every human life, when you have to be tried for what you are, before God and man, you will find that strength, and faith, and zeal are abundant, and love cannot fail. You have won without knowing it the topmost rung, you have built the tower stone by stone.

REFERENCES.—II. 1, 2.—C. H. Wright, The Unrecognised Christ, p. 84. II. 1-4.—J. G. Greenhough, The Cross in Modern Life, p. 148. II. 1-5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 604. II. 4.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, pp. 210, 331. II. 4, 5.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 273.

THE WALL OF FIRE

'I, saith the Lord, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and I will be the glory in the midst of her.'—ZECHARIAH II. 5.
This prophecy, as you read it to-day, might seem to have been enthusiastic and sanguine and doomed to disappointment. The young man's vision was not fulfilled in the literal sense which he probably expected. That great city, Jerusalem, the city of his dreams, was never built. But remember, if we bring to the interpretation of it that which grew out of Jerusalem—the Christian religion—this prophecy of Zechariah becomes singularly beautiful and accurate. How could the Christian religion be better described than by saying that it is a wall of fire round about, and the glory in the midst? And as that new faith came out of the old, the nations of the earth were gathered to it as Zechariah saw.

I. Let us take this vision for a moment as it applies to every country, and especially to our own. Measure not the walls. Forbid that reed by which you estimate a city's strength or a nation's pride. A nation's greatness does not consist in its size, nor in the multitude of its people, nor in the strength of its battlements or its defences. There is no security in great armies, no defence in warships. A nation that depends upon them cannot prosper. There is but one security for a nation—it is God. There is but one defence to our life, whether personal or family or national—it is the wall of fire round about, and the glory in the midst.

II. Apply these words to yourselves, to your personal life. The wall of fire round about represents the transcendence, and the glory in the midst represents the immanence of God. The belief in Jesus Christ is nothing if it does not bring an experience with it. And it is not true unless the experience it brings is precisely this: An inward life which is the glory in the midst resulting in an outward protection which is the wall of fire round about. The inward life is of this character: that by the faith of Christ your inward being becomes filled with God. The Spirit of God dwells there. Harmony, purity, and love are within you. And that inward light becomes a guidance and a power in every action of the day. That glory in the midst is the secret of the Christian life. And from that glory in the midst of you, that is to say, from the rightness with God within, and only from that, comes the wall of fire round about you.

III. The wall of fire round about you means that there is warmth within and light shining out around. All the piercing cold of unbelief and the chilly fogs of doubt have been dissipated by that wall of fire round about you. The man who has religion and the one who has not is largely represented by warmth. The one who is aglow, the love of God is shed abroad in his heart and it is a sacred warmth of fire. And as the wall of fire is warmth for you within, it is light shed far and wide upon the world around. For such a soul is as a city set upon a hill, and as a light of the world.—R. F. HORTON, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXIII. 1908, p. 24.

REFERENCES.—II. 5.—H. Rose Rae, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 170. II. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. viii. No. 452. B. Wilberforce, Following on to Know the Lord, p. 85. II. 12.—C. Leach, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1891, p. 310.

FROM DARKNESS TO LIGHT

'Be silent, O all flesh, before the Lord. . . . And he shewed me Joshua the high priest standing before the angel of the Lord. . . . Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire? . . . Joshua was clothed with filthy garments. . . . I will clothe thee with change of raiment.'—ZECHARIAH II. 13 and III. 1-4.

THESE verses illustrate the steps through which God brings a soul out of darkness into His marvellous light, and from the power of Satan unto God. We have here the simile of a Court of Justice. The prisoner is Joshua the high priest, standing as the typical man. And what position does he take up in that dock? He takes up the position of the guilty one. He is described as standing arrayed in filthy garments. The Bible never makes light of sin; the Bible never speaks of sin as an accident or a peccadillo; the Bible always speaks of sin in plain unmistakable language; and the sinner here is represented as standing clothed with filthy garments.

I. The First Step must be Conviction.—You must take your place by the side of Joshua in the dock, you must acknowledge the justice of God's sentence against you; you must make the words in the Epistle to the Romans your own: 'All have sinned and come short of the glory of God'. This verse, then, shows us that the first step in salvation is conviction.

II. The Second Step is Cleansing.—When a man takes the place of the guilty one, when a man acknowledges his own sins, what does he hear proceeding from the Master's lips? He hears the language of the fourth verse, 'Take away the filthy garments from him. Behold, I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with change of raiment'. The question may arise in the minds of many, How can God, Who is a righteous God and Who only can act righteously, how can He say to a soul, 'I have caused thine iniquities to pass from thee'. I will tell you in a moment; I say it with the deepest reverence, God can only utter those words because of the finished work of Jesus Christ on the Cross of Calvary. If you and I will come to the foot of that cross, taking the place of the guilty one, we shall hear the voice from the glory saying to us, 'I have caused thine iniquities to pass from thee'.

If any of you have ever been in America you may possibly have witnessed that very remarkable, never-to-be-forgotten sight of a prairie fire. I dare say you know that, when the prairie catches fire, if the wind is blowing very strongly, the prairie fire will travel faster than a horse can gallop. Those who have settled on the prairies see the devouring flames come, and they know they cannot run away from them. What do they do? They burn a large space in the vicinity of their home; in a short time a very large piece of ground is absolutely cleared and blackened. What do they do then? For purposes of safety they go and stand on the ground where the fire has been already. When the great devouring prairie fire comes up it stops there—it can go no farther—there is nothing to burn.

May I use that simile? There is but one place where the fire has already been, and that is the Cross of Calvary, the Cross of the Lord Jesus Christ.

III. The Third Step is Clothing.—'I will clothe thee with change of raiment.' Joshua is first represented as clothed with filthy garments, standing in the dock. Filthy garments were not at all inappropriate to his position there; but now his position is changed. He is no longer the prodigal, the suppliant, seeking for salvation; he has taken his right place before God; he has heard the words of pardon and rejoiced in them, and now the filthy rags are no longer suitable to his changed condition; and he hears that same voice that spoke pardon to him saying, 'I will clothe thee with change of raiment'. With what raiment are you and I clothed when we come as suppliants to the foot of the Cross?

IV. The Fourth Step is Crowning.—In the fifth verse we read, 'Let them set the fair mitre upon his head'. Whenever in Old Testament Scripture you find the mitre used it is always in connexion with the office of the priesthood. The high priest had the mitre placed upon his forehead, and in that mitre there was a plate with the words 'Holiness to the Lord'.

V. There is one Step More.—Joshua needs counsel. Although his position is about as changed as it is possible to be, from being a convicted felon in the dock to a crowned priest unto God, he is still in the world, subject to the same difficulties and temptations; he still wanted daily and hourly guidance. We find guidance and counsel are given to him in the ninth verse: 'Behold the stone that I have laid before Joshua,' etc. All commentators agree that the stone there means Jesus Christ the Lord.

A MESSAGE TO YOUNG MEN

'Run, speak to this young man.'—ZECHARIAH II. 24.

It is an angel who speaks. And he addresses the charge to another angel.

I. The Divine Message to young men is an Individual Message. The angel is bidden speak 'to this young man'. God's heart has always gone out towards the individual.

1. This young man was interested in the Church. He has 'a measuring line in his hand,' and his avowed purpose was 'to measure Jerusalem, to see what is the breadth thereof, and what is the length thereof'. It is not often you meet a reflective young man who has not 'a measuring line in his hand'. Young men will take the measure of everything, and as of everything so of the Church of God. The danger is lest a young man forget to measure himself. Do not neglect to use your 'measuring line,' your reason, your judgment, your conscience. The more you apply your measuring line to the Bible, the more you will be satisfied of its intrinsic Divinity. The Christian Religion is not in fear of your measuring line. As to all these things measure the spiritual city with your 'measuring line'. We do not fear the decision you will arrive at if you measure with a steady hand and a true heart.

2. There are some who use the 'measuring line' in a wrong spirit. Your measurement will be wrong if your motive be wrong. There is much contemptible measuring of the holy city. Some apply their 'measuring line' to the creeds and institutions of the Church in a fault-finding spirit. Reverence is a wise interpreter. Love measures truly.

3. This young man was religiously candid. When the Prophet interrogated him he avowed his deliberate intention 'to measure Jerusalem, to see what is the breadth thereof, and what is the length thereof'. He had not already made up his mind as to its dimensions. Many have decided as to Jerusalem's dimensions without having themselves ascertained them. Some are infidels on trust. They are sceptics by hearsay. He measures Christianity best who endeavours to live it.

II. This young man was taught of God. The angel declared to him the future which awaited Jerusalem. And God will teach every young man who sincerely desires to be taught by Him.

III. The Divine message to young men is imperatively urgent. The angel is bidden 'Run, speak to this young man'. No time is to be lost. With urgency, too, we bring the word of exhortation to every Christian young man. It is ours, in God's name, to delegate you with the solemn yet gladsome duty of seeking for Christ every young man who is not yet His.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, Messages for Home and Life, p. 3.

PURIFICATION

(An Old Testament Vision)

ZECHARIAH III. 1-7.

I. Cleansed.—Joshua was clothed with filthy garments (v. 3). What an anomaly is here; a priest clothed with filthy garments; a believer indulging in known sin, is this possible? But mark well Joshua's conduct; sin-stained as he was, he stood there still, 'he stood before the angel'. Happy for him that he did so; Satan might attack, conscience might condemn, yet would he stand still before Jehovah Jesus. Not one inch would he remove. Was he sin-defiled, then he would know it, that the filthiness might be cleansed away.

II. Clothed.—What was this? 'He answered and spake unto those that stood before Him, saying, Take away the filthy garments from him. And unto him He said, Behold, I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with change of raiment.' God's purpose in electing us was that we should be holy (Eph. 1. 4); and shall we by our unbelief do what He will not permit the devil to do, 'frustrate the grace of God'? But again—the Lord appeals to what He has done for Joshua already. 'Is not this a brand plucked from the burning?' Have I not already, He seems to say, snatched him from destruction; and shall I not deliver him from sin? I have done the greater, shall I not do the less? What can Satan answer? He is speechless. What can he say? He is overcome by the blood of the Lamb.

III. Crowned.—One thing alone remained, and Joshua's restoration to favour was complete. The mitre was the sign and token of high priestly service, and Joshua knew as it was placed upon his head that he was once more 'a priest in function,' and that he was free to serve.

I believe that as in temporal so in spiritual things there come crises in our lives—crises when God opens up before our eyes a path that mounts the higher table-lands of Christian experience, a path illuminated by His own most gracious smile, fanned by the ever-present breezes of His Spirit. We may take it if we will; the responsibility is ours, but if we do, the cost must well be counted. The path is steep, the last and least weight must be thrown aside if we are to tread it.

IV. Charged.—And now what follows? Grace had triumphed, Joshua was restored—Cleansed, Clothed, and Crowned. But do we part from him here? Nay, there must be first a solemn charge . . . never was Joshua in so responsible and solemn a position as now. The angel of the Lord protested unto Joshua, saying, 'Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, If thou wilt walk in My ways, and if thou wilt keep My charge, then thou shalt also judge My house, and shalt also keep My courts, and I will give thee places to walk among these that stand by'. Honours unspeakable, but for whom? For the faithful servant.—E. W. MOORE, Life Transfigured, p. 129.

REFERENCES.—III. 1-5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 611. III. 1-10.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 280. III. 3, 4, 5.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in a Religious House, vol. i. p. 17. III. 4.—R. J. Campbell, New Theology Sermons, vol. II. 1897, p. 379. III. 5.—F. B. Meyer, Christian World Pulpit, vol. II. 1897, p. 379. III. 7.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 287. III. 9, 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 953. III. 11, 12.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. x. p. 248. IV. 1-3, 12-14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvi. No. 1569. IV. 1-10.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 294. IV. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 149. G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 89. R. F. Bracey, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 298. S. Barnett, ibid. vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 186. G. Rodney Eden, ibid. vol. lxviii. 1905, p. 21. A. F. Winnington Ingram, ibid. vol. lxi. 1906, p. 152; see also A Mission of the Spirit, p. 1. E. H. Bickersteth, Thoughts in Past Years, p. 107. G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 89. G. H. Wilkinson, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 280. J. G. Simpson, Christian Ideals, p. 153. IV. 9.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 169. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 301. IV. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2601. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Common Life Religion, p. 205. C. F. Aked, Old Events and Modern Meanings, p. 181. C. Stanford, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 281. VI. 10-12.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 171. VI. 12, 13.—G. Body, The Anglican Pulpit of To-day, p. 258. VI. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. p. 191; vol. xxv. No. 1495. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Minor Prophets, p. 309. VII. 5, 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. viii. No. 438. VIII.—Ibid. vol. liii. No. 3047.

ZECHARIAH VII. 9; MICAH VI. 8.

BESIDES various maxims of renunciation and wisdom written from top to bottom of the stele, Confucius has left to this sanctuary certain thoughts on literature which have been engraved in letters of gold in such a way as to form pictures hung on the walls. Here is one which I transcribe for young western scholars who are preoccupied with classification and inquiry. They will find in it a reply twice two thousand years old to one of their favourite questions: The literature of the future will be the literature of compassion.—PIERRE LOTI'S Last Days of Peking, Describing temple of Confucius.

REFERENCE.—VIII. 4, 5.—J. G. Simpson, Christian Ideals, p. 75.

WORK AND PLAY

'And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof.'—ZECHARIAH VIII. 5.

I SHALL set play in a threefold light: I. In the light of work. II. In the light of the Gospel. III. In the light of heaven.

I. Play in the Light of Work.—What is the difference between work and play? It is not in the things we do so much that the real difference between work and play is found: it is in the spirit in which the thing is done. And can we distinguish that difference of spirit? I do not suppose that it was ever better done than by that great thinker and poet, Horace Bushnell. 'Work,' he said, 'is activity for an end, and play is activity as an end;' and if we think of that we shall find the depth of it. In other words, back of our work is duty, back of our work is hunger, back of it is constraint. But back of play there is no force like that. It is labour, but in the labour there is liberty.

II. Play in the Light of the Gospel.—I think we will all admit that we owe to Christ the dignity of labour. Did you ever think of this, that the Gospel of Jesus has dignified our play? Yet the one is just as true as the other. I mean that, in the Gospel view of man, there is such compass, there is such wisdom, there is such compassion, that the element of play comes to its own again. I have read of that great saint Borromeo, that while engaged with some friends in a game of chess, the question was started what they would do if they knew that they were to die within the hour. 'I would go on with my game,' replied Borromeo. And that is the true spirit of the Master. Even a game of chess can be illumined, brought into line with the great purpose of life, and made to echo with the praise of God.

Do you think it a mere figure of speech that we talk of the waters playing on the shore, or of the wind playing among the trees, or of the sunlight playing on the grass? These words are real, penetrative. For the creative work of the Infinite is play. It is not task-work. It is the outcome of love, of liberty, of superabundant, everlasting life. And hence the irresistible conviction witnessed in human speech, of the play-element in the handiwork of God.

III. Play in the Light of Heaven.—What is your first thought of heaven. The first thing that we think of heaven is rest. Do you really think it will be that? And do you really think that you will want that? Consider.

For us all there comes the Friday night. Our week of school is done. God's discipline is over. We lay aside our pencils and our books. And we are wearied with the stress of it, and we cry out, 'O God, to be at rest!' And so we fall asleep. Then dawns the Saturday, the everlasting Sabbath, and we awake, and Jesus Christ is there. And every faculty is full of being, and every part is wondrously expanded; and we are quivering, inspired with life, and we do not want to rest: we want to serve, and the service of eternity is play! For here we must be driven to service, but yonder to serve will be our very joy.—G. H. MORRISON, Flood-Tide, p. 115.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 5.—B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 29. VIII. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxix. No. 1747. VIII. 9, 13.—T. Parr, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 74. VIII. 12 and 16.—C. Silvester Horne, ibid. vol. lxi. 1902, p. 382. VIII. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ix. No. 543; vol. liii. No. 3045. VIII. 17.—J. Parker, Studies in Texts, vol. i. p. 159. VIII. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2248. 'Plain Sermons by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. x. p. 239. J. H. Newman, Sermons Bearing on Subjects of the Day, p. 431. W. Percival Ward, Love the Truth and Peace. VIII. 21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1107. IX.—Ibid. vol. I. No. 2883. IX. 9.—Ibid. vol. xxxi. No. 1861. C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 34. IX. 10.—A. Rowland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 360. IX. 11.—T. A. Gurney, The Living Lord and the Opened Grave, p. 1. IX. 11, 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2839; vol. I. No. 2883. IX. 12.—T. A. Gurney, The Living Lord and the Opened Grave, p. 37.—C. J. Vaughan, Last Words in the Parish Church of Doncaster, p. 54. IX. 17.—F. E. Paget, Faculties and Difficulties for Belief and Unbelief, p. 86. W. H. Hutchings, Plain Instructive Sermons on Holy Communion, p. 65. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Blessed Sacrament, p. 35. H. Ward Beecher, Sermons, p. 119. X. 1.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 181. X. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2588.

CONFIRMATION

'He that is feeble among them in that day shall be as David.'
—ZECHARIAH XII. 8.

THERE are two great senses in which we may take the verse; both equally true: both very, though not perhaps equally, comforting.

I. 'He that is feeble among them shall be as David.' The promise is to you; and so it had need to be. You, in all your infirmity—you, so unequally matched with the prince of the power of this world—a feeble soldier on one side, on the other, principalities, and powers, rulers of the darkness of this world, spiritual wickedness in high places—you, to resemble the most glorious Victor of all? You to be like Him in the time of His greatest victory? Even so: and in one particular of that victory you must more especially resemble Him. How did He conquer? Not with Saul's armour: not by the outward show of defence and attack; but by the commonest of all weapons, the five smooth stones, and by the sling which he had so often used in the little incidents of his shepherd's life. So of you: in and by little things you must achieve this conquest; by the ordinary circumstances of your life, for the most part, and not in great and out-of-the-way efforts or trials.

II. 'He that is feeble among them shall be as David.' But of that same David I read in another place, 'David waxed faint'. And it was with no common faintness, no common exhaustion that He Whom we love was faint for our sakes. When the darkness of death was closing over His eyes, and the damp of death was resting upon His forehead, and His tongue had spoken the last words of earthly love, 'Behold thy Mother!' David waxed faint with that faintness which needed the three days' rest in the grave to turn it into everlasting strength. Then the promise is, He that is feeble among you, shall, in that weakness, by that weakness, not in spite of it, but by means of it, be as David. But here we must take in three little words that we have hitherto left out. It is not every weakness that will make us like Him, any more than it is all pain which will make us like Him. We may suffer with the impenitent thief, as well as with Christ: we may be weak like Reuben—'Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel'—as well as like Christ. So, to look at the text again: 'He that is feeble among them at that day shall be as David'. What day? When Jerusalem shall be on the one side, and the banded world against it on the other: when there is no thought of peace, no offer of quarter between the clean and the unclean, between the holy and the unholy: when the battle shall be as persevering and lengthened as it is earnest, then, 'he that is feeble among them shall be as David'. Now, take the condition, and you have the promise. Let your battle be like that of which the Prophet speaks.—J. M. NEALE, Occasional Sermons, p. 96.

REFERENCES.—X. 11, 12.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 192. X. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1805. XI. 2.—P. M'Adam Muir, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 68. XI. 12, 13.—W. Hay M. H. Aitken, Mission Sermons (2nd Series), p. 204. XII.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. I. No. 2901. XII. 1.—J. Leckie, Sermons Preached at Ibrox, p. 21. XII. 8.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 201.

CONTRITION

'I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of supplications.'
—ZECHARIAH XII. 10.

WE are to offer to God the sacrifice of broken and contrite hearts. Where shall we gain this offering? Here, as ever, this is true: we can only give to God what God first gives to us; and the answer comes in the words of our text. In it there is given to us the revelation of the genesis of contrition. In a day of religious indifference Zechariah is privileged to look upon a vision that kindles hope. He sees the people turning from their sins to God with deep contrition.

I. Contrition must be learned at the foot of the Cross.

Contrition is the breaking of the sinner's heart in union with the broken heart of Jesus. All contrition flows from the vision of the Crucified. Our Lord's death upon the cross was the expression of a perfect contrition. He sorrowed with a perfect sorrow for the sins of men. He condemned those sins with a perfect condemnation. He bowed Himself down under the Father's hand, and bore the penance of those sins with a perfect conformity of will. His is a meritorious contrition.

II. Whence is it that there is this power in the vision of the Crucified to awaken and develop contrition in the penitent's heart?

1. There is an assimilating power in the vision of Jesus in His Passion.

2. There is an illuminating power. We see our sin, and we see the love of God, and we see the path of duty.

3. There is an attractive power. Sin loses its attractions.—GEORGE BODY, The Sermon Year Book, 1891, p. 355.

REFERENCES.—XII. 10.—R. A. Suckling, Sermons Plain and Practical, p. 16. J. Henderson, Sermons, p. 240. G

Body, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxvii. 1905, p. 185; see also Church Times, vol. xxix. 1891, p. 240. F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. i. p. 135. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 575; vol. xxiii. No. 1362; vol. xlvi. No. 2683; vol. i. No. 2001. XII. 10, 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiii. No. 1983. XII. 10-14.—Ibid. vol. xli. No. 2431. XII. 10-14; XIII. 1.—A. Whyte, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 387. XII. 12-14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2510. XIII. 1.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 971. XIII. 1, 2.—Ibid. vol. xli. No. 2431.

THE INCENTIVES TO WORSHIP (For Ascensiontide)

'And one shall say unto Him, What are these wounds in Thine hands? Then He shall answer, Those with which I was wounded in the house of My friends.'—ZECHARIAH XIII. 6.

THE Prophet is anticipating the first Ascension Day, the day the Church observed last Thursday; a day which, for the importance of the event it commemorates, ranks with Christmas and with Easter. He is looking on to the first Ascension Day. Think what the picture is that floats up before him: The Passion is over; the Cross is ended; the forty days after the Resurrection are completed; and, at last, the great and final day has come, and from the mountain's summit the conquering Saviour is preparing to return to His Throne. The battlements of heaven are lined with the angel hosts ready to do Him welcome. The golden gates of heaven have swung back to receive Him, and from out those gates runs the chorus of the heavenly choir, 'Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of glory shall come in'. And as they watch and wait, the question passes along those angel ranks: In what shape, in what appearance will He come? Will He come as they saw Him leave His Throne before He took human flesh, or will He come as they saw Him last when they spread their wings around the Cross? How will He come? And as they ask, He enters in at the open door, and they see at once that He comes not as He went, for in His hands and feet and side are the wound-marks of His suffering. The question runs through the astonished angel host, 'What are these wounds in Thy hands?' And He answers in the tones that are so familiar on earth and in heaven, 'The wounds with which I was bruised in the house of My friends'.

I. What does the vision of the Prophet say to us to-day? It tells us of the eternal measurements of sin; it tells us of the eternal assurances of love; it tells us of the eternal measurements of prayer; but does it not tell us something else? Surely it tells us, and in moving, pathetic tones of its own, the eternal incentives to worship. You and I are slow to worship God. You and I are apt to be careless and neglectful of the worship of God. I cannot think of any picture in the Bible which will come to us with more force than this, 'What are those wounds in Thy hands?' 'Those with which I was wounded in the house of My friends.' For see what the vision has to do with worship. What is the ground, the real ground, upon which all worship rests? Surely it is belief in a living Christ. You do not worship a dead Christ upon the Cross, you worship a living Christ upon the Throne. God forbid that you and I should ever lose sight of the picture of the Christ upon His Cross; but if we are to worship God with all earnestness, with all reverence, with the devotion of all the best powers that we have, it is not a Christ upon the Cross that we must look to, it is a living Christ upon the Throne: 'I am He that liveth eternally'. You hear Christ say those words, and there is only one thing for you and me to do: to fall down and worship Him that liveth for ever and ever.

II. And what is the motive power of worship? Is it not just gratitude for mercies received? I cannot think of any more beautiful description of worship than that which the Psalmist gives us: 'I love the Lord, because He hath heard my voice and my supplications'. But directly he says, 'I love the Lord,' what does he go on to say in response to that love? He goes on to declare his intention to worship: 'I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord. I will pay my vows unto the Lord now, in the presence of all His people.' What makes the neglect of God's worship so terrible to-day is that it reveals the want of grateful hearts. There cannot be a man or woman living on God's earth who is able to say, 'I love the Lord, because He hath heard the voice of my supplication,' who must not perforce go on to say, 'What can I render to the Lord? This, at any rate, I can render, poor sinner though I am, "I will take the cup of salvation . . . I will pay my vows unto the Lord". I will worship the God to whom I owe my all.'

III. And, last of all, what is the characteristic of worship? Where does it find its noblest feature? Is it not in this: Not in what I receive, but what I give? The very motto of all true worship is this: 'It is more blessed to give than to receive'. What is the true, the highest feature of worship? I tell you it is the consecration of the best of everything to God. It is the dedication of every human power, of every human talent, of every human faculty.

'WHAT ARE THESE WOUNDS IN THINE HANDS?'

'And one shall say unto Him, What are these wounds in Thine hands? Then He shall answer, Those with which I was wounded in the house of My friends.'—ZECHARIAH XIII. 6.

I. WHEN our Lord appeared to His disciples after the Resurrection, He showed them His hands and His side. By this time He was on the other side of death. From the Resurrection to the Ascension was a short step compared to that between Good Friday and Easter. That step had been taken, and He was revealed as the Conqueror. Henceforth the note of power—the power of His Resurrection—rings loudly through the New Testament. The strength that God set at work in Christ when He raised Him from the dead is the theme of believers from now to the end of time. But that strength was the power of victorious and accepted sorrow. He carried through the grave the strong and full and everlasting indications of His sorrow. His wounds were no more burning, but their record remained, and will remain, in the scars that are the seal of victory.

II. He came through the grave with the life whole in Him. It is not enough to say that after the Cross, the suffering, the blood, the patience, there came the life and power. The life and power were there through all the endurance, though they blazed forth in their glory at the Resurrection. So Good Friday and Easter are not so far apart as they seem. He carried Good Friday into Easter, and there was Easter in Good Friday. He showed them His hands and His side. It was as much as to say to them, 'In this new land, where all is peace and triumph, you are safe with Me. These wounds are fountains of grace, the titles of My glory, and the seals of My power to save. For you the rains will descend a little while, and the winds beat, but I have not forgotten the storm that burst on Me.'

III. In heaven, where He and His redeemed are together, and at rest for ever, He appears to them as a Lamb as it had been slain. They, His people, have the marks of wounds. They have come up out of the great tribulation of earthly life. The angels have never known a wound, but He is a Lamb as it had been slain. Nothing has dishonoured Him or shamed Him. It is not of the suffering that impoverishes, but of the suffering that enriches that He bears the traces. It is the power and the witness of victorious and availing sorrow that are His through the eternal years. He has offered up one sacrifice for sins for ever, and the memory of that sacrifice is green, and its tokens are never out of the eyes of those it has brought home to God.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLI, The Garden of Nuts, p. 133.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 6.—W. C. E. Newbolt, Counsels of Faith and Practice, p. 264. C. H. Wright, The Unrecognized Christ, p. 112. C. G. Clark-Hunt, The Refuge of the Sacred Wounds, p. 25. J. I. Blackburn, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxvii. 1905, p. 302. R. Mackintosh, ibid. vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 147.

PURIFICATION

'I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined,' etc.—ZECHARIAH XIII. 9.

CONSIDER the purpose of God in asking His children to live with Him the life of contrition. God is seeking our personal purification. The great work God is doing within us is the separating of the pure from the impure.

I. Life is a purgatory, and is intended to be purgatorial. God's penances here are not punitive, but remedial. Our sorrows form the mystic fire in which God wills to separate between us and our sin. Why does character sometimes determinate under God's discipline of life? Because the suffering is not looked upon in its true light nor submitted to in a true spirit.

II. If there had been no sin, there would have been no intermediate state, and hence it follows that it is a penitential discipline, for the purifying of the spirit. The vision of Jesus seen by us coming out of the sinful past, and carrying into His presence a married nature, how can that vision be anything but one that develops contrition even to the limit of perfection?

The intermediate state is a state of joy, because it is a state of purgation.

III. Sweet communion. You could not bear the purification but for this—'They shall call upon Me, and I will answer'.—GEORGE BODY, The Sermon Year Book, 1891, p. 357.

REFERENCE.—XIV. 6, 7.—W. M. Taylor, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 287.

'I will bring the third part through the fire.'—ZECHARIAH XIII. 9. A FAVOURITE text of Charles Wesley.

'But it shall come to pass, that at evening time it shall be light.'—ZECHARIAH XIV. 7.

THE Prophet is speaking of the last times—the period after 'that day' when the 'feet' of the Lord 'shall stand upon the Mount of Olives'.

Whether 'that day' refers to the occasion when our Lord made His public entry into Jerusalem, and, pausing on Olivet, 'wept' over the doomed city, or whether it refers to His future Second Coming, when He shall 'reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before His ancients gloriously,' one thing is certain, that after that day a period follows, which is described as being 'neither clear nor dark: but it shall be one day which shall be known to the Lord, not day, nor night'.

I. 'At evening time it shall be light.' There are two principles in this promise which, for the most part, regulate all the dealings of God. There is—

1. A principle of surprise. God delights to frustrate human speculation. The day seems passing; the darkness deepening; night falling, when, in a moment, the light kindles into meridian lustre; 'at evening time it shall be light'. Thus human pride and reason is humbled, and God's glory and love stand out alone and supreme.

2. The principle of patience. The blessing waits till the 'evening'. You look for it in the morning watch, or you seek for it at midday, but it is nowhere to be found; it is 'evening' now; soon it shall be night, when—lo! it is here. Do not doubt but that the morning's gifts, be they what they may, are as nothing to the evening's blessing. The sun may have been shining on you throughout the day, but still, 'at evening time it shall be light'.

II. Consider how true the text is of old age under certain conditions. The old age of a purely worldly man or woman is one of the most distressing and abject of all sights. One cannot be surprised that such dread to be even thought old. The very power to please or to derive pleasure, as they understand it—all gone. Roon companions, where are they? A solitary being, with very uncomfortable thoughts of the past, looking back on sin and folly—forward, to a dark unknown. But mark the Christian man.

He, too, has reached the verge of life's pilgrimage. He has had his share, perhaps more than the average, of cares and trials by the way; his physical powers, too, are waning fast, many a loved object has passed from his sight; but all along he knew full well that this world is no resting-place, and that there is nought abiding; and therefore he did not set his affections on things below, but on things above. Now in such a man there are things—sweet memories of the past, confidence in that Arm which has supported him throughout his pilgrimage, hopes of the future, 'sure and certain'; and the old man's 'mouth is filled with praises, and his tongue with joy'. His old age is the happiest and brightest period of his life; while others are nearing the tomb in darkness and uncertainty, his last words will be the triumphant cry, 'At evening time it shall be light'.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 7.—T. De Witt Talmage, Sermons (1st Series), p. 16. T. A. Gurney, Nunc Dimittis, p. 10. T. L. Cuyler, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 121; see also vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 94. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 160. XIV. 8, 9.—W. Green, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 315. XIV. 9.—F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. i. p. 14. XIV. 20.—J. Pulsford, Infoldings and Unfoldings, p. 58. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 399. J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 118. G. T. Candlin, ibid. vol. lxi. 1902, p. 396. XIV. 20, 21.—C. Brown, ibid. vol. xlv. 1893, p. 373.

MALACHI

MALACHI

REFERENCES.—I. 2, 3.—H. M. Butler, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 12. Rawnsley, Sermons in Country Churches, p. 64. I. 13.—J. Norton, Golden Truths, p. 455. I. 18.—R. W. Evans, Parochial Sermons, vol. ii. p. 315. II. 2.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Saints' Days, p. 133. A. K. H. Boyd, Sunday Afternoons in the Parish Church, p. 109. II. 7.—J. Keble, Sermons for Advent to Christmas Eve, p. 341. II. 17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1415.

THE COMING OF THE LORD

'Behold, I will send My messenger, and he shall prepare the way before Me: and the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to His temple, even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in: behold, He shall come, saith the Lord of Hosts.'—MALACHI III. 1.

HERE is a twofold prediction: we have a forerunner of Christ announced in it and then Christ Himself.

I. This tells us two things of this forerunner.

(a) It points out his mission from God. Our Lord Himself refers to this passage, and says that it points to John the Baptist and the ministry of the Baptist.

(b) The work this forerunner was to perform. The very appointment of a messenger to precede Jesus, even in His Humiliation, was a foresight and evidence of Christ's royal dignity of his being King over His believing people.

II. We have in this passage two statements of Christ's Divinity:—

(a) He is called the Lord. It is most important thus to observe the Divinity of Jesus, not only where it is directly but even where it is incidentally stated in Scripture, for the Deity of Christ supports the very substance of our religion.

(b) The end of the verse tells us, it is the Lord of Hosts. The Lord Jesus and the Lord of hosts are one and the same. Thus constantly throughout Scripture we meet with this same truth of the Deity of Jesus.

III. He is also called—

(a) 'The messenger of the Covenant.' The covenant is the gracious term used by Jehovah in regard to the promises which He makes to His people to bless and save them.

(b) A messenger. For it is He who has made known the glad tidings of salvation, and through the Holy Spirit He reveals and offers to us the blessing of the Gospel. In these two names we observe the happy blending together of our Lord's majesty and lowliness. He is the Lord of the temple, and at the same time a Messenger, the Lord of hosts and yet a servant.

IV. Observe the place, He shall come to his Temple; and about this temple the last three Prophets frequently spoke telling the Jews that they polluted and profaned it, but that the Lord Jehovah would one day honour it and come to it.—E. J. BAKWETER, The Shield of Faith, p. 174.

THE GLORY OF GOD'S HOUSE

'The Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to His temple, even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in: behold, He shall come, saith the Lord of hosts. But who may abide the day of His coming?'—MALACHI III. 1, etc.

I. We may trace four stages in Messianic prophecy:—

- (a) From the Fall to the Exodus.
- (b) From the time of Moses to Saul.
- (c) The period of the earlier kings.
- (d) From Isaiah to Malachi.

II. Malachi tells of the coming of the Lord to His temple, and calls attention to the unexpectedness of that coming and to the misapprehension of its purpose. They had expected him to come and judge the heathen. But the Prophet warns them that they themselves shall be first judged.

III. The purpose of the temple was twofold. A house for God to dwell in among His people, and a place where acceptable sacrifices might be offered. We may notice three stages in the development of the sacrificial idea:—

- (a) The building of altars of sacrifice.
- (b) The building of a tabernacle in the wilderness to be a dwelling for the ark with which was associated God's abiding presence.
- (c) The temple planned by David and built by Solomon was but a development of the tabernacle, linked in the same way with God's presence.

IV. The temple reached its glory when Christ entered it. The two ideas connected with the Temple blend into one in the Holy Eucharist, the presence and the sacrifice.—A. G. MORTIMER, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, p. 181.

REFERENCES.—III. 1.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. ii. p. 268. Ibid. vol. iv. p. 120. II. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 2611. III. 1, 2.—Bishop E. H. Browne, Messiah as Foretold and Expected, p. 30. III. 1, 3.—C. Stanford, Symbols of Christ, p. 175. III. 2.—F. B. Woodward, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 73. III. 3.—F. D. Maurice, Sermons, vol. v. p. 205. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1575.

THE LIGHT OF OTHER DAYS

'As in former years.'—MALACHI III. 4.

It seems as if we heard God's own voice in these words and the words that accompany them. This is not a man talking about the light of other days; it is, in the person of the Prophet, God Himself speaking, and saying, in effect, O that it were as it used to be! what times we had together in the long ago, in the former years, in the days of old! Things have gone wrong since then; the house is not what it used to be: O if these people would only return, repent, and give Me the opportunity of saying, I forgive you all, we should bring back the centuries we have lost, we should make new time, we should make forty-eight hours instead of twenty-four in the day; and by My grace and power we should accomplish the miracle of living our lives over again.

I. You remember some of the former days; the days, you know, when our love saw no difficulties. Love has always been blind; in that sweet sense may love never get its eyesight! To be blind is sometimes to be right and happy and secure. When love begins to see difficulties you may close the windows, and turn the key, and send in the man who will buy up wrecked happiness for bronze. If love should give way the mother has given way, and we always said that as long as mother was there we need not trouble about grate or cupboard or bed to sleep on. But when love gives way, sell your house, go out into the wilderness, and by accident drop in the sea if you can.

II. And who cannot recall those happy years when the soul was absolutely without a suspicion? Once we believed everybody; of course it never occurred to us that anybody could be saying anything that was not true. 'Let your yea be yea, and your nay nay.' That is the very soul of the kingdom of God—sincerity, simplicity, directness, emphasis, and candour. I long for the days when we never suspected anybody, when we thought there were no wrinkles in any heart, when we were perfectly sure that what was said to us was said in truth and innocence, simplicity and love, and might be relied upon to the last tick and syllable of the speech.

III. I sometimes want the days to come back when my confidence was absolutely strong, when I rose with a simple creed and worked it out all day, and then laid my head upon it at night and slept well. There was a time when I thought that everything would come right, when I was quite sure that everything was right because God was in it.

Now we are glad when any man arises to give us an excuse for giving up our old ways; if he will hint that there is something wrong in this page or on that page, enough, we are quite willing if he can prove that, then we are away to serve the devil. Not that we care for criticism or archaeology or any verbal difficulties, but we are glad that men have arisen to point all these out, because it gives us chance to go with an easier conscience to redouble our social iniquities. Will the enthusiastic days of faith ever return, when men are battling at the church gates and saying, Open to me the gates of Zion; I will enter in and be glad and shout the Lord's song? I wonder.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. iv. p. 69.

REFERENCES.—III. 6.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 236. III. 7.—J. Keble, Sermons for Christmas and Epiphany, p. 236. III. 8.—W. Baird, The Hallowing of our Common Life, p. 23. J. Foster, Lectures (2nd Series), p. 336.

FAITH IN DARKNESS

'Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another: and the Lord hearkened, and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him, for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon His name.'—MALACHI III. 16.

THE internal state of Jerusalem was bad beyond all former example. The crimes of those men who one after another filled the high priest's office, and the general wickedness of the people, were quite enough to prevent them from expecting those blessings which had been promised as the reward of their faithful obedience.

I. To what then could a good man look with hope in such a time of darkness? Outward signs of God's favour to His people were nowhere to be seen; their condition was in no respect better, and in some it was worse, than that of the heathen nations around them. Had God then cast them off utterly, and was there nothing more to be hoped from trying to serve Him? Many of them did not scruple to say that it was so.

II. For those who looked only on the surface of things, there was nothing that could support their faith. But the more thoughtful, and those who loved God better, sought to find whether there was not some ground of comfort yet left them. They turned over the volume of the law and the prophets; they found trust in God urged as a duty which would never be practised in vain.

III. We must live by faith; that is, we must take much upon trust; we must sow in patience, believing that the harvest will come. All our practice in common life is founded upon belief, not upon certainty: we cannot be sure that a single plan we form will answer; we cannot be sure that a single step we take will lead to our good. So then we may believe or not, as we choose; and herein lies our trial.

REFERENCES.—III. 16.—J. Baldwin Brown, The Sunday Afternoon, p. 20. III. 16, 17.—J. C. M. Bellow, Christian Life: Life in Christ, p. 249. C. D. Bell, The Name Above Every Name, p. 85. III. 18.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1415. III.—Canon Jelf, Sermons for the People, p. 152.

THE END OF THE CHRISTIAN YEAR

'The day cometh.'—MALACHI IV. 1.

THE end of a Christian year and the approach of another bring, like all endings and new beginnings in our frail and brief life, solemn thoughts. The Church in her services encourages them, and impresses them upon us.

I. The Day of Change and Ending.—Life, if you think of it, is so made that it seems stable, settled, permanent, and yet it is liable always to interruption and shock. It moves incessantly towards some day of change and ending. Both things are true—both, no doubt, are meant for us by God. Without the appearance—call it the illusion if you will—of quiet and of security, we could not live our lives heartily or do our work effectively. To that appearance we owe all our happiness. If life be but a stage, it has a look of home. You could not act a drama as you moved along down a road. God knows the real value of the moment and the day, and knows that it is perhaps through the feeling of their being safely our own that we are able either to enjoy or to use them, or that they can do their true work of probation for us. But if that is true, it is also true that He means us to take to heart the certainty of change. If we get settled in security, we deceive ourselves. Blind and self-satisfied, we grow careless and rash. 'In my prosperity I said, I shall never be removed.' 'Tomorrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant.' And so to the man in the Gospel, who has wrapped himself round with security of his possessions, saying, 'I will pull down my barns and build greater,' comes the word, 'Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee, then whose shall these things be?' Therefore, for our good, life is always full of signs and warnings of change. Sometimes they come suddenly, sometimes gradually. The death at our side by the quick stroke of accident or after a few days' illness, the break-up of a home, a bereavement which darkens our sky, a physician's word, or look, which gives the verdict of incurable and mortal disease, these are the common examples of sudden catastrophe which make our best security insecure.

II. The Appeal to the Conscience.—It is not only that the change will come, whether gradually or in an instant, but that when it comes, it will wind up a time of opportunity; a chapter will be closed, accounts will be cast up, and judgment will be passed. The day, when it comes, will test our value and the use that we have made of the days that are gone. The conscience of man, like the words of the Prophet, forebodes the day, which may be a day of hope, but must be a day of judgment. We may look for it, like Haggai, as a day which will bring some triumph of the right, some better state than this in which we live, with all its trials, sufferings, and sin—some glory and some peace; but, being the poor, sinful creatures that we are, we must think of it as a day when, under the searchlight of God, all that is in use is seen for what it really is; all the evil that is hidden by our respectability is revealed; all the faults that we will not own, even to ourselves to be faults, are exposed in their true character—a day when we shall see ourselves as we might have been, and as we are, and shall be mightily ashamed.

III. And behind Conscience there is God.—'Who may abide the day of His coming? and who shall stand when He appeareth?' for He shall bring every secret thing into judgment, whether it be good or whether it be evil. Well for us if the judgment be 'Well done'. There is time to purge away the dross and to give us the opportunity to do better, but can we reckon that it will be always so? or will the fire find in us only what it must consume? Will there be a last day after the different days of warning and of trial, a last day winding up our opportunity after the many warnings that have gone before?

MALACHI IV.

I. WE are studying the very last words in the Old Testament. The prophecies of Malachi. The oracle is about to cease. Malachi is about to resign the pen. What are his last words? There shall no Prophet arise after him until John come, and John the Baptist was not coming for four hundred years. What is to be done in the meantime? Does God provide for the interstices of history? Here is the word—verse 4: 'Remember ye the law of Moses My servant, which I commanded unto him in Horeb for all Israel with the statutes and judgments'. For four hundred years the people were to remember the law of Moses. So the Jewish Church was not left without oracles during the four centuries of so-called silence. If the law of Moses had prevailed it would have given life, if lovingly accepted and obeyed. All truth gives life, all truth brings life. But is it the law of Moses? that is only part of the description. The full description is 'The law of Moses My servant'. There is the supremacy of God, 'which I commanded unto him'; there is the foundation of law. God commands, Moses communicates. All that men can do is to act instrumentally. The fountain, the origin of law, we find in God.

II. Is there, then, no touch of prophecy? Is there no widening horizon before that view of the Church? Is it simply the law, the law—iron, dogmatic, positive, unchangeable? Is there no sky above this poor earth of law? God never made earth without making sky. So in this instance we find the sky, the horizon, the far away hint and promise; Behold, I will send you Elijah the Prophet, not Elijah the Tishbite. What shall this Elijah do when he comes? 'He shall work out the great reconciliation, and he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children.' This is not a family reference. The Prophet is not speaking, or God is not speaking through the Prophet, merely of the father of a family and the children of a family. He is speaking of fathers in the sense of leaders, teachers of the world and children. The populations and the flocks of the earth. And this Prophet, when he comes, will be known by his desire to promote, and his power to promote reconciliation. God's Prophets always bring music, harmony, rest. If any man bring aught else except in an official and temporary sense, he is no Prophet of God.—J. PARKER, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. III. p. 196.

THE ILLUMINATING POWER OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

'The sun of righteousness shall arise with healing in His wings.'—MALACHI IV. 2.

I. THERE is nothing which illuminates this world like the vision of righteousness, and therefore there is nothing which heals doubt like that vision. The reason is that only in the vision of righteousness do I learn my superiority to nature. Every other vision dwarfs me. The glory of the natural sun makes me pale. The vastness of the mighty firmament makes me humble. The flash of the lightning makes me tremble. The height of the mountains makes me shrink. The depth of the ocean makes me feel shallow. The sight of disease and death makes me identify myself with the flower that fades and the bird that dies. But when I see a righteous man I see something at variance with natural law. Professor Huxley himself tells me so. The law of nature, the law of evolution, is the survival of the strongest. But the law of righteousness is the refusal of the strongest to survive at the expense of the weakest. It is the insistence of the strong to share the life of the weak—to appropriate their burdens, to wear their infirmities. It is a law which never could have been made by physical nature, which in this sense is supernatural. My vision of a righteous man is fitted to heal all my scepticism. It tells me that human life is something unique, something revolutionary, something above the common clay. It tells me that the human soul can do what even the stars cannot do, make a new law which will override the old. It tells me that, with all its seeming insignificance, the little stream in the heart of a man has outweighed the wonder of the whole ocean—has turned the downward into an upward current and led the way to a higher plane.

II. The righteous man is no longer a cipher. He was born a cipher like the leaves and the grass. But he has reversed the order of science. He has made a new law—the death of the strong for the weak. He has arrested the first course of Nature. He has said: 'You shall no longer live for self-preservation, but for the preservation of others'. He has made the winds his missionaries, the mines almoners, the seas his road to brotherhood, the stream his flag of union, the electricity his voice of fellowship, the light a framer of his neighbour's image, the heat a warmer of his neighbour's hearth, the herb a soother of his neighbour's pain. The sacrificial man is the man that has conquered nature. The vision of righteousness heals my despair.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 157.

REFERENCES.—IV. 2.—C. Bosanquet, Tender Grass for the Lambs, p. 113. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 1020; ibid. vol. xxv. No. 1463.

THE CESSATION OF PROPHECY

'Remember ye the law of Moses My servant, which I commanded unto him in Horeb for all Israel, with the statutes and judgments. Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord.'—MALACHI IV. 4, 5.

THESE are almost the last words of the Old Testament; they come in their place not by accident, but because it is really the last word of the prophecy uttered before the Gospel was declared. Of Malachi himself we know nothing but his name; when he lived we can only guess. After him there arose not any like him. Malachi died and no other took his place. No man arose who came to Israel and said, 'Thus saith the Lord'. They were not left ignorant of the will of God, but they had to learn it, not from a living voice speaking among them, but from the books already written. They were indeed to learn something more some day, but not yet. It was enough for the present if they would keep what they had. 'Remember ye the law of Moses My servant, which I commanded unto him in Horeb for all Israel, with the statutes and judgments:' if they remembered that, all would be well. And they did remember it. The Jews henceforth would stick to their law and to the name of their God, whom before they had always been so ready to forsake. They were persecuted by the heathen that ruled over them, as Daniel foretold: 'They shall fall by the sword, and by flames, by captivity, and by spoil many days;' but in one way they did not fall—they would not fall down and worship the images which the kings of the Gentiles set up: their fall was only 'to try them, and to purge them, and to make them white, even to the times of the end'. Yet all this time they had no Prophet among them. Four hundred years at least went by and no Prophet came. Yet the People did not cease to look for one: they remembered the law of Moses the servant of the Lord, how he had said: 'A Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto thee out of thy brethren, like unto me'; that promise had not been fulfilled yet, and they knew was to be. And there was another Prophet also to come, of whom the latest of the old Prophets speaks: 'Behold, I will send you Elijah the Prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord'. The four hundred years did pass, and Elijah came; not indeed as the Jews seem to have expected, Elijah himself; descending from heaven, whither he had been carried up alive by the chariot of fire: but one in the spirit and power of Elijah, turning the children of Israel to the Lord their God. And then only a few months passed and the other Prophet came; a Prophet like, not only to Elijah, but to Moses; yea greater than Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face, for He knew the Lord even as the Lord knew him. And so the gift of prophecy was restored, while by the very restoration all the old prophecies began to be fulfilled. This found its great perfection and fulfilment in the Person of the Lord Jesus; who was, even in His human nature, filled by God with the Spirit, and called to the work of a Prophet to make God known to men.—W. H. SIMCOX, The Cessation of Prophecy, p. 1.

REFERENCE.—IV. 4, 5.—F. J. A. Hort, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 28.

THE GIFT OF PROPHECY THE SUPREME NEED OF OUR AGE

'Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse.'—MALACHI IV. 5, 6.

WHATEVER spiritual gifts may have been necessary or profitable to the Church in other times, I am sure that the gift of prophecy is the most necessary and profitable now. 'Christ sent me not to baptize,' says the Apostle—others with lower gifts could do that—

'but to preach the Gospel,' and he adds, 'I preached it, not with the enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power'. Men felt the power and acknowledged the teaching; their listening to him was the Apostle's higher credential.

I. Man may well pray for a portion of this power, and for grace to use it in the noblest cause. It is not eloquence, it is not popularity, it is not the power of attracting the crowd. It is a spiritual power which can bow the hearts of a multitude as of one man, swaying them with a charm of strange, mysterious potency; a power which we feel though we cannot describe it. This age is prepared to receive, not the priest but the prophet, not the man who claims to stand between souls and God, but the man who can teach them the truth, and help them in their blindness and waywardness and ignorance, to discover the way of peace and righteousness—for men do feel their ignorance and are thankful for light, and are not indisposed to truth. It is marvellous to me and yet most encouraging to see how few of what the world calls 'gifts' are needed to fill a church and to work wonders in the lives and conduct of a people. A preacher acquires the truest eloquence by daily contact with his flock. Like the Chief Shepherd whom he is trying to follow, 'he knows his sheep and is known of them'. Not only do they know his voice but his life also.

II. The Prophet must be in earnest or men will not receive him as a Prophet; must himself believe his message or he will carry no conviction to his hearers. Is it not because we are so cold and rigid that your hearts are so seldom reached; that we preach and you are not edified; that great opportunities are given and missed; that even in the best cases ears often are tickled rather than lives improved? And yet we have a message, able to stir the most phlegmatic feelings, and to arouse the dullest conscience, if only we know how to deliver it. If our hearts have found the secret, we can speak of present peace and joy in believing; of the kingdom of God standing in righteousness; of the nearness of a Father to us in our dangers, difficulties, and troubles; of the no harm that shall happen to us if we are followers of that which is good; of the love of Christ and the comfort of the Holy Ghost; of the sweetness that can be got from the life that now is if only we go the right way to seek it; of the strength that comes of faith, and the satisfaction that rewards obedience. There are those who can speak of these things with a strange and moving power, and their arguments will rise high above the clouds of doubt and speculation till they seem to bring me almost face to face with God. Such men are in truth the Lord's Prophets. They are sure and trustworthy guides, for they are leading men to God, through Christ, by the way of holiness.—J. FRASER, University Sermons, p. 225.

REFERENCE.—IV. 5, 6.—J. Fraser, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxi. p. 401.

ST. MATTHEW

ST. MATTHEW

REFERENCES.—I.—R. Stier, The Words of the Angels, p. 37.
 I. 1.—Archbishop Alexander, Leading Ideas of the Gospels, p. 1. J. Farquhar, The Schools and Schoolmasters of Christ, p. 15. I. 1-16.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 1. I. 5.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Blessed Sacrament, p. 159. I. 18.—Archbishop Alexander, Verbum Crucis, p. 1. J. Farquhar, The Schools and Schoolmasters of Christ, p. 28. I. 18-25.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 6. R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1904, p. 393.

JESUS THE SAVIOUR

(For Christmas Day)

‘Thou shalt call His name JESUS: for He it is that shall save His people from their sins.’—MATTHEW I. 21.

CHRISTMAS comes to us with both light and shade. There is the glorious light of the Christ, the long-looked-for Messiah, the Morning Star of prophecy, the Dayspring from on high. But the very fact that Jesus comes as Saviour also speaks to us of sin. There was need for Him to come, and that is the shadow athwart the glory of this day. It is true we need not look so much at the shading as at the glorious colours of the picture, ‘the glory as of the only-begotten’. His name is Jesus, Saviour.

Consider two points.—I. What we mean by sin. II. In what sense it can be said that Christ our Lord is a Saviour from sin.

I. What is Sin?—It has a twofold meaning, (1) inherent corruption, and (2) actual transgression.

1. From the full penalty, consequences, and inbeing of sin we are not delivered whilst in the body of our humiliation. But we are saved in anticipation, and all that baptism signifies is secured for us in Christ Jesus. As regards the second meaning, St. John tells us, ‘Sin is the transgression of the law’. Look at it in various aspects.

2. (a) Sin is trespass—breaking bounds. ‘Forgive us our trespasses.’

(b) Sin is shortcoming. Not full-measure—not coming up to standard. The former aspect (1) is doing the things we ought not to have done; the latter (2) leaving undone what we ought to have done.

(c) Sin is iniquity, inequitableness—not plumb—not straight, not equal. Failure of equilibrium, lack of balance implied.

(d) Sin is defilement, uncleanness, disease, leprosy. ‘There is no health in us.’

But dropping these metaphors, we must look upon sin as actual rebellion against God, ‘I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against Me’. ‘All day long have I stretched out My hands to a wicked and rebellious people. Sin is trespass upon God's rights, shortcoming in regard to His standard, iniquity—opposed to His law of equity, defilement against His purity. ‘Against Thee, Thee only have I sinned,’ said David when confessing a sin which was a deep wrong done towards his neighbour. Yet the sin was only against God.

II. How does Christ Save? And Whom?—He saves ‘His people’ from their sins. The people of Israel first—then all the world, ‘To the Jew first,’ etc.

(a) From their sins. Their special sins. The sin of each, the easily besetting (‘well-circumstanced’) sin. Experience and history prove that the Christ Whose coming is to-day celebrated can save the greatest of sinners from their sins—the drunkard from drink, the debauchee from uncleanness, the Sabbath-breaker from robbing God, and the thief from robbing man. He can also save the worldling from his worldliness, the proud from his pride, the unbelieving from his doubts. He saves from the sins themselves, not from the penalty merely.

(b) He saves from the love of sin. Sin is not only to be avoided but to be abhorred. Like Lot's wife, some bewail the idols they are called upon to leave, but such have not realized the meaning of Christ's salvation.

(c) ‘He it is’ who thus saves (R.V.). Not self in any form, not any other, not formal services or rites, although these may have their uses if they are transparencies to reveal the Christ and not thick curtains to hide Him. The personality of the Christ is the central Christmas doctrine, Immanuel, God with us. He is the Rock—the Light, the Life, His salvation the tree of life. As represented by Noel Paton's great picture ‘Lux in Tenebris,’ death itself through Him bursts into light.

(d) The name of the child Jesus works miracles of grace. Illustration: Norfolk Island beautiful in itself, healthy, charming. Made a convict settlement for worst class of criminals, became a hell on earth, and the establishment had to be broken up. Succeeded by another body of men, brought up in a secluded island of their own in the love and fear of God, they made it a paradise.

The name of Jesus, as it is our joy and inspiration in life, will be our solace and strength in the hour of death.

JESUS SAVIOUR

‘And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call His name JESUS: for He shall save His people from their sins.’—MATTHEW I. 21.

I. The Saviour from Sins.—I ask your careful attention to this expressed purpose and intention of Christ. I may call it His regnant and supreme purpose to save His people from their sins. He teaches men that He may save from sin; heals and serves men; asks for their obedience and love; suffers Himself to be put to death on the cross, that He may save from sin.

The greatest thing a man can do in this world is not making a fortune or a reputation, or carrying out some great work of genius at which the world may wonder. It is not even feeding the hungry or clothing the naked, though these may be parts of it. It is to master sin in himself and others.

And as it is the greatest, so also it is the most difficult. It is such a complicated business. Sins of the past reach forward to the present, and those of the present to the future.

II. There is another element in the case, the saddest and strangest of all, which is that people do not want to be saved from their sins. You know that the very last thing that people want to hear about is their sins. It was precisely this difficulty that met our Lord. Men wanted everything else but this, and were willing to take everything else save this from His hands. And it is perfectly clear to any candid and careful reader of the New Testament that it was this very purpose of our Lord, persisted in, that led to His death. We all want to be saved from the disagreeable consequences of sins; but as for the sins themselves we will defend them and excuse them and do anything rather than acknowledge and hate them, and turn from them.

III. And there are people who doubt the possibility of being saved from their sins. There is a refreshing dogmatism about the prophecy, 'He shall save His people'. His own people who follow Him. It is the thing that He can do. He is not called Saviour as a mere courtesy title, but because He saves from the dominion of the lusts of the flesh and of the mind, from the grip and fascination of evil. He is able to save to the uttermost all them that come unto God by Him. It will not be done by our struggles, but by the union of our lives with Him. —C. BROWN, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII. 1907, p. 406.

'He shall save His people from their sins.'—MATTHEW I. 21. The cardinal question is that of sin. The question of immanence or of dualism is secondary. The Trinity, life to come, paradise and hell, may cease to be dogmas and spiritual realities, the form and the letter may vanish away—the question of humanity remains: What is it that saves?—AMIEL.

WHY A YOUNG MAN SHOULD BE A CHRISTIAN

(Because Christ Saves His People from Their Sins)

'Thou shalt call His name JESUS: for He shall save His people from their sins.'—MATTHEW I. 21.

LET us open this sermon with a quotation. 'The cardinal question,' says Amiel, 'is sin.' The question of humanity remains. What is it which saves? How can man be led to be truly man? 'The cardinal question,' I repeat the words, 'is sin,' and the writer who lays down this truth with such solemnity, who was he? He was not a clergyman, and I am not sure that he would have called himself a Christian. Certainly he was not a member of the Christian Church, and did not hold the Christian creed. He was a man of letters and a profound thinker, who corresponded at Geneva to what Green of Balliol was in Oxford. He stood on the bank, and looked upon the stream; he thought at large and was free from all bonds. He had no traditions, he kept no conventions, he lived at equal distance from the rant of shallow unbelief and the cant of unreal religion; and this man, with one of the calmest, most penetrating minds of last century, said, 'The cardinal question is sin'. Contrast this profound statement of Amiel with Renan's light-hearted reply: 'Sin. I believe that I have abolished it.'

Which of the two, both very brilliant and very attractive men, came nearer to fact? Wherever it came from, or whatever it is, there is something called sin, working in our life and damaging our souls; and it is a big, hard, masterful, undeniable fact.

I. Well, over against that fact which we have all discovered, let us put another fact which we may also all verify. There have been a number of religious teachers of the first order in the world who not only have had multitudes of disciples, but have founded schools. Confucius, for instance, whose influence for good in China is felt to this day; Buddha, who set so fine an example of sacrifice; Mohammed, who has raised savage tribes several degrees in civilization; and Socrates, who taught men the eternal glory of the mind. But only one Teacher faced the fact of sin, and dealt with it in a thorough-going fashion. Jesus had many tasks. He proposed to teach men about His Father, to show them their duty in the world, to lift them above the bondage of the senses, and to give them the hope of immortality. But He also proposed to deliver them from their sins, and He set himself, by His life and death, by His word and Spirit, to save men from their worst and most degrading enemy.

II. You may place yourself with confidence in our Master's hands for two reasons. 1. The first is that He is too wise a Physician to use the old-fashioned treatment, which was to expel the evil by violent medicines. Before Christ began, if I may so say, to practise in this sad hospital of humanity, the only way of curing a man was to forbid and to threaten. No doubt there is a function for such means. It is well that a man should be reminded of the consequences of sin; that, whatsoever he soweth, that shall he also reap; that, if he ruins his constitution in his youth, he will have a bad time in his manhood. It is well also to have the commandments written on the memory and on the conscience, to have them before one's eyes, and to use them as a light for the path. But forbidding has not prevented men sinning, and threatening has not delivered them from their sins. Moses is the great practitioner in this system, and we have cause to be grateful to him, but no one has ever yet confounded a lawgiver and a Saviour.

2. This is the second reason why you may trust Jesus as your Saviour, because He uses the one perfect treatment, which is not to forbid anything, but to command good things, not to threaten any one with punishment, but to promise to every one blessing. Consider this difference between Moses and Christ. Christ did not say to men: 'You must not kill'; 'you must not steal'; 'you must not lie'; 'you must not live uncleanly'. One may say roundly, He never forbade His disciples to do anything. He took the Ten Commandments and re-wrote them, and handed them back. This is how they read when they come from Jesus' hands, 'Love God and love your neighbour'. But is there nothing which I am forbidden to do against God? Nothing. Do anything you please towards God, provided first you love Him. Is there nothing against my neighbour forbidden? Nothing. Do anything you please to your neighbour if first you love him. Christ gave His commandments, and they are contained in the Sermon on the Mount; but they are not called commandments, they are called beatitudes. He undertook to save men from being sinners by making them in a true and manly sense saints; by possessing them with good thoughts, pure feelings, kindly intentions, high endeavours. He proposed to keep them so busy with goodness that they would have neither time nor tendency to sin; to keep them in so high a state of health that, though like other men they were subject to infection, the microbes settling upon them could find no home. This is the positive system of treatment, and this is the way in which Jesus conducts His spiritual practice, and does His saving work.—JOHN WATSON, Respectable Sins, p. 163.

REFERENCES.—I. 21.—J. Munro Gibson, A Strong City, p. 103. W. J. Butler, Sermons for Working Men, The Oxford Sermon Library, vol. ii. p. 26. George Macdonald, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 385. Lyman Abbott, ibid. vol. lvi. 1899, p. 186. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 290. J. Farquhar, The Schools and Schoolmasters of Christ, p. 2. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew i.-viii. p. 12. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1434.

AHAZ'S REJECTION OF GOD'S MERCIES, AND WHAT IT PICTURES TO US

'All this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying,' etc.—MATTHEW I. 22, 23.

I. IN His immense pity, the God of love not only promised His people this wonderful sign of Christ's coming in the flesh, which they were to look on to in faith, but He confirmed it also, as to other times, by something which was shortly to happen before their eyes. In the course of ten years, a shorter time than would be required for a young child to grow up so as to know right from wrong, 'to refuse the evil and choose the good,' the land which Ahaz abhorred, which he was so grievously wronging and ill-using, as if he could not do it too much harm, that land should be forsaken of both her kings. And so indeed it came to pass, for the King of Syria and the King of Israel both of them fell by the sword, and the land had rest.

II. Great was this indulgence and merciful care of God for His people at this time; and, like all His tender mercies, it was to be taken by them and by us as a pledge and sample of infinitely more to come, even of all that is meant by the blessed name Emmanuel. That name means, not only that He is present with us and in us as our Preserver and Watcher, to keep us in the life and being in which He at first created us. He is now 'God in us,' because He is really Incarnate, very man, man indeed; perfect God and perfect man. He became our Second Adam, the Fountain of life and grace to all who are grafted into Him. He would have a soul and body like ours that He might fulfil His love by dying for us, dying the death which we had deserved. Excepting only that there was not in Him the least spot or taint, or slightest beginning of sin, He was made Himself like unto us in all things, all the infirmities of the body, all the anxieties and feelings of the soul.

And so He became our Intercessor, offering up our prayers and other unworthy services, and pleading for us continually, in such a feeling of our infirmities as none but He can have. For as God He knoweth them all, and as man He is touched with all.—J. KEBLE, The Contemporary Pulpit (2nd Series), vol. iv. 1890, p. 363.

'Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the Prophet, saying, Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son.'—MATTHEW I. 22, 23.

'CHRISTMAS DAY,' says Alexander Smith in Dream-thorp, 'holds time together. Isaiah, standing on the peaks of prophecy, looked across ruined empires and the desolation of many centuries, and saw on the horizon the new star arise, and was glad.'

REFERENCES.—I. 22, 23.—H. P. Liddon, Christmastide in St. Paul's, p. 89; see also Expository Sermons on the New Testament, p. 1. W. C. E. Newbolt, Church Times, vol. xxxiii. 1895, p. 20.

THE INTERPRETER

'Which being interpreted is,'—MATTHEW I. 23.

I. WE need the interpreter. We shall always need him. The great reader will always have his day, come and go who may. We want men who can turn foreign words, difficult languages, into our mother tongue; then how simple they are and how beautiful, and that which was a difficulty before becomes a gate opening upon a wide liberty. We need a man who can interpret to us the meaning of confused and confusing and bewildering events; some man with a key from heaven, some man with Divine insight, the vision that sees the poetry and the reality of things, and a man with a clear, simple, strong, penetrating voice who will tell us that all this confusion will one day be shaped into order, and all this uproar will fall into the cadences of a celestial and endless music.

II. In life there is a great place for the interpreter; in all life there is a sanctuary in which such a man can exercise his ghostly ministry. This house called Nature needs an interpreter. The grass is more than grass, herbage is more than herbage; it is beauty, it is fruit, it has a mission to man and beast, and nature needs a man who can understand her mutable appearances, her ever-changing voices, her silent but progressive and inevitable processions, so that she never halts long at one place, but is continually moving on to the old age of completion and the youth of a new beginning. We want some men who can read Nature to us religiously, who can find tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, sermons in stones, good in everything—a wondrous parable interwrought with all that is visible and mutable and measurable.

III. The interpreter is the sent of God. Interpretation is not a universal gift. Nearly every man can go to the dictionary for the meaning of words, but the dictionary is always poorest when we want it most. The dictionary cannot explain any word right into the heart. It can give you equivalent words, or words that grade into one another, or words that help one another to some higher definition than themselves; but interpretation is a Divine gift: it is genius, it is a Divine trust. Few men can read. All men within the compass of practical civilization can read words, but that is not reading in the true and deep sense. We must read the soul out of the words, and read the soul into our souls, and catch the higher meanings and be struck dumb with rapture and with ecstasy.

IV. When the interpreter abuses his gift he loses it. That is the law of God, that is the law of righteousness. When does the interpreter abuse his gift? When he becomes offensive in his interpretations, when he ceases to be philosophical and becomes fantastical, and wants to find meanings where there are none, and turn that which is inanimate into that which is only galvanically vital; then the man has begun to fritter away his gift, and God will soon see that he loses it altogether. When does the interpreter abuse his gift? When he turns it to self-seeking purposes, when he would make a livelihood by it, when he would keep the secret of God to himself and sell it to some Simon Magus; then God will see that His gift is soon lost, and lost for ever.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. I. p. 40.

GOD WITH US

'They shall call His name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us.'—MATTHEW I. 23.

THIS glorious statement is made on the basis of a glorious prophecy which Isaiah uttered at an important era in Jewish history (Is. vii. 14). But this glorious prophecy had a far more important and magnificent fulfilment in relation to the Incarnation.

The name of Jesus was exceedingly wonderful—'Emmanuel'. As St. Matthew uses it, it means a double nature—that of God and that of Man.

I. Jesus is God with us in Human Form.—This is a mystery which no created mind can explain; yet it is no myth soever: it is a fact as sublime as it is mysterious. 'Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: He was manifested in the flesh.' And there was absolute necessity for this. Man is 'a religious animal,' and hence naturally craves for a God. In Emmanuel, however, there is all that man yearns for (Exod. xxxiii. 18; John xiv. 8, 9). Thus the infinite Jehovah has subjected Himself to finite laws for this essential purpose; and he who believingly looks at Jesus as 'the brightness of His glory, and the express image of His person,' will feel that he is put in possession of all that his heart can possibly desire. 'This is life eternal, to know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, Whom Thou hast sent.'

II. Jesus is God with us in Divine Sympathy.—And sympathy is that which man needs next to God Himself. This also is to be found in Jesus; indeed, this was one prime reason why He became Incarnate (Heb. ii. 16-18). His path in life was accordingly made as rough as ours; His foes were as many as ours; His temptations were as fierce as ours; and for three-and-thirty years His cup of sorrow was as full and bitter as ours. All this became Him (Heb. ii. 10-13). Wherefore He showed His Divine sympathy with all manner of human suffering; and in all instances He demonstrated that He was truly 'Emmanuel, God with us'.

III. Jesus is God with us in Redeeming Love.—All men are sinners, and no man can redeem his own soul. God must provide Himself a lamb for a burnt-offering; and He did this by sending Jesus, and Jesus was willing to do His Father's will. What led the Divine Father and the Divine Son to unite in this greatest of all great works? Love—love as amazing as it was undeserved!

IV. Jesus will be God with us in Heavenly Glory.—His own words, spoken to His disciples during the last days of the Incarnation, overflow with consolation and hope: 'In My Father's house are many mansions'. And then there are those other golden words which He spoke in prayer to His Father: 'Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am; that they may behold My glory, which Thou hast given Me: for Thou lovedst Me before the foundation of the world'. Whatever He is in person, and whatever in bliss, His redeemed will share with Him.

REFERENCES.—I. 23.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 57. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 12. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 15. J. F. Kitto, Religion in Common Life, p. 9. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1270. I. 24.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. viii. p. 285.

JESUS AND JOSHUA

'And he called His name Jesus.'—MATTHEW I. 25.

He called His name Jesus—Joshua—the Lord our Saviour. Two men above all others in old time bore the name, and bearing it were permitted by God to present some traits of the Saviour to the world. One appears at the beginning and the other at the close of the Divine history of the earthly Canaan. We first read of Joshua, the son of Nun, the great captain; and then of Joshua, the son of Josedeck, the great high priest.

I. 'And Moses called Oshea, the son of Nun, Jehoshua.' Such are the pregnant words with which the sacred historian closes the first notice of the future leader of Israel—the Jesus of the Exodus. Faithful among the faithless, Joshua saw the terrible sons of Anak in the promised land without dismay; and when the people wept he said, Fear them not, the Lord is with us. In the strength of that faith he led their sons across Jordan. A noble repose closed a course of valiant action. The land rested from war; and the people said unto Joshua, The Lord our God will we serve, and His voice will we obey. The great captain won peace by conflict, and confirmed faith by deeds of might.

And is not all this an image of the work of Jesus, the Captain of our Salvation? He too is leading a great host, in which we all have been solemnly enrolled, to a heavenly country. Giant passions and ancient prejudices, foes without and weaknesses within, threaten our progress; but in all our trouble and terror, when we approach a task which we have no adequate forces to fulfil, when we face an enemy by whom we have been foiled before, He still says, Fear not: the Lord is with you. He has seen the land towards which we are struggling. In token that we should not shrink before our adversary or faint in the hour of battle, His name was called Jesus—the Lord our Saviour.

II. This is one picture: Jesus the great Captain. But there is another: Jesus the great High Priest. I lifted up mine eyes again, and looked . . . and, behold, the angel showed me Joshua the High Priest standing before the angel of the Lord, and Satan standing at his right hand to resist him. But this new Joshua, the Jesus of the Return, was no champion of a youthful nation marshalled for active strife. He was the representative and mediator of a nation burdened with long guilt and suffering.

This is the second picture: and so we also have Jesus, as a great High Priest at the right hand of God, ever ready to make intercession. At the outset of life we think, perhaps, that we need guidance only and mercy. With us as with the Jewish nation the fashion of our contest changes with advancing years. As we look backward we see the gathered sins of the past rising like a mountain to overwhelm us. We are alone, desolate, conscious of sin, strangers in our former homes. Alone and yet not alone, for Christ is with us; desolate, but not forsaken; conscious of sin, and yet children of a Redeemer; strangers on earth, and yet heirs of a glorious kingdom. For in token that we should not sink beneath the burden of past guilt or despair in the dark valley, His name was called Jesus—the Lord our Saviour.—BISHOP B. F. WESTCOTT, Village Sermons, p. 59.

REFERENCES.—II.—R. Stier, The Words of the Angels, p. 61. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2407.

'Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judæa, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem.'—MATTHEW II. 1.

SEE, on the earlier part of this chapter, Mrs. Browning's striking poem, 'Christmas Gifts'.

Savonarola, after quoting verses 1 and 2 in one of his sermons, proceeds to harangue the Florentines as follows: 'Mark the words and observe the mysteries. Behold then that He by whom all things were made is this day born upon earth. Behold He that is above all things begins by having a native land; He begins as the compatriot of men, the companion of men, the brother of men, and the son of man! Behold the wise men; behold the Chaldeans; behold those who were not born among Christians; behold those that were not baptized; behold those who were not instructed in the law of the Gospel; behold those that did not receive the numerous sacraments of the Church; behold those who heard not the voice of preachers. Behold the wise men from the East, from the midst of a perverse and evil nation, from distant and remote regions, shrinking from no expense, from no weariness, from no danger. They came. And when was it they came? When Christ was a babe, when He lay upon straw, when He showed nought but weakness, when He had as yet done no miracles.' And so on. Professor Villari adds that 'this description of the wise men coming from distant lands and through many perils to seek the infant Jesus, while Christians remain indifferent to Christ the Man, even when He has risen to the splendour of His glory, and opens His arms invitingly to them, was undoubtedly one of the appeals that acted most magically upon the people.'

THE STAR OF THE WISE MEN

(Epiphany)

'Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judæa in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, saying, Where is He that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen His star in the east, and are come to worship Him.'—MATTHEW II. 1, 2.

THE lessons which we may learn from these wise men:—

I. The Way in which They were Brought to Seek for Christ.—This is pointed out in the Collect, 'O God, Who by the leading of a star didst manifest Thy only begotten Son to the Gentiles'. It was through their own common and proper occupation of watching and studying the stars that God led them in the right way to behold His Son. This is an example of the way in which He always works. We are very apt to think that any occupation rather than our own is the best and easiest for serving God. This is the greatest delusion. The one great truth which we must hold fast at starting and never let go is that God is really Himself our leader and our teacher wherever we are, and whatever we may be doing.

II. Consider the Gifts which the Wise Men Brought.—They were offerings of love and worship, signs of the devotion within their hearts rather than presents intended for His use: for, whatever may be thought of gold, one sees not what He could do with frankincense and myrrh. And, secondly, they were just the things, the most precious things, found in their own country. Here surely is a lesson to ourselves of the kind of sacrifices with which God is well pleased.

III. These Wise Men are to us an Example of Faith.—They are presented to us as such in the Collect, which says, 'we, who know Thee now by faith'. It needed much faith first to care for a King of the Jews at all, then to leave their own home and take a long journey to see Him, and then more than all not to be staggered when they found Him: through faith they were not dazzled by the earthly greatness of Herod or withheld from worship by the low estate of Him Whom they found lying in the manger.

It is the same when God would fain lead us to His Son and to Himself. We must learn to love goodness for its own sake, and to recognize it even when it is naked and seemingly weak, and to trust in its undying strength. Every day almost may show us how easily without faith we may come to reject that which has the mark of God upon it, and is strong with His everlasting strength, because we deceive ourselves with outward appearances.

IV. But the Collect points out a higher goal which may be reached in this way, and in no other: 'Mercifully grant that we which know Thee now by faith may after this life have the fruition, that is, the enjoyment, of Thy glorious Godhead'. The wise men sought and found the King of the Jews because they believed in a King of heaven.—F. J. A. HORT, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 48.

THE WISE MEN FROM THE EAST

'Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judæa,' etc.—MATTHEW II. 1, 2.

THE visit of the wise men furnishes us with the following topics for consideration:—

I. An Insight into the Method of Divine Revelation.—'We, being in the East, have seen His star.'

God adapts His method to the mental capacity and ordinary circumstances of men. To the Jews prophecies were given. To shepherds, accustomed to stories about angelic visitors, an angel was sent. To astrologers a meteor appeared.

II. A Recognition of Christ's Royal Dignity.—'Where is He that is born King of the Jews?'

'We are come to worship Him;' i.e. pay Him homage.

III. An Indication of the Extent of Christ's Kingdom.—In His infancy He received the adoration of Gentiles (Is. lx. 3-6).

IV. The Reward of Persevering Faith.—A long weary journey was repaid with the sight of Christ.—F. J. AUSTIN, Seeds and Saplings, p. 12.

REFERENCES.—II. 1.—S. A. Tipple, The Admiring Guest, p. 60. H. J. Wilnot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 22. II. 1, 2.—H. P. Liddon, Christmastide in St. Paul's, p. 348. F. C. Blyth, Plain Preachings for a Year, vol. i. p. 103. H. C. Beeching, Sermons for the People (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 1. H. Scott Holland, Church Times, vol. li. 1904, p. 80; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 24. H. Hensley Henson, ibid. vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 33. Trench, The Star of the Wise Men (commentary on the second chapter of Matthew). F. W. Robertson, Sermons (2nd Series), No. 2. Cecil's Sermons, p. 123. Cox, Expository Essays, p. 264. Parker, Inner Life of Christ, vol. i. p. 30. Christian World Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 401; vol. iii. p. 36; vol. iv. p. 97; vol. xviii. p. 392; vol. xxvi. p. 159. Homiletic Quarterly, vol. i. pp. 52, 381, 557. Kitto's Daily Bible Illustrations, vol. vii. pp. 91, 110, 118, 133. Fairbairn, Expositor (1st Series), vol. vii. p. 161, and Gibson, Expositor (2nd Series), vol. iii. p. 116. Biblical Things not Generally Known, pars. 2, 354, 798. Hall's Contemplations. Matheson, Moments on the Mount, p. 125. A. Whyte, Contemporary Pulpit, vol. i. p. 339, and vol. vi. p. 28. II. 1-3.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 33. P. H. Hall, The Brotherhood of Man, p. 52. II. 1-4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2325. II. 1, 2, 11.—H. C. Beeching, Faith, p. 12. II. 1, 2, 9, 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxix. No. 1698. II. 1-12.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 19.

THE WITNESS OF THE CHILDREN

(Holy Innocents' Day)

'Where is He that is born King of the Jews?'—MATTHEW II. 2.

I. The Lambs Sacrificed for the Sake of the Lamb of God.—The Holy Innocents were martyrs in deed but not in will, spotless lambs who were fit to be folded in the fold of God, spotless and innocent flowers fit to be planted in the gardens of Paradise.

The festival of the Holy Innocents was observed by the Church from very early times, though at first it would seem to have been joined to the Feast of the Nativity, which was also combined with the Epiphany.

II. The Story of the Holy Innocents.—As the gallows which Haman had erected for Mordecai became his own place of execution, so the sword which Herod sent forth against the Innocents slew his own child and touched not the Child Jesus. These little ones of Bethlehem died as silent witnesses to Him Who, like them, was born in Bethlehem. Thus early in His earthly life Jesus called little children unto Him, as though He said already, 'Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God'. He had come to set up the kingdom of God, and the very first to be called to it were the children; the Holy Innocents were the first flowers transplanted to the Paradise which the Lord had come to open to all believers.

III. Christ's Dwelling-place.—'Where is He that is born King of the Jews?' In the hearts of little children. In the pure shrine of an innocent child's soul.—H. J. WILMOT-BUXTON, Notes of Sermons for the Year, pp. 47-50, part i.

WORSHIPPING CHRIST

(For Christmas)

'We . . . are come to worship Him.'—MATTHEW II. 2.

JESUS CHRIST Himself did not often use the word worship, but He did once use it with striking and continual effect. 'The Father seeketh such to worship Him.' What is the meaning of 'such' in that relation? It indicates people who worship God in spirit and in truth, people whose hearts are altars, whose lives are tabernacles which the Lord hath chosen as His abiding places. They offer acceptable worship, whatever it be, how poor soever, who really mean it.

I. We know what it is to worship. Let us for the moment drop the word worship, regarding it as having become too narrowly a church word that has upon it a kind of religious symbol. The spirit of worship is in us all. It may not be directed to the right end, but the spirit or instinct of worship is in us, though, mayhap, we may be atheists. Instead of saying 'worship' let us say homage.

We advance a step, and come to the idea of deliverance, redemption, answered expectancy. We live in expectation. There are those who would not use the word prayerful hope, and yet they are living in expectation of a coming Christmas, they have a Messiah of their own; they say, The right man has not yet come, but he is coming, and he will come; for we have seen his star, and we have heard voices of silence, the sublimest eloquence, the spiritual grandeur of speech. All men live in expectation of their own Christmas. They may cast out the dear Son of God, the Babe of Bethlehem, they may deride Him, but they have a cradle of their own, a Bethlehem Ephrata out of which is to come the delivering soul, the mighty man whose garments are red as with the blood of victory. It is a political messiah or a commercial or some kind of intellectual messiah, it is a great Humanity or a splendid ideal. What talk is that? It is Christian speech, turned from the directly Christian line, yet full unknowingly of Christian meaning. Man must have a Christmas, a born Christ, a Babe, a Root, a Branch, a germ out of which will come the whole kingdom of reconciliation and righteousness and final peace.

II. We find our Christ in Bethlehem. We believe that He will make the whole world right. He claims time in which to carry out His great ministry. He comes in the flesh; He vanishes from the body that He may send the true Paraclete, the abiding Spirit, the true inward Personality—the personality that is a Trinity in itself. He will convict the world of sin, of righteousness and of judgment to come—that other trinity that rules from a throne unseen.

III. We have come to worship the Son of God. Worship is not a mere sentiment; worship is a great practical force. Do not be afraid of the word sentiment; it is a softening, healing, comforting word. Without sentiment much energy would be simply lost. We are indebted to the sentiment of the dew for the richness of the literal flower. Only Christ can make things go right, and He is very slow about it, as we count slowness.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 2.

THE VISIT OF THE MAGI

'We have seen His star in the east, and are come to worship Him.'—MATTHEW II. 2.

TO-DAY we commemorate the visit of the wise men to the infant Jesus. These wise men offered to the Lord Jesus Christ the very best they possibly could; they gave Him the homage of their hearts. They were sincere in worshipping Him, and they also offered gold, and frankincense, and myrrh. I would ask you all to do as the wise men did, and accept Jesus as your own personal Saviour, not merely by assenting to the general religious doctrine that Christ is the Saviour of the world, but by offering yourselves to Him.

I. True Wisdom.—We know next to nothing about these wise men. A good many people think they were kings, and it seems certain they were men of substance. The only thing I would ask you to note is this, that they were wise men, and the way in which they showed their wisdom was in going, at great trouble and expense, and perhaps peril, in order to give the homage of their hearts to Christ. They had the wisest wisdom, the spirit of the Holy Ghost, to guide them by means of the star to where Christ, the new-born King, was to be found. We do not know from what kingdom they came: they might have come from Persia, or some of those ancient cities in the East, or possibly from where Israel was carried away captive. They must have heard something of the coming of the Christ, the Jewish Messiah, of the King of Kings, of the Lord of Lords, Who was to appear in Judæa, for these Eastern countries were not left without warning as to the truth of God. We have the striking prophecy uttered by Balaam, and there were other prophecies that had been uttered, not only in the Jewish language, but in the Chaldean, one of the common languages of the East.

II. Little Knowledge.—The wise men had very little to help them, but they made the best use of what they had. When the extraordinary star appeared, which was always connected with the coming of a new king, they felt confident that the time had come, and they set forth upon that difficult and dangerous journey in order to go and worship Christ. They had no gospel, and in this respect they put us to shame. Here we are, with our complete Bible, and Church services and meetings, and yet some of us have not even yet given our hearts to Christ. Jesus is not very far from us; we have not a long journey to take; we have no difficulties to contend with; we have nothing to do but to go to Jesus, and we know He invites us again and again: think of His loving words, 'Come unto Me . . . and I will give you rest,' and yet we have closed the door against Him.

III. Much Faith.—These wise men triumphed over the difficulties which stood in their way. They had so little to guide them from the world's point of view. They went in speculation, as it were; they might have been disappointed, and have had all their trouble in vain; but they were not to be deterred by any consideration of that kind. When they got to Jerusalem there came a very great difficulty and a disappointment. They were told there was no new king there, they were told that Herod was king; and, added to this very great disappointment, their guiding star had disappeared. We do not read that in Jerusalem the star was shining over any particular portion of the city. They might have considered that they had made a mistake, and have turned back. But no, they were thoroughly in earnest. We want to be in earnest; we want not only to think of these things in church, but to do them day by day, and labour in all earnestness. If you will put Christ in the forefront of your life He will give you help. Even when the wise men saw the star again that did not finish their disappointment. The star went on to Bethlehem, and took them to an inn. But there was no Christ in the inn. And at length the star stood over a very humble building—a mere shed, a stable. Then surely they might have given up the search altogether, but faith enabled them to triumph over every difficulty. When they got inside they did not even see a costly fur on which the infant Christ lay; there was only straw, and there were oxen lying close behind, and there was a manger and in it lay the new-born King.

IV. Whole-hearted Adoration.—At once these men fell down before Him, and they laid at His feet not only their hearts, but also the most expensive things they had brought with them. The best things they gave were their hearts.

'We are come to worship Him.'—MATTHEW II. 2.

THESE men, for their own part, came—I beg you very earnestly again to note this—not to see, nor talk—but to do reverence. They are neither curious nor talkative, but submissive.—RUSKIN, Fors Clavigera, XII.

FOLLOW you the star that lights a desert pathway, yours or mine,
Forward, till you see the highest Human Nature is Divine.—TENNYSON.

HUMAN learning well improved makes us capable of Divine. God would never have bestowed any gift that should lead us away from Himself.—BISHOP HALL.

'We have seen His star in the east.'—MATTHEW II. 2.

CLAUDIUS BUCHANAN, as Dr. Eugene Stock tells us, took this text for his great missionary sermon at Bristol on 26 February, 1809, which, said a paper of the day 'kept the minds of a large auditory in a state of most lively sensation for an hour and twenty-five minutes'. He said: 'While we are disputing here whether the faith of Christ can save the heathen, the Gospel hath gone forth for the healing of the nations.

A congregation of Hindus will assemble on the morning of the Sabbath under the shade of a banyan-tree, not one of whom, perhaps, ever heard of Great Britain by name. There the Holy Bible is opened, the word of Christ is preached with eloquence and zeal; the voice of prayer and praise is lifted up; and He who hath promised His presence when two or three are gathered together in His name, is there in the midst of them to bless them, according to His word. Those scenes I myself have witnessed, and it is in this sense in particular I can say, "We have seen His star in the East".

In his Postilla, Melancthon quotes the opinion of Chrysostom that the star was an angel, and adds that this view does not displease him, although it might have been a real star which an angel guided or led. There may have been 'both an angel and a star'.

REFERENCES.—II. 2.—A. G. Brown, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 40. Lyman Abbott, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 392. H. Scott Holland, ibid. vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 33. A. H. Moncur Sime, ibid. vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 381. J. A. Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 21. B. Wilberforce, The Hope that is in Me, p. 52. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. vi. p. 15. Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 403. G. Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 76. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 967.

'In Bethlehem of Judæa.'—MATTHEW II. 5, 6.

JESUS entered into the world with all the circumstances of poverty. He had a star to illustrate His birth: but a stable for His bedchamber and a manger for His cradle. The angels sang hymns when He was born; but He was cold, and cried, uneasy and unprovided.—JEREMY TAYLOR.

'They departed; and, lo, the star went before them.'—MATTHEW II. 9.

I SEE no man either of the city or the court to accompany them. Whether 'distrust or fear hindered them, I inquire not; but, of so many thousand Jews, no one stirs his foot to see that King of theirs which strangers came so far to visit. Yet were not these resolute sages discouraged with this solitariness and small respect, nor drawn to repent of their journey, as thinking, 'What, do we come so far to honour a King whom no man will acknowledge? What mean we to travel so many hundred miles to see that which the inhabitants will not look out to behold?'—but cheerfully renew their journey. And now, behold God encourages their holy forwardness from heaven, by sending them their first guide; as if He had said, 'What need ye care for the neglect of men, when ye see heaven honours the King whom ye seek?'—BISHOP HALL.

REFERENCES.—II. 9.—A. Young, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lii. 1897, p. 302. G. Matheson, Moments on the Mount, pp. 3 and 125. J. C. Jones, Studies in St. Matthew, p. 28. Parker, Hidden Springs, p. 306. Liddon, Sermons Selected from the Penny Pulpit, vol. i. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to Tracts for the Times, vol. ii. p. 202; vol. vi. p. 15. Parker, Inner Life of Christ, vol. i. pp. 29, 40, 50. F. W. Robertson, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 17. J. Vaughan, Sermons to Children

(3rd Series), p. 98. H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 1634. Bishop Barry, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xvii. p. 17. Bishop Boyd Carpenter, ibid. vol. iii. p. 36.

STARS THAT LEAD TO CHRIST

(For Epiphany)

'When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy.'—MATTHEW II. 10.

THE festival of the Epiphany has a great deal of teaching to bring to us, and this account of the visit of the wise men to Bethlehem is one of the incidents of which it puts us in mind. They saw His star in the East. A great many theories have been advanced to account for the appearance of this star, but what God tells us in the Bible is all that we need to know.

I. The Leading of the Star.—The star led them to Jesus Christ, and so, too, may we be led to Him in some such way. Astronomy is a very fascinating study in itself, and it can hardly fail to make us realize something of the vastness of God, the Maker of heaven and earth and of all things visible and invisible. The distances from our earth to some of these stars are known to be inconceivably great. The light from the nearest star outside the system of our own sun and the planets is known to take some four years to reach our earth, and light can travel a distance of eight times round the world in a second. Surely facts like these may do something to lead us to know God's infinite greatness and our own insignificance, humbly to cry to Him for mercy and for grace, and to remember that to please Him is really the only aim in life that is worth our attention.

II. Stars as Types.—The star was the sign that led the wise men to seek Jesus, and we may think too of the stars as types of some of those lights, as it were, in the darkness that may guide us if we will to His feet. Christian friendship shining like a beacon light in the darkness is often the star that has led to Christ. We may imagine how the wise men on their journey were a comfort one to another. They may not have said much about the object of their journey, but each one wanted to find Christ, each one had gifts to offer to Him, and so they cheered each other on their way. So, too, in our own life there are many of us who can think of some to whose quiet influence we owe very much. A quiet, steady, gentle light shone from them as if from a star that told of powers hidden away that were the strength and force of their character. They may not have said much to us; their lives were to us an open Bible that told us of God's laws. They may not have been at first sight the most attractive people, but soon we learned that the meek and quiet spirit that adorned them was far more beautiful than anything else. They were those whom we really loved and trusted. Let us then be careful in choosing which spirit is to guide us, who is to be our most intimate friend. While we must be careful not to wound the feelings of the sensitive, we must be careful that our friendships are a means to help us and our friends nearer to our Lord Jesus Christ. Let us take care also that our own star is shining, that by God's grace our lamps are alight to show others the way to God.

III. Other Stars that Lead to Christ.—And the circumstances of life may be stars that lead us to the Lord Jesus Christ. The wise men left their country and their homes, all that was dear to them. There were dangers and hardships on the road for them to bear, but when they saw the star they rejoiced with an exceeding great joy. There were many disappointments for them. When they found Christ Himself all was so different from what they expected. They found the child cradled in a manger stall, but they had faith enough to see God's plans through it all. They worshipped Christ and they offered Him their gold, incense, and myrrh, as to their King and their God, and to Him Who would conquer by the sufferings of the Cross. And others besides the wise men have been led by hardship and disappointment to find joy and peace in Christ. At the beginning of a new year we may perhaps feel how uncertain is the future that lies before us. Let us try to welcome whatever God may see fit to send. Hardship and disappointment are perhaps more likely to be the stars that lead to Christ than anything else. Let us look for the stars that will lead us to Christ, let us follow whither they lead. We give the incense of prayer, the gold of loyal obedience, and the myrrh of thanksgiving. There is still in our Saviour Christ a welcome now and for ever for all who truly turn to Him.

THE GUIDING STAR

(Epiphany)

'When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy.'—MATTHEW II. 10.

ST. AUGUSTINE tells us in one of his sermons the reason for observing Epiphany as a separate feast. 'On this day we celebrate the mystery of God's manifesting Himself by His miracles in human nature; either because on this day the star in heaven gave notice of His birth; or because He turned water into wine at the marriage feast at Cana in Galilee; or because He consecrated water for the reparation of mankind by His baptism in the River Jordan; or because with five loaves He fed five thousand men. For each of these contains the mysteries and joys of our salvation.' The reverence for Epiphany grew and increased in the Church as time went on; on the vigil it was the custom for sermons to be preached, the Holy Eucharist was celebrated, and slaves had a holiday. The feast itself was known as the Day of Lights, and on it was consecrated the water to be used in baptism during the year.

I. Our Guiding Stars—the Church.

In early times, before the mariner's compass was discovered, sailors steered their course by the stars. We all have our Epiphany stars if we would but see this, and they all guide us to our Lord, teaching us how to steer our course over the waves of this troublesome world. First among them, I place the Church. It was the custom in the early days to mark the Feast of Epiphany or day of lights, with many glowing lamps and tapers in church. It is still the custom in some churches to have a lamp burning perpetually before the altar, and in some Sanctuaries the lamp has not been extinguished for hundreds of years. These things are an allegory, the light of the Church never goes out; the Guiding Star of Epiphany never sets, but stands over against the place where the Holy Child is.

II. Our Guiding Stars—the Conscience.

God not only gives us a guiding light in His Church, but He places a light within us. 'The Lord shall light my candle.' As long as we follow the light, walk in the light as children of the light, all is well. When the light shines through the church windows we know that God's service is taking place inside. When no light appears, the church is cold and forsaken. We are only serving God and keeping spiritually alive as long as the light of conscience shines like a star, and guides us to Jesus. In a certain old castle of former days, a beacon fire was always kindled at night, and when men saw its light shining forth, they knew that all was well with the castle. One night no beacon fire shone from the tower, and all men knew that ruin and disaster had fallen on the garrison.

III. Our Guiding Stars—the Bible.

In the darkness of the night ships at sea signal by means of lights. We, in this world, are all 'as ships that pass in the night,' our course is often a dark and dangerous one, and we need a guiding light to point us to the haven where we would be, and that home where Jesus awaits our coming. The Bible gives us such a guide. 'Thy Word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path.' If we steer by this light, we are safe. So many people lose their way in the fogs and darkness of men's devising, because they will not look for the light of God's Word.—H. J. WILMOT-BUXTON, Notes of Sermons for the Year, pp. 56-61.

REFERENCES.—II. 10.—W. J. Butler, Sermons for Working Men, The Oxford Sermon Library, vol. ii. p. 62. II. 11.—G. H. Morrison, The Unlighted Luster, p. 257. Morgan Dix, Sermons Doctrinal and Practical, p. 54. W. J. Dawson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 403. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. i. p. 58. G. W. Herbert, Notes on Sermons, p. 29. G. Tugwell, Church Times, vol. xliii. 1900, p. 105. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. i. p. 89. W. Howell-Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 31. R. C. Trench, The Star of the Wise Men, etc. Dr. Arnold, Sermons (3rd Series), No. xvii. F. W. Robertson (2nd Series), Sermon 2. Liddon, Three Hundred Outlines on New Testament, p. 3. Homiletic Quarterly, vol. i. pp. 381, 511, 537. 'Intellect, Power, Wealth, etc., Offering Itself to Christ,' Homiletic Quarterly, vol. i. p. 52. Hall, Contemplations, vol. iii. Dr. Whyte, Contemporary Pulpit, vol. i. p. 339. Bishop of Ripon, 'The Lesson of the Epiphany,' Christian World Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 36. Ibid. p. 97. Bishop Barry, Epiphany Offerings, vol. xvii. p. 17. Parker, The Inner Life of Christ, vol. i. pp. 30, 40, and see his Homiletic Analysis. Pulpit Analyst, vol. i. p. 30; vol. iii. p. 609. Cox, Expository Essays and Discourses, p. 264. E. White, 'Gospel of the Infancy,' etc., Mystery of Growth, etc., p. 66. Kitto, Daily Bible Illustrations, vol. vii. pp. 110 and 118. Biblical Things, etc., paragraphs 2, 354, and 798. R. C. Trench, Poet's Bible, p. 49. II. 13.—C. Silvester Horne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 74. II. 13-15.—A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part i. p. 132. II. 13-23.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 28. II. 14, 15.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1675. II. 15.—J. B. Brown, The Soul's Exodus and Pilgrimage, p. 28. G. Trevor, Types and the Antitype, p. 155.

INNOCENT'S DAY

'Then Herod, when he saw that he was mocked of the wise men, was exceeding wroth.'—MATTHEW II. 16.

THE Festival of the Innocents dates as far back as the third century. Its celebration has been universally observed from the first. Dying so early, these little ones are called Innocentes, or Innocui—harmless babes, incapable not only of doing the least wrong to any person, but of defending themselves from their cruel persecutors. They were slain for Christ's sake; hence we keep this holy day.

I. The Disappointment Experienced by Herod.—Herod, surnamed the Great, was reigning as king over Judæa when Christ was born in Bethlehem; but he had often to struggle hard, both by craft and sword, to keep his throne; so that when he heard of the Magi from the Orient inquiring in Jerusalem for the new King of the Jews, the sceptre seemed already to have fallen from his aged hands. Warned of God in a dream, the Magi went back to their own country without revisiting Jerusalem; and when Herod heard they had done so, his wrath burned like fire, and he felt more determined and vengeful than ever.

II. The Merciless Edict Issued by Herod.—As he could not dispose of the young King as he intended, the plan of a general massacre suggested itself to him. So he issued his fiat. Strange that he could find anyone to execute it, for it was a barbarous piece of work; but his soldiers were Romans, who hated the Jews. Inhuman monsters these men! but he was the greatest of them all who was their chief. So all the centuries have regarded him. He was verily the incarnation of cruelty, and blood was his delight! But he was foiled a second time. Jesus was then in Egypt, safe and happy, and they who would touch the Lord's Anointed must first strike through the Lord's omnipotence!

III. The Bitter Sorrow Caused by Herod.—This is forcibly expressed by three touching words—'lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning'—which had original fulfilment when Nebuzar-adan, after destroying Jerusalem, brought all the prisoners to Rama, and there disposed of them for the sword or captivity (Jer. xl. 1); then the lamentation in Rama was so voiceful that it was heard in Bethlehem, where Rachel was buried, the two cities being not far from each other. But the prophecy had its complete fulfilment in connexion with the slaughter of the Innocents; the lamentation, however, in this latter case was not borne from Rama to Bethlehem, but from Bethlehem to Rama.

REFERENCES.—II. 16.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ii. p. 292. A. G. Mortimer,

One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. i. p. 74. II. 16-18.—J. Clifford, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 385.

'Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying, . . . Rachel weeping for her children.'—MATTHEW II. 17, 18.

It is indeed true that peace has its moral perils and temptations for degenerate man, as has every other blessing, without exception, that he can receive from the hand of God. It is, moreover, not less true that, amidst the clash of arms, the noblest form of character may be reared, and the highest acts of duty done; that these great and precious results may be due to war as their cause; and that one high form of sentiment in particular, the love of country, receives a powerful and general stimulus from the bloody strife. But this is as the furious cruelty of Pharaoh made place for the benign virtue of his daughter; as the butchering sentence of Herod raised without doubt many a mother's love into heroic sublimity; as plague, as famine, as fire, as flood, as every curse and every scourge that is wielded by an angry Providence for the chastisement of man, is an appointed instrument for tempering human souls in the seven-times heated furnace of affliction, up to the standard of angelic and archangelic virtue.—W. E. GLADSTONE.

In his Levana and our Ladies of Sorrows, De Quincey describes the eldest of these three as 'Our Lady of Tears. She it is that night and day raves and moans, calling for vanished faces. She stood in Rama, where a voice was heard of lamentation—Rachel weeping for her children, refusing to be comforted. She it was that stood in Bethlehem on the night when Herod's sword swept its nurseries of Innocents, and the little feet were stiffened for ever, which, heard at times as they tottered along floors overhead, woke pulses of love in household hearts that were not unmarked in heaven.'

REFERENCES.—II. 18.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for Saints' Days, p. 47. II. 23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1632. III.—Ibid. vol. xli. No. 2409; vol. xlv. No. 2704.

THE PREACHING OF THE BAPTIST

'In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judæa.'—MATTHEW III. 1.

AND what did he preach? This chapter in St. Matthew's Gospel tells us pretty plainly what was the burden of his message.

I. He Spoke Plainly About Sin.—He taught the absolute necessity of 'repentance' before anyone can be saved; he preached that repentance must be proved by its 'fruits'; he warned men not to rest on outward privileges, or outward union with the Church. This is just the teaching that we all need.

II. He Spoke Plainly About our Lord Jesus Christ.—He taught people that One 'mightier than himself' was coming among them. He was nothing more than a servant: the Coming One was the King. He himself could only 'baptize with water'; the Coming One could 'baptize with the Holy Ghost,' take away sins, and would one day judge the world.

This, again, is the very teaching that human nature requires. We need to be sent direct to Christ. We need to be told the absolute necessity of union with Christ Himself by faith: He is the appointed fountain of mercy, grace, life, and peace; we must each have personal dealings with Him about our souls.

III. He Spoke Plainly About the Holy Ghost.—He preached that there was such a thing as the baptism of the Holy Ghost. He taught that it was the special office of the Lord Jesus to give this baptism to men. This, again, is a teaching which we greatly require. We need to be told that forgiveness of sin is not the only thing necessary to salvation. There is another thing yet, and that is the baptizing of our hearts by the Holy Ghost. There must not only be the work of Christ for us, but the work of the Holy Ghost in us. There must not only be a title to heaven purchased for us by the blood of Christ, but a preparedness for heaven wrought in us by the Spirit of Christ. Let us never rest till we know something by experience of the baptism of the Spirit.

IV. He Spoke Plainly About the Awful Danger of the Impenitent and Unbelieving.—He told his hearers that there was a 'wrath to come'; he preached of an 'unquenchable fire,' in which the 'chaff' would one day be burned. This, again, is a teaching which is deeply important. We need to be straitly warned that it is no light matter whether we repent or not. We are fearfully apt to forget this; we talk of the love and mercy of God, and we do not remember sufficiently His justice and holiness.

V. He Spoke Plainly About the Safety of True Believers.—He taught that there was 'a garner' for all who are Christ's 'wheat,' and that they would be gathered together there in the day of His appearing. This, again, is a teaching which human nature greatly requires. The best of believers need much encouragement: they are yet in the body; they live in a wicked world; they are often tempted by the devil. They ought to be often reminded that Jesus will never leave them nor forsake them: He will guide them safely through this life, and at length give them eternal glory.

REFERENCES.—III. 1.—H. Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 405. G. Jackson, ibid. vol. lxxvii. 1905, p. 171. III. 1, 2.—J. E. C. Welldon, The Spiritual Life, p. 69. J. H. Thom, Spiritual Faith, p. 245. III. 1-3.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 56. III. 1-12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2818. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 37. III. 2.—C. Gore, The Permanent Creed and the Christian Idea of Sin, p. 27; see also The New Theology and the Old Religion, p. 231. H. Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 124. G. A. Chadwick, ibid. vol. liv. 1898, p. 357. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 85. III. 3.—W. Llewelyn Williams, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxvi. 1904, p. 74. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 230. III. 4.—F. C. Blyth, Plain Preaching to Poor People (7th Series), p. 5. III. 5, 6.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (1st Series), p. 44.

‘O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?’—MATTHEW III. 7.

As his raiment was rough, so was his tongue; and if his food was wild honey, his speech was stinging locusts. Thus must the way be made for Christ in every heart. Plausibility is no fit preface to regeneration.—BISHOP HALL.

REFERENCE.—III. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 2704.

‘And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees.’—MATTHEW III. 10.

‘Such as I am,’ said Ruskin in 1875, ‘to my own amazement, I stand—so far as I can discern—alone in conviction, in hope, and in resolution, in the wilderness of this modern world. Bred in luxury, which I perceive to have been unjust to others, and destructive to myself; vacillating, foolish, and miserably failing in all my own conduct in life—and blown about hopelessly by storms of passion—I, a man clothed in soft raiment; I, a reed shaken with the wind; have yet this message to all men again entrusted to me. Behold, the axe is laid to the root of the trees. Whosoever tree bringeth not forth good fruit shall be hewn down and cast into the fire.’

‘I HAVE a great regard,’ said Dr. John Duncan once, ‘for the Humorists, for they are generally men of a tender heart. Both Charles Lamb and Thomas Hood were great men, especially the author of ‘The Song of the Shirt’. He had a good head and a fine heart. That song of his is better than many a sermon I’ve heard. Punch, too, is an acute censor, generally right in his castigations; a censor, but not censorious. When those who should lay the axe to the root of the tree won’t do it, Providence raises up a buffoon, who preaches many a most rememberable sermon.’

REFERENCE.—III. 10.—C. Houghton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 36.

THE FINAL BAPTISM

‘I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but He that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire.’—MATTHEW III. 11.

‘He that cometh after me.’ Christianity has always some further man or truth or vision or poem in reserve. You never hear God’s final word. This is the very secret, as it is also the joy and the security of eternity.

The point of this text is the One coming after: always coming, always come; a great fact and a great prophecy is the Christian idea or the Messianic prediction and forecast. My Lord is always coming: What I say unto one I say unto all, Watch. He came this morning, He came at noonday, He will be here with the evening star, or we may be called out to see Him under other conditions, but the kingdom of God is unseen but ever-coming, invisible but ever-descending; and where the kingdom comes the King is never absent.

I. Now let us illustrate this text upon levels with which we are all familiar. ‘He that cometh after,’ the fuller teacher, richer, riper, gentler, the teacher who we know must come. There is a prophecy in the very soul of man. No man was ever yet contented with the spring as sufficient and final; when he saw the green blade he was right glad in his heart; he said, I have been waiting for this, here is the promise of God realized up to this visible and calculable degree. Will not that green blade satisfy you? No. What want you? The fruit, the full corn in the ear. Are you sure it will come? Certainly! Why so sure? Because the blade has come, and God never sends the beginning without also sending the end, He never sends the promise, without sending the fulfilment of the promise; inasmuch as He has given one little violet this February day or one snowdrop, He means to give a whole summerful of flowers, and He will not fail of His word. And so it is throughout all life. The teacher we have to-day will give place to a larger teacher to-morrow.

II. ‘He that cometh after Me.’ That is what Jesus Christ Himself said. Jesus Christ did not remain long; who would remain long under these grey skies if he could honourably get away? Jesus Christ was not long here; He was always young and always old, He was always the child and always the Everlasting Father. He returned to the Father, not that He might enjoy immunity from suffering, but that He might help us on a larger and surer scale.

Christ comes by the Spirit; Christ returns in the power of the Holy Ghost.

III. Nothing has been finally settled until we receive the baptism of fire.

Under the power of the Holy Ghost we shall not need any new teachers. The Holy Ghost will give us new vision, new perception, new capacity, new sensitiveness; not some original speaker, but some clearer realization of the Holy Ghost is the security, the assurance, and the completion of our progress.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. I. p. 94

THE BAPTISM OF FIRE

‘I baptize you with water, . . . He shall baptize you with fire.’—MATTHEW III. 11.

WATER and fire! Our two great cleansing ministrants! Which is the more searching, the more powerful agent, water or fire? Fire is our most effective purifying minister. A powerful and relentless enemy of disease.

I. When the ‘Word became Flesh,’ piety became transfused with passion; water was changed into fire. ‘I baptize you with water,’ says the Prophet John. The revelation which I have proclaimed has made you penitent, humble, and obedient, and this, indeed, has helped to cleanse and save you. But my baptism has only been the cleansing of water. The Christ who comes will reveal God in Himself, in His own person; and the revelation which He will make will be so full of unspeakable glory as to create in men a cleansing energy like fire, for their hearts shall become inflamed with an enthusiastic love.

II. Passionate religious enthusiasm attaches itself to a person; and the more near and real our intercourse with the person, the more beautiful will be our holiness, and the more fiery-hearted will be our service and devotion. Just think for a moment what magnificent import this revelation in the person of Jesus had for those Jews who became His disciples. The religion of the Jews had become an obedience to precept and laws. Christ lifted God out of abstraction, out of dead regulations and traditions, and presented the image of the eternal glory in His own person. God was no longer a burdensome law, but a great, near, and loving personality. And what happened to those disciples who received the revelation? Cold obedience to law was changed into enthusiastic obedience to a person. Cold and lukewarm water was changed into hot and cleansing fire.

III. Is this in any way significant of the need of the Church to-day? Has she put on her beautiful garments, the garments of a holy and sanctified life? By cold obedience the Church can never be holy. If the Church would be pure the Church must be passionate. Why, the very heart of the word 'pure' is suggestive of fire. It is significant of an end which has been reached through the ministry of flame. You cannot have purity without burning; you cannot have holiness without the baptism of fire. When devotion burns low, and personal piety smoulders down into a cold spiritual obedience, the 'beauty of holiness' becomes an impossible attainment. But when devotion is fiery, when religion is enthusiastic, when piety is passionate, then you have the very fire from the altar of God, in which all uncleannesses are purged away.

IV. But this is not all. An enthusiastic religious life is not merely the only saving religious life, it is the only religious life that is safe. The defensive energy of character is born out of its own heat. Lukewarmness is never safe. A man's defences are gone when he loses his zeal. A chilling and numbing worldliness steals in upon the Church when she loses her vesture of fire. The only safety for you and for me and for all men is that we be baptized with fire.

V. How is this baptism of fire to be attained? How is this spiritual enthusiasm to be kindled; and, when kindled, how is it to be kept burning? We shall have to make time to contemplate God. The spirit of meditation must be re-introduced into our fruitless feverishness and our passion for things transformed into a thirst for God. The Church must give herself time to kindle and time to pray. We must give ourselves time for visions, if we would worthily accomplish our task. Let us muse upon the King in His beauty, let us commune more with His loveliness, let us dwell more in the secret place, and the unspeakable glory of His countenance shall create within us that enthusiastic passion which shall be to us our baptism of fire, a fire in which everything unchristian shall be utterly consumed away.—J. H. JOWETT, Apostolic Optimism, p. 209.

REFERENCES.—III. 11.—A. Martin, Winning the Soul, p. 81. J. H. Jowett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 181.

A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 48. III. 11, 12.—T. Chalmers, Sermons Preached in the Tron Church, Glasgow, p. 75. III. 12.—J. Clarke, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lx. 1901, p. 349. F. D. Maurice, Lincoln's Inn Sermons, vol. iii. p. 231. T. M'Crie, Sermons, p. 382. III. 13-17.—A. Morris Stewart, The Temptation of Jesus, p. 2. J. Bannerman, Sermons, p. 84. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 64. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2613.

CHRIST'S ADVENTS

(An Advent Sermon)

'Comest Thou to me.'—MATTHEW III. 14.

Our thoughts turn at this season of the year to our Lord's second coming to judge the quick and the dead. There are two aspects of the second advent: the one relates to the whole human race—for we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; the other relates to each one of us separately—for every one of us shall give an account of himself to God.

I. Christ's Advent to Judgment.—It is an awful thought—all the thousands, all the millions of our race who have lived since time began, to be assembled on that great day to receive their eternal doom. And it is a still more awful thought that we shall each one of us have a separate place in that great scene. We sing together in the Te Deum, 'we believe that Thou shalt come to be our judge'. Let us then, in this Advent season and in our private prayers ask, 'Comest Thou to me?' Let us picture ourselves as placed before His bar, the record of our deeds proclaimed to ourselves and the assembled universe, out of the books of God's remembrance; our hidden works of darkness made manifest, our thoughts and deeds no less than our words and actions all made visible to ourselves and others, and each of us in our separate identity alone by himself, waiting to hear the awful sentence in which is our everlasting happiness or everlasting, never-ending misery and punishment.

II. Christ's Invisible Advent.—There is the invisible advent of Jesus Christ, which is probably nearer to us than these. His invisible advent or coming at the hour of our death. It is appointed unto men to die and after that the judgment. We all acknowledge death to be a universal necessity, but how few of us regard it as a personal necessity. We think that everyone must die—except ourselves. One after another our companions, our friends in life who are nearest and dearest to us, are summoned from our side, and laid in the cold grave. We see in the failing strength and whitening hair of one and another of our friends and neighbours that their time of departing hence is not far distant, and as, sooner or later, we gather round their dying beds we tell them that the Master has come and calleth for them. But although His approaching footsteps may be just as plain to ourselves, we promise to ourselves many years to come and lay our plans for the future as if our life had a long time to run. Would it not be far wiser and better to think and meditate on our death, and its possible speedy approach, and say to our Lord, 'Comest Thou to me?' Is not this the way to follow and obey our Blessed Lord's oft-repeated warning: 'Be ye therefore ready, for at such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh'.

III. Christ's Present Advent.—Lastly, there is yet another advent of Christ. Our Lord said of old that the day should come when we should desire to see the days of the Son of Man, and should not see them. This day is, for all of us, a day of the Son of Man. By His Cross, by His Spirit, by His Holy Sacraments, by the reading and the preaching of the Word, by the dispensation of His providence, He comes amongst us and visits us. May He never have cause to say over any of those mournful words He sighed over Jerusalem of old, 'thou knewest not the day of thy visitation'.

REFERENCES.—III. 15.—Hugh Black, University Sermons, p. 233. III. 16.—G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 91. S. A. Tipple, The Admiring Guest, p. 60. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VII. p. 66. III. 16, 17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 909.

THE MESSIANIC CONSCIOUSNESS OF JESUS

'This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased.'—MATTHEW III. 17.

THERE are many ways of approaching the life of Jesus. No other theme has produced so many books, and the steady stream flows on. The knowledge of Jesus is indeed the most excellent of the sciences. And yet no one has written an exhaustive or comprehensive discussion of Christ. It has always been so. No one of the Gospels gives a complete picture of the Master, nor do all four Gospels tell us all that we should like to know, nor, in fact, all that was once known of Jesus. Herein lies a strong argument for the deity of Christ, His inexhaustibleness. 'The riches of Christ' are 'unsearchable' and past finding out.

I. The Problem of Jesus.—He is a constant challenge to men, to the greatest of men. It was so at the first and is true to-day. Men have grappled with the universe under the spell of a great theory of development. Orderly development has been found in the various spheres of human knowledge. But what about Jesus of Nazareth? Is He the product of the narrow ceremonialism and ecclesiastical bigotry of Palestinian Pharisaism? No connexion can be traced between Christ and Plato, Socrates, Buddha, or any of the great thinkers outside of Judaism. Here is universal and absolute truth that sprang out of an atmosphere of intense racial pride and hate. Here is the man who laid most stress on the spiritual and moral aspects of religion in the midst of teachers who tithed mint, anise, and cumin.

But this is not all. Here is One who led a sinless life in the face of malignant enemies, whose character is the unapproachable ideal of all men who have ever read His story. Here is One who made the greatest claims for Himself, who put Himself on a par with the living God, according to the testimony of the Gospels which bring us the story of His career. Here is One who asserts His right to the allegiance of all men, who offers to rescue all that come to Him from sin and its effects. His perfect life and His lofty teachings give a serious aspect to what would otherwise be absurd claims.

II. The First Glimpse of Jesus.—When the boy Jesus comes to Jerusalem at twelve years of age, He knows that He is the Son of God in a sense not true of other men. 'Wist ye not that I must be in My Father's house?' His parents were astonished at the ease and powers He showed in such a place of dignity, teaching and amazing the doctors of divinity in the rabbinical theological seminary. But none the less is He astonished at their ignorance of the fact that this is the place of all the world for Him. Who can tell a boy's golden dreams of the future till some day the sun bursts out in full glory? The boy has gone for ever with the revelation of the man, and the manly purpose has come to fill the heart and life. The word 'must' throws a long light back into the boy's quiet years at Nazareth. Modern theologians speculate learnedly on the time when Jesus first became conscious of the fact that He was God's Son and had a Messianic mission to perform. That is idle speculation. We only know that at twelve years of age Jesus is aware that God has laid His hand upon Him. He is at home in the Father's house and rejoices to discuss high and holy themes.

The whole problem of the person of Jesus is brought before us by this incident. By the side of this early Messianic consciousness lies the other fact that He grew in wisdom and in stature. He was a real boy for all the Divine element in Him, and an obedient one, too, for He was subject to His parents gladly after this event. The one boy that really knew more than His father and mother was a model of obedience.

III. The Father's Sanction of the Son.—The news came to Jesus in Nazareth that strange things were going on down by Jordan River. He was a man now, the man Jesus, and the news had a fascination for Him. It was not the call of the wilderness, but the call of His Father that He heard, though He must go to the desert.

Clearly the baptism of Jesus had a wonderful personal significance. It has been variously interpreted. Some imagine that now for the first time Jesus became aware of the fact that He was the Messiah, the Son of God, but that interpretation is not justified by the facts. His protest to John just before the baptism was no disclaimer of the Messiahship. His whole bearing with John was that of one who had faced His destiny and had settled it. Some of the Corinthian Gnostics imagined that Christ as an Aeon or Emanation of God came down on Jesus at His baptism like a dove, and that it was this Aeon Christ that was Divine, while Jesus was Himself a mere man. His baptism was, however, the beginning of the public Messianic work. Jesus was now stepping out into the open. He had crossed the Rubicon and there was no turning back. He had put His hand to this plough and He must follow it to the end and sink the plough in deep. It was the coming of the Holy Spirit that constituted the anointing of Jesus, and not the baptism.

—A. T. ROBERTSON, Epochs in the Life of Jesus, p. 1.

REFERENCES.—III. 17.—J. Wright, The Guarded Gate, p. 133. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2409.

THE TEMPTATION OF JESUS

MATTHEW IV.

WHETHER the devil appeared objectively to Christ or not, it was in the realm of spirit that the temptation took place. Mark even says that Jesus was led of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. This is at first a hard saying, but probably it only means that God wished His Son to meet the tempter at once and have it out once for all. Not that the devil would not try again, but the line for future conflict would be clearly defined.

I. The devil has an evident allusion to the approval of the Father at Christ's baptism when he said 'if Thou art a son of God,' as God had said. Not that the devil denies that this is so; in fact, the form of the condition implies that it is true, and he says 'a son of God,' not 'the Son of God,' as God had said. But he suggests to Jesus that it would be just as well for Him to test what God had said. That would do no harm. He would then have personal experience to sustain him. He was very hungry, and, if He was God's Son, surely He could do creative work as God did. It was a subtle appeal. Jesus would work miracles for others. Why not begin by working one for Himself? In a word, shall Jesus be a selfish Messiah? But the temptation would have been no temptation put in that form. That is the peril with a temptation, that its real character is at first concealed and difficult to see. There was here concealed distrust of God.

The Jews expected the Messiah to come with a great spectacular display. They will often ask Jesus to do a sign, not merely work miracles, but some great portent in the heavens, for instance. The devil suggests that Jesus accommodate Himself to the popular expectation and let them see Him come sailing down from the pinnacle of the temple, right out of heaven. They would hail Him with acclaim. But Jesus was to be no mere performer of tricks, no balloon or parachute aeronaut. The devil grows pious and quotes Scripture, not misquotes it as some good people do, but he misapplies it. In that also the devil has no monopoly. But Jesus saw that He would be presumptuous and not trustful if He dared such a feat. Besides, He might as well settle now as later whether He was to be the kind of a Messiah that the people wished or the one that the Father had planned. Every preacher in a humbler way has to meet a similar problem. It is so easy to fall in with the drift of things, so easy as to fall over a great height when nervous and afraid.

II. But the devil was not done. He appealed to the ambition of Jesus. He would help Him to be king of the world. The devil was an old hand at it. He would not exactly abdicate; he and Jesus could run it together. That would be better than open war. He offered Jesus all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them. It was a fascinating picture as it passed before the mind of Jesus. He only asked in return that Jesus bow down before him up there on the mountain. Nobody else was there, and it would be merely a recognition of the facts of the case. The devil did have the kingdoms of the world in his power, the great Roman Empire, for instance. Was it not better to make peace and be friends than to fight it out? He could turn this great Roman Empire against Jesus, who had no disciples as yet, and, if He should win some, he could use this empire against the kingdom of Jesus. This was the heart of the temptation. Jesus wanted the world. In fact, He had come to win the world, but He was to win the world from the devil, not take the world on the devil's terms and with the devil as dictator. Christ was not confused by the issue. He knew what His decision meant. But he loved the world too well to betray it in that fashion. He would not have a mixture of the kingdom of heaven and the kingdom of the world. He would die for the world. Strange to say, the devil did fight Jesus with the Roman Empire, and did graft much of the world on the Church of the Middle Ages. But Jesus brushed aside all compromise and surrender and ordered Satan to go hence. He did go, cowed for the moment, but he will bide his time and wait for another chance. Death then faces Jesus at the very beginning. He must be willing to die for men before He can save men. So Jesus chose the high and stony path that led to Calvary, a lonely way and a weary one. His decision meant eternal conflict with Satan till He has conquered and the kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ.—A. T. ROBERTSON, Epochs in the Life of Jesus, p. 1.

TEMPTATION

'Then was Jesus led up of the spirit, into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil.'—MATTHEW IV. 1.

In temptation there are three factors: God, the power of evil, and the tempted man himself.

I. The first of these is God. I suppose that looking at temptation in the abstract this is easily acknowledged. It is indeed asserted in many passages of God's Word. And yet in the concrete experience, in the very grip and breath of the temptation itself, this is the hardest thing of all to believe. We are rushed and blinded. The heart feels left to itself and cruelly forsaken. Universal as temptation is, we go into it as we go into death, each of us for himself and absolutely alone. A besetting sin, a strong passion will suck the reality out of all else: out of love and truth and honour and God. Like our Lord we draw into the wilderness. The grass and the flowers cease, comradeship and sympathy are gone. God Himself seems gone, and we are 'alone with wild beasts'.

1. The first rally, which it is possible to sound to our hearts under this awful loneliness of temptation, is that which is also the first to be sounded under those other solitudes, which await us all, of pain and death—that they are universal and parts of the appointed order of things. Temptation, too, is part of the destiny of man. Suddenly though the assault surge upon him, it is no accident. Solitary as he feels in his battle, he does not in fact fight alone. He is one of an innumerable army of warriors.

2. See how all this general belief is heightened and enforced upon us by the sight of Jesus Himself in our battle. That even He did not escape the strife, how infinitely more sacred must it make our own position there. We take temptation not as the curse of our individual wills, too worthless for a higher fate, but as the debt and obligation of our manhood glorified in Him.

II. Though led by the Spirit into the wilderness Jesus was led up to be tempted of the devil.

To Jesus evil was a force and an intention outside of man, though it had its allies within him. In the earthly life of our Lord there are no moments so intense as those in which He felt the attempts of evil upon Himself. And it was out of this horror, that, in spite of all His illustrations of the necessity and Divine uses of temptation, He bade His disciples pray not to be led into it.

Temptation however much employed in the Divine Providence is not only from God; not only an examination set by the Great Master to His pupils: a problem and exercise in morals. It is a real encounter with a real foe.

III. There is a third agent: the tempted man himself. I do not mean that there are three personages in the drama; of whom God and the devil set the problem, and man has got to solve it. But I mean that all three have the setting of the problem: that man himself has, in his own degree, the determining of his temptations; that, to what may be deliberately called an awful extent, each of us is his own tempter.

For temptations, broadly speaking, are of two kinds. They may be little short of penal; pursuing us from our past, the results of old indulgences, and never coming upon us but with that added force to them, and weakness to us, which springs from the recollection of our former defeats of them. Or like Christ's they may be not punishments but discoveries, opportunities, and tests: the vision to us of our greatness, that two worlds are in contest for our souls; the proof that we are trusted and called of God; the obligation to some higher task; the signals of a growing and a destined nature.—GEORGE ADAM SMITH, The Forgiveness of Sins, p. 51.

THE INTERRUPTIONS OF LIFE

(Lent)

'Then was Jesus led up of the spirit, into the wilderness.'—MATTHEW IV. I.

THE SON OF MAN Who 'came eating and drinking'—why did He make this break in His life? Why did He forsake its innocent gaieties, the companionship in which He delighted for the dreary solitudes of the Dead Sea?

Our only answer can be that He felt the need of an interruption to His ordinary life. It was the greatest and longest, the most impressive and solemn of all those breaks in His ordinary life which from time to time He was making. He felt the need of these interruptions, of these temporary surrenderings of things lawful in themselves, of the sacrifice of the good for the better, of the losing of the life that He might find it more abundantly.

I. And it is just this that Lent comes to remind us of—the perils which may be in things lawful and good in themselves; and the danger is all the greater because it is so much less obvious and more subtle than many more dangers which face us. There is a peril to the fibre of character. And this may be true either of a nation or of an individual. A nation with trade advancing by leaps and bounds, with wealth increasing, with the standards of life rising, may be a nation gradually but surely becoming more and more incapable of heroism and self-sacrifice. And it is for that reason that moralists have sometimes defended war.

I would contend that what war sometimes does for a nation, interrupting its even, ordinary pursuits, shaming its quiet selfishness, stirring it up to see the sterner and more heroic sides of life which calm prosperity may hide or obscure, this is what such a period as Lent does or may do for the individual. It calls upon us to have something of the soldier's spirit of self-denial, of freedom and detachment from those things which may interfere with the supreme end of life, to be more daring, more venturesome, more unworldly, than we are apt to be in our everyday career.

II. What are likely to be its benefits:—

1. We shall learn to depend less on things which, though harmless or excellent in themselves, are not necessary to a true life.

2. By going into the wilderness readily and voluntarily we may be, as it were, ourselves anticipating the inevitable work which the swiftly passing years are doing and must do for all of us. For may we not say that every year we live the Spirit seems to be driving us into the wilderness?—driving us out of the things which we have most loved and cared for and enjoyed, forcing us, as it were, to surrender them, and to go, as it was said to St. Peter, 'whither we would not'?—H. R. GAMBLE, The Ten Virgins p. 91.

THE TEMPTATION IN THE WILDERNESS

(A Lenten Sermon)

'Led up of the spirit, into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil.'—MATTHEW IV. I.

RECURRING anniversaries add a pathos and a nobility to life. There are days when all must be sacred. Birth and death, some sacred blessing or some great sorrow, as the day may come, what matter it? The heart sings with joy or it becomes still with sorrow, as the case may be. It is not strange, then, that Christian people should mark the recurring season of Lent; it is an anniversary which is limited to no nation, no people, no age. It marks an epoch for the great human family for all time.

I. The Challenge.—‘Led up of the Spirit to be tempted of the devil.’ It is the history of mankind. It was the challenge of the Spirit of God to the spirit of evil; it was the struggle which was bound to take place for the supremacy of the world. It is vain to speculate upon the form or character of the spirit of evil, for whatever theory we may have as to its origin or form, whether it be a permeating essence or a person, nothing alters the universal result of all experience—that it is a fact. Man has been too often driven from Eden by the self-same spirit of evil to have any doubt as to its reality. And it is just as vain for man to speculate upon its nature as to mistake what that nature is. Poverty, obscurity, disappointment, care—these things are often deemed evil by the world, and yet they are not evils in themselves. They are often the stepping-stones to kingdoms where men may reign. Many a man afflicted with poverty becomes servile and mean; and it is just as true that men of wealth may become hard, cynical, and selfish. There is no evil in these things in themselves. Many of them have proved the greatest of blessings with which God has endowed the human family; but it is the material which goes into the crucible that shows in the result. If mean spirits go in, it is mean spirits that come out; if nobility goes in, it is nobility refined and purified that comes forth.

II. The Struggle.—The Lord Jesus Christ, Who looked into the very eyes of the tempter, never made light of evil, and it is well for us to remember that men who succeed in this great battle, only succeed after a struggle, a struggle with a really terrible enemy. We read in the history of days gone by in the land of slaves, how that they were tracked by blood-hounds, but no blood-hound ever tracked its victim as the spirit of evil tracks the footsteps of its slaves. The trouble is that men are so often their own tempters. Bad as he is, the devil is often falsely charged and falsely accused; when men are to be blamed alone they cast on him the sins that are their own. It is not only that man is his own tempter, but man is his own penalty. The evil of disease is one of the scourges with which the spirit of evil rends those who fail in the great conflict. The pitiful thing is that so many of us go through the world, and see its evil, and forget that, sooner or later, evil comes home to them that give it an abiding place within them.

III. The Discipline.—In Lent it is well that we should withdraw ourselves from the world, that we should gather together, and see the evil within us, that we should face the penalties that go with the evil and cry aloud for penitence and for pardon. These who have known the struggle will welcome this season as a means of grace, and for those who have been amongst the fallen, there will be the pleasing remembrance that Lent is not only the recruiting ground for the good, but it is a fresh starting-place for those who have done wrong. It may mean to them that God will use it as a means of instruction; that He will help them to reckon rightly, to estimate accurately the blessings and the evils that are around them; and when men do that there is little doubt that, however busy they may be with their work, however engrossed with their pleasures, they will at least find some time in which to remember the petition of the Litany, ‘That it may please Thee to give us true repentance, to forgive us all our sins, negligences, and ignorances, and to endue us with the grace of Thy Holy Spirit, to amend our lives according to Thy Holy Word’.

IV. The Victory.—The threefold temptations of our Lord show us that body, soul, and spirit of man—each the abiding temple of the Holy Ghost—may be assaulted in its turn. ‘Command that these stones be made bread’ was the voice of the tempter to the body of the hungering Saviour. ‘All these things will I give Thee’ is the appeal to the desires of the soul. ‘Cast Thyself down’—this was the temptation of pride to the intellect. Body, soul, and spirit were all assaulted, and these, each in its turn, are the universal temptations to-day. And so Jesus Christ has given us as He gave to His disciples that short pattern prayer on which men have moulded their petition to God from that time to this: ‘Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil’.

REFERENCES.—IV. 1.—M. Dods, Christ and Man, p. 13. H. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 1. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. i. p. 143. J. Fraser, Parochial and Other Sermons, p. 30. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 229. R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. i. p. 114. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lii. No. 2997. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. i. p. 137. Henry Wace, Some Central Points of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 59. A. Morris Stewart, The Temptation of Jesus, p. 16. W. P. Balfern, Glimpses of Jesus, p. 62. F. Temple, Church Times, vol. xlvii. 1902, p. 230. R. H. McKim, The Gospel in the Christian Year, p. 175. F. D. Maurice, Christmas Day and Other Sermons, p. 131. F. R. H. H. Noyes, Plain Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 250. S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 252. Bishop J. Percival, The Great Choice or the Great Refusal, p. 3. W. C. Magee, The Gospel and the Age, p. 57. R. Duckworth, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 129. F. Temple, ibid. vol. liii. 1898, p. 129. H. Scott Holland, ibid. vol. lxi. 1906, p. 24. M. G. Glazebrook, Prospice, p. 29. H. E. Manning, Sin and Its Consequences, p. 159. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 146; see also Readings for the Aged (4th Series), p. 34. G. Body, The Life of Temptation, p. 1. J. Vaughan, Sermons (11th Series), p. 61. S. A. Brooke, Sermons, p. 251. W. G. Blaikie, Glimpses of the Inner Life of Our Lord, p. 74. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, The Life of Duty, vol. i. p. 140. Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 51. E. M. Goulburn, Thoughts on Personal Religion, p. 200. C. A. Fowler, Parochial Sermons, p. 61. W. Landels, Christian World Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 344. H. Wonnacott, ibid. vol. xiv. p. 59. Clergyman's Magazine, vol. xiv. p. 91. J. C. Jones, Studies in St. Matthew, p. 70. E. G. Charlesworth, Church Sermons, vol. i. p. 48. G. Matheson, Moments on the Mount, p. 20. H. M. Butler, Harrow Sermons. IV. 1, 2.—R. W. Church, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 175. H. Bushnell, Christ and his Salvation, p. 77. IV. 1-11.—George Macdonald, Unspoken Sermons, p. 126. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 76. F. W. Macdonald, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 88. A. B. Davidson, Waiting Upon God, p. 109. T. Champness, New Coins From Old Gold, p. 55. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2613; vol. lli. No. 2997. IV. 2.—A. Morris Stewart, The Temptation of Jesus, p. 30. IV. 2, 3.—Ibid. p. 54. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. i. p. 168. IV. 2-4.—A. Morris Stewart, The Temptation of Jesus, p. 74. H. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 13. IV. 3.—H. Scott Holland, Church Times, vol. lv. 1906, p. 54. W. H. Brookfield, Sermons, p. 252. F. D. Maurice, Christmas Day and Other Sermons, p. 142. R. Winterbotham, Sermons Preached in Holy Trinity Church, Edinburgh, p. 128. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2613. IV. 3-4.—A. Morris Stewart, The Temptation of Jesus, p. 91.

THE OFFICE OF RELIGION

'But He answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.'—MATTHEW IV. 4.

RELIGION rests upon the facts of human nature. What are those facts?

1. Its sinfulness.
2. Its sorrowfulness.
3. Its shortness.

1. They suggest three questions: (1) What is the motive for resisting sin? (2) What is the meaning of sorrow? (3) Does the life of each of us end at his death?

1. What is the revelation of Jesus Christ about human sin? Whatever the faults of Christian men and women, and whatever the merits of those who are not Christians, it is ridiculous to tell me that in the conduct of life, in the hours when temptation is strong and sin can be wrought with but little fear of detection or degradation, he who looks only to himself and his fellow-men for his standard of duty possesses the same powerful motive to morality as he who believes that his life, in its meanest actions no less than its highest, is passed under the searching eye of an omnipotent God.

2. What is the revelation of Jesus Christ about life's sorrow? He does not ignore it. He does not deny it. He weeps for it as He draws near to the grave of Lazarus. But Christ teaches that sorrow is itself a benediction. The world lends no sanction to the theory that 'whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth'. But the revelation of Christ makes it plain.

3. What is it that Christ reveals about life's shortness. Standing beside the open grave, He says, as of old, 'I am the resurrection, and the life: he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth, and believeth in me, shall never die'.

Whoever claims to control our spirits must be prepared to furnish some elucidation or justification of life's sinfulness, its sorrowfulness, and its shortness. Jesus Christ explains these mysteries by referring them to a superhuman law.

II. It remains, then, to ask, What are the substitutes proposed for religion?

1. It is said that humanity may support itself, and, I suppose, enjoy itself, in the contemplation of material progress.

Still, granting the salient fact of material progress, there are two thoughts which may well occur to us: (1) that concurrently with this progress there have arisen certain causes which militate against its beneficent operation; (2) that, however wide its operation may be, it satisfies a part only, and not the whole, of man's nature.

2. But it is sometimes said that although man will not find his satisfaction in an era of commercial prosperity, he will find it in the cultivated pleasure which attends the development of science or art. In other words, as religion decays, scientific discovery and artistic taste will fill the void. The love of knowledge and the love of beauty are not less natural to man than the love of God. But they are not, and cannot be, substitutes for the love of God. They cannot fill the place of religion.

3. It is sometimes argued that the law of duty in itself is potent to command the hearts and minds of men.

Christianity, in referring actions to God, recognizes man's natural love of approbation. The problem of life is to accommodate the self-regarding and the self-forgetting impulses of human nature. They are accommodated, I think, only in a system which teaches that it is the duty of man to sacrifice himself, if the need be, for the salvation of other men—yes, to sacrifice himself even to the death—and yet teaches that his self-sacrifice will issue in a complete reward behind the veil of time.

III. Not in material progress then, nor in art and science, nor in the stoicism of absolute duty, is the law of human nature found to lie. We fall back upon the immemorial truth—'man shall not live,' says the Saviour, 'by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God'. Human nature can find its satisfaction only in Him Who is not human but Divine.—BISHOP WELLDON, The Spiritual Life, p. 140.

REFERENCES.—IV. 4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xx. No. 1208. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 487. Brooke Foss Westcott, Village Sermons, p. 353. Henry Wace, Some Central Points of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 79. F. W. Farrar, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 408. M. R. Vincent, God and Bread, p. 3. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. i. p. 152. IV. 5.—C. Jordan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 83.

'Then the devil saith unto Him, It is written.'—MATTHEW IV. 5, 6.

In the eleventh chapter of Martin Chuzzlewit, Jonas upbraids his old father for living to such an age. 'Where's his religion, I should like to know, when he goes flying in the face of the Bible like that! Three-score-and-ten's the mark; and no man with a conscience and a proper sense of what's expected of him has any business to live longer.' Is anyone surprised at Mr. Jonas making such a reference to such a book for such a purpose? Does anyone doubt the old saw, that the devil (being a layman) quotes Scripture for his own ends? If he will take the trouble to look about him, he may find a greater number of confirmations of the fact, in the occurrences of any single day, than the steam-gun can discharge balls in a minute.

REFERENCES.—IV. 5-7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 689. J. Wordsworth, University Sermons on Gospel Subjects, p. 102. H. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 25. A. Morris Stewart, The Temptation of Jesus, p. 110. IV. 6.—R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. iii. p. 136. W. Hardy Harwood, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 84. T. B. Dover, Some Quiet Lenten Thoughts, p. 31. IV. 7.—Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. i. p. 168. Henry Wace, Some Central Points of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 97. IV. 7, 10.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, p. 319.

'The devil taketh Him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth Him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; and saith unto Him, All these things will I give Thee, if Thou wilt fall down and worship me.'—MATTHEW IV. 8, 9.

COMPARE Ruskin's application, in the fifth volume of Modern Painters: 'High on the desert mountain, full descried, sits throned the tempter, with his old promise—the kingdoms of this world and the glory of them. He still calls you to your labour, as Christ to your rest;—labour and sorrow, base desire, and cruel hope. So far as you desire to possess, rather than to give; so far as you look for power to command, instead of to bless; so far as your own prosperity seems to you to issue out of contest or rivalry, of any kind, with other men, or other nations; so long as the hope before you is supremacy instead of love; and your desire is to be greatest instead of least;—first, instead of last;—so long are you serving the Lord of all that is last and least.'

REFERENCES.—IV. 8, 9.—C. F. Aked, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 100. A. Morris Stewart, The Temptation of Jesus, p. 142. IV. 8-11.—J. Wordsworth, University Sermons on Gospel Subjects, p. 119. IV. 9, 10.—A. Morris Stewart, The Temptation of Jesus, p. 178. IV. 10.—Henry Wace, Some Central Points of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 115. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, The School of Christ, p. 80. Harry Jones, Christian World Pulpit, 1896, p. 151. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. i. p. 184. IV. 11.—Ibid. vol. i. p. 201. A. Morris Stewart, The Temptation of Jesus, p. 194. E. Fowle, Plain Preaching to Poor People (7th Series), p. 80. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2326. IV. 12.—W. Brooke, Sermons, p. 2. IV. 12-16.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 86. IV. 12-24.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2646. IV. 13-17.—Fuller Gooch, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxvii. 1895, p. 346. IV. 15, 16.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 1010.

'The people which sat in darkness saw great light.'—MATTHEW IV. 16.

THE first Creature of God, in the Workes of the Dayes, was the Light of the Sense; the last, was the Light of Reason; and his Sabbath Worke, ever since, is the Illumination of his Spirit. First He breathed Light, upon the Face of the Matter or Chaos; Then He breathed Light into the Face of Man; and still He breatheth and inspireth Light into the Face of his Chosen.—BACON.

A FRIEND who was with Robertson of Brighton 'at the English Lakes, said to him one day with some sharpness, pointing to the top of Skiddaw, which was unseen the while for mist, "I would not have my head, like the peak of that mountain, involved, as we see it now, in cloud, for all that you could offer me". "I would," rejoined Robertson quickly, "for, by and by, the cloud and mist will roll away, and the sun will come down upon it in all his glory."

REFERENCE.—IV. 16.—S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 82.

'Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.'—MATTHEW IV. 17.

THE appropriate lesson of the hour might be thought to be one of passive watchfulness; to lie in wait for the hoped-for redemption. . . . Instead of this, however, the great Prophet of the hour draws the opposite inference; and utters the exhortation short and sharp, 'Repent!' Personal repentance, the transference of the life from conventionalism to conviction, must precede and usher in the reign of God upon the earth.—MARTINEAU.

REFERENCES.—IV. 17.—J. Parker, Studies in Texts, vol. i. p. 161. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 1. H. Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 124. J. Martineau, Endeavours After the Christian Life, p. 44. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 329. IV. 17-25.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 89.

THE CALL OF ST. ANDREW

'Jesus, walking by the sea of Galilee, saw two brethren, Simon called Peter, and Andrew his brother.'—MATTHEW IV. 18.

THE festival in honour of the memory of St. Andrew is one of the earliest recorded in Church history. Its institution took place about the middle of the fourth century; and it appropriately opens the series of the festivals, inasmuch as St. Andrew was the first disciple of Jesus Christ.

St. Andrew was a native of Bethsaida of Galilee, and was a son of Jonas, and a brother of Simon Peter, but whether older or younger has never been satisfactorily ascertained. He was the first of all the Apostolic band to begin the work of evangelization. 'He first findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found the Messiah, which is, being interpreted, the Christ.' But his call to the work of an Apostle did not take place for a year after his first introduction to Christ. During that time he occupied himself in his ordinary pursuit of fishing, as is evident from the text that it was from the net and the boat that he and his brother Simon were finally called to be 'fishers of men'.

In the narrative of the Gospel, St. Andrew is spoken of in connexion with the call of the first disciples (Matt. iv. 19-22). Then on the occasion when Jesus sat upon the Mount of Olives, over against the temple, and predicted the fall of the Holy City (Mark xiii. 3, 4). He is also said to have been present at the feeding of the five thousand, for he was the disciple who felt so anxious for the comfort of the famishing multitude (John vi. 8, 9); and in the Holy Week, when certain Greeks 'would see Jesus,' Andrew was the first to tell Jesus of their desire (John xii. 21, 22). These are most, if not all, of the instances in which St. Andrew is noted in the Gospels.

Ecclesiastical history states concerning him that when the division of the world was made among the Apostles, St. Andrew undertook Scythia and the adjacent countries as his sphere of labour. Like St. Paul, he was 'in labours more abundant'.

Ægeas, the proconsul of Achaia, because of St. Andrew's wonderful success in his Master's work, condemned him to be scourged and afterwards crucified. And, in order that his death might be as painful and protracted as possible, he had this noble martyr fastened with cords—not nailed, as was usual—to the cross, which was of the peculiar kind called decussate, in the form of an X, and known afterwards by the name of St. Andrew. When his executioners were conducting him to this cross, and he was within sight of it, it is said that he apostrophized it thus: 'Hail, precious cross! thou hast been consecrated by the Body of my Lord, and adorned with His limbs as with rich jewels. I come to thee exulting and glad; receive me with joy into thine arms. O good cross! since thou hast received beauty from my Lord's limbs, I have ardently loved thee. Long have I desired and sought thee; now thou art found by me, and art made ready for my longing soul. Take me from among men, and present me to my Master, that He Who redeemed me on thee may receive me by thee.' In this brave and sublime manner St. Andrew died.

From the conduct of Andrew we may learn that it is the nature of true religion to desire that others may possess it. It does not lead us to monopolize it, nor to hide its light under a bushel; but it seeks that others also may be brought to Jesus. It does not wait for them to come to Him, but it goes for them; it seeks them out, and leads them directly to Him.

REFERENCES.—IV. 18.—C. S. Robinson, Simon Peter, p. 30. IV. 18, 19.—J. Halsey, The Spirit of Truth, p. 108. A. F. Winnington Ingram, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 84. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 702. IV. 18, 19, 20.—Thomas Spurgeon, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1883, p. 65. IV. 18-22.—A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part i. p. 150. N. Adams, Christ a Friend, p. 183. J. H. Rigg, Scenes and Studies in the Ministry of Our Lord, p. 43.

THE CALL TO SERVICE

'Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men.'—MATTHEW IV. 19.

THE references to this incident in different Gospels are so various that it seems impossible to determine with certainty that St. Peter and St. Andrew, St. James and St. John were called to follow Christ with a view to being made of further service immediately after the occasion of the miraculous draught of fishes or on a subsequent occasion. It does not matter much whether the incident took place on the same day as the miraculous draught of fishes or on the following day. We know that these men were called, and the exact words of their calling are given. Christ came to these men and said: 'Follow Me'. Some one has said that God never calls an idle man; so we see that Jesus Christ was looking for disciples who were following professions, as in the case of these four men. He saw them at work; He saw that they were industrious. They were doing well in their earthly position; therefore they were the men Christ needed to do well in a higher calling. Christ's religion commands us to serve Him and work for Him. It does not consist of merely singing and praising and praying. Service, and not status, distinguishes one disciple from another, though a good many members of the Christian Church do not recognize this fact, and very often status is thought to be better than service.

I. The Career of a Christian is to be one of Ministry; to undertake the task of helping our fellow-men. To follow the Lord Jesus Christ and accept the Christian faith means renunciation. We are called upon to give up something in this world if we want to become true Christians—something which is incompatible with our new life and new service for Christ—and to believe in Jesus Christ and to follow Him as a true disciple, to practise His teaching, and to love Him. This means, perhaps, the renunciation of many things, not merely what we understand as the renunciation of the devil and all his works, the pomp and vainglory of this wicked world, and all the carnal lusts of the flesh; but even more than that, for it may mean giving up some worldly occupation in which we cannot carry out Christ's principles and His life. Do we recognize this renunciation when we take up the Christian religion? When we are called in Christ, He says: 'Come, follow Me'. It is not a call to slavery; it is a call to blessed companionship with Him, the remaking of us as better men and women, if we can only realize what it means when we go to Him. Do we realize that we are called to follow Christ, that Christ is with us, that Christ takes His place in our hearts when He says 'Follow Me'? Why Christ wanted these men to follow Him was that He might impress His spirit upon them. We shall never be the fishers of other men until the spirit of Christ is in us, until it gives us the greater force of character.

II. This Command to these Poor Fishermen has a very Beautiful and Peculiar Charm.

(a) It was an absolutely direct call from Person to person. Christ comes to them, and looks them in the face and says: 'Follow Me'. Christ is a personal being; He knows us by name, and speaks to us Himself; and I often wonder if we all realize that He is calling each one of us to be a disciple of His, and serve Him in love for ever and ever.

(b) The swiftness of the answer. They immediately left their nets and followed Him. Oh! if you would only respond to the call of God at once, and not put it away from you when He calls you from sin and from the world! Will we respond to this voice? Will the beautiful and peculiar charm of His presence hasten our footsteps to Him?

(c) Notice the thoroughness with which these fishermen entered into the duty of serving Christ. Of course, we hear of certain human weaknesses in the characters of the disciples; for instance, the want of confidence of St. Peter, the weak Apostle who followed Christ afar off; though, on the other hand, we read of the faithful devotion of St. Andrew, who followed close on his Master. If we follow Him closely, we must follow Him with mind and conscience and spirit in this way.

III. His Presence is With Us.—There was a great general who said to his troops: 'I cannot now explain the worst to you, but I can lie on the hard ground with you'. And that is but a faint idea of the love and work of Jesus Christ. He cannot explain everything to us in the present, but if we have the mind to follow Christ and to rest upon His power, we shall find Christ is side by side with us in the hardships of life, and we shall know there is a Friend Who will help us at all times. Our minds can rest in Him.

FOLLOW ME!

MATTHEW IV. 19.

I. Whom?—Not simply a human teacher; but Jesus, Who qualified Himself by His earthly life, with its temptation, toil, and suffering, to be the only Leader of men.

II. How?—We cannot follow His person, as the disciples did when He was upon earth; but we may—

1. Obey His precepts.

2. Copy His example.

III. Why?—1. We cannot direct our own course.

2. There is no leader equal to Christ.

3. If we follow Him we shall be in good company.

4. Only thus can we escape spiritual danger and eternal death.

IV. Whither?—1. To God. 'I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by Me.'

2. To heaven. 'In My Father's house are many mansions. . . . I go to prepare a place for you.'

V. When?—1. Now. 'Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation.'

2. Always.—F. J. AUSTIN, Seeds and Saplings, p. 90.

REFERENCES.—IV. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1906. E. S. Talbot, Some Aspects of Christian Truth, p. 147. Reuben Thomas, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 141. H. A. Thomas, ibid. vol. lv. 1899, p. 182. J. H. Jowett, ibid. vol. lxx. 1904, p. 257. H. P. Liddon, Clerical Life and Work, p. 93. George Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 73. IV. 20.—C. S. Robinson, Simon Peter, p. 137. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for Saints' Days, p. 9. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2618. IV. 21.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. iii. p. 157. Walter C. Smith, Sermons, p. 197. IV. 21, 22.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. vi. p.

142. IV. 23 (R.V.)—A. Rowland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 195. IV. 23-25.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 333.

'And He healed them.'—MATTHEW IV. 24.

LET no man who wants to do anything for the soul of a man lose the chance of doing something for his body. Of many a soul Jesus laid hold by healing the suffering the body brought on it. No one but Himself can tell how much the nucleus of the Church was composed of and by those who had received health from His hands, loving-kindness from His mouth.—GEO. MACDONALD, A Seaboard Parish, p. 238.

'In the shape of converts,' said James Gilmour of Mongolia, 'I have seen no result. I have not, as far as I am aware, seen any one who even wanted to be a Christian; but by healing their diseases I have had opportunity to tell many of Jesus, the Great Physician.'

REFERENCES.—IV. 24.—W. P. Balfour, Glimpses of Jesus, p. 74. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 3. IV. 25.—Henry Wace, Some Central Points of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 173.

THE BEATITUDES ILLUSTRATED BY EVENTS IN THE PASSION

MATTHEW V.

1. CHRIST condemned. Pilate washes his hands and declares Christ innocent. 'Blessed are the pure in heart.'

2. Christ takes up the cross. 'Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake.'

3. Christ falls under the weight of the cross. 'Blessed are they that mourn.'

4. Christ meekly allows another to share His cross. 'Blessed are the meek.'

5. Christ comforts the women. 'Blessed are the merciful.'

6. Christ stripped of His garments. 'Blessed are the poor in Spirit.'

7. Christ nailed to the cross. Prays for His murderers to His Father. 'Blessed are the peacemakers.'

8. Christ dead upon the cross. His hunger and thirst after the perfect fulfilment of His Father's will satisfied. 'Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness.'—F. A. G. EICHBAUM, Subjects for Courses of Sermons, p. 104.

REFERENCES.—V.—C. Gore, Church Times, vol. xxxiii. 1895, p. 475. R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 81. J. Brett, The Blessed Life, p. 74. V. 1.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. ii. (Sermon-Sketches), p. 9. A. B. Bruce, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 344. J. Stafford Northcote, ibid. vol. xl. 1891, p. 217. C. Brown, ibid. vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 137.

A MESSAGE TO THE CHURCH

'And when He was set, His disciples came unto Him, and He . . . taught them.'—MATTHEW V. 1, 2.

I. The Sermon on the Mount was spoken to the Disciples, to the Church.—It has been so truly said, the Sermon on the Mount was spoken in the ear of the Church but was overheard by the world. The Sermon on the Mount was not, then, primarily spoken to the world at all. Again and again it is true that the teaching of the Sermon on the Mount is beyond those who belong to the kingdom of this world. Our Lord's teaching with regard to forgiveness or resisting evil, or with regard to the simplicity of faith, all these things are confessedly beyond those who belong to the kingdom of the world. But these things are spoken to those who are members of the Body of Christ, in grace, living and walking in the Spirit. When you are dealing with the world at large, then again it may be necessary to make concessions as Moses had to do. It becomes difficult when you speak not only of the State but of the Christian State; the State cannot require the same standard from its members that the Church can and does require from its members. The Sermon on the Mount, let us remember, was spoken to the Church. It was not so impracticable as it seems, because we work not on the scale of time, but on the scale of eternity. No doubt it is true that if the few and evil years of this life were all that you and I had to reckon upon, it would be frankly absurd to set before us such a standard as that in the Sermon on the Mount. Do you not feel and understand how that the Sermon on the Mount does correspond with your own immortality? It is not only here that we progress and grow; there is a Paradise, a heaven beyond, and depend upon it Paradise will be a busy place indeed; there they rest from their labours, but there there will be work, if we may say so, without toil and weariness; surely it is unthinkable that it is only here, where we are so sorely let and hindered, that spiritual growth and progress are possible. It is the very exaltation of the standard of the Sermon on the Mount that speaks to us of our own immortality.

II. Let us also Remember that we are not left to Ourselves.—When you are aiming at holiness you are working in accordance with the will of God; 'this is the will of God, even your sanctification'; and surely it is true that when you are working in accordance with the will of God ultimate failure is unthinkable. Depend upon it, God is not an austere man, an unfair man, gathering where He has not strewed and reaping where He has not sowed. The first thing a preacher has to do is to attack that lie in men's hearts that God deals with us unfairly, to speak to men of the love of God manifest in the way of the world and in life, but above all manifest in Jesus Christ. To preach the love of God, that is how men are brought to repentance. It is the goodness of God that brings men to repentance. The punishment of sin is not an article of Christian faith; we do not say in the Creed, 'I believe in the punishment of sin'; we do say that wonderful thing, 'I believe in the forgiveness of sin'. But why do we not say, 'I believe in the punishment of sin'? Because it is a fact of experience; you do not make that an article of faith which is an act of experience. It is the goodness of God that brings men to repentance.

III. And then there is Power.—We have to preach that which St. Paul was expressing when he said, 'I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation'. The Gospel is not only good advice and a message of pardon for the past, but it is the coming into men's lives of a real power, so that they are able to be what in their best moments they desire, what yesterday seemed beyond all hope and imagination. That is what happens; that is what one has seen for years happening in men's lives again and again. And so I say the Sermon on the Mount is not so impracticable as it seems, because we are not left to ourselves. 'This is the will of God, even your sanctification.'

IV. What Kind of Perfection is it to which we are Called?—'Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect,' or as St. Luke gives it in the parallel passage, 'Be ye therefore merciful, even as your Father in heaven is merciful'. And so we are not all to be perfect in wisdom or to be perfect in power; that no doubt is beyond us—limitation in such respects is of the very essence of our nature; but we are called to be merciful even as God is merciful; to be easy to be entreated, to be compassionate; that ought not surely to be beyond us. True it is, indeed, that we have not yet attained; nothing is more strange in this strange and perplexing world than the hard measure which again and again we sinners deal out to one another. But in proportion as you draw near to Jesus Christ, Who was the Friend of sinners, so will you be merciful. It is not to be perfect in wisdom or in power—that is indeed beyond us; but you are called to be compassionate, to be easy to be entreated, to be merciful as God Himself is merciful.

Let us remember that it is not as impossible as it seems because we work not on the scale of time but on the scale of eternity; not so impossible as it seems because when we aim at it we are working in accordance with the will of God, and when you are doing that ultimate failure is unthinkable.

'He went up into a mountain . . . and taught.'—MATTHEW v. 1, 2.

In a letter to the Westminster Gazette (7 June, 1904), an Old Liberal declares that he can reproduce with absolute fidelity the purport and spirit of some words in a great speech of John Bright at the unveiling of Cobden's statue in the Bradford Exchange. 'I remember,' said the orator, 'on the morning of my dear friend's funeral, I was standing beside his coffin, looking at that which contained all that was mortal of the man I had known so long. His daughter, who was in the room with me, said, "My dear father was always very fond of the Sermon on the Mount".' And then Bright's voice swelled and grew in depth and volume as it was wont to do when he was deeply moved, and he went on, 'And I think that my friend's whole life was a sermon upon that highest and holiest of all texts'. He repeated, as only he could have done, the blessings uttered by the Divine lips upon the poor, the mourners, the meek, the hungerers after righteousness, the merciful, the pure in heart, and the peacemakers; and then, in his own severely simple words, summed up the labours of Cobden and his associates in a single phrase, 'We tried to put Holy Writ to an Act of Parliament'.

REFERENCES.—V. 1, 2.—G. Jackson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 245. J. R. Cohu, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 1. V. 1-3.—C. J. Ridgeway, The Mountain of Blessedness, p. 1. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 280. T. K. Cheyne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 376. C. A. Thomson, ibid. vol. lv. 1899, p. 202. V. 1-12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2508. V. 1-13.—Henry Wace, Some Central Points of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 193.

'And He opened His mouth, and taught them, saying, Blessed. . . .'
—MATTHEW V. 2.

THERE are no real pleasures without real needs.—
VOLTAIRE.

No list of circumstances will ever make a paradise.—
GEORGE ELIOT.

In the ninth chapter of the second book of Sartor Resartus, Carlyle distinguishes happiness and blessedness as follows: 'I asked myself: What is this that, ever since earliest years, thou hast been fretting and fuming, and lamenting and self-tormenting, on account of? Say it in a word: Is it not because thou art not HAPPY? Because the THOU (sweet gentleman) is not sufficiently honoured, nourished, soft-bedded, and lovingly cared for? Foolish soul! what Act of Legislature was there that thou shouldst be Happy? . . . There is in man a HIGHER than Love of Happiness: he can do without Happiness, and instead thereof find Blessedness! Was it not to preach forth this same HIGHER that sages and martyrs, the Poet and the Priest, in all times, have spoken and suffered; bearing testimony, through life and through death, of the Godlike that is in Man, and how in the Godlike only he has Strength and Freedom? Which God-inspired Doctrine art thou also honoured to be taught; O Heavens! and broken with manifold merciful Afflictions, even till thou become contrite and learn it!'

REFERENCES.—V. 2, 3.—E. M. Goulburn, Three Counsels of the Divine Master, vol. i. p. 104. F. H. Dudden, Church Times, vol. lvi. 1900, p. 571. V. 2-4.—E. H. Rogers, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 332. V. 2, 3, 5.—George Macdonald, ibid. vol. xlii. 1892, p. 36. V. 2-9.—A. J. Parry, Phases of Christian Truth, p. 209.

THE FIRST BEATITUDE

'Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.'
—MATTHEW V. 3.

I. THE Old Testament is full of descriptions of the spirit of the world, the spirit of selfish wealth with its attendant cruelty: and by contrast to this are descriptions of the oppressed poor who are the friends of God. Our Lord took up all this language upon His own lips when, as St. Luke records, He turned to His disciples and said, 'Blessed are ye poor . . . woe unto you that are rich'. But all the actually poor are not the disciples of Christ. So our Lord has, as recorded by St. Matthew, gone beneath the surface and based His kingdom, the character of His citizens, not upon actual poverty, but upon detachment. The world says, 'Get all you can, and keep it'. Christ says, 'Blessed are those who at least in heart and will have nothing'.

II. Christ was detached. The Incarnation was a self-emptying. Then when He had been born a man He set the example of clinging to nothing external. He abandoned ease, popularity, the favour of the great, even the sympathy of His friends, even, last and greatest of all, on the cross, the consolation of the Divine presence. He became utterly naked, poorer than the poorest; therefore in a supreme sense 'His was the kingdom of heaven'. So we, like Him, are to be ready to surrender, ready to give up; and in proportion to this detachment, in proportion as we do really in will adore the sovereignty of God, and are ready to receive and to give up according to His will, in that proportion are all the hindrances removed by which the royalty of His kingdom is prevented from entering into our hearts and lives.

III. The splendid promise attached to this beatitude brings it into contrast with an old Jewish saying which has many parallels: 'Ever be more and more lowly in spirit, for the prospect of man is to become the food of worms'. The motive to humility which our Lord suggests is very different.—BISHOP GORE, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 23.

POVERTY OF SPIRIT THE OTHER SIDE OF GREATNESS

Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.'
—MATTHEW V. 3.

I. It seems to me that this foundation beatitude, on which all the other beatitudes are built up, sets forth a universal law of human life, that it describes the attitude of mind characteristic of the wisest, strongest, best of the human family. The greater a man is in any walk of life the wider his vision, and the keener his insight the greater is his poverty of spirit in the presence of the perfection he has seen.

1. The thesis may be worked out in detail. Take the man of science in the presence of the majesty of nature.

Look at the same thing from the point of view of art.

2. The presence of poverty of spirit is still more manifest in the moral sphere. Here, too, the contrast between the ideal and the real, between what ought to be and what is, is still more striking. To have seen the ideal of conduct, to have recognized its binding force, and to feel that one has acted contrary to its plain behests, is the form which poverty of spirit takes in the presence of the ideal of moral goodness somehow revealed to us.

3. But the feeling of poverty of spirit is most conspicuous in the religious sphere. If we follow the experience recorded in the Scriptures, we shall find that the deepest form of poverty of spirit is found whenever men obtained the vision of God.

II. Let us try now to see the connexion between the feeling of poverty of spirit and the blessedness of the possession of the kingdom of heaven.

If a man is without the kingdom of heaven, he is in no way concerned with the thought of it. If he is concerned with it, he is already within it.

But the vision of God begets poverty of spirit; indeed, the trueness of the vision is measured by the consequent poverty of spirit. This is the note that seals the possession of the kingdom of heaven. In fact, this is the keynote of all our Lord's teaching. It is the note of His own life. At every fresh departure in His work He spent the night in prayer and fellowship with the Father, and whenever He needed wisdom and power for His life-work He sought these from the Father. Thus in virtue of His poverty of spirit He was in possession of the kingdom of heaven.—J. IVERACH, The Other Side of Greatness, p. 1.

'Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.'—MATTHEW V. 3.

POVERTY in any shape helps to stir in man a sense of need, a disposition to consider himself as dependent. . . . The real puzzle of life consists not in the fact of widespread poverty but in that of widespread affluence; in the fact that so many are sufficiently endowed with 'goods' as to believe they can live by them, and so cease to look for their true life to God their Father.—E. LYTTETLTON.

REFERENCES.—V. 3.—J. Brett, The Blessed Life, p. 7. J. Iverach, The Other Side of Greatness, p. 1. J. R. Cohn, The Sermon on the Mount, pp. 23, 54. W. J. Woods, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. p. 3. J. Stalker, ibid. vol. lvi. 1899, p. 379. W. M. Sinclair, Simlicity in Christ, p. 113. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 50. W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 42. C. J. Ridgeway, The Mountain of Blessedness, p. 12. A. W. Potts, School Sermons, p. 64. Henry Wace, Christianity and Morality, p. 17. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 108. W. Sanday, The Anglican Pulpit of To-Day, p. 334. F. Temple, ibid. p. 83. W. Boyd Carpenter, The Great Charter of Christ, p. 83. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. ii. (Sermon-Sketches), p. 12. B. F. Westcott, Social Aspects of Christianity, p. 101. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 27. Parker, The Inner Life of Christ, vol. i. p. 149. Davidson, Lectures and Sermons, p. 551. Parry, Phases of Christian Truth, p. 209. Jenkins, Eternal Life, p. 258. Magee, Christian World Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 353 (1872). Expositor (1st Series), vol. I. pp. 70, 128, and 196. A. M. Fairbairn, ibid. vol. viii. p. 188. Bradley, Christian World Pulpit, 29 June, 1881. C. Morris, Preacher's Lantern, vol. iii. p. 503. A. B. Bruce, The Galilean Gospel, p. 39. Goodwin's Works, vol. viii. p. 220. Parker, A Homiletic Analysis of the New Testament, vol. i. p. 52. See Prof. Tholuck, Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount. V. 3, 4.—Archbishop Lang, Church Times, vol. lvii. 1907, p. 219. V. 3-5.—C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 1. T. D. Barlow, Rays from the Sun of Righteousness, p. 130. V. 3-12.—W. Boyd Carpenter, The Great Charter of Christ, p. 101. V. 3-16.—J. Elder Cumming, The Blessed Life, p. 11.

THE SECOND BEATITUDE

'Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted.'—MATTHEW V. 4.

THE world says 'Get as much pleasure as you can out of life; suck it in wherever you can; and hug yourself as close as you can from all that disquiets you or makes you uncomfortable; in a word, get as much pleasure and avoid as much pain as by intelligence and forethought you can possibly do'. In startling opposition to this maxim of the world, our Lord puts His maxim, 'Blessed are they that mourn'.

I. What does that mean? Briefly: there are two chief kinds of mourning into which it is the duty of every true servant of our Lord to enter—the mourning for sin and the mourning for pain.

1. We must mourn for sin, for we are sinners.

2. The mourning of sympathy with others' pain. There are moments when a Christian may legitimately, like His Lord, in the garden of Gethsemane, be engrossed in the bearing of 'his own burden'. But in the main a Christian ought, like his Lord, or like St. Paul, to have his own burden so well in hand, that he is able to leave the large spaces of his heart for other people to lay their sorrows upon.

II. And in proportion to the fullness with which you enter into penitence for sin and into sympathy for the sufferings of men, you shall get, not the miserable laughter of forgetfulness, which lasts but for a moment, but the comfort (or encouragement) of God.

III. There is a false as well as a true mourning. It is possible to be discontented with the world but to lack the courage of faith which makes our discontent fruitful of reform. We are discontented; but our discontent is pride, not the humility of true sorrow. It will not be comforted, it will not thankfully take the Divine offer of absolution. 'The woman that was a sinner' made no delay in believing herself forgiven, but set to work at once to show the love which springs of gratitude in the heart of those who accept their release.—BISHOP GORE, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 27.

'Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted.'—MATTHEW V. 4.

WE reach happiness only through tears. True bliss does not consist in the absence of tears but in the presence of consolation, and real misery is not so much to weep as to weep without being consoled. If Christianity accords moments to sorrow, it devotes our whole life to joy.—VINEY.

REFERENCES.—V. 4.—J. Brett, The Blessed Life, p. 35. W. J. Woods, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 95. W. Wynn, ibid. vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 179. George Macdonald, ibid. vol. xlii. 1892, p. 47. F. W. Farrar, ibid. vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 33. W. M. Sinclair, Simlicity in Christ, p. 139. J. Wright, The Guarded Gate, p. 29. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 45. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 24. C. J. Ridgeway, The Mountain of Blessedness, p. 57. J. R. Cohn, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 65. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 117. E. M. Goulburn, Three Counsels of the Divine Master, vol. i. p. 118.

THE THIRD BEATITUDE

'Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth.'—MATTHEW V. 5.

I. THE world says 'Stand up for your rights; make the most of yourself; don't let any man put upon you'. And so we are always standing on our dignity, always thinking ourselves insulted or imposed upon. 'Blessed are the meek,' our Lord says. The meek—that is manifestly those who are ready to be put upon as far as they themselves are concerned. This is the character of our Lord, Who, 'when He was reviled, reviled not again; when He suffered, threatened not; but committed Himself to Him that judgeth righteously'.

II. Of course, from another point of view, we may be quite bound from time to time to assert ourselves. We may have to assert ourselves for the sake of the moral order of the Church and of the world. But no one gets true peace, or has really got to the foundation of things, until, as far as his own dignity is concerned, he is in a position to say, You can wrong God and you can wrong society; and it may be my duty to stand up for God and for society; but me, as far as I am concerned, you cannot provoke. This is the ideal to which we have to attain.

III. And the result of this entire absence of self-assertion is that we can make no claim on the world which God will not at the last substantiate. 'Blessed are the meek'—our Lord is here quoting the Psalm—'for they shall inherit the earth'. What is an heir? An heir is a person who enters into rightful possession. Now, if we go about the world making claims on society which God does not authorize, refusing to bear what God will have us bear, the day will come when the true Master appears, and we shall be exposed to shame. But the meek, who have committed themselves to Him that judgeth righteously, have nothing to fear. 'Friend, come up higher,' is all that is before them. They will simply, in steady and royal advance, enter into the full heritage of that which men kept back from them, but God has in store for them.—BISHOP GORE, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 32.

'Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth.'—MATTHEW V. 5.

THE history of the world confirms the prophecy that the meek shall inherit the earth. A nation that sells its birthright of peace, and backslides from the front rank of industrialism into the file of filibusterism, makes a poor bargain indeed.—FROM PROF. NITOE'S, Bushido, pp. 186, 187.

WHEN have we ever before held such a clew to the meaning of Christ's Sermon on the Mount? 'Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth.' In the cruel strife of centuries has it not often seemed as if the earth were to be rather the prize of the hardest heart and the strongest fist? To many men these words of Christ have been as foolishness and as a stumbling-block, and the ethics of the Sermon on the Mount have been openly derided as too good for this world. . . . It is none the less true that when once the degree of civilization is such as to allow this highest type of character, distinguished by its meekness and kindness, to take root and thrive, its methods are incomparable in their potency.—FISKE, Man's Destiny, chap. xv.

COULD the world unite in the practice of that despised train of virtues, which the Divine ethics of our Saviour hath so inculcated upon us, the furious face of things must disappear; Eden would be yet to be found, and the angels might look down, not with pity, but joy upon us.—SIR THOMAS BROWNE, Christian Morals.

THE declaration of our Saviour that the meek shall inherit the earth may be understood, I think, as verified in the very nature and attributes of meekness. The dross of the earth the meek do not inherit; but all the true enjoyments, the wisdom, love, peace, and independence, which earth can bestow, are assured to the meek as inherent in their meekness.—SIR HENRY TAYLOR.

'Blessed are the meek.'—MATTHEW V. 5.

SAY what you will of Pietism, no one can deny the sterling worth of the characters which it formed. It gave to them the highest thing that man can possess—that peace, that cheerful spirit, that inner harmony with self which can be disturbed by no passion. No pressure of circumstances or persecution of men could make them discontented, no rivalry could provoke them to anger and bitterness. Even the casual observer was touched with an involuntary feeling of respect before such men. I yet remember what happened on one occasion when difficulties arose between the strap-makers and the saddlers in regard to their respective rights. My father's interests were seriously affected; yet even in conversation the difference was discussed by my parents with such tolerance and indulgence towards the opposite party, and with such a fixed trust in Providence, that, boy as I then was, the memory of it will never leave me.—KANT.

DESCRIBING the character of Mr. Robert Cunningham, minister of Holywood in Ireland during the early part of the seventeenth century, Livingstone declares that 'he was the one man to my discerning, of all that ever I saw, who resembled most the meekness of Jesus Christ in his whole carriage, and was so far revered by all, even the most wicked, that he was oft troubled with that Scripture, "Woe to you when all men speak well of you!"'

REFERENCES.—V. 5.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.—VIII. p. 126. J. Brett, The Blessed Life, p. 22. W. J. Woods, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 134. W. M. Sinclair, Simplicity in Christ, p. 163. E. M. Goulburn, Three Counsels of the Divine Master, vol. i. p. 133. S. A. Tippo, Sunday Mornings at Norwood, p. 55. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 61. E. Lyttleton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 66. C. J. Ridgway, The Mountain of Blessedness, p. 34. J. R. Cohu, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 74.

THE FOURTH BEATITUDE

'Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled.'—MATTHEW V. 6.

I. THE citizens of the new kingdom 'hunger and thirst after righteousness'. Everyone knows what appetite is, what hunger and thirst mean. It is a strong craving, a craving which must be satisfied, or we perish. You cannot forget that you are hungry or thirsty. And in human pursuits we again and again see what is like hunger and thirst. Righteousness, or rather the righteousness, that character which God has marked out for us, the character of Christ—blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after it.

II. We so often feel hopeless about getting over our faults. Let us hunger and thirst after righteousness, and we shall be filled. As our Lord saw of the travail of His soul and was satisfied, so, depend upon it, shall we. If you only seriously want to be good, your progress may be slow, but at the last you will be good. Christ is pledged to satisfy, if only you will go on wanting. There is not in the pursuit of goodness any failure except in ceasing to hunger and thirst—that is, in ceasing to want, to pray, to try.

III. Do you want righteousness seriously, deliberately? Then you can have it, and not for yourself only, but for the world. 'Till righteousness turn again unto judgment, all such as are true in heart shall follow it.' It is pledged to us. The day will come when the kingdom of heaven, the kingdom of righteousness and meekness and truth, shall be an established and a visible fact. Blessed are they that here and now hunger and thirst after righteousness in themselves and in the world: for they shall be filled. BISHOP GORE, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 34.

'Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled.'—MATTHEW V. 6.

GRACE is a nourishment, and the richness of its sustaining quality is determined by one thing alone—the genuineness of our desire.—E. LYTTELTON.

REFERENCES.—V. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxv. No. 2103. G. Salmon, Gnosticism and Agnosticism, p. 124. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 18. C. G. Finney, Sermons on Gospel Themes, p. 398. W. J. Woods, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 228. Canon Duckworth, ibid. vol. xlii. 1892, p. 303. W. M. Sinclair, Simplicity in Christ, p. 189. J. S. Swan, Short Sermons, p. 48. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 81. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 75. C. J. Ridgeway, The Mountain of Blessedness, p. 47. J. R. Cohu, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 81. J. K. Popham, Sermons, p. 1. E. M. Goulburn, Three Counsels of the Divine Master, p. 144. J. Brett, The Blessed Life, p. 47. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 135. V. 6-8.—T. Disney Barlow, Rays from the Sun of Righteousness, p. 148.

THE FIFTH BEATITUDE

'Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy.'—MATTHEW V. 7.

OF course wherever human misery is, there is also human pity. But, apart from Christ, it was not thought of as a motive force, to be used in redeeming others' lives and in enriching our own.

I. For the disciple of Christ pity is a motive to vigorous action. God in Christ declares His 'power most chiefly in showing mercy and pity'. Powerful pity is pity which passes from emotion into practical and redemptive action. Of such pity only does Christ say 'Blessed are the merciful or pitiful'. Compassion which does nothing is in the New Testament regarded as a form of pernicious hypocrisy.

II. And the merciful shall obtain mercy. Here we get a great law of the Divine dealing. God deals with us as we deal with our fellow-men. Do we want to know how our Lord will regard us at the last day? We can find the answer by considering how our face looks, not in mere passing emotion, but in its serious and deliberate aspect, towards our fellow-men.

III. The same law is observable in the treatment we receive at men's hands. On the whole we can determine men's attitude to us by our attitude to them. Almost all men have their best selves drawn out towards a really compassionate life. 'Perchance for a good man—one who is not only just, but good—some would even dare to die.' 'Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy.'—BISHOP GORE, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 36.

'Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy.'—MATTHEW V. 7.

You will find, alike through the record of the Law and the promises of the Gospel, that there is, indeed, forgiveness with God and Christ for the passing sin of the hot heart, but none for the eternal and inherent sin of the cold. 'Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy';—find it you written anywhere that the unmerciful shall?—RUSKIN, Fors Clavigera, XLIII.

REFERENCES.—V. 7.—J. Brett, The Blessed Life, p. 60. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 143. C. J. Ridgeway, The Mountain of Blessedness, p. 60. W. J. Woods, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 310. W. M. Sinclair, Simplicity in Christ, p. 213. E. M. Goulburn, Three Counsels of the Divine Master, vol. i. p. 158. Stopford A. Brooke, Short Sermons, pp. 208, 214. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 81. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 101. J. R. Cohu, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 89. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 34. V. 7, 10, 11, 12.—George Macdonald, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 79.

HEART PURITY

'Blessed are the pure in heart.'—MATTHEW V. 8.

I. THERE is such a thing, according to the Holy Scriptures, as heart purity; that is to say, there is such a thing as a state of the human heart, in which the man, the genuine man, the person of the present day and of modern circumstances, entirely loves the will of God, and entirely seeks to do it. There is such a thing as will, mind, and affection, united, not divided, against the tempter and for the will of God.

II. But how shall this thing be? Can I answer better than in the words of our Lord, spoken on an occasion close to the purpose of our present thoughts? 'Who then can be saved?' cried the amazed Apostles. Who then can be saved, deep and at the centre, from the love and from the power of sin? 'The things which are impossible with men are possible with God.'

It is a question of a miracle; the requisite is the action of none less than a Divine Person. We can, in the grace and mercy of God, put ourselves in the way of the action, even as helpless sufferers of old, the blind, the halt, the palsied, the bleeding, put themselves in the way of the Man of Nazareth. The secret is the Wonder-Worker Himself, trusted, welcomed in, summoned by the soul, to be the conquering and liberating Presence in its great need, and in its depths.

III. We shall never do it for ourselves. At the centre of things, man is powerless to be his own transfigurer; he can as soon run, he can as soon soar, from his own shadow. But his Maker and his Redeemer, as man yields himself to God, can lift him from that shadow into light, and set him free indeed.—BISHOP H. C. G. MOULE, The Secret of the Presence, p. 218.

THE SIXTH BEATITUDE

'Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God.'—
MATTHEW V. 8.

I. If we are to take part in the kingdom, there must be singleness of purpose. Purity of heart is, of course, continually taken in its narrower meaning of absence of sensual defilement and pollution. That is an important part of purity; and may I say a word about the pursuit of purity in this narrower sense? A great many people are distressed by impure temptations, and they very frequently fail to make progress with them for one reason, namely, that while they are anxious to get rid of sin in this one respect, they are not trying after goodness as a whole. For the way to get over uncleanness is, in innumerable cases, not to fight against that only, but to contend for positive holiness all round, for Christlikeness, for purity of heart in the sense in which Christ used the expression, in the sense in which the 51st Psalm a clean heart is coupled with a 'right spirit'—that is, a will set straight towards God, or simplicity of purpose. Our Lord means 'Blessed are the single-minded,' for they, though as yet they may be far from seeing God, though as yet they may not believe a single article of the Christian Creed, yet at last shall attain the perfect vision; yes, as surely as God is true, they shall be satisfied in their every capacity for truth and beauty and goodness; they shall behold God.

II. Any measure of true spiritual illumination, like that of Job when the Lord had answered his questionings, may be described as 'seeing God'; and in this sense to see God is a necessary preliminary to repentance, and is requisite for spiritual endurance. But in its full sense it is incompatible with any remaining dissatisfaction; it is the final goal of human efforts, the reward of those who here are content to 'walk by faith, not by sight,' and it includes in perfection—what in a measure all discovery after search includes—satisfaction for the intellect, and full attainment for the will, and the ecstasy of the heart, in God as He is.—BISHOP GORE, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 40.

'Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God.'—
MATTHEW V. 8.

'Hold off from sensuality,' says Cicero, 'for if you have given yourself up to it, you will find yourself unable to think of anything else.' That is morality. 'Blessed are the pure in heart,' says Jesus Christ; 'for they shall see God.' That is religion.—MATTHEW ARNOLD.

As I myself look at it, there is no fault nor folly of my life—and both have been many and great—that does not rise up against me, and take away my joy, and shorten my power of possession, of sight, of understanding. And every past effort of my life, every gleam of rightness or good in it, is with me now, to help me in my grasp of this heart, and its vision.—RUSKIN.

'INTUITION,' said Amiel, 'is the recompense of inward purity.'

THE remark has often been made that the pre-eminent, the winning, the irresistible Christian virtues, were charity and chastity. Perhaps the chastity was an even more winning virtue than the charity; it offered to the Iagan world, at any rate, relief from a more oppressive, a more consuming, a more intolerable bondage. Chief among the beatitudes, shone, no doubt, this pair: Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven, and Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God; and of these two, the second blessing may have brought even the greater boon. . . . Perhaps there is no doctrine of Christianity which is exposed to more trial amongst us now, certainly there is none which will be exposed, so far as from present appearances one can judge, to more trial in the immediate future, than this.—MATTHEW ARNOLD, A Comment on Christmas.

'BLESSED are the pure in heart: for they shall see God.' Blessed are those who have preserved internal sanctity of soul; who are conscious of no secret deceit; who are the same in act as they are in desire; who conceal no thought, no tendencies of thought, from their own conscience; who are faithful and sincere witnesses, before the tribunal of their own judgment, of all that passes within their mind. Such as these shall see God. What! after death, shall their awakened eyes behold the King of heaven? Shall they stand in awe before the golden throne on which He sits, and gaze upon the venerable countenance of the paternal Monarch? Is this the reward of the virtuous and the pure? These are the idle dreams of the visionary, or the pernicious representation of impostors, who have fabricated from the very materials of wisdom a cloak for their own dwarfish or imbecile conception.

Jesus Christ has said no more than the most excellent philosophers have felt and expressed—that virtue is its own reward. It is true that such an expression as He has used was prompted by the energy of genius, and was the overflowing enthusiasm of a poet; but it is not the less literally true [because] clearly repugnant to the mistaken conception of the multitude. . . . That those who are pure in heart shall see God, and that virtue is its own reward, may be considered an equivalent assertion. The former of these propositions is a metaphorical repetition of the latter. The advocates of literal interpretation have been the most efficacious enemies of those doctrines whose nature they profess to venerate.—SHELLEY, Essay on Christianity.

REFERENCES.—V. 8.—J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 119. E. M. Goulburn, Three Counsels of the Divine Master, vol. i. p. 169. G. Salmon, Gnosticism and Agnosticism, p. 53. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, The School of Christ, p. 114. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 53. J. B. Lightfoot, Cambridge Sermons, p. 34; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 309. C. J. Ridgeway, The Mountain of Blessedness, p. 72. E. L. Hull, Sermons, p. 145. W. C. Magee, Christ the Light of all Scripture, p. 105. Stopford A. Brooke, Short Sermons, pp. 256, 263. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 86. J. R. Cohu, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 98. J. S. Swan, Short Sermons, p. 95. B. F. Westcott, The Revelation of the Risen Lord, p. 96. T. F. Lockyer, The Inspirations of the Christian Life, p. 144. J. Guinness Rogers, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 337. W. J. Woods, ibid. vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 418. C. A. Vince, ibid. vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 12. E. H. Eland, ibid. vol. lix. 1901, p. 342. W. T. Davison, ibid. vol. lxi. 1904, p. 337. Bishop E. King, Church Times, vol. lvi. 1906, p. 531. Walter C. Smith, Sermons, p. 50. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 153. V. 8, 9.—George Macdonald, ibid. vol. xlii. 1892, p. 61.

THE SEVENTH BEATITUDE

'Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called sons of God.'—MATTHEW V. 9.

I. CHRIST is the Prince of Peace. He brings about peace among men, breaking down all middle walls of partition between classes and races and individuals, by making them first of all at peace with God—atonement among men by way of atonement with God. This is the only secure basis of peace. There are many kinds of false and superficial peace, which the Prince of Peace only comes to break up. 'I came not to send peace on earth, but a sword.' Peace can never be purchased in God's way by the sacrifice of truth. But peace in the truth we, like our Master, must be for ever pursuing.

II. Do we habitually remember how it offends our Lord to see divisions in the Christian Church, nations nominally Christian armed to the teeth against one another, class against class and individual against individual in fierce and relentless competition, jealousies among clergy and church workers, communicants who forget that the sacrament of union with Christ is the sacrament of union also with their fellow-men?

III. Christians are to be makers of Christ's peace. Something we can all do to reconcile individuals, families, classes, churches, nations. The question is, are we, as churchmen and citizens, by work and by prayer, in our private conduct and our public action, doing our utmost with deliberate, calculated, unsparing effort? If so our benediction is the highest: it is to be, and to be acknowledged as being, sons of God.—BISHOP GORE, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 42.

'Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God.'—MATTHEW V. 9.

'THE Lord,' said Dr. A. A. Bonar, 'does not use me, like His servant, Dr. Chalmers, for great things, but my way of serving the Lord is walking three or four miles to quiet a family dispute.'

Just before his death, Cobden and a friend were walking through St. Paul's Cathedral, when the latter observed that perhaps the name of Cobden one day might be ranked among those heroes. 'I hope not,' Cobden said, 'I hope not. My spirit could not rest in peace among these men of war.'

HE was an happy reconciler of many differences in the families of his friends and kindred—which he never undertook faintly; for such undertakings have usually faint effects—and they had such faith in his judgment and impartiality, that he never advised them to anything in vain.—ISAAC WALTON, Life of Dr. Donne.

COMPARE Sir Philip Warwick's account of Hampden's conduct in a Parliamentary debate. 'We had caught at each other's locks, and sheathed our swords in each other's bowels, had not the sagacity and great calmness of Mr. Hampden, by a short speech, prevented it, and led us to defer our angry debate until the next morning.'

'THIS great gift also,' says Augustine, 'hadst Thou bestowed on Thy good servant, in whose womb Thou didst create me, O my God, my Mercy: wherever she could, she showed herself such a peacemaker between factious and quarrelsome people, that, although she listened to many a bitter word from both sides, such as swelling anger pours forth against an absent enemy in the presence of a friend who has to listen to sharp angry talk, she never would repeat to one what another said, unless it were something which might tend to reconcile them.'

REFERENCES.—V. 9.—J. R. Cohu, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 109. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 139. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 92. W. G. Rutherford, The Key of Knowledge, p. 171. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 71. E. M. Goulburn, Three Counsels of the Divine Master, vol. i. p. 184. C. J. Ridgeway, The Mountain of Blessedness, p. 84. W. J. Woods, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 108. H. Price Hughes, ibid. vol. xlv. 1893, p. 381. G. Body, ibid. vol. liii. 1898, p. 220. H. A. Thomas, ibid. vol. lv. 1899, p. 348. H. Hensley Henson, ibid. vol. lxi. 1902, p. 372. H. D. Rawnsley, ibid. vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 125. F. B. F. Campbell, ibid. vol. lxi. 1904, p. 199. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 422. J. Brett, The Blessed Life, p. 87. F. Lewis Donaldson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 188. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 161. V. 9, 10.—T. D. Barlow, Rays from the Sun of Righteousness, p. 172.

'Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you.'—MATTHEW V. 10, 11.

WHEN St. Francis de Sales was asked which of the beatitudes he preferred, he chose this one, giving it as his reason: 'Because their life is hid with Christ in God, and they are conformed to His image and likeness—inasmuch as all through His earthly life He was persecuted for that very righteousness' sake which He came to fulfil'.

REFERENCES.—V. 10.—C. J. Ridgeway, The Mountain of Blessings, p. 95. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 171. J. Brett, The Blessed Life, p. 103. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 98. E. M. Goulburn, Three Counsels of the Divine Master, vol. i. p. 199. V. 10-12.—J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 161. W. J. Woods, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 166. J. R. Cohu, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 120. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 88. W. M. Sinclair, Simplicity in Christ, p. 239.

'And shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for My sake.'—MATTHEW V. 11.

WHEN immortal Bunyan makes his picture of the persecuting passions bringing in their verdict of guilty, who pities Faithful? That is a rare and blessed lot, which some greatest men have not attained, to know ourselves guiltless before a condemning crowd—to be sure that what we are denounced for is solely the good in us. The pitiable lot is that of the man who could not call himself a martyr even though he were to persuade himself that the men who stoned him were but ugly passions incarnate—who knows that he is stoned, not for professing the Right, but for not being the man he professed to be.—GEORGE ELIOT in Middlemarch.

REFERENCES.—V. 11.—J. R. Cohu, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 45. S. Martin, Rain Upon the Moan Grass, p. 295. F. D. Maurice, The Prayer Book and the Lord's Prayer, p. 331. V. 11, 12.—J. Guinness Rogers, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 339. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 106. V. 12.—C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 243.

SALT WITHOUT SAVOUR

'Ye are the salt of the earth: but if the salt have lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted? it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men.'—MATTHEW V. 13.

I. EACH of the three leading words of this short sentence, 'Ye are the salt of the earth,' appears to have a significance of its own.

1. Ye, 'you living men and women'. This was one meaning of the Incarnation, that the unseen God should be revealed by and through the 'man Christ Jesus'. Christ Himself must be chiefly known—not through His words or even His personal example—but through the men and women who are the living embodiments of His spirit.

2. Ye are the salt. When our Lord calls His disciples—'those who profess and call themselves Christians'—the salt of the earth, He is implicitly warning us against a vulgar error—the error of estimating, or trying to estimate, the real influence of any movement by the simple process of counting heads. The fact is that, from some points of view, it is not so much the quantity of Christians that matters, as the quality, and the failure in the latter respect is often far more grievous than in the former. There was once a city which might have been saved by 'ten righteous' if only they could have been found.

3. 'Ye are the salt of the earth'; of the earth—not of heaven. True it is, to earth that we belong—to earth—and even though our spirits soar beyond the stars, on earth our feet are set. Let us never be tempted by any superfine religion to try and forget or ignore this fact. The 'good Church-people' are not merely the communicants, but those who carry with them into business and politics, into society in general, whether in the west or the east, the salt of a higher honour, justice, purity, usefulness.

II. 'Ye are the salt of the earth.' Salt has, we might say, two special functions of its own. In the first place it is a preserving and purifying power. It saves from corruption. It is an influence which is more felt than seen.

Or, once more, salt suggests the notion of something strong and pungent—that which adds taste and flavour to all that it touches. I am afraid that this is not the idea which we always connect with good people. Good people are frequently conceived of, not as the most strenuous souls, but rather as negative and colourless, or, at the best, sweet and consoling, as though our Lord had said, not 'ye are the salt,' but 'ye are the sugar of the earth'. Do not let us give in to the notion that there is any natural connexion between goodness and dullness, or goodness and weakness. When our Lord said to His disciples, 'Ye are the salt of the earth,' He did not mean that they were to be the wits of the world; but surely He meant that they were to bring to it the savour—shall we say—of consecrated intelligence as well as of moral purity.

III. Salt is good; but if the salt have lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted? The earth needs the Christian religion as much as ever it did; but an insipid and savourless Christianity will not long be tolerated. It is a fearful thing to realize that in us Christ Himself reigns or falls: that by us He is judged, that through us His name is blessed or blasphemed. 'If the salt have lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted?' For there is something more tragical than Jesus crucified by Caiaphas and Pilate—it is the Christ who is wounded 'in the house of His friends'.—II. R. GAMBLE, Christianity and Common Life, p. 63.

'Ye are the salt of the earth. . . . Ye are the light of the world.'—MATTHEW V. 13-15.

To the personal influence of Christians our Lord commits His cause; in personal influence His Church was founded, and by this it was to stand.—R. W. CHURCH.

REFERENCES.—V. 13.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 178. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 113. H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 185. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 1. A. Jessopp, Norwich School Sermons, p. 54. Stopford A. Brooke, Short Sermons, p. 22. V. 13, 14.—F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 76. R. H. McKim, The Gospel in the Christian Year, p. 289. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 104. V. 13-16.—R. W. Church, The Gifts of Civilization, p. 81. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 181. W. M. Sinclair, Simplicity in Christ, p. 263. W. Boyd Carpenter, The Great Charter of Christ, p. 133. A. Melville, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 360. A. Clayton, ibid. vol. lxx. 1906, p. 49. V. 13-37.—C. Gore, Church Times, vol. xxxiii. 1895, p. 337.

CHRIST'S CONCEPTION OF THE CHRISTIAN LIFE

'Ye are the light of the world.'—MATTHEW V. 14.

'I AM the Light of the world.' That is the assumption which Jesus Christ makes for Himself. 'Ye are the light of the world.' That is the high assumption which He makes similarly on the part of His disciples. And taken together they declare that there is not only power in His own character adequate to dispel the darkness, but the power of that character reproduced in His disciples is also capable of the same result.

I. In the parable of the lamp and the lampstand there is a great deal of simple, practical instruction as to light shining—whence it proceeds, how it is maintained, and what is to be its nature and outcome.

1. Of course it assumes that in any life the lamp has been kindled by Jesus Christ. It assumes, too, that the light is received not for the benefit of the lamp, but for the benefit of those among whom the lamp is placed; that the light is given in order to be diffused. Christ is in us in order that He may be seen through us, in all the activities of our lives and influence of our character.

2. And to such as are already kindled the injunction is, 'let your light shine'; that is, do not hinder it from shining. Therefore, Christ's exhortation really calls us to remove all hindrances to the shining of the light in our own lives.

3. Elsewhere in the same sermon, Jesus Christ said: 'If thine eye be single,' etc. If one is seeking first and only His glory, then there is but little doubt as to the clear shining of the light, and but little doubt also as to its influence.

II. Then the Saviour goes on to speak about a lampstand. What does that mean?

1. I cannot but feel that it illustrates our necessary connexion with the world. You have been set in a family—that is, you are set upon a lampstand there. You have been put into an office, and that place with all its duties is God's own lampstand for you.

2. It is well to remember that the appearance of the lampstand has very little to do with the shining. You may have a beautiful lampstand, but it does not make the light shine any brighter. Let your light shine just where you are.

3. It is the darkness which is immediately surrounding us that is to be illumined. 'All that are in the house' does not mean all that are in the next street, the next town, or village, or country.

III. If the light is to shine, it is, of course, necessary to see that the flame is continually fed. There is need of continual secret assimilation of oil. If we fail to receive a continual ministry of grace to our own hearts, we shall fail when we seek to minister to others.

The cost at which a man becomes a shining light. Of course, it is the oil which feeds the flame, but the wick burns also. You must be consumed also if others through you are going to have light shed upon the pathway, upon the great mysteries and facts of life. Do not forget that it will cost you no less than it cost Jesus Christ, the entire sacrifice of yourself.—J. STUART HOLDEN, 'Christ's Conception of the Christian Life,' Mundesley Bible Conference, 1908, p. 63.

Illustration.—I read a very interesting thing the other day in the life of Leonardo da Vinci, who painted the famous picture of the Lord's Supper. When he had painted this wonderful picture he called in one of his friends to see it. He stood back from the canvas with his friend, waiting in silence for his comment on what he himself regarded as his greatest work. His friend's first words were, 'How wonderfully you have painted that silver cup.' The painter immediately took his brush and put a great daub of black paint over it. The friend, in consternation, said: 'Why did you do that?' 'I did that,' he replied, 'because it was the cup which first attracted your attention, and I do not want anything in my work to detract from the central figure of Jesus Christ. I have painted that picture to give men a conception of Him, and if you come and fix upon that which is a mere detail in the picture, and so overlook Him, it must go.' I could not but feel that the devotion of that painter of early days to Jesus Christ is as an inspiration and an example to me. If my life is to shine for Christ, if Christ is to be the central figure, if Christ is to be seen in me in all His beauty, other things must be painted out, other things must be sacrificed; they must go.

You must for wisdom, for sanity, have some access to the mind and heart of the common humanity. The exclusive excludes itself.—SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.

LET YOUR LIGHT SHINE

I WOULD not give much for your religion unless it can be seen. Lamps do not talk; but they do shine. A lighthouse sounds no drum, it beats no gong; and yet far over the water its friendly spark is seen by the mariner. So let your actions shine out your religion. Let the main sermon of your life be illustrated by all your conduct, and it shall not fail to be illustrious.—C. H. SPURGEON.

'Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on an hill cannot be hid. Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house.'—MATTHEW V. 14, 15.

THE whole majesty of humanity raised to its fullness, and every gift and power necessary for a given purpose, at a given moment, centred in one man, and all this perfected blessing permitted to be refused, perverted, crushed, cast aside by those who need it most,—the city which is Not set on a hill, the candle that giveth light to None that are in the house;—these are the heaviest mysteries of this strange world, and, it seems to me, those which mark its curse the most.—RUSKIN, Stones of Venice, vol. II.

LIKE a horse after running, a dog after tracking the game, and a bee after storing honey, so a man, after some good deed, does not call others to come and see, but goes on to do another deed, as the vine proceeds to produce grapes season after season.—MARCUS AURELIUS.

REFERENCES.—V. 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1100. H. P. Liddon, Christmastide in St. Paul's, p. 405; see also Penny Pulpit, No. 485. W. M. Sinclair, Religion in Common Life, p. 58. F. Mudie, Bible Truths and Bible Characters, p. 233. H. Scott Holland, Church Times, vol. lvi. 1906, p. 380; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 216. J. W. Diggle, Sermons for Daily Life, p. 37. J. H. Newman, Parochial and Plain Sermons, vol. i. p. 152. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. iii. p. 406. W. G. Rutherford, The Key of Knowledge, pp. 182-209. R. Rainy, Sojourning With God, p. 64. W. H. Dallinger, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 52. W. L. Watkinson, ibid. vol. lx. 1901, p. 388. V. 14-16.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 188. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 16. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 120. V. 15, 16.—J. B. Mozley, Sermons Preached Before the University of Oxford, p. 262. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1894.

'Let your light so shine before men; that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.'

—MATTHEW V. 16.

CHRIST doth not say that others hearing your good works, your good story, or your pathological expressions; but that others seeing your good works may glorify your Father.—JONATHAN EDWARDS.

'LET your light shine before men,' wrote Margaret Gordon to Carlyle, 'and think them not unworthy the trouble.'

GOD appoints to every one of His creatures a separate mission, and if they discharge it honourably, if they quit themselves like men, and faithfully follow the light which is in them, withdrawing from it all cold and quenching influence, there will assuredly come of it such burning as, in its appointed mode and measure, shall shine before men, and be of service constant and holy.—RUSKIN, Frondees Agrestes, p. 71.

TOLSTOY, in his Confession, speaks of the faith and practice of orthodox believers in his own circle, men whose religious position was respectable, and whose manner of life in no way differed from the ambitious, vicious conduct of unbelievers like himself. 'No arguments were able to convince me of the sincerity of such so-called believers' faith. Only actions, proving their conception of life to have destroyed that fear of poverty, illness, and death, so strong in myself, could have convinced me; and such actions I could not see among them. Such actions, indeed, I saw among the open infidels of my own class in life, but never among its so-called believers.'

'A MAN,' said Mozley, 'can only be a witness to the Christian faith, if his life can only be accounted for by Christian faith.'

'Before men.'—MATTHEW V. 16.

THE main point nowadays is to be pious in the open air.—ROTHER.

'I CANNOT,' said John Wesley's father to him, 'allow austerity or fasting, considered by themselves, to be proper acts of holiness, nor am I for a solitary life. God made us for a social life. We are to let our light shine before men, and that not barely through the chinks of a bushel, for fear the wind should blow it out; the design of lighting it was, that it might give light to all who went into the house of God.'

'It has struck me often lately,' writes Mr. Coventry Patmore in a letter, 'that a Kempis, whom you are daily reading now, cannot be read with safety without remembering that he wrote his book expressly for the use of monks. There is much that is quite unfit for and untrue of people who live in the ordinary relations of life. I don't think I like the book quite as much as I did. There is a hot-house, egotistical air about much of its piety. Other persons are so ordinarily the appointed means of learning the love of God, and to stifle human affections must be very often to render the love of God impossible.'

REFERENCES.—V. 16.—G. F. Holden, Church Times, vol. lviii. 1907, p. 810. B. Reynolds, ibid. vol. li. 1904, p. 112; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1904, p. 54. H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 244. Henry Wace, Some Central Points of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 213. E. Fowle, Plain Preaching to Poor People, Sermon (1st Series). J. W. Diggle, Sermons for Daily Life, p. 79. E. Talbot, Sermons Preached in Leeds Parish Church, 1889-1895, p. 86. W. Lefroy, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxvi. 1904, p. 27. J. B. Mozley, Sermons Parochial and Occasional, p. 212. W. M. Punshon, Christian Consistency, Sermons, p. 737.

THE PRESUPPOSITIONS OF CHRISTIANITY— THE OLD TESTAMENT

'Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil.'—MATTHEW V. 17.

OUR Christianity is unique, a thing by itself; but it has not come into existence without any ties with the past. It is original; it is not eclectic; but it has one great root from which it has sprung and of which it claims to be the perfect flower. That is the revelation of God to Israel, recorded in the sacred books of that people, the collection of which we call the Old Testament. To a full and proper understanding of Christianity, a man must know the Old Testament; he must in a measure be familiar with the religion of the Jews. His own faith has blossomed out of that, and owes much to it. It is the presuppositions of Christianity in the Old Testament that we shall look at here. To the rest, Christianity, at any rate in its primitive and purest form, owes nothing directly. Its debts are directly, and in the first instance only, to the Old Testament faith.

I. I would even emphasize the statement in that form as my first point. It is not to Judaism as it existed in Christ's time that any debt is due. It is to the religion which is enshrined in the Old Testament. And the distinction is vital. There is a serious difference between Judaism as Christ found it, and the religion which He recognized as the truth in the much misunderstood sacred books of His people. There was there the revelation which God had given of Himself, and there was alongside of it the man-made version which passed current in the temple and in the synagogue, which was expounded in the schools, and which was practised by the Pharisee. The latter has its modern survival, but it is not Christianity. It is the Judaism of the present day, with the modifications and embellishments which have made it what it is in order to serve a people without a country or a central shrine, at which alone they might perform the rites which ought to be observed, but perforce must lie in abeyance. It is not to that we turn to find the presuppositions of Christianity. That has little to tell us. Our Lord, in fact, repudiated the whole body of tradition, because, as He said, the Scribes and Pharisees made void the law of God by their tradition.

II. Christianity accepts without further discussion or exposition the ripened views of the religion of Israel on many primary religious truths. It takes, for instance, the Old Testament view of God, of man, of the Messiah. These, of course, are views that had only gradually attained to clearness in Israel's consciousness through God's continuous teaching. And it is the mature view which Christianity assumes, and to which it adds. But what the Old Testament thus offers, it accepts without demur.

(a) The Old Testament never attempts to prove the existence of God. It sets the man down as a fool, i.e. not wrong in his head, but wrong in his will, uttering not what he thinks, but what he wishes, who says there is no God. Its very first book, with its very first words, begins with the assumption of God: 'In the beginning God'. That is the attitude of the New Testament.

(b) So with regard to man: Christianity thinks of man as the Old Testament has taught him to think of him. Man as the New Testament deals with him is man made in the image of God. He is man—no isolated unit, but linked by a thousand ties to all his race who have preceded him and to all his fellow-men amongst whom he lives. He is man, with a physical frame that needs to be nourished, clothed, and cared for; but that is the least of him. He is man, with an intelligence that lifts him high above the beasts that perish. He is man, with an immortal soul fitted for fellowship with God Himself. He is man, with the fateful right of a free will and the dread responsibility which its use involves. He is man, fallen by his own fatal choice. He is man, lost, unable to save himself, but not beyond salvation. That is man as the Christian knows him, but the New Testament offers no proofs. It takes man as it finds him in actual human experience, as does the Old Testament.

(c) In the same way the New Testament takes over the whole Messianic hope of the Old. It offers to its students the justification and fulfilment of that hope in Jesus, whom it presents as the Messiah, the Christ. That hope itself was a growth. The seed was the promise to Adam almost immediately after the fall: 'The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent'.

III. Turn to a further general consideration. The possession of this great treasure-house of moral and religious truth accounts for many things that seem omissions in Christianity as it appears in what are its own distinctive records and in the teachings of its Founder. 'Take away the Old Testament,' says John Ker, 'and even though the Christianity of the New were left, there would be an immense want in meeting the different moods of feeling and stages of thought in human nature.' There is little in the New Testament to stir the patriotic sentiments. There is little to correspond to the book of Psalms. What is there to tell us that phases of thought like those which meet us in the book of Job or of Ecclesiastes are compatible with devoutness? Nothing. But why? Is it because they are alien to Christianity? No; but because they are adequately dealt with in the first stages of revelation which Christianity adopts as its own.—ROBERT J. DRUMMOND, Faith's Certainties.

FULFILMENT

'Not to destroy, but to fulfil.'—MATTHEW V. 17.

I. JESUS CHRIST here gives us the secret of every great ministry. We shall never be great preachers if we only discourse upon the topics of the day. He has a poor text who has only the latest anecdote of an evening newspaper. That is not preaching to the times, that is making a livelihood out of lies. He preaches to the times who preaches from eternity. Jesus Christ did not displace the law and the Prophets, He will talk with both of them upon a mountain by and by; they three—Law, Prophet, Redeemer—will meet and reveal the unity of things. The secret of a great ministry is that it founds itself upon the original, the primordial, the initial; its great speech is ab initio, coming up with dews of heaven's first and only morning upon it. That is preaching.

II. If we follow Jesus therefore we shall hear wonderful speaking.

1. Take, for example, His doctrine respecting worship. That doctrine was taught to one hearer Jesus Christ never kept anything for great assemblies. We keep our little essays for the principal meeting. Ah me! what wonder we are buried so cheaply and so instantaneously forgotten! Jesus revealed the great doctrine of true spiritual worship to one hearer, and she was a woman. The women said all the most beautiful things that are to be found in Scripture, and the things were the more beautiful that the women knew nothing about their beauty. They were words wrung out of agony. Agony is always eloquent. Jesus Christ did not rebuke people for worshipping in special localities. When did He contract history or reduce it by subtraction to some meaner expressiveness? When did He fail to open the bud and show the full flower? If He had destroyed the local notion of prayer He would have created an immense prejudice; He accepted it, enlarged it, glorified it by fulfilment and completion.

2. We might illustrate this text from the more concrete point of what is known as beneficence or good-doing. The Jew thought he had advanced to the very final step in the march of civilization when he gave something to the inoffensive stranger, to the harmless widow and orphan; but Jesus says, If thine enemy hunger, feed him; love thine enemy: go to the positive aspect of thy poor beneficence. Whilst we were yet sinners Christ died for us; not whilst we were becoming sinners, but when we had reached the very depth of our apostasy, and when we had depleted ourselves of all nervous power and all moral restorativeness, when we had lost all self-helpfulness; while we were yet sinners, the blood dripped on us, the red blood of the infinite Redemption. I am not come to destroy your little beneficences and maxims of caretaking respecting the stranger and the fatherless and the widow, but I am come to raise you to that Godlikeness which is kind to the unthankful and to the evil, to that Divinity of love which sheds its showers upon the atheist and the blasphemer.

3. We might illustrate the text by Jesus Christ's estimate of righteousness. He found a good deal of respectability in His day; there were many persons who were reading pious sentences and observing more or less reputable traditions; He looked abroad upon the whole mass, and having estimated all that was being done by Scribe and Pharisee and Sadducee, He said, Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and of the Pharisees, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.

4. Jesus Christ said, You must enlarge your conceptions of the world; of course it was right that you begin with this little place which you call your own land. If there was anything in the world which Jesus Christ was not it was a patriot. A patriot was a very small but frequently a somewhat necessary person. Jesus Christ was not a patriot. Jesus Christ was a philanthropist, a man-lover, a world-redeemer. And beautiful it is to mark the evolution of this thought in the apostolic missionary service.

5. If you will read the law—hard, stiff reading, and equally an education and a successful examination—if you will read the law as given in the Pentateuch, you will see what Jesus Christ has done in the enlargement of men's ideas and the fulfilment of elementary discipline and propositions. Love, if true, is growing, it will be mighty some day; and then we shall see that though the tithe has not been done away it has been carried up into its proper consummation; it is displaced by love, all-giving love, that wondrous love which says nothing has been given whilst anything has been withheld.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. vii.

FULFILMENT, NOT DESTRUCTION, THE METHOD OF JESUS

'I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil.'—MATTHEW v. 17.

I. It is evident that our Lord's critics had been denouncing Him as an intellectual and social anarchist, and one can imagine their evidence.

It is also evident that Jesus keenly resented this charge, and one can understand His reasons. When He was called a revolutionary there was enough truth in the criticism to make it dangerous. He did appear on first sight not to improve but to reverse the past, not to attack abuses but to uproot institutions, and if this had been so it would have been a serious reflection, both upon the wisdom and the work of Jesus. Destruction is not the principle of growth in any province of God's universe.

Had the opponents of Jesus been able to take a fairer view of His work, they would have found that He was the opposite of what their fears painted. Under His spirit the God of Abraham and Jacob became our Heavenly Father, to be worshipped the world over wherever there was an honest heart.

II. Fulfilment is the guiding principle of all successful progress and ought to control every department of action. When, for instance, we attempt the regeneration of society, repression may be needful as a temporary measure; but repression is a policy of despair. It coerces, but it does not control, it terrifies, but it does not satisfy. We ought to go to the root of the matter and find out the causes which create the vices of the people.

1. The same principle holds in the elimination of sin from an individual life. To sin is to miss the mark; the arrow went astray, and struck the wrong place. Every vice is the inversion of a virtue, it is degenerate goodness. Moralists of the second order would advise a man to put his sins under lock and key: Jesus teaches men to expel them. He would transform temptations to sin and make them incentives to holiness; He would have us concern ourselves not with the destruction of the evil but with the cultivation of the good.

2. With this principle of fulfilment we ought also to approach the erroneous ideas which affect the popular mind and are rivals of the truth. It is wiser to give a man what he is seeking after than to denounce its imperfect substitute. It is, indeed, of no use to take away unless you can bestow, and therefore the wise missionary of to-day finds out what the non-Christian religion means, and shows that it is a prophecy of Christ. It is the unknown God whom men are seeking through many systems and after many fashions; it is the known God whom Jesus reveals and presents to us all.

Just as religion appears to us a fulfilment or a destruction of life, shall we come to love or hate it. If religion be nothing but a refusing and denying, a repressing and mortifying, then it may be a necessity; it is also a burden. But this is not the religion of Jesus as He taught and illustrated it in the life of Galilee. With Him religion was not a bondage, but the breaking of fetters, that the sons of God might enter into the liberty of their Father's house.—J. WATSON (IAN MACLAREN), The Inspiration of Our Faith, p. 147.

'Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil.'—MATTHEW V. 17.

COMPARE the closing sentences of Max Nordau's Degeneration: 'The criterion by which true moderns may be recognized and distinguished from impostors calling themselves moderns may be this: Whoever preaches absence of discipline is an enemy of progress; and whoever worships his "I" is an enemy to society. Society has for its first premise, neighbourly love and capacity for self-sacrifice; and progress is the effect of an even more rigorous subjugation of the beast in man, of an ever intenser self-restraint, an ever keener sense of duty and responsibility. The emancipation for which we are striving is of the judgment, not of the appetites. In the profoundly penetrating words of Scripture: Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil.'

COMPARE MATTHEW ARNOLD's verses entitled 'Progress'.

'Think not.'—MATTHEW V. 17.

To be misunderstood even by those whom one loves is the cross and bitterness of life. It is the secret of that sad and melancholy smile on the lips of great men which so few understand; it is the cruellest trial reserved for self-devotion; it is what must have oftenest wrung the heart of the Son of Man; and if God could suffer, it would be the wound we should be for ever inflicting on Him. He also—He above all—is the great misunderstood, the least comprehended.—AMIEL.

THERE is still something of self-seeking in the refined disinterestedness which will not justify itself, that it may feel itself superior to opinion.—AMIEL.

REFERENCES.—V. 17.—J. R. Cohu, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 38. W. Boyd Carpenter, The Great Charter of Christ, p. 151. J. M. Wilson, The Anglican Pulpit of To-Day, p. 356. A. Jessopp, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 218. Reuben Thomas, ibid. vol. lx. 1901, p. 404. H. E. J. Bevan, ibid. vol. lxxiii. 1903, p. 325. V. 17-20.—J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 203. W. M. Sinclair, Simplicity in Christ, p. 287. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 125. V. 17-26.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 199. V. 17-48.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. liii. No. 3031. V. 18.—Ibid. vol. xxviii. No. 1680. V. 19.—H. P. Liddon, Clerical Life and Work, p. 355. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ix. p. 64.

TRUE RELIGION

'I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness (or rightness) of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven.'—MATTHEW V. 20.

THESE words of our Lord are a challenge, an impeachment and an indictment of high treason against those in authority in the Church. No man who uttered such words, under such conditions, could escape retaliation. Had our Lord contented Himself with His wonderful works, He might have walked across Calvary unscathed. But one who could say such things as this, under such circumstances, must come to the Cross. Those who were so challenged were certain to encompass His death. For I want you just to notice who the challenge was made against. It was made against the great religious teachers of the day, the scribes and Pharisees. They were the oracles of the kingdom, and in no case could they enter into the kingdom whose oracles they held. You know how the case stood, how religion had become formal, mechanical. You cannot turn out righteousness from any machine. Directly religion becomes a system, it loses its power. Systematized religion degenerates always, sooner or later, into formalism. It was so then, and has ever been so since.

I. The Scribes were the men who knew all about Holy Scripture. They read it, they learned it, they knew every word of it. And yet, though they knew all about it, they did not know it.

II. And the Sadducees, who were they? They were the Higher Critics of the day. How did the Lord admonish them? He said, You are only haggling over the letter, you are literalists. You do not know the Scriptures, and you do not know the power of God.

III. Then you know about the Pharisees and their punctiliousness, how they were the religionists. They did exactly what they were told in the letter and not the spirit. According to the Pharisees, you might touch the dead body of an ass, but not of a high priest, because that would defile you. And you must not go and eat with unwashed hands. What did our Lord do? He and His disciples deliberately went and sat down to dinner with unwashed hands—deliberately, as an object lesson.

IV. I want you to note that our Lord stands amongst us to-day, and says to us, 'Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven'. Is our religion formal? When we worship Christ with ceremony, let it be with understanding too—with the head and with the heart. He loved me, and washed me, and gave Himself for me, and the object of life is to be like Him. If this righteousness is in us, we are right. Take care that your faith does not make you formalists at heart. It must make you like your dear Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.—A. H. STANTON, Unpublished Sermon.

THINGS NO MAN COULD SAY

'I say unto you.'—MATTHEW V. 20.

THINGS which no man would say or would be allowed to say and retain any reputation for sanity or truthfulness. There are things which we cannot say, as certainly as there are things which we ought not to say.

Yet we are now face to face with a Man who used all the vocabulary of God, a Man who never hesitated to use the language which God alone, according to our interpretation, has permitted Himself to use.

I. Begin where you like, the evidence is forthcoming and is unique.

1. Let us hear Him in one of His simplest speeches; simplest, that is, when looked upon superficially: 'I am meek and lowly in heart'. No man has a right to say that; to say 'I am meek' is to prove that the speaker is not meek; to claim lowliness may be to abandon it. Never forget the ironies of history. Consider what it is for a man to stand up in any company of his fellows and to say, 'I am meek and lowly in heart'! Not a soul would believe him; there is a human instinct, an unwritten transcendental human intuition that says to a speaker, No, for if you were so you would not speak thus; you would leave us to discover your meekness and your lowliness of heart.

2. Take another instance, running on the same line: 'I will give you rest'. This is a word that no sane man can utter if he be only a man. Who knows the meaning of rest as Jesus Christ used that pregnant word? No man can give another man rest; he can lull him, soothe him, administer opiates to him, and bring to bear upon him the influence of chemical anodynes; he cannot give peace, rest, fullness of peace.

3. Take this instance. 'I and My Father are one'. If that occurs only once perhaps it was introduced surreptitiously, but it does not occur only once; for the same lips said: 'He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father'. A man may have said that, but he called down upon himself the ridicule of all who heard it; he did not seek the faith of the world, he tempted its distrust and its derision.

4. Hear Him once again, as we might hear Him in every day of His life: 'I will raise him up at the last day'. A man cannot say that, and be only a man; he is a lunatic, he is the devil, or he is God. You cannot make a commonplace of him; you find no place in history that he can occupy. Can any man in the world stand this test? Not one. If any man has uttered these words he was less than a man or more than a man; and you cannot find a middle place for him.

II. These are some of the passages. Now these passages put Christ in this position; they utterly discredit Him; He is the victim of His own pretensions; He has discredited Himself in the presence of sober-minded, honourable criticism. If He had claimed less He might have received more. He would sit down nowhere but on the throne. A man may easily cut up his own claims and pretensions, and may be burned by lighting his own certificates and credentials, and go up with them in their own smoky evaporation. But if the words are true they make Jesus Christ more than a man and better than a man; and you cannot remove those words from the record without removing Christ with them.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. III. p. 13.

'Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven.'—MATTHEW V. 20.

PEOPLE have often tried to find a type of life that might serve as a basement type. . . . The type must be one discontented with society as it is.—WALTER PATER.

REFERENCES.—V. 20.—F. E. Paget, Faculties and Difficulties for Belief and Unbelief, p. 100. H. S. Lunn, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxx-iii. 1890, p. 382. H. Hensley Henson, ibid. vol. lxx. 1904, p. 136. R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 28. H. Varley, Spiritual Light and Life, p. 120. J. B. Mozley, Sermons Preached Before the University of Oxford, p. 25. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. iii. p. 50. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 36. V. 21.—F. W. Farrar, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 232. Hugh Black, ibid. vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 7.

'It was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not. . . . But I say. . . .'—MATTHEW V. 21, 22.

ONE of the commonest and most deep-seated, and perhaps not the least pernicious fallacy in our estimate of relative 'goodness,' lies in our disposition to rank negative above positive virtue—abstinence from wrong above active duty and distinguished service. There is surely a higher and completer decalogue than the purely prohibitory one of Sinai, taught us by One who surpassed and superseded Moses. 'Thou shalt' appeals to nobler natures and befits a more advanced civilization than 'Thou shalt not'. The early Israelites, just emerging from the double degradation of semi-barbarism and of slavery, and soiled with the brutal passions and the slimy sins belonging to both conditions, had first to be taught the difficult lessons of self-denial and forbearance. On Christians is laid the loftier obligation of active and laborious achievement. It is much for the fierce appetites and feeble wills of savages to abstain from the grosser indulgences of the temper and the flesh—not to steal, not to kill, not to lust, not to lie. But the civilization of a cultured and awakened age can rest content in no such formal or meagre conception of moral duties. It cannot acquiesce in mere self-regarding excellence. It feels that there is something at once loftier, more generous, and more imperative than the asceticism which aims simply at the elaboration and development of the spiritual possibilities of a man's own nature—and that to serve others, even in miry byways, in menial capacities, in damaging and revolting conditions, is a worthier and more Christian vocation than coddling one's individual soul. Faire son devoir is, after all, a nobler purpose than faire son salut.—W. RATHBONE GREG, Literary and Social Judgments, pp. 488, 489.

REFERENCES.—V. 21, 22.—J. R. Cohu, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 131. H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxix. 1906, p. 321. J. R. Walker, ibid. vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 378. V. 21-24.—E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 135. V. 21-26.—J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 223.

‘I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment.’—MATTHEW V. 22.

You are to distinguish, of course, controversy from rebuke. The assertion of truth is to be always gentle: the chastisement of wilful falsehood may be—very much the contrary indeed. Christ’s Sermon on the Mount is full of polemic theology, but very gentle: ‘Ye have heard that it hath been said—but I say unto you’; ‘and if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others?’ and the like.—RUSKIN; see also Mornings in Florence, § 112.

HIGH cultivation may help to self-command, but it multiplies the chances of irritative contact. In mansion, in hovel, the strain of life is perpetually felt—between the married, between parent and children, between relatives of every degree, between employers and employed. They debate, they dispute, they wrangle, they explode—their nerves are relieved, and they are ready to begin over again. Quit the home and quarrelling is less obvious, but it goes on all about one. What proportion of the letters delivered any morning would be found to be written in displeasure, in petulance, in wrath? The post-bag shrieks insults or bursts with suppressed malice.—GEORGE GISSING.

REFERENCES.—V. 22.—E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 141. W. Leighton Grace, Hard Sayings of Jesus Christ, p. 151.

MEMORY AT THE ALTAR

‘If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest.’—MATTHEW V. 23.

THERE are a hundred things we may and ought to do at the altar. We should bow at the altar with reverence of spirit. We should confess at the altar with penitence of soul. We should sing at the altar with glad thanksgiving. We should make our vows at the altar with earnest purpose. But whatever else we do we must there remember. We must yoke memory to worship else worship will be vain.

I. We must remember our relations with our fellows. That is a secret of blessing at the altar. It is an enrichment of our worship that we remember our happy relations with our fellows.

It is essential to our worship that we remember our unhappy social conditions at the altar. Our brother may have a legitimate grievance against us. We have wronged him. And we are called to remember that unwelcome fact at the holy altar. Leave your gift before the altar, go and be reconciled to your brother, then, with clean hands and a pure heart come and offer your gift. Do not forget the gift and the altar when you have righted yourself with your brother. No social service, however obligatory and beautiful, must lead us to neglect the gift and the altar. Our Lord, Who was the servant of all, was supremely the servant of Jehovah.

There must always be a right relationship between our service of humanity and our sacrifice to God.

When I give God His rights I shall hasten to give man his rights. Philanthropy and worship must blend if both are to be effective. It is indeed a short-sighted policy which would abolish the altar and its worship for the service of humanity. Look at the very meaning of the word worship: it means worship.

II. Passing from the immediate reference of the text, and still holding to its principle, we must remember the general circumstances of our life. Life’s painful circumstances are seen in their true proportions if remembered at the altar.

III. We must remember our sins. This is not a popular doctrine, nor is it a popular practice. Yet it is a deep necessity of the soul that when we bring our gift to the altar we remember our transgressions. Public worship offers us an immense opportunity for the exercise of memory upon our sins. As Benjamin Jowett of Balliol has said, ‘The advantage of public worship is that it is also private’. The privacy of public worship is its opportunity and its charm. If memory be thus exercised, it shall lead us to a great evangelical victory. We shall pass from the vision of our sin to the vision of the blood of Jesus, God’s Son, which cleanseth us from all sin.—DINDALE T. YOUNG, Messages for Home and Life, p. 155.

REFERENCES.—V. 23.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. ii. p. 70; see also Readings for the Aged (4th Series), p. 148. V. 23-25.—E. Griffith Jones, The Cross and the Dice Box, p. 39. V. 24.—C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 147. V. 25.—H. Rawlings, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lii. 1897, p. 299. V. 25, 26.—T. Disney Barlow, Rays from the Sun of Righteousness, p. 1. W. H. Brookfield, Sermons, p. 58. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 150. V. 26.—F. C. Spurr, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 117. V. 27, 28.—E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 157. ‘Plain Sermons’ by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ix. p. 295.

‘Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.’—MATTHEW V. 28.

BUT this is not the rule by which we are to judge our past actions, but to guard our future ones. He who has thoughts of lust or passion is not innocent in the sight of God, and is liable to be carried on to perform the act on which he suffers himself to dwell. And in looking forward, he will do well to remember this caution of Christ’s, but in looking backward, in thinking of others, in endeavouring to estimate the actual amount of guilt or trespass; if he begins by placing thought upon the level of action, he will end by placing action on the level of thought. It would be a monstrous state of mind in which we regarded mere imagination of evil as the same thing with action; hatred as the same with murder; thoughts of impurity as the same with adultery. It is not so that we have learned Christ. . . . However important it may be to remember that the all-seeing eye of God tries the reins, it is no less important to remember also that morality consists in definite acts capable of being seen and judged of by our fellow-creatures.—JOWETT.

SHE WAS UNAWARE that the distance between us and dreadful crimes is much greater often than it appears to be. The man who looks on a woman with adulterous desire has already committed adultery in his heart if he be restrained only by force or fear of detection; but if the restraint, although he may not be conscious of it, is self-imposed, he is not guilty. Nay, even the dread of consequences is a motive of sufficient respectability to make a large difference between the sinfulness of mere lust and that of its fulfilment.—From Miriam's Schooling, by MARK RUTHERFORD.

REFERENCES.—V. 28.—C. S. Macfarland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1900, p. 21.

'Pluck it out, and cast it from thee.'—MATTHEW V. 29.

No man ever took his besetting sin, it may be lust, or pride, or love of rank and position, and, as it were, cut it out by voluntarily placing himself where to gratify it was impossible, without sensibly receiving a new strength of character.—JOWETT.

REFERENCES.—V. 29, 30.—E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 165. J. B. Mozley, Sermons Parochial and Occasional, p. 1.

'If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee.'—MATTHEW V. 30.

OFFENCE in Scripture does not mean sin itself so much as something suggestive of it; something which puts sin in our way, and places us in imminent danger of giving way to it. In all such cases our Lord enjoins a decided line upon man. . . . After all it is not the temptations which meet men, but the temptations which they go to meet, which they purposely find out, and use all kinds of art and management and subtlety to put themselves in the way of, which do the great mischief in moral and spiritual things.—MOZLEY.

'I say unto you, That ye resist not evil.'—MATTHEW V. 39.

Is not the public air which European nations breathe at this moment, as it has been for several years back, charged with thunder? Despots are plotting, ships are building, man's ingenuity is bent, as it never was bent before, on the invention and improvement of instruments of death; Europe is bristling with five millions of bayonets; and this is the condition of the world for which the Son of God died eighteen hundred and sixty-two years ago! There is no mystery of Providence so inscrutable as this; yet, is not the very sense of its mournfulness a proof that the spirit of Christianity is living in the minds of men? For, of a verity, military glory is becoming in our best thoughts a bloody rag, and conquest the first in the catalogue of mighty crimes. . . . There cannot be a doubt that when the political crimes of kings and governments, the sores that fester in the heart of society, and all 'the burden of the unintelligible world,' weigh heaviest on the mind, we have to thank Christianity for it. That pure light makes visible the darkness. The Sermon on the Mount makes the morality of nations ghastly. The Divine love makes human hate stand out in dark relief. This sadness, in the essence of it nobler than any joy, is the heritage of the Christian. . . . If the Christian is less happy than the Pagan, and at times I think he is so, it arises from the reproach of the Christian's unreachd ideal, and from the strings of his finer and more scrupulous conscience.—ALEXANDER SMITH in Dream-thorp.

IN the Spectator's review of James Gilmour's book, Among the Mongols, it is stated: 'As for danger, he had made up his mind not to carry arms, not to be angry with a heathen, happen what might, and—though he does not mention this—not to be afraid of anything whatever, neither dogs, nor thieves, nor hunger, nor the climate; and he kept those three resolutions. If ever on earth there lived a man who kept the law of Christ, and could give proofs of it, and be absolutely unconscious that he was giving them, it is this man whom the Mongols he lived among called "our Gilmour".'

REFERENCES.—V. 30.—W. Allen Whitworth, Church Times, vol. xxxiii. 1895, p. 638. V. 31, 32.—E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 174. V. 33, 34.—J. H. Jellott, The Elder Son, p. 129. V. 33-37.—C. Gore, Church Times, vol. xlii. 1899, p. 174. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 185. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 208. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 265. V. 30.—W. M. Sinclair, The New Law, p. 89.

THE LAW OF REVENGE

'Ye have heard that it was said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: but I say unto you, Resist not him that is evil.'—MATTHEW V. 38, 39.

OUR Lord is here dealing with one interesting prescription of the old law. It had definitely allowed revenge up to a certain point, but no further. It might go to the point of exact reciprocity.

I. Here we must remark that the law of the old covenant was in itself a limitation of human instinct. The savage instinct of revenge is to rush blindly in, and do as much harm to an enemy as can be done. The savage satisfies himself to the full; he kills the man that has done him wrong and his wife and family. Now nothing is more striking in the old covenant than that it checks barbarous habits and puts them under restraint. The point which needs emphasizing is that the old law worked by way of gradual limitation, not of sudden abolition. God dealt with men gradually. Their savage passions are restrained under the Old Testament as a preparation for the time when they were to be brought under the perfect discipline of the Son of man. So now, when the fullness of the time is come, our Lord lays on this passion of revenge a harder and deeper prescription, and says in fact to each of His disciples: A wrong aimed at thee as an individual is, so far as thy feeling goes, simply to be an occasion for showing complete liberty of spirit and superiority to all outrage. The Lord requires not moderation in revenge, but complete self-effacement.

II. We may notice that this requirement of self-effacement is of the nature of an ascetic prescription, as when our Lord said, 'If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out; if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off'. The instinct of revenge has in it something that is right: something of the passion of justice. It is a true instinct which makes us feel that for wrong done man should suffer wrong. It is derived from the Divine principle of justice. But in our own cases, where our own interests are concerned, this passion of justice has come to be so mixed up with selfishness, and with those excessive demands which spring of selfishness—in a word, it has become so defiled with sin—that our Lord imposes on it an absolute ban; He says: 'Vengeance is Mine, I will repay, saith the Lord'.

III. The requirement which our Lord lays on His disciples is not only made in words. It was enforced, where the enforcement is most striking, in our Lord's example. You watch our Lord in His Passion; and when you look delicately and accurately at the details of the treatment He received, you observe how almost intolerably hard to bear were many of His trials. Yet 'when He was reviled, He reviled not again; when He suffered, He threatened not; but committed Himself to Him that judgeth righteously'.—BISHOP GORE, Sermon on the Mount, p. 79.

REFERENCES.—V. 38-42.—S. Chadwick, Humanity and God, p. 313. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 210. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 193. W. Leighton Grane, Hard Sayings of Jesus Christ, p. 77. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 287. V. 38-42.—C. Gore, Church Times, vol. xxxiii. 1895, p. 368.

'Resist not evil.'—MATTHEW V. 39.

MACAULAY admits this placable and forgiving spirit was a redeeming feature of Lord Bacon's character. 'He bore with meekness his high civil honours, and the far higher honours gained by his intellect. He was very seldom, if ever, provoked into treating any person with malignity and insolence. No man more readily held up the left cheek to those who had smitten the right. No man was more expert at the soft answer which turneth away wrath.'

THERE came one time, when I was in Pall Mall, an ambassador with a company of Irishmen and rude fellows; the meeting was over before they came, and I was gone up into chamber, where I heard one of them say, 'He would kill all the Quakers'. I went down to him, and was moved in the power of the Lord to speak to him. I told him, 'The law said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth; but thou threatenest to kill all the Quakers, though they have done thee no hurt. But,' said I, 'here is gospel for thee: here is my hair, here is my cheek, and here is my shoulder,' turning it to him. This came so over him that he and his companions stood as men amazed, and said, if that was our principle, and if we were as we said, they never saw the like in their lives. I told them what I was in words I was the same in life. Then the ambassador, who had stood without, came in; for he said that Irish colonel was such a desperate man that he durst not come in with him, for fear he should do us some mischief; but truth came over him, and he carried himself lovingly towards us; as also did the ambassador; for the Lord's power was over them all.—Fox's Journal.

REFERENCES.—V. 39.—W. Garrett Horder, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 117. J. H. F. Peile, Ecclesia Discens, p. 222. James Moffatt, The Second Things of Life, p. 21. V. 39-41.—Lyman Abbott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 131.

THE SECOND MILE

'Whosoever shall compel thee to go one mile, go with him twain.'—MATTHEW V. 41.

I. THAT for which the second mile stands—the overplus of goodness, unselfishness, and service—is seen throughout the whole Gospel. It characterizes, for instance, Christ's ample interpretation of the old commandment. 'Thou shalt not kill' becomes in His lips 'Be not angry'. The law forbade adultery—He proscribed evil thought. The law condemned false witness—Christ said, 'Let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay'. In other words, in His interpretation of the old code Christ taught men to go the second mile—not merely to desist from open sin, but to manifest that specific grace of which the particular sin is the moral antithesis. The same principle is seen also in the record of the measure in which God deals out His blessing to His people. He not only bestows pardon but abundant pardon. He gives not only grace but abounding grace. He promises not only victory in life's conflicts but makes men 'more than conquerors'.

II. Applied to life's compulsions, of which every one of us is conscious—those things of which we can never rid ourselves and from which we can never altogether escape—the doctrine of the second mile enjoins the doing of ordinary toil and the fulfilment of ordinary obligation in the spirit of Christian service. It demands that we shall not only be honest in our business dealings but generous also, measuring duty not by financial consideration but in the spirit of Christian service. It means that we look beyond second causes and gladly acknowledge God's will in all life's restrictions and burdens.

III. But the glory of the second mile is only to be seen in all its fullness as exemplified in Christ Himself. His life, His teaching, His miracles of healing, His gentleness, the purity of the example, which He left us, may be looked upon as the first mile to which the need of men compelled Him. But love constrained Him still further, and the second mile led Him to Calvary! And still day by day does He manifest that same love in His response to our constraints. For if we invite Him for one mile, and compel Him by faith and prayer with that compulsion to which He always so readily yields, to come into fellowship with us, He always goes further and gives 'exceeding abundantly above all that we ask'. And if we invite Him for the first mile of life, we need have no fear but that He will come with us twain, even through death and beyond. It is Christ who has made the second mile beautiful, and beckons us on to share its glory.—J. STUART HOLDEN, The Pre-Eminent Lord, p. 119.

REFERENCES.—V. 41.—Rocliffe Mackintosh, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 189. V. 43.—W. M. Sinclair, The New Law, p. 20. V. 43, 44.—H. Hensley Henson, Christ and the Nation, p. 265. Lyman Abbott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 169. V. 43-48.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 214. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 311. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 200. G. Macdonald, Unspoken Sermons, p. 217. V. 44.—J. R. Cohu, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 142. W. G. Rutherford, The Key of Knowledge, p. 51. V. 45.—Henry Van Dyke, Sermons to Young Men, p. 193. R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. I. 1896, p. 209. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1414. V. 46, 47.—R. W. Dale, The Evangelical Revival, p. 60.

LOVE YOUR ENEMIES

'I say unto you, Love your enemies.'—MATTHEW V. 44.

It is one of the signs of the Divine originality of Christ that, in the midst of a condition of society which throughout the world was based on national selfishness and racial hatred, He ordered the citizens of His kingdom to act on the very opposite principle of treating every human being as a friend.

'In the time of our Lord, and in the last decrepitude of the morality of nations, the selfishness of human intercourse was much greater than the present age can easily understand. Selfishness, therefore, was not a mere abuse or corruption arising out of the infirmity of human nature, but a theory and almost a part of moral philosophy. It was in the midst of all this recognized and authorized sentiment to the contrary that Christ stood up and said, "Love your enemies".'

We may perhaps have been thrown much together with people whose tastes and opinions were quite different from our own. Each fault that we may have committed has probably been watched by keen observers, who, if they are of the world and not of Christ, will score one against us accordingly. It would probably amaze us beyond measure did we know what is said of us, in our absence, by those of our acquaintances who have occasion to mention our names. We cannot live entirely here amongst people possessed by the Spirit of Christ. We are far more likely to meet with enemies, in the general sense of the word, than with friends.

'I say unto you, Love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you; and pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you.' A hard task to us in our natural state. Unaided we cannot think kindly of the offender. Our lips would more easily form themselves into a curse than a blessing.

I. The Holy Spirit of God alone can help us to this calm, tranquil, undisturbed feeling of Christian benevolence which our Lord commands. That is why our Lord commands it with such confidence. He knows that in God's strength we can get this temper. But He here is urging it for our own sakes.

It is because such boilings of our blood prevent us from being what we should. They are of the devil, not of God. Christ gives us the reason: 'That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven'.

II. It is no use having right opinions about religion, unless we get the Holy Spirit to enable us to put them into practice. Think how far more deeply men are every moment offending than even our most cruel enemy has injured us. How easily might God take away the unthankful and the evil from sharing His blessings at all! Yet He allows them to rejoice—filling their hearts with food and gladness, and giving them ever, opportunity of returning to Him before it is too late. If God can do that, to Whom all sin is so utterly abhorrent, why cannot we overlook these miserable little offences which can only affect the things of this life? Oh, pray more earnestly than ever before for this conquering glorious grace of the Holy Spirit in this thing; that we may reach this happy, unruffled, hopeful temper; not that we may grow indifferent to error and wrongdoing, but that, while doing what we can to bring the counsels of the evil to nought, we may remember all the time that the slanderer, the injurious, or the insolent, are all the time our brethren, misguided children of the same great Father, bought by the same precious Blood, needing the same pardon as ourselves.

'Love your enemies, and pray for them which despitefully use you.'—MATTHEW V. 44.

THERE is a class of men who see a great many things to be said against their own side, and a great deal for its adversaries. They fulfil the precept, 'Love your enemies,' but we could almost wish we were among them, that we might have some chance of impartiality and a small portion of their favour.—DR. JOHN KER.

In George Fox's Journal for 1652 he describes a riot, in the course of which a rude mason gave him a severe blow on the back of the hand, bruising the flesh and benumbing the arm, 'that I could not draw it unto me again. But I looked at it in the love of God (for I was in the love of God to them all, that had persecuted me).'

'Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you.'—MATTHEW V. 44.

THERE are cases, I grant you—cases of impenitent wickedness—where the higher law is suspended, finds no chance to act—where relief from the bond is itself mercy and justice. But the higher law is always there. You know the formula—'It was said by them of old time—But I say unto you'. And then follows the new law of a new society. And so in marriage. If love has the smallest room to work—if forgiveness can find the narrowest foothold—love and forgiveness are imposed on—demanded of—the Christian! here as everywhere else. Love and forgiveness—not penalty and hate!—Mrs. H. WARD in The Marriage of William Ashe.

I PREACHED in Charles Square to the largest congregation I have ever seen there. Many of the baser people would fain have interrupted, but they found, after a time, it was lost labour. One, who was more serious, was (as she afterwards confessed) exceedingly angry at them. But she was quickly rebuked by a stone which hit on her forehead and struck her down to the ground. In that moment her anger was at an end, and love filled her heart.—WESLEY'S Journal (9 May, 1742).

THE JUST AND THE UNJUST

'He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.'—MATTHEW V. 45.

WHY does God cause His sun to rise on the evil as well as the good? why does He send the rain on the unjust as well as on the just? God, because He is God, never acts without reason. There is a meaning and purpose in this matter, as indeed there is a meaning and purpose in all God's dealings, and in all God's works; and what you and I want to pray for, is the clear eye and the attentive mind and the enlightened heart to understand these things.

Now there seem to be three reasons at any rate why God causes the sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sends the rain on the just and unjust.

I. He Wants us to Believe in His Fatherhood, in its widest meaning. God wants us to realize that He is the Father of all men, whether they be good or whether they be bad, and because God is the Father of all men He must, nay, He loves to show His abundant works of love to all men, so instead of the indifference of Nature, we have before us the great beneficence of God. We see God in the light of a loving Father, making ample, making equal provision for all His children, bad and good. Now God the Father is doing nothing unjust in all this. When He does this He is doing, when you come to think of it, He is doing exactly what a good earthly father would do. Picture to yourself a father who has many children. Some of them may be dearer and closer to him than the others. There may be one son who may love him better than his brothers and sisters, and that one son of his may have won his father's heart more than all the rest of the family put together. But that father does not confine his attention to the best beloved of the family. No, he exercises his fatherly care over all his children, all of them; he clothes all of them, he feeds all and educates all of them, he tries to set all out in life, he toils for all of them. Why? Because he is the father of them all, and so with God the Father. We are all His children, the worst as well as the best of men. He never forgets us, He never disowns us, He tries to win us wanderers back, by giving us fresh signs of His love and goodwill.

II. The World is not a Place of Judgment, but it is a Place of Probation.—The good and the evil—we know it—the good and the evil are working and living in this world to-day, side by side, and Jesus Christ Himself recognized this fact, in that most instructive parable of the tares and the wheat. In that parable He bade us not to judge anybody, but to let the good and the bad remain together unseparated until the harvest—that means as long as this world lasts. The good and the bad are to remain undistinguished.

III. God Wants to Teach us the Length and Breadth of His Forgiving Love.—The gifts and blessings of Nature give us some faint idea of His love. Only a faint idea. God bestows all the loveliness of the world upon such sinners as we are. Then, though we wander from God, though we forget God, still the sun shines, still refreshing rain comes. And all this He does, He continues to do, for this reason, to bid us to look up and see that Father, with Whom is no variableness neither shadow of turning. We love change, but God never changes. He always is our Father. He always loves us. In spite of ourselves, in spite of our selfishness, in spite of our sins, God Who hates sin with a hatred of which He alone is capable, God still continues to bless us and give us all we need. He still loves to give good unto men. What a forgiving love that must be!

'He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good.'—MATTHEW V. 45.

THE sun does not wait for prayers and incantations in order to be induced to rise, but shines out forthwith and is hailed by all; so do not you wait for applause and praise to be induced to do good, but do it of your own accord, and you will be as much loved as the sun.—EPICTETUS.

'He sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.'—MATTHEW V. 45.

'But,' adds Bacon, after quoting this verse in his essay upon Goodness, 'he doth not raise wealth, nor shine Honour and Vertues, upon Men equally. Common benefits are to be communicate with all; but peculiar Benefits, with choice.'

'If ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same?'—MATTHEW V. 46.

It would be a great step in advance for most of us to love anybody, and the publicans of the time of Jesus must have been a much more Christian set than most Christians of the present day; but that we should love those who do not love us is a height never scaled now except by a few of the elect in whom Christ still survives.—Mark Rutherford's Deliverance.

IF any of the Indians in Georgia were sick (which indeed exceedingly rarely happened, till they learned gluttony and drunkenness from the Christians), those that were near him gave him whatever he wanted. O, who will convert the English into honest Heathens! —WESLEY'S Journal (8 Feb., 1753).

THE DISTINCTIVENESS OF THE CHRISTIAN LIFE

'If ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans the same?'—MATTHEW V. 47.

THE drift of this passage is the distinctiveness of the Christian life. Christ has an ideal of His own to offer to the world; His type of goodness is original, is unique, and the lives of those who follow Him are to furnish the proof of it.

The illustration in the text may seem a trivial one; but it is not so. Manners make the man always.

Half the battle of human advancement is gained when men have learned to give to one another not less than they receive from one another. The social equilibrium is maintained on these terms, and the individual life is preserved in well-being and peace.

I. Law and Personal Duty.—The regrettable thing is when with this, the legal standard for society, there is confounded the moral standard for the individual. Israel had never learned to distinguish between personal duty and civic obligation. The standard of mere equity is a noble enough standard in its way, and even when most unpleasing may extort an admiration of a kind. It is not the Christian standard.

II. Retaliation and Non-Resistance.—The non-resistance of injury. 'I say unto you, Resist not evil,' etc. And here, let us remember, that it is the individual life that is referred to. Christ speaks to the private life, leaving societies and nations free, as they are inherently bound, to maintain right in the world by the final argument if need be. The temper that will not take offence invariably ends by disarming violence. The supreme example, of course, is the Son of man. In His life meekness is a notable trait throughout.

III. The Christian and His Enemy.—Your persecutor is to be loved. No one anywhere is to be hated, and nothing is to be hated but hate.

That is a high pitch of virtue to rise to. But, you observe, we are offered here a ladder of self-discipline by which to rise to it. First comes the injunction, 'Bless them that curse you'. Then, next, he is to do his enemy good. For, as we all know, nothing is so treacherous as feeling. He is to pray for his enemy. The most real and irrefragable thing in the whole universe is surely the Divine Heart which is the radiant, life-giving core of it. And what does that Heart do but just this: bless its enemies, and load them daily with benefits and yearn over them evermore.—A. MARTIN, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII, 1907, p. 88.

THE MINISTRY AND THE MASSES

'What do ye more than others?'—MATTHEW V. 47.

THE relation of working men to the churches is determined by many things, and one of them is worth special consideration. When I think of the impressions received in my artisan days, and compare them with later experience, I have to recognize in crowds of the workers a deep-rooted prejudice, not so much against the office of the ministry as against the men who hold it. That this prejudice is as a stone wall between them, no one who knows the former will seriously question.

The prejudice, not to use a stronger term, exists; and, until they can fight it down, ministers must reckon with it as best they can. Of one thing I am persuaded: it will yield to no assumption of orders; it is impervious to argument; and it is proof against appeals to respect the ministerial office for its own sake. Nothing can make an impression on this prejudice but an example which works out in self-sacrifice, character, and courage. If ministers are to be highly esteemed, it must be for their work's sake.

I. It is the first of these that goes to the quick of the problem. It is self-sacrifice. Religion must always find its dynamic through the heart. He who holds the heart in the service of religion is a giant as compared with a vastly abler man who but influences the mind. 'All men are commanded by the soul.' The Koran makes a distinct class of those who are by nature good, and whose goodness has an influence on others, and pronounces this class to be the aim of religion. The light of the saintly spirit which, as it has often been remarked, is a form of the heroic spirit, shines through the wrappings of education and dogma, and reveals to us the synthetic power and beauty of sacrifice. It is not reason or ability, it is not money or mechanism, nor these combined, that can effectually lift the race. Nothing, on our side of the question, can do this but good men. Man is God's means for acting upon men. Whether God could save the world apart from human agency we know not. This is certain, He has not so far willed to do so. God in Christ is the Supreme Sacrifice for the salvation of the world; and man's power with man is obedience to the same profound law.

It is one great weakness of our Protestant Churches that we produce so few saints who strike the imagination of the people. We somehow fail, all but entirely, to achieve the type of man and woman which is to the sacerdotal Churches what pageantry or sentiment is in politics. Who, for example, during the last quarter of a century has given nobler hostage to the imagination of the workers than the late Father Dolling? A man who offered his life on the altar of the unreached majority; who lived and moved amid human wreckage and moral hopelessness, probably unmatched on the face of the earth. Broken in health and consumed in little more than half his days; living daily, as we are told, with vagabonds at his table and outcasts sleeping at night under his roof, this man's life was an incarnation of the divinest of all motives—the redemption of the lowest in the Saviour's name.

And when he 'underwent the ceremony of death' men who rarely speak of the Christian religion without a sneer, and newspapers that exist nearest the ground, bore willing testimony to a sacrifice that finds its way through the imagination to the heart as nothing else can. Father Damien, diseased and rotting among his lepers, and Father Dolling, toiling for the outcasts of London, are of the same spiritual kin. 'No man,' says a wise teacher, 'ever casts the wealth of his life and the crown of his devotion at the feet of Jesus without quickening the earth with diviner life, and uplifting it with a new courage.'

II. Next to self-sacrifice character can do much to break down popular prejudice against ministers as a class. One of the first and hardest things they have to do is to convince the masses that they preach what they believe, and, as far as possible, live what they preach. Ministers must make men feel that the message which they claim to have received of the Lord Jesus is for themselves, and, as they believe, for others, nothing less than a matter of eternal life or death. I do not exaggerate when I say that eighteen out of every twenty working men whom I knew intimately in my factory days regarded ministers as men who, like the augurs of ancient Rome, laughed in themselves and to one another over a huge business of make-believe, which it was to their interest to keep in existence as long as possible. I shall say nothing about the unworthy side of the justification for this impression. It has not been to seek in the past, and it can be found to-day. Enough for my purpose to remark that the popular idea is a severe idea, of what is fitting between ministerial profession and conduct. The idea may be unfair, it may be absurd, but it is there, and the minister will disregard it only at the cost of his own influence.

III. Then, again, a potent force in the ministry is courage, and it was never more needed.

The courage that is needed pre-eminently is the courage of the Christian message. 'I am not ashamed of the Gospel, for it is the power of God unto salvation,' said the great Apostle. There is no lack of power in the world, but it is not power unto salvation. Civilization means the domination of human intelligence over natural conditions; salvation means civilization quickened into life which can be affirmed of God. Until we grasp the difference between that which is native to man, and that which is the gift of God in Jesus Christ, we may talk never so wisely about progress, but we talk in a circle.

Let our tongue cleave to the roof of our mouth rather than by a word we should encourage any impression that the world has its substitute for the dayspring from on high. Let us pray to be, and pray for, men with the courage of our message.—AMBROSE SHEPHERD, The Gospel and Social Questions, p. 171.

REFERENCES.—V. 47.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xviii. No. 1029. J. Denney, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 188; see also vol. lviii. 1900, p. 24. C. Silvester Horne, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 17.

'Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.'—MATTHEW V. 48.

'THESE words,' says Julius Hare, 'declare that the perfect renewal of God's image in man is not a presumptuous vision, not like a madman's attempt to clutch a handful of stars, but an object of righteous enterprise, which we may and ought to long for and strive after. . . . Be ye perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect. This is the angel-trumpet which summons man to the warfare of duty. This, and nothing less than this, is the glorious price set before him. Do our hearts swell with pride at the thought that this is what we ought to be, what we might be? A single glance at the state of the world, at what we ourselves are, must quench that pride, and turn it into shame.'

His whole life was but one noble, earnest effort to follow His Master's call; that call which sets no lower ideal before the Christian than one of absolute, moral beauty, the very Beauty of God Himself. 'Be ye perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.' There is but one way to attain this height, either practically or intellectually; and that is, to aim ceaselessly at all that is highest, noblest, most beautiful; and of all men I have ever known, this dear brother pursued such an aim most earnestly.—PÈRE GRATY on Henri Perreyve.

REFERENCES.—V. 48.—A. Earle, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 132. J. E. Carpenter, ibid. vol. lx. 1901, p. 202. F. W. Robertson, Sermons Preached at Brighton (3rd Series), p. 143. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 121. J. Martineau, Hours of Thought on Sacred Things, p. 72. Prebendary Shelford, Religion in Common Life, p. 1. J. T. Bramston, Sermons to Boys, p. 94. Bishop Creighton, University and Other Sermons, p. 110. W. J. Knox-Little, The Perfect Life, p. 1. S. Chadwick, Humanity and God, p. 1. VI.—C. Gore, Church Times, vol. xxxiii. 1895, p. 429. VI. 1.—F. E. Paget, Sermons on Duties of Daily Life, p. 251. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 209. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 333. H. C. Beeching, Faith, p. 21. VI. 1-5.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 220. VI. 1-9, 10.—H. Scott Holland, Church Times, vol. liii. 1905, p. 155. VI. 1-18.—W. Boyd Carpenter, The Great Charter of Christ, p. 187.

'Do not sound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do, that they may have glory of men.'—MATTHEW VI. 2.

'PRACTICALLY at present,' Ruskin writes, in Sesame and Lilies, 'advancement in life means, becoming conspicuous in life; obtaining a position which shall be acknowledged by others to be respectable or honourable. We do not understand by this advancement, in general, the mere making of money, but the being known to have made it; not the accomplishment of any great aim, but the being seen to have accomplished it.'

HE who sincerely takes life in earnest finds it quite natural and a matter of course to do so, and therefore he does not make any great noise about it.—ROTHE.

REFERENCES.—VI. 2.—H. P. Liddon, Sermons on Some Words of Christ, p. 19. Phillips Brooks, The Love of Growth, p. 273. VI. 2-4.—E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 218. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 351.

'Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth.'—MATTHEW VI. 3.

CARLYLE, after quoting this verse in his essay on 'Characteristics,' adds: 'Whisper not to thy own heart, How worthy is this action. For then it is already becoming worthless. The good man is he who works continually in well-doing; to whom well-doing is as his natural existence, awakening no astonishment, requiring no commentary; but there, like a thing of course, and as if it could not be so. He returns to the same idea at the close of his essay on Varnhagen von Ense's Memoirs: 'Is a thing nothing because the morning papers have not mentioned it? Or can a nothing be made something, by never so much babbling of it there? Far better, probably, that no morning or evening paper mentioned it; that the right hand knew not what the left was doing!'

BRAVE deeds are most estimable when hidden. . . . What was better in them was the desire to hide them. —PASCAL.

In his Life of Chalmers, Dr. Hanna quotes the grateful remark of an old, unfortunate teacher: 'Many a pound-note has the Doctor given me, and he always did the thing as if he were afraid that any person should see him. May God reward him!'

BEES will not work except in darkness; Thought will not work except in Silence; neither will Virtue work except in Secrecy. Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth! Neither shalt thou prate even to thy own heart of 'those secrets known to all'. Is not shame the soil of all Virtue, of all good manners and good morals? Like other plants, Virtue will not grow unless its root be hidden, buried from the eye of the Sun. Let the Sun shine on it, nay, do but look at it privily thyself, the root withers, and no flowers will glad thee.—CARLYLE, Sartor Resartus, bk. III. chap. iii.

REFERENCES.—VI. 3.—A Scotch Preacher, The Strait Gate, p. 138. VI. 4.—W. M. Sinclair, Christian World Pulpit, vol. I. 1896, p. 58. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. IV. p. 245. VI. 5.—E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 228. C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 55. F. E. Paget, Sermons on Duties of Daily Life, p. 269. VI. 5, 6.—J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 373.

PRIVATE PRAYER

'But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret.'—MATTHEW VI. 6.

I. It would be impossible to say what our Lord exactly meant by closet prayer. We generally understand it to mean our bedroom. It means, literally, the place from which things are given out or dispensed. We may take it to be the spot in the background of life, that spot wherever it be which is the holiest and calmest, and where the chief supplies of thought and being lie. Our Lord Himself made the mountain His closet and the garden. It is not so much the place as the spirit of the place. The great idea is privacy, modesty, and intimacy.

Observe the personal words and the possessive thou. When thou prayest enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door pray to thy Father. They are so endearing, they are so practical, and are so solemn, they bring it all so close together.

II. By its being said, Enter into thy closet, it implies of course that you are not there, but that you go there for the purpose of prayer. When you go to your closet to pray the first thing is, shut the door. It of course means, first that you are to separate yourself from all outer things, be and feel shut in with God. It has been thought, too, and this is in entire agreement with the context, that you are to shut your door in order that you may not be overheard, which implies that even in your closet you pray out loud, in a soft but in an audible voice.

III. The next thing taught us by our Saviour's words is, take as you go to prayers, take with you fatherly views of God. Let it be the prayer, not of a subject to a king, but of a child to its parent. Pray to the Father. Pray to the Father who is in secret. Take care that your private communications with you: Father are not vague, not such as any one else could say as well as you, but personal, confidential, and minute.

Remember that every complete prayer has in it an order, an invocation, a confession of sin, thanksgiving for mercies, a supplication for gifts and graces, intercession, arguments, and pleadings, with a doxology. There is another part of devotion which does not occupy its proper place and degree in many of our holy functions, which is very important. Adoration, adoring God for what He is in Himself, not for what He gives. Simple, devout, admiring contemplation of God.—JAMES VAUGHAN, Penny Pulpit, vol. XIV. p. 25.

RECOLLECTION

'When thou hast shut thy door.'—MATTHEW VI. 6.

RECOLLECTION, said Richard Cecil, is the life of true religion. It is to the soul, said another, what sleep is to the body; without it must come fever, collapse, and death. The soul that does not gather itself together and abide steadfast at the centre will soon be spent. A return to the well-head is the condition of renewed constant vigour and fertility. We live amidst unprecedented activity and growing discontent. The outward agencies of the Church were never so demonstrative; they almost keep pace with the world; but no one is satisfied with their results. 'Life hurries on, spreads itself far and wide, but the source of life dries up.' Dispersed amid the multitude of things external, Christian people are forgetting that mental and spiritual progress consist in intensifying the inward life—that abiding and fruitful Christian work can only be accomplished by serious and refreshed souls.

I. Recollection is the fixed thought of the Redeeming God carried into all things. It is the calm, collected mood of those who set the Lord always before them, to whom every common vessel has been made a sacramental chalice, because all life has become a true communion with God in Christ. It is not necessarily the repression of activity; it is its intensification. If it be true that the world is in a hard strait, and that the duty of Christian men to-day is to turn aside from everything and to employ their whole force to set forward the perilous course of the mighty vessel freighted with the human race, recollection will not hinder this zeal. But the 'sad heart tires in a mile'. The world will not be overcome by what St. Bernard calls evisceratio mentis—the disembowelling of the soul. The trouble of all the Churches to-day is the slackening of the central impetus, and the one cure is recollection—the possession of the soul—the return to the abandoned sanctuary.

II. Some general helps to recollection may be stated, however incompletely. Perfect simplicity of life and feeling can rarely be reached without sacrificing some part of our possessions and our work. There is no rule; every believer has to find how he may best live for himself the life of the true Christian. It is certain that the demands of society are a chief foe to recollection. The last Babylon is a place of merchandise, where the souls of men are sold. John Woolman says, 'Universal love reconciles the mind to a life so plain that a little doth suffice to support it, a life of simplicity and sufficiency where the real comforts of life are not lessened'. It is assuredly true that many do nothing because they try to do much. It is not the will of God that any should undertake all kinds of labour. It is not the will of God that men should elect forms of service for which they have no capacity. He does not take the pencil from the artist, the pen from the ready writer, and turn these men into preachers. He asks each to glorify Him where he stands, to take possession for God of the channels in which his strength is flowing.

III. For true recollection we must be occupied with the immediate duty. That is really all we have to do with. Yet Christian workers in our day are being crushed with the burden of the past and the future. With these we have no concern. The past may inspire us, but looking unto Jesus we have a present help. It does not trouble us; in the kingdom of priests we are loosed from our sins. It does not dishearten us; God is with His people still. The future is His, not ours. We have no concern with one day of it. When we sit with Christ in heavenly places we pass already into the nobler order; we see all things put under Him. But the times, the seasons, the circumstances—these things should not load us with the lightest burden.

It is hardly necessary to add that the life of recollection is supremely a life of prayer—a life of prayer with others, but chiefly a life of prayer in the closet. As Pascal says, it abides in its own room. Its first precept is 'Shut to the door'. There it seeks light, peace, strength in the most hidden recollection. So the soul discovers that it has power with God. It reveals to Him its own natural longings. But its will is subordinate to His—it is at last, as a great master of the spiritual life has not shrunk from saying, 'steeped sevenfold in the blood of the Lamb'. —W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, Ten Minute Sermons, p. 69.

TIMES OF PRIVATE PRAYER

'Thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly.'—MATTHEW VI. 6.

WHOEVER is persuaded to disuse his morning and evening prayers, is giving up the armour which is to secure him against the wiles of the Devil. If you have left off the observance of them, you may fall any day; and you will fall without notice. For a time you will go on, seeming to yourselves to be the same as before; but the Israelites might as well hope to lay in a stock of manna as you of grace. You pray God for your daily bread, your bread day by day; and if you have not prayed for it this morning, it will profit you little that you prayed for it yesterday. You did then pray and you obtained, but not a supply for two days. When you have given over the practice of stated prayer, you gradually become weaker without knowing it. Samson did not know he had lost his strength till the Philistines came upon him; you will think yourselves the men you used to be, till suddenly your adversary will come furiously upon you, and you will as suddenly fall. You will be able to make little or no resistance. This is the path which leads to death.—J. H. NEWMAN.

'Pray to thy Father which is in secret.'—MATTHEW VI. 6.

WHAT indeed is prayer but love—love with a want! —EUGÉNIE DE GUÉRIN.

REFERENCES.—VI. 6.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. i. pp. 71, 79. W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 136. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 226. J. H. Newman, Parochial and Plain Sermons, vol. i. p. 244. W. Binnie, Sermons, p. 140. W. M. Sinclair, The New Law, p. 38. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 137. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 232. G. G. Bradley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xiv. 1894, p. 169. E. Rees, ibid. vol. lxvii. 1905, p. 219. G. Dawson, Sermons, p. 8. VI. 6-15.—C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 185. VI. 7.—J. E. Rattenbury, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 371. VI. 7, 8.—J. G. James, Problems of Prayer, p. 113. F. D. Maurice, The Prayer Book and the Lord's Prayer, p. 149. VI. 7-15.—J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 393. VI. 8, 9.—F. D. Maurice, Christmas Day and Other Sermons, p. 170.

GOD OUR FATHER

(Trinity Sunday)

'After this manner therefore pray ye: Our Father.'—MATTHEW VI. 9.

IN 1865 the late Charles Kingsley wrote to Maurice, 'As to the Trinity, I do understand you. You first taught me that the doctrine was a live thing, and not a mere formula to be swallowed by the undigesting reason; and from the time that I learnt from you that a Father meant a real Father, a Son a real Son, a Holy Spirit a real Spirit, Who was really good and holy, I have been able to draw all sorts of practical lessons from it in the pulpit, and ground all my morality upon it, and shall do so more.'

We dwell only upon the first of these propositions, that 'a Father means a real Father,' and seek, like Kingsley, to draw some practical lessons from the fact. 'The whole Trinity is in a sense summed up in 'Fatherhood'—the Son reveals the Father, the Holy Ghost proceeds from Him, with the Son, and witnesses to our sonship. The great Duke of Wellington is reported to have said, 'The Lord's Prayer alone is an evidence of Christianity, so admirably is that prayer accommodated to all our wants'. We have now to do with only the opening invocation. Why 'our' if used in private prayer? Two reasons, including our relations to (1) God and (2) to one another.

I. Our Relations to God.—It teaches us the doctrines of (a) Mediation; (b) Sonship.

(a) Mediation. We clearly see that God is not revealed as Father of the individual in the Old Testament, but as the Father of the nation (Mal. i. 6; Mal. ii. 10; Is. lxxiii. 16). True (Ps. lxxxix. 26) 'He (David) shall cry unto Me "Thou art My Father, My God"'. Yet David in his most intimate approaches to the throne does not call God 'Father'. The doctrine but dimly hinted at in the Old Testament is a New Testament truth. Christ says, 'No man knoweth the Father, but the Son and He,' etc. 'I ascend unto My Father and your Father.' 'No man cometh unto the Father but by Me.' 'Our Father' means then Christ's Father and my Father, teaching (1) Atonement, (2) Intercession. Some would like to finish up the Lord's Prayer with the customary Christian form 'for Christ's sake,' but that is not necessary if we understand the meaning of 'Our,' which places Him in the forefront of the prayer. It also teaches:—

(b) Sonship. Not only is He our Advocate, but he whom He leads to God is a son also. 'At that day ye shall ask in My name . . . for the Father Himself loveth you.' This is the consummation. God is 'Father' of all, even in a sense of unbelievers. This is the teaching of the parable of the Prodigal Son. But even a heathen acknowledges a distinction. Alexander the Great said, 'God is a common Father of all men, but more particularly of the good and virtuous'. Hence the necessity of the New Birth.

II. Our Relation to One Another.—Another reason for the use of the plural may be found in our relations to one another.

(a) The Brotherhood of Believers. 'Our Father' means the Father of all my fellow-Christians and my Father. 'God is your Father, and all ye are brethren'; 'Members one of another'. We include in the prayer all God's children everywhere, as they include us. This obtains universal blessing. The Church is a Catholic Church. God's grace, like the sunbeams' actions upon the ocean drawing its particles up into the air in invisible vapour, draws from many hearts, widely apart as the far-stretching ocean, the common prayer of 'Our Father,' and as these particles condense into a cloud and fall in copious streams upon the earth, making it bring forth and bud, so are our common prayers answered, and widespread blessing secured for the world.

(b) Common Brotherhood. 'Our Father' means the Father of all mankind and my Father. We include in our petitions those who are not in the family reconciled to God. Our Lord says in the same chapter, 'Love your enemies, and do good to them that hate you . . . that ye may be the children of your Father in heaven'.

III. One or Two Reflections.—1. Let us learn a lesson of confidence. We never come alone into God's presence. Every time we say 'Our Father' Christ joins with us in the petition. We go hand-in-hand with Him to the throne (the hand pierced for us), 'and Him the Father always hears'. His Holy Spirit prompting our prayers and filling them with true and vital meaning, thus the whole Trinity stand engaged to make us blest.

2. Let us be sure we can use the plural form in the highest sense of Sonship. 'As Christ is God's Son, so humbly am I.'

3. Let us not be selfish in our prayers. God's family is large, and has many needs. Mark the order of petitions in the Lord's Prayer. Those for others come first.

4. Let us not think we are lost in a crowd. The prayer is individual as well as general. Scientists tell us a real solid exists nowhere in nature. Different experiments have proved invisible spaces between atoms composing a so-called solid body. Individuality is God's order—'One sparrow'. Our very hairs are numbered.

THE COSMOPOLITANISM OF THE LORD'S PRAYER

MATTHEW VI. 9-13.

I. Has it ever struck you how representative this prayer is in respect to human want. To my mind its very originality lies in its power to include the old desires of the heart. These six petitions are each the voice of an ancient philosophy or faith; Christ has simply gathered them in. He has counted the scattered cries and made them one choir.

II. The Jew cried, 'Hallowed be Thy name,' he wanted a God whom men could reverence for His holiness—who charged His very angels with folly, who could not look upon sin but with abhorrence. Two empires have cried, 'Thy kingdom come'—the Chinese and the Roman; they have seen heaven incarnated on a visible throne. The Brahman has cried, 'Thy will be done'; he counts his own will delusion; he wants to lose himself in the Absolute Life. The polytheist of every clime cries, 'Give us this day our daily bread'; his whole use of religion is for the needs of the hour. The Buddhist cries, 'Forgive us our debts'; he trembles lest the consequences of sin may be to bring us back after death to lower forms of being. And the Stoic cries, 'Lead us not into temptation'; his whole desire is to be free from the vain seductions of life—to ignore its jealousies, to scorn its passions, to laugh at its ambitions, to regard its gains and its losses with equal contempt.

III. These are the cries of the old world; and Christ has said, 'Come unto Me and I will give you rest!' He has not sent one of them empty away. He has gathered them together as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings; and there will not be one want neglected in His shower of blessings.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 212.

REFERENCES.—VI. 9.—E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 238. J. E. Roberts, Studies in the Lord's Prayer, p. 15. Henry Wace, Some Central Points of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 231. J. B. Brinkworth, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 312. C. S. Macfarland, ibid. vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 333. R. Flint, Sermons and Addresses, p. 94. B. Wilberforce, Sanctification by the Truth, pp. 189, 202, 213. C. Gore, Prayer and the Lord's Prayer, p. 30. C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 311. A. Saphir, The Lord's Prayer, p. 37. B. W. Randolph, Church Times, vol. lii. 1904, p. 197. G. E. Deacon, The Lord's Prayer, p. 1. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew, I.—VIII. pp. 228, 233, 241. R. F. Horton, Lyndhurst Road Pulpit, p. 165. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 155. F. D. Maurice, The Prayer Book and the Lord's Prayer, pp. 283, 294. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. ii. p. 149. F. W. Farrar, The Lord's Prayer, pp. 11, 31, 43; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, pp. 6, 16, 29. J. Harries, Does God Break His Promises? pp. 38, 43, 49, 52. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 34; see also Common Life Religion, p. 126. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 213. VI. 9, 10.—J. E. Roberts, Studies in the Lord's Prayer, pp. 25, 82. C. W. Stubbs, The Social Teaching of the Lord's Prayer, pp. i. 28. VI. 9-13.—Ibid. Christian World Pulpit, vol. lii. 1897, p. 233. W. Boyd Carpenter, The Great Charter of Christ, p. 207. J. Jarvie, Discourses, p. 154.

ON DOING GOD'S WILL

'Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.'—MATTHEW VI. 10.

MANY people make a great mistake about God's will; they think that to do God's will is hard, painful, and so they say 'God's will be done' with a sigh or a groan. They think that if God's will be done it means taking away our dear ones—that sickness and trouble will come into our homes. God's will, in their minds, is always connected with ruin, dying friends, and newly made graves. Some people never think of writing those words except on tombstones.

I. God's Will is Love.—He loves us; He is our best friend, so to do His will must be for our happiness. We obey the will of a good earthly father because we know He is doing the best for us and our future. The angels are perfectly happy because they are doing God's will. People often say: 'Oh, I have a will of my own, and I want to go in my own way'. That is pretty certain to end in misery. The prodigal leaves his father's home and comes to misery; when the sheep leaves the fold he is lost.

II. How are we to do God's Will as it is Done in Heaven?—Do you say it is too high for you? That you are here on earth and that heaven is very far away? Many mistakes are made about heaven. Heaven means the state of life where God's people do His will, and that life begins here on earth. We must begin the heavenly life here, heaven must be in us now if we are to be in it hereafter. Heaven means doing God's will. If there is no heaven in this life, we shall be the same individuals after death as now. If a man has no love for God, no love for his neighbours, no love for holy and beautiful things, if he be without prayer or praise, what would he do in heaven? We are made to do God's will, and as long as we do it we shall be happy. It is not unpleasant, it is a pleasure. The child who loves you runs quickly to do your wishes; so if we love God our greatest joy is to serve Him. God must come to us before we go to Him. God must work on us before we can do His good pleasure. 'I want to do God's will, I want to serve Him.' In answer to this cry God always comes to us—comes into our hearts in answer to our prayer.

III. The Example of Jesus Christ.—What is God's will? What would He have us do? To get the right answer we must look at Jesus Christ. He did His Father's will as it is done in heaven. He made the world better. We are like emigrants sent from home into a far country. The good emigrant constructs roads and highways. He makes the rough wilderness to blossom like the rose. He puts the wild land into cultivation and produces useful crops and sweet flowers. He builds a good house and makes the place useful and beautiful. We are sent into the world for a like purpose that we may go down into the forest of ignorance and clear the way for truth. We are sent to get the highway of life open—to pick up the stones and clear away the rocks so that poor pilgrims may not stumble. We must help our neighbours along the path of life. That is doing God's will.

THE LIFE OF THE ANGELS

'Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven.'—MATTHEW VI. 10.

WHAT we have to fix our gaze upon, as we use this prayer, is, the revelation that underlies it of the existence of certain spiritual beings who in heaven are doing ever the Father's will; in other words, underlying this prayer, there lies the revelation of angelic existence.

I. The point to which I wish to call your attention is the student life of the angels of God. Always and everywhere that is their condition. There is in them an intense craving to know. St. Peter speaks, in the first chapter of his first general Epistle, of things 'which the angels desire to look into'. But then, side by side with this intense craving to know, they have limited knowledge. Our Lord Himself tells us that 'of that day and that hour knoweth no man, not even the angels of God'. Therefore they are in the position of having limitations to their knowledge, a limitation which provokes them immediately into the activity of study.

II. If you look at the student life of the angels you will find that they are always revealed to us as students of theology. They seek God everywhere, they find God everywhere, they rejoice in God everywhere, and everywhere they worship God.

If you look in the Bible you will find three great spheres of angel-study comprehended in the great theology of the angels, a threefold study in which they are ever engaged.

1. The angels are revealed as studying the material world around us. 'When God laid the foundations of the earth, the sons of God shouted for joy.' And that joy has been an abiding joy; the angels are ever students of science, they are ever penetrating with enlightened gaze into all the mysteries of all physical phenomena around us.

2. But there is a second sphere of angel-study to which our attention is turned by St. Paul. He says as he goes forth upon his mission as a Christian preacher, and as the power of the Gospel is made manifest among men through his preaching, that he is acting upon the angels. And that one effect of God's wonderful working in His Church is the education of the angels themselves. 'To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the Church the manifold wisdom of God.' So that the angels are shown to us as the students of Church history. And surely not of Church history only; are we not taught that all history is under the hand of God in some strange way?

3. The angels are revealed to us as being students of what we call theology, in the more restricted sense especially, as being students of the Incarnate. St. Paul, enumerating some of the mysteries of the Incarnation, says that 'He was seen of the angels'.

III. Our prayer is that God's will may be done on earth, as it is in heaven, which surely means that we, by God's grace, may be enabled so to live on earth as angels live above. If this be the case then one aspect of our life must be the aspect of a student. Like the angels we must seek from God the blessed gift of hunger and thirst after knowledge—after knowledge of all kinds.

1. We learn from the angels that our student life must not be narrow.

2. We should imitate the angels in the spirit in which they study. The student should be possessed above all things by the spirit of reverence.

3. The study of God, and the study of God's will whenever we seek it, is meant to influence our character and to shape our lives. We must study God's will in order that we may do it, that we may become like Him.

Theological study which is thus wide in its extent, courageous and reverent in its spirit, practical in its end—this is the ideal of student life which is revealed to us by the lives of the angels.—G. BODY, The Contemporary Pulpit, vol. viii. 1887, p. 321.

CHRISTIANITY AND WEALTH

'Thy will be done on earth.'—MATTHEW VI. 10.

OUR Lord Jesus Christ left no code of social legislation. He laid down no laws for Palestine in the first century, but He laid down principles for all countries, and for every century.

What does Christ say of accumulation, and what of expenditure?

I. First, how are we to understand 'Lay not up for yourselves treasures on the earth'? Does He mean that we are not to save money at all? Observe that two reasons are given for this advice. First, the hoard is liable to be lost, spoilt, or stolen, before it is enjoyed; and secondly, 'Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also'. It is assumed that wealth, whether in gold or commodities, is simply hoarded for future personal enjoyment, buried, probably under the floor; and our Lord says, as many other moralists have said: How foolish to keep the means of enjoyment till they are stolen, or spoilt, instead of using them. Well, we do not hoard money now, we invest it, which is a very different thing. But the second reason does touch us. Where is our real treasure? and where is our heart? It cannot be in both places. Those who try to 'make the best of both worlds' generally make nothing of either. We ought to know—we do know, if we are honest with ourselves—in which of these two worlds lies that which we love best and are most afraid to lose.

Is it then impossible, according to our Lord's preaching, to be a successful man of business and to have one's heart and treasure in heaven? No, assuredly not impossible. We are unlucky if we have not known several instances to the contrary. But it is difficult; so our Lord warns us; and those who have tried it will not, I think, differ from Him.

But there is another aspect of accumulation besides the self-regarding one. What is the justice of the matter? All acquisition should surely be the exchange value for some service rendered.

And the law of Christ has much to say about investments. There are some businesses which degrade all who touch them: there are others which simply waste the energies of the workmen employed upon them; there are others which are gigantic instruments of national demoralization. Are we Christians enough to resist a tempting opportunity to invest at a high rate of interest in concerns of this kind? Once more, how are the workmen treated? All these cautions seem to be covered by our Lord's principles, but it would be a great mistake to suppose that He condemns the investment of surplus income in sound enterprises, which is generally, I believe, the best way of making work for the unemployed, and one of the best uses that we can make of superfluous money—far better, certainly, than promiscuous doles.

II. Next, as to expenditure—it is strange how often one hears the old fallacy that to consume the fruits of labour is 'good for trade'. The millionaire who uses up the value of five hundred working men's time impoverishes the nation by that amount, and is by no means a benefactor. He is bound to show that he is putting in some equivalent for all that he takes out. Wealth does not release the rich man from his obligation to work, but only enables him to do unpaid work for society. A man has a legal right to the use of money which the law allows him to call his own; but morally, we have only the right to do what we ought, not what we like, or are allowed to do.—W. R. INGE, All Saints' Sermons, 1905-1907, p. 69.

'Thy will be done.'—MATTHEW VI. 10.

COMPARE the closing words of Sir Thomas Browne's Religio Medici: 'Bless me in this life with but the peace of my conscience, command of my affections, the love of Thyself and of my dearest friends, and I shall be happy enough to pity Cæsar! These are, O Lord, the humble desires of my most reasonable ambition, and all I dare call happiness on earth; wherein I set no rule or limit to Thy hand or providence; dispose of me according to the wisdom of Thy pleasure. Thy will be done, though in my own undoing.'

In Past and Present (chap. xv.) Carlyle describes the true reverent man as one who 'has a religion. Hourly and daily, for himself and the whole world, a faithful, unspoken, but not ineffectual prayer rises, "Thy will be done". His whole work on earth is an emblematic spoken or acted prayer. Be the will of God done on earth—not the Devil's will, or any of the Devil's servants' wills! He has a religion, this man; an everlasting Lordstar that beams the brighter in the Heavens, the darker here on earth grows the night around him.'

REFERENCES.—VI. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1778. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. pp. 244, 253. B. Wilberforce, Sanctification by the Truth, p. 227. F. D. Maurice, The Prayer Book and the Lord's Prayer, p. 304. B. W. Maturin, Church Times, vol. xxxv. 1896, p. 357. S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 139. C. Thirlwall, Missionary Duties, Difficulties, and Prospects, p. 5. G. E. Deacon, The Lord's Prayer, pp. 17, 25. C. Gore, Prayer and the Lord's Prayer, pp. 39, 40. J. Harries, Does God Break His Promises? pp. 66, 60. F. W. Farrar, The Lord's Prayer, pp. 67, 73; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, pp. 45, 77. T. Sims, ibid. vol. xli. 1892, p. 182. C. A. Berry, ibid. vol. li. 1897, p. 184. G. Mackenzie, ibid. vol. lii. 1897, p. 118. J. H. Bernard, ibid. vol. lvi. 1899, p. 274. W. H. Fremantle, ibid. vol. lvi. 1899, p. 376. R. Rainy, ibid. vol. lix. 1901, p. 41. G. Campbell Morgan, ibid. vol. lxi. 1902, p. 37. F. W. Gunsaulus, ibid. vol. lxii. 1902, p. 107. F. W. Macdonald, ibid. vol. lxxv. 1903, p. 244. G. Campbell Morgan, ibid. vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 251. J. R. Harmer, ibid. vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 243. F. H. Chase, ibid. vol. lxx. 1906, p. 252. T. E. Ruth, ibid. vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 108. H. T. Knight, Rational Religion, pp. 121, 137. F. E. Paget, The Living and the Dead, p. 193. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. i. p. 31. Henry Allford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. ii. pp. 134, 230. C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 34. W. Woods Smyth, Life and Holiness, p. 1. E. Bickersteth, 'Thy Kingdom Come' Sermons, 1887.

DAILY BREAD

'Give us this day our daily bread.'—MATTHEW VI. 11.

It is remarkable that, out of the seven petitions which compose the Lord's Prayer, only one should concern the needs of the body, while the other six concern needs of eternity. One for the body, six for heaven. And have you noticed that, for present duties, God has fixed an inverse ratio? God has said, 'Six days for work and one for worship,' but He has restored the balance, as it were, in prayer, and He has said, 'Six prayers for heaven, and one prayer for the earth'. After all, when you come to look at it from a real and honest standpoint, you cannot fail to see that the things that concern us for our short day here on earth are of secondary importance to the things that concern the eternity beyond.

I wish you to look a little more closely at the believers' way of seeking temporal things from God, and first to see the piety of the prayer, and then the faith, and then the moderation.

I. The Piety.—Look at the child kneeling at his father's knee, with the love of a son looking up to his father's face, reaching up a hand for the needs of a day—our daily bread. How reasonable it all is. Who made the body, and who made the bread? Did not God make the body and the bread; and is it not God, and only God, Who can suit the bread to the body? Is it not God Who gives you the food you eat, and gives you health to eat it? Therefore, is it not reasonable that day by day, and hour by hour, you should lift your eyes to Him Who giveth all, and say, 'Give us this day our daily bread'? And besides being reasonable, is it not a joy, is it not a delight, that we should turn up loving eyes to the Father of all, and then ask Him for all our needs? 'My Father, give me enough bread for my bodily needs, give me enough sustenance to keep me alive, while Thou wilt.' Would it not be a joy and a pleasure if we could look up, with the eyes of sons and daughters, look up trustingly, lovingly to our Father, and say, 'Give us this day our daily bread'? It is a beautiful thing, in the sight of God and His holy angels, to see a godly man get up in the morning, and, surrounded by his wife and children, put special emphasis upon the words of my text, 'Give us this day our daily bread'. He looks round and sees his family. He knows that the bread they eat depends more or less on his toil, and he puts an emphasis on the 'us'. He thanks God that He has made the 'us' so large that it includes all that he holds dear, his wife, his children; yes, possibly many more, and he prays, 'Give us this day our daily bread'. What does it matter if the next meal does depend upon his labour? Things may change, health may fail, trials may draw near, but it is the Lord Who changeth not; and that poor man goes forth from his knees to his work, full of joy. 'Give us this day our daily bread.'

II. The Faith.—Look at the faith of the prayer. It is a strange thing, but there is absolutely no doubt about it, we have far more difficulty in trusting God with regard to temporal matters than with regard to spiritual matters. 'Spiritual things,' we say, 'these are in God's province; for temporal things I have to depend upon myself.' Is it so? God withdraws His hand. You lie, perhaps, upon the bed of sickness, you live by charity. Do you depend upon your own powers, upon your own ability? No, it is given you, given; and what a useful lesson it is! Every morning, yes, often during the day, you should pray, 'Give us'. Why? 'Because I depend upon Thee, Great Lord, because the power of brain and body which Thou hast given me Thou canst take away, Therefore, give it me, keep it for me. Give me all that is included in the word "bread".'

III. The Moderation.—Let us see the moderation of the prayer. We see that in time, manner, and degree. Enough for the day is the evil thereof, and enough for the day is this one prayer, 'Give us this day'. One thinks of the miser hoarding his money, hoarding penny after penny. He gloats over it. It is his worship, it is his god. He does not pray, 'Give us this day'. Do not for a moment imagine that I do not want you to make provision for tomorrow; I do. But I do not want you to make anxious provision. That is all the difference in the world. That is the difference between what is good and what is evil. God will provide. 'Give us this day our daily bread.' You know that in the East this word 'bread' is made to stand for all the necessities of life. God knows what is necessary. We leave it a blank in God's hand. We say, give us this day all that we need for our bodily sustenance. Is not that enough of a prayer? I wonder how many of us pray that prayer as it ought to be prayed?

REFERENCES.—VI. 11.—Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. ii. p. 163. J. Martineau, Hours of Thought, vol. ii. p. 50. G. E. Deacon, The Lord's Prayer, p. 33. C. W. Stubbs, The Social Teaching of the Lord's Prayer, p. 54. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 260. C. Gore, Prayer and the Lord's Prayer, p. 56. F. W. Farrar, The Lord's Prayer, p. 91; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 100. S. M. Taylor, ibid. vol. lxx. 1906, p. 294. T. Sadler, Sermons for Children, p. 128. J. Harries, Does God Break His Plagues? p. 62. B. W. Maturin, Church Times, vol. xxxv. 1896, p. 389. H. T. Knight, Rational Religion, p. 155. VI. 11-13.—J. E. Roberts, Studies in the Lord's Prayer, p. 36.

FORGIVE US OUR DEBTS

'Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors.'—MATTHEW VI. 12.

IN that last hour of that last day, when the silent morning light has glimmered through the window for the very last time before our failing eyes, and we feel the burden of our many sins pressing heavily upon us, there will be nothing that can give the trembling mind of the strongest man of us any comfort, unless he can say with truth, 'And now, Lord, what is my hope? Truly my hope is even in Thee.' Nothing, unless he can receive back through the familiar voice of the Spirit of God, speaking by a pure conscience, the message which our Lord gave to the sick of the palsy: 'Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee'. And surely it will be well, while we are in the full vigour of both mind and body, 'and the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh when we shall say, We have no pleasure in them,' that we consider what grounds we have for this assurance, so that when the summons comes we may have no cause why our hearts should fail us.

I. Our Lord has mercifully put into our daily prayer a reminder of how the case really stands between us and God.

There is no happiness apart from God. God is that Essence of Goodness and Perfection which fills all space, time, and eternity; Who brought everything into being; apart from Whom there is no life; Who keeps everything in health and safety; Whose perfect will is the law of the universe; and Who, by allowing you and me free will, is training us to be with Him, and share His glory of perfection for ever and ever. To Him we owe everything. It is to His bountiful Providence that we are indebted for our daily food, clothes, money, gifts, and talents. To the Goodness of His Being belong the ideals of our homes, family life, friendships, and affections. To His pervading loving-kindness we attribute our enjoyments in the present, our hopes for the future, our knowledge of Him, our understanding of His revelation, our salvation in Jesus Christ His Son and Messenger, our instruction in the ways of peace and happiness, our consolation in the troubles of this world, our comfort in the unknown terrors of that which is to come. From His loving-kindness in the gradual stages of revelation come the explanation of the bewildering mysteries of life, our conscience, our sense of duty and responsibility, our capacity to love Him, after Whose spiritual image we were formed. We owe all this to God.

II. Is there no duty we owe to Him in return? More than that, can we have these things without owing Him any duty at all? Some of them come to us by nature, and we can spoil them by neglecting our duty to God. Some of them we cannot have at all without recognizing this duty, and acting upon it. We owe God love, gratitude, reverence, trust, obedience. We find His laws for us in our consciences, in His Holy Word, in the revelation of His Son. We see that to be on the same side with all that is good, powerful, healthy, living, happy, eternal, we must give ourselves up wholly to Him. We must resign our wills into His hands; our lives, thoughts, hearts, principles, affections, all to be ruled by Him. When a heart is so willingly given up to Him, He sends His Spirit, His Grace, His Power, and does so guide and rule it. He makes the sacrifice easy. He alone can govern the unruly wills and affections of sinful men. That is what He is always waiting to do for us. That, then, is what we owe to God; in order to be what we are intended to be we have to yield up to Him all that we have and are.

III. How imperfect is the sacrifice we have made! What self-will there yet remains in some; what worldliness, what wayward affections, what folly, what weakness, what sinfulness in others! What a want of truth, candour, firmness, purity, self-control, generosity, unselfishness, love to man and love to God! Convinced of all this, we should indeed be miserably helpless, if the same message which tells us about God and our sins did not also assure us that, 'if we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness'.

IV. Therefore it is that, with the precious promises of God's Word before us, and with all the bitter remembrance of our shortcomings behind us, our Lord bids us bend daily before our gracious Father in heaven, and say in penitence and humility, in love, trust, and hope, 'Forgive us our debts'.

We are forgiven, not cheaply, because that would encourage other beings and worlds to rebel and ruin themselves. We are forgiven by the infinite and never-failing love of our All-pitying God. We are forgiven for the sake of Him Who died for us, and rose again, and ever liveth to make intercession for us. We are forgiven, in order that God may be feared, and not defied, that He may be loved and not challenged. We are forgiven that we may ever be renewed from the past, that we may have hope for the future, and courage again and again to seek the life-giving Throne of grace to obtain help in time of need.

And among other conditions of our forgiveness there is one of which we, poor vindictive angry souls, so ready to take offence, so unwilling to pardon, have at the same time daily to remind ourselves. In the very act of prayer, we are taught to remember it. The temper that does not forgive cannot be forgiven, because it is itself a proof that we have no idea of the debt we owe. We cannot forget the ten thousand talents, as we exact the hundred pence, and in the act of exacting we bring back the burden of that greater debt upon ourselves.

REFERENCES.—VI. 12.—B. Wilberforce, Sanctification by the Truth, p. 255. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, The School of Christ, p. 44. F. D. Maurice, The Prayer Book and the Lord's Prayer, p. 348. W. M. Sinclair, The New Law, p. 73. C. Gore, Prayer and the Lord's Prayer, p. 65. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 272. J. Harries, Does God Break His Pledges? p. 68. W. C. Magee, The Gospel and the Age, p. 259. G. E. Deacon, The Lord's Prayer, pp. 41, 48. F. W. Farrar, ibid. pp. 109, 129; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, pp. 109, 285. VI. 12, 13.—C. W. Stubbs, The Social Teaching of the Lord's Prayer, p. 80.

THE SOURCES OF TEMPTATION

'Lead us not into temptation.'—MATTHEW VI. 13.

WHAT are the sources of temptation? We should do wrong to narrow down our idea of temptation to incitement to evil, coming from an evil quarter. There are more sources than one, and the first we are apt to overlook; it is:—

I. God Almighty Himself.—In more than one place God reveals Himself as tempting man. God tempted Abraham by the order to slay his only son; God tempted David to number Israel by permitting the devil to suggest it. It is a common phenomenon of daily life, in which God may be seen tempting men, in His goodness, to goodness, for their good. Joseph and Daniel are tried respectively with the same temptations which tried David and St. Peter, but they emerge through degradation and the fear of death to a greater eminence than they enjoyed before.

But temptations which come from God are no easy things which any one can bear; all that is ordinarily said about temptation applies to them (see 2 Cor. xii. 7-9). See men and women around us snapping under the sharp discipline of God. Yet, could they have but seen it, with the trial, coming out of it, there was the way of escape, there was the special grace enabling them to bear it, the special virtue to be developed out of it. It has been so all through the history of human experience. The sorrows of the world's sin have brought out the Church; the sufferings of the human frame have developed the healing art. Trouble has brought the unexpected store of sympathy; the depth of despair has brought close the vision of God. But the most characteristic source of temptation is:—

II. The Devil.—Now it belongs to the jugglery of the accusing angel to try and confuse in our minds attack and defeat, temptation and sin. Before any sin can be set up, three processes must be gone through. First, there is the suggestion of evil (here, per se, there is no sin); then there comes the delight, the acquiescence in the suggestion (here the sinfulness is commencing); until at last the will consents, and sin is formed, according to the strong statement of St. James, pregnant with death.

Next observe some of the regions in which Satan's temptations come upon us. We shall find these in the example of the temptation of our Blessed Lord, the model on which Satan founds many more of his attacks.

1. The appetite. This is the point where Satan is riding rough-shod over the lives of thousands of human beings. Think of the terrible condition of our streets, the coarse animalism of our villages. An appetite which overmasters the will enslaves the man. On any showing grace is stronger than nature, reason than instinct, and man is higher than a brute.

2. Satan also approaches through the soul—i.e. the inner principle of life. He tampers with the policy, the aim, the motive of life by means of a view from a 'high mountain'. A view! A young man—e.g.—entering life is altogether upset by the view of riches, and enters on his work with a false aim. We have to deal with a subtle danger known as 'the world'—an influence, a mist, which mounts up from the careless lives of men, which smoothes out the distances in religion and obliterates the objects of faith. The world of religion, the world of morality, the world of ideals, we know what they mean—so that no one can let himself 'go,' so to speak, in the world. While we get good out of the world for all sorts of purposes, we have to be on our guard against this tarnishing 'mist'. It is a dangerous atmosphere to which Satan tempts us to commit ourselves. He is asking us to part with our eternal inheritance at the price of the gratification of a few years; to sell our birthright for a mess of pottage.

3. Satan's third attack is through the region of the 'spirit'—e.g. 'If Thou be the Son of God, cast Thyself down'. It is a very subtle temptation to dictate to God how He ought to treat us. Stairs, and walking down, are much too simple things for God to care for. The Son of God has a right to expect upholding angels; nothing between Him and God. It sounds well, but it is the highest presumption. It is the claim for exceptional treatment, the essence of self-complacency. Thus men would be Christians without the sacraments, without the Church, without a revelation.

III. There still remains another source—there is a temptation which comes from within. We know of two conditions for the spread of disease—an infected air and an enfeebled constitution. And so in the infected air around us our weak human nature is a distinct trial to us. True, at baptism, original sin was washed away, but there still remains 'poor human nature' as we call it. When this fails beneath the assault, where is the means of escape?

Never too much temptation—God always faithful. A way of escape through the temptation. Do we not know how a doctor will say sometimes of a sick man, 'His splendid constitution saved him'? Is there not, or should there not be, a reserve of strength within the souls of us all? There exists in all who have not quenched or driven it out, a reserve of baptismal grace. Confirmation was no mere taking upon ourselves of our baptismal vows, as is sometimes said, with strange ignorance of real meaning. Confirmation was an access of strength coming to us through the Holy Spirit. Welcomed into the soul, it stays, a store of strength, a spiritual reserve in time of need. It is not in vain that we have so often approached the altar, so often prayed, received absolution, heard the Word of God. In our spiritual gifts we shall always find a reserve of strength, so that even the memory of past grace is a way of escape.

'Deliver us from evil.'—MATTHEW VI. 13.

THE Christian says to God: Deliver us from evil. The Buddhist adds: And to that end deliver us from finite existence, give us back to nothingness! The first believes that when he is enfranchised from the body, he will enter upon eternal happiness; the second believes that individuality is the obstacle to repose, and he longs for the dissolution of the soul itself. The dread of the first is the Paradise of the second.—AMIEL.

REFERENCES.—VI. 13.—B. Wilberforce, Sanctification by the Truth, pp. 266, 277. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, The School of Christ, pp. 51, 58, 64. C. Gore, Prayer and the Lord's Prayer, pp. 72, 78. Bishop Creighton, The Mind of St. Peter, p. 33. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. pp. 277, 282, 289. H. T. Knight, Rational Religion, p. 169. Harvey Goodwin, Parish Sermons, p. 161. J. E. Cumming, The Blessed Life, p. 133. F. W. Farrar, The Lord's Prayer, pp. 149, 181, 199, 213; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 301, and vol. xliii. 1893, pp. 17, 33, 49, 65. W. M. Sinclair, ibid. vol. xlii. 1894, p. 75. E. S. Talbot, ibid. vol. lxx. 1906, p. 324. D. M. T. Willis, ibid. vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 300. J. Stalker, The Four Men, p. 31. J. Forgan, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 328. J. Harries, Does God Break His Pledges? pp. 72, 76, 80. G. E. Deacon, The Lord's Prayer, pp. 66, 63. F. D. Maurice, The Prayer Book and the Lord's Prayer, pp. 363, 387. Harvey Goodwin, The Anglican Pulpit of To-Day, p. 114. Bishop J. Percival, Sermons at Rugby, p. 148. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ix. No. 509, vol. xxiv. No. 1402. VI. 14.—F. W. Farrar, The Lord's Prayer, pp. 229, 245, 257. VI. 14, 15.—D. M. T. Willis, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 300. VI. 16.—E. Lyttelton, ibid. vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 168. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. x. p. 73. VI. 16-18.—E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 264. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 417. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 298.

'When thou fastest.'—MATTHEW VI. 17.

FASTING? Why, for a man who is trying to do his work in the best way, life is a perpetual fast.—EDWARD THRING.

REFERENCES.—VI. 17.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 141. J. S. Mavor, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 174. VI. 17, 18.—F. E. Paget, Sermons on Duties of Daily Life, p. 289. VI. 19.—S. Rigby, Sketches of Sermons, p. 1. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 275. W. B. Selbie, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1904, p. 212. VI. 19, 20.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 299. VI. 19-21.—Stopford A. Brooke, The Fight of Faith, p. 307. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 28. R. J. Campbell, A Faith for To-Day, p. 331. George MacDonald, Unspoken Sermons, p. 118. J. Denney, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 344. R. J. Campbell, ibid. vol. lxxii. 1900, p. 68. VI. 19-22.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 1. VI. 19-24.—J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 449. VI. 19-34.—W. Boyd Carpenter, The Great Charter of Christ, p. 233. VI. 20.—T. L. Cuyler, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 367. S. Rigby, Sketches of Sermons, p. 13. VI. 20, 21.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. i. p. 155.

'Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.'—MATTHEW VI. 21.

WHERE the pursuit of truth has been the habitual study of any man's life, the love of truth will be his ruling passion. 'Where the treasure is, there the heart is also.' Every one is most tenacious of that to which he owes his distinction from others.—HAZLITT.

THE character of a man depends on that which is his confidence. . . . If you can persuade a covetous man that money is not son bouclier ni sa grande récompense, but that God is, you change him from a covetous man into a pious man. . . . The thing in which I put my confidence for happiness has necessarily a directing influence over my whole being; it communicates its own nature to me in some measure. ERSKINE OF LINLATHEN.

REFERENCES.—VI. 21.—H. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 211. A. F. Winnington Ingram, Church Times, vol. lviii. 1907, p. 690. H. Harris, Short Sermons, p. 230. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 302.

THE EYE OF THE SOUL

'The light of the body is the eye: if therefore thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light. But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness!'—MATTHEW VI. 22, 23.

I. If we would see aright, we must cultivate the imagination.

II. Have faith in conscience as a trustworthy witness.

III. Educate them both in the things of God. If one of us was asked to judge a piece of music to see if it were Handel's, we should be sure to judge wrongly, if we did not know Handel's style; we must study our composer; we must read into his thoughts and note his expressions, and then we shall know if the piece has a true ring or not. So it is with the things of God: something comes before you purporting to be from God: are you in a position to judge? Not if you have never studied God's ways, not if you know nothing of His love, not if you never pray, not if you are drifting on, careless of your faith, not if you only care for your intellect and leave conscience and imagination to dwindle and to die: then you will decide against the revelation of God; for the light that is in you will be darkness, and if the light that is in you be darkness, how great is that darkness! But if, on the other hand, with humble patience and modest fearlessness you turn yourself towards the opening heaven; if with fresh untarnished powers you compare that external revelation with the light already gathered by those powers within; if, to sum it all up, in the words of the text, your eye is single, then the opening revelation shall flood your soul with light; nay! your whole body shall be full of light; you shall breathe light, speak light, act light; and you shall inherit the blessing pronounced on those who have 'not seen and yet have believed'.—BISHOP WINNINGTON INGRAM, Oxford University Sermons, p. 1.

REFERENCES.—VI. 22.—W. G. Rutherford, The Key of Knowledge, p. 182. J. J. Tayler, Christian Aspects of Faith and Duty, p. 267. R. C. Moberly, Church Times, vol. xlviii. 1902, p. 76. VI. 22, 23.—J. G. James, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 118. S. Milburn, ibid. vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 152. J. Martineau, Enleavours After the Christian Life (2nd Series), p. 100. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 175. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 335. VI. 22-24.—E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 282.

'If the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness.'—MATTHEW VI. 23.

HE put things in such a way that his hearer was led to take each rule or fact of conduct by its inward side, its effect on the heart and character; then the reason of the thing, the meaning of what had been mere matter of blind rule, flashed upon him. The hearer could distinguish between what was only ceremony and what was conduct; and the hardest rules of conduct came to appear to him infinitely reasonable and natural, and therefore infinitely prepossessing.—M. ARNOLD.

HUMAN life at the best is enveloped in darkness; we know not what we are or whither we are bound. Religion is the light by which we are to see our way along the moral pathways without straying into the brake or the morass. We are not to look at religion itself, but at surrounding things with the help of religion. If we fasten our attention upon the light itself, analysing it into its component rays, speculating on the union and composition of the substances of which it is composed, not only will it no longer serve us for a guide, but our dazzled senses lose their natural powers; we should grope our way more safely in conscious blindness. 'When the light that is in you is darkness, how great is that darkness!' In the place of the old material idolatry we erect a new idolatry of words and phrases.—FROUDE on Calvinism.

REFERENCE.—VI. 23.—Hugh Price Hughes, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 161.

'Ye cannot serve God and mammon.'—MATTHEW VI. 24.

It would almost appear as if one half of mankind started on their career in life for the purpose of proving that this saying of our Lord's was not true.—MOZLEY.

MAMMON, cries the generous heart out of all ages and countries, is the basis of known gods, even of known devils. In him what glory is there that ye should worship him? No glory discernible; not even terror: at best, detestability, ill-matched with despicability!—CARLYLE, French Revolution (towards close).

OUR deity being no longer Mammon—O Heavens, each man will then say to himself: 'Why such deadly haste to make money? I shall not go to Hell, even if I do not make money! There is another Hell, I am told!'—CARLYLE, Past and Present, iv.

NATURE gives herself to those who are determined to possess her, but she will be exclusively loved.—MILLET, 'Notes on Art'.

Go and argue with the flies of summer that there is a power Divine yet greater than the sun in the heavens, but never dare hope to convince the people of the South that there is any other God than Gold.—KINGLAKE in Eothen, chap. vii.

THIS is the meaning of St. Francis's renouncing his inheritance; and it is the beginning of Giotto's gospel of works. Unless this hardest of deeds be done first—this inheritance of mammon and the world cast away—all other deeds are useless. You cannot serve, cannot obey, God and mammon. No charities, no obediences, no self-denials, are of any use, while you are still at heart in conformity with the world. You go to Church, because the world goes. You keep Sunday, because your neighbours keep it. But you dress ridiculously, because your neighbours ask it; and you dare not do a rough piece of work, because your neighbours despise it. You must renounce your neighbour, in his riches and pride, and remember him in his distress.—RUSKIN.

It is impossible to read those impassioned words in which Jesus Christ upbraids the pusillanimity and sensuality of mankind, without being strangely reminded of the more connected and systematic enthusiasm of Rousseau. 'No man,' says Jesus Christ, 'can serve two masters. Take, therefore, no thought for the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.' If we would profit by the wisdom of a sublime and poetical mind, we must beware of the error of interpreting literally every expression it employs. Nothing can well be more remote from the truth than the literal and strict construction of such expressions as Jesus Christ delivers. He simply exposes, with the passionate rhetoric of enthusiastic love towards all human beings, the miseries and mischiefs of that system which makes all things subservient to the subsistence of the material frame of man. He warns them that no man can serve two masters—God and mammon; that it is impossible at once to be high-minded and just and wise, and to comply with the accustomed forms of human society, seek power, wealth, or empire, either from the idolatry of habit, or as the direct instruments of sensual gratification.—SHELLEY, Essay on Christianity.

'But, you may tell me, the young people are taught to be Christians. It may be want of penetration. But I have not yet been able to perceive it. As an honest man, whatever we teach, and be it good or evil, it is not the doctrine of Christ. . . . Take a few of Christ's sayings and compare them with our current doctrines:—

'Ye cannot, he says, serve God and mammon. Cannot? and our whole system is to teach us how we can! . . .

'Take no thought for the morrow. Ask the successful merchant; interrogate your own heart; and you will have to admit that this is not only a silly but an immoral position. All we believe, all we hope, all we honour in ourselves or in our contemporaries, stands condemned in this one sentence, or, if you take the other view, condemns the sentence as unwise and inhumane. We are not then of the "same mind that was in Christ". We disagree with Christ. Either Christ meant nothing, or else He or we must be in the wrong. . . .

'To be a true disciple is to think of the same things as our Prophet, and to think of different things in the same order. To be of the same mind with another, is to see all things in the same perspective; it is not to agree in a few indifferent matters near at hand and not much debated; it is to follow him in his farthest flights, to see the force of his hyperboles. . . . You do not belong to the school of any philosopher because you agree with him that theft is, on the whole, objectionable, or that the sun is overhead at noon. It is by the hard sayings that discipleship is tested.' Whereupon the writer ends, as he began, by vehemently denying the claim of modern Christians (so-called) to the name and mind of Christ. When the hard sayings of Christ conflict with modern practice, the whole fellowship of Christians, he contends, 'falls back in disappearing wonder'.—R. L. STEVENSON.

REFERENCES.—VI. 24.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (Sermon-Sketches), vol. ii. p. 5; see also 2nd Series, vol. ii. p. 126. J. K. Popham, Sermons, p. 156. H.

Ward Beecher, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 303. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 182. E. Fowle, Plain Preaching for Poor People (10th Series), p. 85. H. Scott Holland, Church Times, vol. lvi. 1906, p. 347; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 195. F. W. Farrar, ibid. vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 49. A. M. Fairbairn, ibid. vol. liv. 1898, p. 229. VI. 24, 25.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 311; see also Creed and Conduct, p. 184, and Sermons Preached in Manchester, p. 261.

THE LORD WILL PROVIDE

(Fifteenth Sunday after Trinity)

'Take no thought for your life.'—MATTHEW VI. 25.

THE verses in to-day's Gospel are about 'taking no thought'. What does that mean? Our Lord mentions it five times (vv. 25, 27, 28, 31, 34), so it must be important. Is it that we are not to think at all about life, raiment, food, etc.? No; God has given us reason, judgment, prudence, etc., to use for His glory; but it is that we are not to think too much, so as to be full of care, and anxiety, as though God were not caring for His children's wants (Phil. iv. 6).

Now, our Lord says we may take a lesson in this—

I. From the Birds (v. 26). We see them flying about in the air—hopping here and pecking there. 'They sow not,' that they may have a good crop; 'they reap not,' that they may have a good provision in store. But do they ever want? You never see them in need of anything. Why? Because God provides them with all, and watches over them (Job xxxviii. 41). He knows them (Ps. l. 11). He is acquainted with their ways (Jer. xvii. 11). He provides their dwelling (Ps. civ. 16, 17). He hears their cry (Ps. cxlvii. 9). He gives man a law concerning them (Deut. xxii. 6, 7). The sparrow lying dead upon the housetop does not escape the eye of God (Matt. x. 29).

II. From the Flowers (v. 28).—'Consider the lilies, how they grow.' A bulb is put into the ground. It appears lost in winter, but rises in spring (Cant. ii. 11, 12; John xii. 24; 1 Cor. xv. 36-38). They are 'of the field,' ready therefore to perish (Ps. ciii. 15, 16). 'They toil not,' etc. There is no labour on their part. Yet how beautiful the lilies are! The glory of Solomon was great (1 Kings x.). But to what does 'the greater than Solomon' compare Himself (Cant. ii. 1, 2)?

III. And all this is for our Learning.

(a) Our heavenly Father knows exactly what we need (v. 32). If He provides for the birds and lilies which 'take no thought,' surely He will provide for me, His own child (Ps. xliii. 1; Luke xi. 13).

(b) We are not, however, to be idle, and fancy God will do all. That is tempting, not trusting. Be diligent with what God gives, and leave the rest to Him (Prov. xiii. 4; Matt. xxv. 24).

(c) One thing we are to 'take thought' about—that is, our soul's welfare (v. 33). That first and last should engage our attention (Phil. ii. 12; 2 Pet. i. 10; iii. 14).

REFERENCES.—VI. 25.—F. W. Farrar, Sin and Its Consequences, p. 94. Lyman Abbott, Christian World Pulpit, vol.

xlx. 1896, p. 245. A. B. Bruce, ibid. 1896, p. 179. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 95. VI. 25-34.—J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 483. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 288. Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 26. A. J. Griffith, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xv. p. 140. J. M. Neale, Sermons to Children, p. 204. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Waterside Mission Sermons, vol. i. No. 16. C. Kingsley, Discipline and Other Sermons, p. 168. VI. 26.—R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 140. E. White, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 385. A. H. Bradford, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 151. VI. 26-30.—G. Elmslie Troup, ibid. vol. xl. 1891, p. 197. VI. 27.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 220.

HUMAN LILIES

'Consider the lilies, how they grow.'—MATTHEW VI. 28.

I. PROBABLY the lily of Galilee was our Lord's favourite flower. I am not aware that He mentioned any other. And if we were capable of considering the lily, not by chemical analysis, but by the laws of philosophic thought, and knowing how it grew, we should discover that the whole history of created (or, rather, derived) life was bound up in the nature of that flower. If we could trace it back to its very first beginning we should have solved the riddle of life, and discovered—as Tennyson said of the flower in the crannied wall—the secret of God and man.

II. A lily, our Lord implies, is the analogy of a man; but it is an analogy with a difference. So far as we can judge, the lily is irresponsible. It appears to us to be evolved solely by the direct action of the Creative Spirit operating in natural law; its growth and beauty are the automatic result of the continuous adjustment of internal relations to external relations. Our life, like the life of the lily, is from above—that is, from within. It is Divine; but it may be helped by our care or hindered by our neglect; that which in the lily is probably mechanical and unconscious must be with us a willing exercise of spiritual energy. We are not responsible for where we are planted. 'My Father is the Husbandman.' The environment into which I am born is His affair, not mine; and all lilies have not the same environment to overcome, or the same difficulties to meet. There are some planted in pleasant gardens, protected from trial; there are others, like the beautiful water-lily, whose whole growth is a continuous struggle, who must rise from the very depths, and lift their heads above the pressure around them, and there, resting on the surface of the very difficulty they have overcome, open out their golden petals and feed upon the sunshine. The power of rising in the water-lily is calculated exactly according to the depth of the water in which the natural law has planted it. There hath no temptation taken it but such as it shall be able to overcome. There is within the stem of the water-lily an elaborate apparatus, consisting of an elastic spiral coil, which expands and contracts, giving it power to rise or sink as the water deepens or diminishes, so that it may be always above the pressure in which it lives, and face to face with the life-giving sun.

III. Is the spiral coil, the Divine nature, thus lifting each one of us? The grace we do not exercise, the power we do not exert, like the limb we do not use, or the faculty we do not expand, atrophies, withers, weakens. The first step is to believe in the power, and the next to suffer the life to come out. The saying about not 'toiling and spinning' has reference only to the production of Christian character, and it means that Christian character is not a mosaic of moralities, painfully built up in imitation of a model, but a life; not hand-made, like Solomon's robes, but God-evolved, like the lily's flower.—B. WILBERFORCE, Speaking Good of His Name, p. 47.

A SERMON FOR SPRINGTIDE

'Consider the lilies of the field.'—MATTHEW VI. 28.

I LIKE at this season of the year to speak sometimes on the ministry of nature, and to discover what that meant for Jesus.

I. In this matter there is one thing which strikes me, and that is the contrast between Christ and Paul. You never feel that Paul is at home in the country. You always feel that Paul is at home in the city. When he would illustrate the things of grace, he does not turn to the vine or the lily. He turns to the soldier polishing his armour; to the gladiator fighting before ten thousand eyes; to the free-born citizen whose civic charter had been won in the senate of imperial Rome. Not in the city did Jesus find His parables, save when He saw the children in the market-place. He found them in the lily of the field, with which even Solomon could not compare.

II. Again, if Christ is different from Paul in this matter, He is equally distinguished from His Jewish ancestry. Remember He was a Jew after the flesh. Yet when we read His teaching about nature, we feel we have moved away from the Old Testament. And I want to try to show you whereon that difference of interpretation rests, and what is the fact that underlies it.

1. Open your Old Testament, and tell me the aspect of nature which you most often find there. It is not the world of sunshine and of flower. It is the world of vast and mighty things. In things that were greater and grander than all others, in hurricane and storm, in wild and unmastered forces—it was in these pre-eminently that the Jew awoke to the presence and the power of God. Now turn to the teaching of the man of Nazareth—'Consider the lilies of the field'. It is no longer the things that tower aloft; it is no longer the things that shock or startle—it is not these that to the man of Nazareth are richest in Divine significance. It is the vineyard on the sunny hill; it is the lily waving in the field. It is things common and usual and silent which no one had had eyes to see before. Never is love richer in revelation than when it consecrates all that is quiet and lowly.

2. One thing more, which helps to illuminate the mind of Christ. It is how often, when He speaks of nature, He deliberately brings man upon the scene. He could not look at the lilies of the field but He saw Solomon in all his glory. And it all means that while the love of nature was one of the deepest passions in Christ's heart, it was not a love that led to isolation, but found its crowning in the love of man. There is a way of loving nature that chills a little the feeling for mankind. There is a passion for beauty that may be a snare, for it weakens the ties that bind us to humanity. But when a man loves nature as Jesus Christ loved nature, it will deepen and purify the springs of brotherhood, and issue in service that is not less loyal because the music of hill and dale is in it.—G. H. MORRISON, The Wings of the Morning, p. 164.

REFERENCES.—VI. 28.—W. P. Balfern, Glimpses of Jesus, p. 85. George Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 286. T. Sadler, Sermons for Children, p. 135. E. C. Paget, Silence, p. 123. J. Martineau, Endeavours After the Christian Life, p. 39. J. Coats Shanks, God Within Us, p. 126. J. Service, Sermons, p. 136. W. H. Shawcross, A Sermon Preached at a Flower Service. C. Silvester Horne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 308. C. Clay, ibid. vol. i. 1896, p. 103. G. A. Chadwick, The Intellect and the Heart, p. 83. VI. 28, 29.—E. White, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 3. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 296. S. Martin, Rain Upon the Mown Grass, p. 28. J. B. Mozley, Sermons Parochial and Occasional, p. 161. VI. 29.—F. Stanley Van Eps, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 189. VI. 28, 29, 30.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 145.

CHRIST AND NATURE

'Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall He not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?'—MATTHEW VI. 30.

I. 'If God so clothe the grass.' There is a little faint tone of depreciation in that remark. Perhaps we have not detected it before, but the depreciation is contrastive. We must place the emphasis not on 'the grass,' but on the contrast which the grass is cited to vivify and exemplify. 'If God so clothe the grass of the field'—so small and insignificant a thing as the grass that grows under your feet—what will He do for you, His sons, His daughters, His children redeemed and in process of final anointment and sanctification? The argument is progressive, and is an instance of a fortiori reasoning. If in the little, how much in the great: a favourite teacher in the ministry of Jesus Christ. If ye being evil know how to give bread and comfort to your children, how much more—That is the ascending argument. It outlines itself like a temple dome.

I wish we could believe this argument drawn from the grass. There is no want of beauty in the grass meadows. The landscape would be poor without the homely field where the cattle are, the cows and the sheep and other living things connected with home and farm life. Jesus did not despise the grass; He was only contrasting it with something other.

II. There is a religious mystery in all growing things. I do not know that there is much mystery, though there is a little, in a stone wall. A stone wall is a kind of proposition in geometry, but there is no ghostly margin, none of the stones seem to quake under a weight greater than their own, all the stones seem to be fastened in their places by a pressure more than fifteen pounds to the square inch; there is no religious mystery of a very perplexing or elevating kind about a stone wall, but there is about a nettle, that wasp of the vegetable world. 'If God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven——' Here is something, you see, perishable, yet typical. The grass is always on the way to something else; not to nothingness. The grass may be on the way to the sustentation of life. All these grass-blades may go to feed the lamb, and the lamb goes to feed the man, and the man goes to feed the other Man, the ever-coming Man, the Adam of the eternal purpose.

III. The Saviour on another occasion, in the Gospel according to John, makes use of the same figure; He says, 'The fields are white unto the harvest.' Jesus Christ could never get rid of the harvest idea; you will be surprised if you gather together the passages in which the word harvest occurs in the utterances of Christ. 'The harvest truly is plenteous'; 'the fields are already white unto the harvest.' You say there are but three months to harvest; why, the harvest is ripe now—out with the sickle, forward to the field, reap sheaves for God.

The blessed Saviour could not have lived if He could not have seen the harvest. It is because He is the End that He can bear to be the Beginning. 'I am Alpha because I am Omega.' To be Alpha is to be in agony, to be both Alpha and Omega is to be at rest, is to exemplify and to realize the peace of God.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 78.

REFERENCES.—VI. 30.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxviii. 1900, p. 201. H. P. Liddon, Sermons on Some Words of Christ, p. 33; see also Penny Pulpit, No. 461. VI. 31-33.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lii. No. 2973. VI. 31-34.—W. Leighton Grane, Hard Sayings of Jesus Christ, p. 87. VI. 32.—W. Boyd Carpenter, The Great Charter of Christ, p. 31. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. i. p. 109.

SEEKING GOD'S KINGDOM AND RIGHTEOUSNESS

(Septuagesima)

'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you.'—MATTHEW VI. 33.

WITH an endless choice of things before us which we can do if we please, we want some great rule to help us how to choose, and to make a plain pathway for us when everything seems so tangled and crooked. The text gives us Christ's rule. 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness.'

I. We are bidden to seek God's kingdom, and the first and easiest way of seeking it is by prayer; and that prayer Christ Himself puts into our mouths, 'Thy kingdom come'.

What then is God's kingdom? We may see our way a little toward answering that question by considering our own kingdom, that kingdom for which we beseech God every time we offer up the prayer for the High Court of Parliament. It is our laws and government stretching themselves among us in ways which we too often forget, that keep our lives and goods in safety, and allow us to pursue our several callings in peace. But God's kingdom is over men's minds and spirits as well as their bodies: not one secret chamber of their hearts can they call wholly their own. His kingdom also is a kingdom of laws, and His Almighty power can never be put forth against His own laws; and the laws of the Gracious and Holy One must needs be gracious and holy too. All good human laws are faint and partial copies of His. And just as human laws bind members of one people to each other, and compel each man to respect the rights of his fellows, so the laws of God's kingdom bind men to each other by ties of the spirit, not of the body, by love and mutual trust and self-denial and devotion. Each of us obeys the laws of God's kingdom just so far as he performs the task in life which God has set him.

II. Christ sent His Apostles to preach the good news of the kingdom, and they rejoiced to declare that it was already come. But though it is among us, there is rebellion enough against it. God has given to men the power of choosing between good and evil. Any one who has thought or care for the welfare of the world must needs pray with all his heart that God's kingdom may come more and more, and that its blessed laws may be daily better known and better obeyed. And thus having begun with seeking God's kingdom by prayer he will go on to seek it in all his daily life.

III. But we are bidden to seek not only God's kingdom, but also His righteousness. For God's righteousness is itself the very spirit of His own kingdom. Christ does not here tell us merely to seek righteousness, though elsewhere we are thus bidden; but to seek God's righteousness. Any righteousness which is of our own making, which we try to gain by standing aloof from Him, is worth nothing at all.

'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness,' says Christ. So far as we can make that the aim of our lives, so far shall we find our way straight and plain before our face.—F. J. A. Hort, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 81.

'The kingdom of God.'—MATTHEW VI 33.

THE kingdom of God, the grand object of Christianity, is mankind raised, as a whole, into harmony with the true and abiding law of man's being, living as we were meant to live.—MATTHEW ARNOLD.

'Seek ye the kingdom of God.'—MATTHEW VI. 33.

EVERY man is worth just as much as the things are worth about which he is concerned.—MARCUS AURELIUS.

'Seek ye first the kingdom of God.'—MATTHEW VI. 33.

'ABOVE all things,' Professor Drummond once told the Harvard students, 'do not touch Christianity unless you are willing to seek the kingdom of heaven first.

I promise you a miserable existence if you seek it second.'

WE forget that there may be many duties, but that among them all there is a first, and a last, and that we must not fulfil the last before fulfilling the first, just as one must not harrow without ploughing.—TOISTOY.

THE whole of duty is modified when we change the hierarchy of duty. How significant is the etymology of 'prerogative,' the section that was asked first for its opinion! There lies the whole force of our ideal. Which do you consult first? Everything else will be different. . . . That which gives life its keynote is not what men think good, but what they think best.—JULIA WEDGWOOD.

REFERENCES.—VI. 33.—E. S. Talbot, Sermons at Southwark, p. 1; see also The Kingdom of God, vol. i. p. 17. J. Martineau, Hours of Thought on Sacred Things, pp. 17, 31. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. vi. p. 228. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 194. J. B. Mozley, Sermons Preached Before the University of Oxford, p. 275. H. C. Beeching, Inns of Court Sermons, p. 79. R. W. Dale, Christian World Pulpit, vol. II. 1897, p. 230. G. A. Gordon, ibid. vol. liii. 1898, p. 254. R. J. Campbell, ibid. vol. lv. 1899, p. 392. E. Lyttelton, ibid. vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 173. H. Hensley Henson, ibid. vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 113. W. J. Knox-Little, Church Times, vol. xxx. 1892, p. 385. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxi. No. 1864; vol. xliii. No. 2515. Beveridge, Works, vol. v. p. 413. Tillotson, Sermons, vol. vi. p. 149. Jay, Short Discourses, vol. iii. p. 395. J. C. Hare, Sermons, vol. i. p. 293. Isaac Williams, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 134. Lord A. Hervey, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 222. Fairbairn, City of God, p. 317. Selections from Pusey, p. 91. Kingsley, Sermons for the Times, No. xiii. Parker, Inner Life of Christ, vol. i. p. 213, and Pulpit Analyst, vol. i. p. 252, and Homiletic Analysis of Matthew. Homiletic Quarterly, vol. i. p. 349; vol. iii. p. 402. Homiletic Magazine, vol. viii. p. 64. Christian World Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 123; vol. vi. p. 128. Beecher, vol. xii. p. 164; vol. xvi. p. 133; vol. xviii. p. 388. Bruce's Chief End of Revelation, p. 297. Macleod's Gentle Heart, p. 87. Pulpit Analyst, vol. iii. p. 352; vol. v. p. 596. Alford, Advent, Creation, and Providence, p. 223. Dr. Alex. Whyte, Expositor (3rd Series), vol. ii. p. 224. Spurgeon, Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, No. 1864.

'Seek ye the kingdom of God. . . . Take no thought for the morrow.'—MATTHEW VI. 33, 34.

ANXIETY and Ennui are the Scylla and Charybdis on which the bark of human happiness is most commonly wrecked.—W. E. H. LECKY.

REFERENCES.—VI. 33, 34.—A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part i. p. 203; see also One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 302.

ON WORRY

'Be not therefore anxious for the morrow, for the morrow will be anxious for itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.'—MATTHEW VI. 34.

OUR Lord in this sentence, 'Be not over anxious about to-morrow,' which is an excellent instance of His homely teaching, warns us against the commonest of all faults, worrying ourselves about troubles that may never happen.

I. It cannot be concealed that people who are sound and orthodox in all their beliefs, who have no doubts about the Incarnation, the Resurrection, and so on, are often in practice discontented self-tormentors. Their religious being seems divided into two distinct compartments; one contains the doctrines confessed every Sunday, the other contains the precepts ignored all through the week. Do not let your faith only assure you of the truth of the articles of the Creed. The faith that is required of you is not only an intellectual assent to certain propositions, it is a living belief in a Father which should keep you from fretfulness and over-anxiety in common life.

II. Cast all your care upon Him. But it is useless to tell us to cast our care on God unless we really and truly believe that He cares for us. No man can cast his care upon an It. If a man does not believe in God, when the pressure of care becomes too heavy for him to bear it alone one of two results will follow; either the creed will break down or the man will break down. Hence we have so often seen unbelievers commit suicide. Take God out of the world, and you will have no one on whom you can with any hope of satisfaction cast your care.

But though we may never have said what the fool says in his heart, though rarely with his lips, 'There is no God,' do we really believe that 'God cares for me'? It is easier to believe that God cares for the universe as a whole than to believe that He cares for individuals. He is a Father, and He has room in His infinite heart for each one of us. It is a mistake to suppose that some cares are too insignificant to take to God in prayer.

And in so doing we shall often see our cares and worries in a different light and realize how unnecessary some of them are. For what is it, too often, that men worry about? Christ goes to the root of the matter. It is 'to-morrow'; almost always 'to-morrow'.

III. But move the subject up into a higher plane. Is it possible that Christ forbade men to be anxious about their moral and spiritual future? Did He say, 'Do not be over anxious about what awaits you after this life?' He guards Himself against any misconception in the same passage by saying: 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness,' and so on. If we give the first place in our thoughts and anxieties to the kingdom of God and to true righteousness, we shall find the little worries of life fall into the background of their own accord.—C. H. BUTCHER, The Sound of a Voice that is Still, p. 196.

Illustration.—I have read somewhere a very quaint proverb: 'White ants pick a carcase quicker and cleaner than a lion'. Do you see the force of the saying? It means that little cares may even more effectually destroy our peace than a single great trouble, if, in a mistaken reverence for God's greatness (which is really unbelief) we refuse to cast them upon Him.—C. H. BUTCHER.

AGAINST WORRY

'Take, therefore, no thought for the morrow.'—MATTHEW VI. 34.

I PREFER the Revised Version for our text, 'Be not anxious for the morrow'; but, even so, this is one of the words of the Lord which absolutely startle us with the greatness of their claim. 'This is one of the words which brings it home to us how great and strenuous a matter it is to be a Christian man. 'Be not anxious for the morrow'; yet we remember that all the world, beginning with ourselves, seems to be clouded over with a great anxiety.

But, subtle as the temptation is to worry and to be anxious, there is no question that it is a quite different temper which the Christian man is bidden and expected to learn. 'There is no question about the Lord's phrase; there is no question for the Christian man about the absolute disloyalty of worry and anxiety.

Well, then, if Christ is true, it is the Father's intention to make of every life a great matter. Christ, with His miraculous power, brings the steadfast and sober spirit into our life—'See, there is not one thing that happens to Me without My Father; shall I not wait My Father's time?' If we could only believe that we mattered we could bear upwards through the pain, could we not? There, at all events, would be a foundation under us if we could know that the little things of little forgotten lives came home to an unforgetting God.

And think what Christ brought home, and brings home, to His own world, His own disciples. His character, His miracles, His words—they are all part of the same earnest assurance that God is alive, with a great and wonderful meaning for every person; and though the miracles have ceased—at least, some miracles have ceased, certain matters of outside miracles have ceased—yet the miracles were never more than a sign, the attention of the world was always taken from them right through to the thing they signified; and the one great thing that the miracles of Jesus signified was this—that we are the absolute assurance to the world of the Divine Providence, of its purpose, and of its power.

But there are two things which are necessary if this conviction of the Providence of God is to become a reality for us.

I. The first thing is that we should accept the Mastery of Jesus. It is to His disciples that He brings peace. Are we disciples?

II. And the second thing is the resolution to live one day at a time. 'Be not anxious for the morrow,' for, after all, it is only to-day that we have to live. We look forward and try and think out how we will act, and to-morrow it is all so different, and meanwhile we have exhausted the nerve and we have used the energy which God intended to give us anew for the fresh day's work. There was no gathering of the manna for more than one day at a time.

'Take no thought for the morrow.'—MATTHEW VI. 34.

WHAT is content? The true answer to that is—A world of bliss and rest. It is not helpless submission to necessity. It is not the fulfilment of all roving desires. It is a sublime condition, the product of knowledge and faith and hope and love. One of its conditions is the perception of our proper place in the universe, and the belief that we have strictly a vocation. Another is that cheerful humility of spirit which honour upholds, and which makes no extravagant demands on the universe or on Providence. Another is the alchymic eye to see much in little—the spirit which made the old woman say to Bishop Burnet, as she held up her crust, ‘All this and Christ!’—JAMES SMETHAM.

JOHN ROSEDEW went to his home—a home so loved and fleeting—and tried to comfort himself on the road with various elzevirs. Finding them fail, one after another, for his mind was not in cue for them, he pulled out his little Greek Testament, and read what a man may read every day, and never begin to be weary; because his heart still yearns the more towards the grand ideal, and feels a reminiscence such as Plato the divine, alone of heathens, won.

John Rosedew read once more the Sermon on the Mount, and wondered how his little griefs could vex him as they did. That sermon is grander in English, far grander, than in the Greek; for the genius of our language is large, and strong, and simple—the true spirit of the noblest words that ever on earth were spoken. Ours is the language to express; and ours the race to receive them.

What man, in later life, whose reading has led him through vexed places—whence he had wiser held aloof—does not, on some little touch, brighten, and bedew himself with the freshness of the morning, thrill as does the leaping earth to see the sun come back again, and dashing all his night away, open the power of his eyes to the kindness of his Father?

John Rosedew felt his cares and fears vanish like the dew-cloud among the quivering tree-tops; and bright upon him broke the noon, the heaven where our God lives.—R. D. BLACKMORE, Craddock Nowell, chap. LI.

‘Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.’—MATTHEW VI. 34. My thoughts are always rambling over past or future scenes; I cannot enjoy the present happiness for anticipating the future, which is about as foolish as the dog who dropped the real bone for its shadow.—DARWIN.

REFERENCES.—VI. 34.—J. B. Mozley, Sermons Parochial and Occasional, p. 38. H. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 108. T. De Witt Talmage, Sermons, p. 96. H. Ward Beecher, ibid. (4th Series), p. 1. A. MacLeod, Days of Heaven Upon Earth, p. 119. A. M. Fairbairn, Christian World Pulpit, vol. II. 1897, p. 257. R. C. Anderson, ibid. vol. III. 1897, p. 171. H. Scott Holland, ibid. vol. LVI. 1899, p. 177; see also vol. Lxi. 1902, p. 173; see also Church Times, vol. XLII. 1899, p. 319.

‘Judge not, that ye be not judged.’—MATTHEW VII. 1.

‘NEXT week, it is still but the 10th of April, there comes a new nineteen’ to the guillotine; ‘Chaumette, Gobel, Hébert’s widow, the widow of Camille: these also roll their fated journey; black Death devours them. . . . For Anaxagoras Chaumette, the sleek head now stripped of its bonnet rouge, what hope is there? Unless Death were “an eternal sleep”? Wretched Anaxagoras, God shall judge thee, not I.’—CARLYLE, French Revolution, Vol. III. book VI. chap. iii.

For myself, I no more call the Crusades folly than I call the eruption of a volcano folly, or the French Revolution folly, or any other bursting up of the lava which lies in nature or in the hearts of mankind. It is the way in which nature is pleased to shape the crust of the earth and to shape human society. Our business with these things is to understand them, not to sit in judgment on them.—FROUDE.

I SOMETIMES wonder whether people who talk so freely about extirpating the unfit even dispassionately consider their own history. Surely one must be very ‘fit’ indeed not to know of an occasion, or perhaps two, in one’s life when it would have been only too easy to qualify for a place among the ‘unfit’.—HUXLEY.

FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE to his mother: ‘Of all spirits I believe the spirit of judging is the worst, and it has had the rule of me I cannot tell you how dreadfully and how long. Looking into other people for faults which I had a secret consciousness were in myself, and accusing them instead of looking for their faults in myself, where I should have been sure to find them all; this, I find, has more hindered my progress in love and gentleness and sympathy than all things else. I never knew what the words ‘judge not, that ye be not judged’ meant before; now they seem to me some of the most awful, necessary, and beautiful in the whole Word of God.

HAVE it a fixed principle that getting into any scornful way is fatal.—BUSHNELL.

‘THE life of Harriet Martineau is strong upon me at present,’ James Smetham writes in 1876. ‘When the “orthodox” begin to frown and curse and maledict, and send everybody into blackness of darkness who does not hold their precise creed, that is more from beneath than above, and never over any good. And I must say that the lives of some “professors” are below the moral elevation of many who do not see the evangelic scheme at all. . . . God knows if H. M. was true to the core—I don’t. I can’t unwind her seventy-four years of act and thought, and if I could, who made me a judge or a divider? Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? He grasps her now, and not an atom shall be wanting in the justice of Divine love

How often we forget in judging others the influences under which they have grown up! How can one expect a child to be truthful when he sees how servants, yes, often parents, practise deceit? How many children hear from those to whom they look up, expressions, principles, and prudent rules of life, which consciously or unconsciously exercise an influence on the young life of the child! Yet with how little of loving introspection we pass our judgments?—MAX MÜLLER.

'THE world is habitually unjust in its judgments of such men as Burns,' Carlyle protests. 'Unjust on many grounds, of which this one may be stated as the substance: It decides like a court of law, by dead statutes; and not positively but negatively, less as what is done right than as what is or is not done wrong. . . . Here lies the root of many a blind, cruel condemnation of Burnses, Swifts, Rousseaus, which one never listens to with approval. Granted, the ship comes into harbour with shrouds and tackle damaged; the pilot is blameworthy; he has not been all-wise and all-powerful: but to know how blameworthy, tell us first whether his voyage has been round the globe or only to Ramsgate and the Isle of Dogs.'

No man can say in what degree any other person besides himself can be with strict justice called wicked. Let any of the strictest character for regularity of conduct among us, examine impartially how many vices he has never been guilty of, not from any care or vigilance, but for want of opportunity, or some accidental circumstance intervening; how many of the weaknesses of mankind he has escaped, because he was out of the line of such temptation; and, what often if not always weighs more than all the rest, how much indebted he is to the world's good opinion, because the world does not know all; I say, any man who can thus think, will scan the failings, nay the faults and crimes, of mankind around him, with a brother's eye.—BURNS.

It is curious to notice the kind of criticism indulged in by mechanics whom one meets at the exhibitions of modern pictures at Liverpool and elsewhere. There is no love in it. The men are for ever on the alert to find out something wrong, to detect faults, and no more.—DR. AUGUSTUS JESSOPP, Arcady, p. 70.

REFERENCES.—VII.—C. Gore, Church Times, vol. xxxiii. 1895, p. 507. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2312, vol. xlviii. No. 2808. VII. 1.—E. H. Eland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 158. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 214. VII. 1-5.—E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 305. VII. 1-6.—J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 529. VII. 1-12.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 324. VII. 1-14.—W. Boyd Carpenter, The Great Charter of Christ, p. 257.

JUST RECOMPENSE

'With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.'—MATTHEW VII. 2.

THESE words are usually interpreted in their application to the relationship which we sustain to others. But the words enshrine a principle to which our Lord gave other and varied applications:—

I. 'Unto you that hear shall more be given.' The measure of your hearing shall be the measure of your listening. If you want to hear the voice of God, listen! The voice will grow clearer and clearer as your hearing becomes more earnest and intense.

Listen to God's voice in conscience, and more and more pronounced and definite shall be its guidance. Do not listen much to conscience, and conscience will say less and less to you, until perhaps some day the hall where it ought to thunder shall be as silent as the tomb. This is a great law: 'Unto you that hear shall more be given,' and 'From him that hath not, shall be taken away even that which he hath'.

II. A person can read the Bible, and not listen, and to him there comes no eternal speech. The revelation is not given to the reader, but to the listener. If we turn to the Word with the spirit awake and alert, we shall be led from revelation to revelation, and from glory to glory.

III. 'According to thy faith be it unto thee.' The measure of our faith is the measure of the power we receive from our Lord. What is faith? 'Faith is the assurance of things hoped for.' Faith acts on the assurance that the thing hoped for is. 'Believe that you have received them, and ye shall have them.' That is faith. Such faith is power; and the more our faith increases the greater will be our power to pursue a quiet, faithful, and confident life.—J. H. JOWETT, Meditations for Quiet Moments, p. 72.

'Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?'—MATTHEW VII. 3.

'IN all my travels,' Cobden once wrote to Bright, 'three reflections constantly occur to me: how much unnecessary solicitude and alarm England devotes to the affairs of foreign countries; with how little knowledge we enter upon the task of regulating the concerns of other people; and how much better we might employ our energies in improving matters at home.'

COMMENTING, in his life of Milton, upon the poet's line, On evil days though fallen and evil tongues, Johnson protested that 'for Milton to complain of evil tongues required impudence at least equal to his other powers; Milton, whose warmest advocates must allow that he never spared any asperity of reproach or brutality of insolence.'

'NEVER yet,' says Dr. Augustus Jessopp, 'have I found an Arcadian who pleaded guilty to anything that was particularly owdacious, even though the recording angel had written it down in letters of flame for all the world to read; but never have I found the same Arcadian unable or unwilling to denounce somebody else!'

REFERENCES.—VII. 3-5.—H. Hensley Henson, Christ and the Nation, p. 54. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 38. R. W. Hiley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 189. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 311.

ON GUARDING HOLY THINGS

'Give not that which is holy unto the dogs.'—MATTHEW VII. 6.

GIVE not that which is holy unto the dogs—that is to say, never surrender the higher to the lower, never sink the celestial to the terrestrial; never desecrate that which has been consecrated. That was the sound piece of advice that our Lord gave to men and women who were trying to aim at a higher life while they were living in and mixing with the world. That was what He put before them as something definite to aim at. In mixing with men and women you will find much that is holy, much that is beautiful and pure and spiritual, and you will find much that is unholy, much that is coarse, and ugly, and animal. And when you find it, when you come across it and meet it face to face, then never surrender good to evil, never sink the higher to the lower.

There is the advice, and this is the picture. It is the picture of a glorious and a great temple, the priests sacrificing some spotless lamb, and as they stand at the altar the picture is that of an Eastern dog—a coarse, cruel scavenger—creeping up the distance of the temple, and then the priest taking a piece of this pure spotless lamb and throwing it to the dog. Every Jew would regard it as a scandal, everyone to whom our Lord was speaking would know to what He referred.

I. The Holiness of Manhood.—First, I think, human nature itself. You are holy, human nature is holy—that which is unholy is inhuman. Human nature is holy because it is human. Man is holy, woman is holy, and am I not right in saying that there is a danger lest our manhood and our womanhood be flung to the dogs and treated recklessly as something unholy, as Satanic rather than as sacred? Manhood is holy, and yet men desecrate their manhood.

II. The Holiness of Womanhood.—And the same is true of womanhood. We know there are women who in one mad moment have thrown their holiest and their best to the dogs. We know their temptations, we know what it means to them. They have lowered the level of womanhood. They have desecrated the consecrated. They have made themselves a sort of right of way for the public to walk over. To them the Master says, as to the men, 'Give not that which is holy to the dogs.'

III. The Holiness of Childhood.—And may I say a word for the children? The children are holy; if ever there is a time in life when men and women have been holy it is when they were children. And yet look how children are by their parents literally thrown to the dogs, sent out into life unwarned of everything. What wonder that they go when they are sent to the dogs. I have read the story of a child whose after-life was the life of many a man. He was a judge's son, and he stood at last in a felon's dock, and the judge who was trying the case knew, and knew well, the man's father. And he said to the prisoner at the dock: 'Don't you remember your father as you stand in that dock?' 'Yes,' was the reply, 'I do remember my father, and the greatest remembrance that I have of him is that whenever I wanted a word of advice, whenever I wanted him to enter into my boy life, he replied, "Go away, and don't worry or bother".'

IV. The Holiness of Health.—'Give not that which is holy to the dogs.' What is it you are in danger of giving to-day? Think it out and ask whether you are doing your best to keep it whole and intact and unimpaired. I will take but one more illustration of what I mean—health. Health is holy. Don't fling away health as men and women do so wildly, so recklessly. In the prayer of all prayers, the Lord's Prayer, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' comes in before the plea for pardon. First the body, then the soul, because if the body is not kept right the soul is morbid and consequently is not at its best to resist what it has to meet in life. 'Give not that which is holy to the dogs.' Take care of the drugs, take care of the stimulants that are so easily to be had. Take care of the way you spend your recreation hours. Life is in that sense holy, and it is to be treated as you would treat a church or a churchyard. Fence it in from the dogs, fence it in from all that desecrates it. All life really is sacred and holy. Your interest, your work in life is holy; and our thought to-day is the thought the Master gave to men and women who, as we have to do, lived in and mixed with the world. 'Give not that which is holy to the dogs.'

'Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine.'—MATTHEW VII. 6.

I WAS always pleased with the motto placed under the figure of the rosemary in old herbals:

Sus apage, haud tibi spiro.

—COLERIDGE.

THERE is a Buddhist parallel: 'Let not this doctrine, so full of truth, so excellent, fall into the hands of those unworthy of it, where it would be despised, shamefully treated, ridiculed, and censured'.

'MR. ERSKINE [of Linlathen]' Miss Wedgwood writes in her journal for 13 September, 1865, 'spoke of the connexion between Matthew VII. 1-5, "Judge not," etc., and the verses which follow, "Give not that which is holy to the dogs," etc., and then of the transition which seems in the ordinary acceptance of these later words so abrupt and almost contradictory, but which, as he understands it, is a harmonious development of the same idea. The instrument of judgment is the conscience; we judge ourselves by the conscience, and other men also, and the conscience is "that which is holy" in us; when therefore we present this holy thing in us to the service of malice, or of conceit, we are giving that which is holy unto the dogs, we are turning the good in us to the service of the evil in us, we are giving our light for the use of our own evil passions. The conscience is cast then as pearls before swine, the upper is made to serve the lower, both being in ourselves.'

REFERENCES.—VII. 6.—C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 232. W. Boyd Carpenter, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv, 1894, p. 88. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 313. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 80.

THE GOLDEN KEY OF PRAYER

'Ask, and ye shall have; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.'—MATTHEW VII. 7.

I. Why should we pray? I suppose that the first answer must be because of a deep inherited instinct which has been trained and fostered from our childhood by those we love. Whether a child would pray if it was never taught may fairly be questioned; but certainly there would always be in it that deep instinct for prayer. And, to reinforce the instinct of prayer, we have the voice of authority—the voice of One who came from heaven, and, therefore, must know what opens heaven's gate. When we ask the question, 'Why should we pray?' the answer is, 'We know that our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ'.

II. How shall we pray? What are the laws of the effective action of prayer?

1. Faith. You cannot pray, or you cannot enjoy your prayer unless you believe that, when you pray, you are coming to a Being who is absolutely perfect, absolutely good, absolutely just, and absolutely loving. It is faith in such a God as that which is the first secret of effective prayer.

2. Unselfishness. What does the Lord's prayer begin with? 'Our Father,' not 'My Father'. Selfishness chokes prayer.

3. Loyalty. Why does Jesus Christ trust His name to us to pray with? Why are we allowed to say 'for Jesus Christ's sake'? I answer that question by another. Why does a husband give his wife his name to use? On one condition, and that condition is that his interests are her interests, that his honour is her honour, and that her life is identified with his.

4. Effective prayer must be persevering. Why are those stories told us of the unjust judge and the selfish friend? To show us that, if an unjust judge or a selfish friend hears at last, then the God of love is certain to hear, and that if we persevere how much more will our heavenly Father give the answer to those that ask Him.

III. What shall we pray for? After the unselfish prayer which the Lord's Prayer teaches us to offer first, then we find that we are allowed to ask for the daily bread for body and soul, for the daily pardon, for the daily guardianship from the evil one for ourselves and for those we love.

And if people say, 'Why ask for these gifts of God? He will give them, surely, without asking,' our answer is, Does He do it in nature? The gold is the gift of God, but we dig for it, the coal is the gift of God, but we mine for it. The bread is the gift of God, but we sow for it and we reap for it. So with these other gifts of God—power, wisdom, strength, love. They are the gifts of God, but we have to pray for them; and therefore prayer comes to be the most beautiful work in the world, the most glorious work to be done with a method, to be done with perseverance and at regular times, and yet to pervade the whole life, so that in a true sense we 'pray without ceasing'.—BISHOP WINNINGTON INGRAM, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXVIII. 1905, p. 136.

Illustration.—I do not know that we can picture the authority on which we rest our prayers better than by recalling the touching scene in Sheffield when our late aged Queen in her last years had to open the gates of the Town Hall of Sheffield. It was thought well that she should not move from her carriage; so hidden electric wires were fastened to a golden key fitting into the lock which she could turn as she sat in her carriage. By an act of faith—and it came to that—by an act of faith she turned the golden key, and, as she turned the golden key, at some distance away, slowly, surely, the gates of the Town Hall opened. We cannot see the connecting wires which connect the golden key of prayer with heaven's gate, but a voice which we trust says to us, 'Turn the key; turn the golden key'. 'Ask, and ye shall have; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.'—BISHOP WINNINGTON INGRAM, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXVIII. p. 137.

REFERENCES.—VII. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxix. No. 1723. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 250. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 332. A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part ii. p. 220. W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 35. E. W. Attwood, Sermons for Clergy and Laity, p. 314. Frank Mudie, Bible Truths and Bible Characters, p. 15. John Harries, Does God Break His Pledges? p. 9. H. P. Liddon, Some Elements of Religion, p. 164. VII. 7, 8.—J. B. Mozley, Sermons Preached Before the University of Oxford, p. 213. J. G. James, Problems of Prayer, p. 43. H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. I. 1896, p. 216. S. Martin, Westminster Chapel Sermons, p. 109. VII. 7-12.—H. H. Snell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xi. p. 88. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 319. VII. 7-14.—J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 551. VII. 8.—S. Cox, Expositions, p. 60. VII. 9.—T. A. Sedgwick, Pædagogus, p. 1. VII. 9-11.—J. Burton, Christian Life and Truth, p. 121. VII. 10.—C. J. Ridgeway, The King and His Kingdom, p. 1.

THE REASONABLENESS OF PRAYER

'If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask Him?'—MATTHEW VII. 11.

PRAYER with Jesus was straightforward and unhesitating petition, asking God to do something, and believing that He would do it. And when Jesus laid the duty of petition upon His disciples He went on to assert the reasonableness of a man asking and of God answering, by that argument from man to God which he loved to use and which is thoroughly scientific.

I. When we ask whether it is reasonable to pray, and not merely a fond superstition, it surely counts for something that prayer is an instinct. In the straits of life, however indifferent a man may have grown to prayer, or however keenly he may have argued against prayer, upon a petition he will fall back.

What does it mean that a bird has wings but that there is air in which to fly, or that men are moved to pray in an orderly universe, but that there is a God to answer them?

II. 1. Granted, then, that men should pray, and that God will answer. What is given? Well, the answer may come, not in granting anything nor in taking anything away, but in a new state of mind. It is right to ask for such things as we need, and that we be saved from the things which we fear; but the chief of all prayers, in which all other are included, is this—'Not my will, but Thine be done'.

2. Again definite things may be given which are not visible. St. Paul's thorn in the flesh was not removed; but he received grace to turn it to good purpose, and was able to glory in his affliction.

3. Have we, then, no ground to pray for tangible things? For the healing of the sick, for deliverance from danger, for the welfare of our friends, for our daily bread? Are we to be politely laughed out of faith by clever writers making game of the 'sturdy beggar' type of prayer? Certainly the history of devotion affords some remarkably sturdy beggars who were not ashamed to beat at the door of God's palace and who refused to leave till they got an answer.

III. When God helps us He does not reverse the laws of nature, nor does He act without agents. When people in danger of shipwreck cry to God, it is not likely that the sea will be reduced to a calm, but it is likely that succour will come through the capacity of the captain. If it be God's will to grant the recovery of a sick person, it will be accomplished through the skill of a physician. In what particular are the laws of nature violated in such beneficent operations? Is anything more in keeping with human consciousness than action upon the mind from an unseen source, and is not the material the servant of the spiritual?—J. WATSON (IAN MACLAREN), The Inspiration of Our Faith, p. 227.

Illustration.—Müller of Bristol kept five large orphanages, besides circulating much religious literature, sending out several hundred missionaries, and teaching a hundred and twenty thousand children in his schools, at a total cost of £1,500,000, and he never had a subscription list or made an appeal for money. It is an absolute fact that he simply laid everything before God in prayer, and he never wanted for the support of his orphans. He is a witness to the success of prayer, acting in the physical sphere.—J. WATSON (IAN MACLAREN), The Inspiration of Our Faith, p. 236.

REFERENCES.—VII. 11.—Andrew Murray, The Children for Christ, p. 210. VII. 12.—J. J. Tayler, Christian Aspects of Faith and Duty, p. 218. E. A. Lawrence, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 329. T. Sadler, Sermons for Children, p. 93. VII. 13.—A. Jessopp, Norwich School Sermons, p. 1. Marcus Dods, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 136.

'Enter ye in at the strait gate. . . . Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.'—MATTHEW VII. 13, 14.

'Now, Madam,' writes Samuel Rutherford to Lady Kenmure, 'I persuade you that the greatest part but play with Christianity; they put it by-hand easily. I thought it had been an easy thing to be a Christian, and that to seek God had been at the next door; but O the windings, the turnings, the ups and downs that He hath led me through, and I see yet much way to the ford.'

THE straight and narrow way which Christ enjoined upon His followers indicates the moral path which each of us must observe in order to lead a blameless, consistent, and individual career. But the instant we try to survey the moral system of a whole people or race we are confronted, not by a single straight path, but by a vast plain, as it were, stretching from a dim light, far in the distance, with green, graceful hills skirting its base, to the wide plains dotted here with primeval forests, others with gardens of daintiest flowers, and cut up by manifold paths of various breadth running in seemingly contradictory directions. How one is bewildered by a sight like this!—PROF. INAZO NITOBE in Japan for the Japanese, p. 263.

I AM suspicious of any religion that is a people's religion or an age's religion. 'Narrow is the way,' our Saviour says.—NEWMAN.

'The straight and narrow way' is an expression that gathers up the whole meaning of the life of this people. It is true even in a geographical sense, the rocky path which leads from Egypt to Assyria is the promised land of the chosen people. . . . Israel has been called to be the prophet among the nations, and life in the present, for the prophet, is necessarily hampered and compressed within tiny limits.—MISS WEDGWOOD, Message of Israel, p. 56.

REFERENCES.—VII. 13, 14.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 342. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 323. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 63. R. Winterbotham, Sermons Preached in Holy Trinity Church, Edinburgh, p. 320. D. M. Ross, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 6. J. Stalker, ibid. vol. lvii. 1900, p. 113. C. Gore, ibid. vol. lix. 1901, p. 171. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ii. p. 233. J. R. West, Plain Preaching to Poor People (9th Series), p. 149. Eugene Bersier, Twelve Sermons, p. 19. C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 272.

THE PLACE FOR CHRISTIAN ASCETICISM

'Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life.'—MATTHEW VII. 14.

I. Is, then, the religious life narrow? Our Lord does not say so; He says exactly the reverse—that it is only the entrance into it that is narrow. I have seen a commodious vehicle with a very narrow door; when once you got in you could travel with comfort over vast ground, but the getting in was a little embarrassing. You must not imagine that the straitenedness of which our Lord speaks lies in the vehicle; it lies outside the vehicle—in yourself.

II. His thought, as I take it, might be expressed thus: 'You are entering a chariot with boundless capacities for travel. The one obstacle is the getting in, and that obstacle lies in you. You have something in your hand which prevents you from finding the door wide enough; it is a mirror in which you see yourself reflected. You will never get through the aperture along with your mirror; it is too narrow for both of you together. Throw aside your self-reflector; break it; leave it in fragments on the causeway; and entering into the chariot free from encumbrances, you will journey over a limitless plain.'

III. That is in spirit what I understand Christ to mean. His motive is not the restraint but the enlargement of the soul. He has provided for it a conveyance with immense travelling powers; its name is Love, and its synonym is not narrowness, but wideness. Unfortunately the soul has a mirror whose name is Selfishness; it dandles that mirror, it will not let it go. But if the soul would enter the chariot it must let the mirror go. The door is big enough for itself alone, but not big enough for the accompaniment of its looking-glass. If it would enjoy the chariot it must sacrifice the looking-glass. In the interest of wide locomotion, in the interest of extensive sight-seeing, in the interest of reaching a road from which all barrier will be removed, the mirror must be left behind. That must be crucified which narrows me; that must be sacrificed which impedes me; that must be amputated which prevents me from soaring on the wing.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 42.

THE REASONABLENESS OF CHRISTIANITY

'Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life.'—MATTHEW VII. 14.

THE doctrine of the text is part and parcel of the spirit and substance of our common philosophy. There is reason under all Jesus says, and He calls upon us to testify that what He is requiring at our hands is only an extension of the principle which lies at the basis of our whole life.

I. 'Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, that leadeth unto life'—of every kind. You mistake theology, you mistake religion, you mistake Jesus Christ if you think that there is not underneath the whole something that you yourselves are doing every day. Let us illustrate this, and then apply it.

1. Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth to—all learning that is worth acquiring. It is said of one of the greatest speakers of the English language that he spent three days in teaching himself how most effectively to utter five words, but when he uttered them the assembly sprang to its feet; fire had touched them, a revelation in speech had been made to their minds.

2. The argument is a fortiori: If for a corruptible, then what for an incorruptible? Thus the great appeal is thundered from infinite altitude, not to discourage the children of men, but to encourage and cheer and welcome every patient toiler.

II. You thought that this arduousness applied only to the kingdom of God; but what kingdom is not God's? There is no kingdom of light, music, beneficence, purity, love that is not God's.

Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, that leadeth to all excellence. Yet you stood out and said, Why hath God made this gate so strait into His kingdom? It is the law of necessity; it is the necessity of a profound, complete, and beneficent education. There will, of course, always be genius, but that is not to rule the average line of human education and progress. We are called upon to do ordinary work, common everyday work, useful, necessary work, full of enjoyment, and full of high utility; but strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, that leadeth unto this.

III. Now will you come and accept the conditions? In striving after this entrance we shall show much weakness. If you are really striving to enter in, you are already in. You have heard what Jesus said to us: 'Ask, and it shall be given; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened,'—almost breathlessly, as if the words were continuous, as if they were indeed one solid word. Ask—thine; seek—find; knock—and the door flies back, and all heaven opens its treasures for your use. So the Lord judges us at the point of our growth. Some are young, some are strong, some are very weak; some cannot knock yet because they are groping for the door. When they get hold of the door then they will knock.—J. PARKER, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 151.

REFERENCES.—VII. 14.—C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 107. A Scotch Preacher, The Strait Gate, p. 1. George Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 278.

'Beware of false prophets.'—MATTHEW VII. 15.

A PROPHET is a man who speaks for God, how then can the word 'false' be put before 'Prophet'? What a sharp sword this is to the ministry! Is the slime of the serpent on the altar? Is the lie in the sanctuary? Eden was the sanctuary of God, the garden of the Most High, and the serpent entered there.

I. When you enter a Roman house at Pompeii, you see marked on the pavement, 'Cave Canem'. Here at the very threshold of the Christian Church you have a 'Cave,' for the Lord Himself has uttered it. He says, 'Beware of false prophets'. He belonged to the New Covenant which fulfilled the Old. He speaks here in the language of the Old Covenant. But His Apostle Paul, he carries on the same caution. How does he look at it in the New Covenant of Grace? He says, 'Beware of false Apostles'. In the very early history of the Church there is this caution, 'Beware of false Apostles'.

II. And if this seems very hard on the pulpit, we too in the pulpit have our caution. We are to beware of 'False brethren'. Surely the very term 'brother' proves that he should never be false to you. The one in whom you have fellowship, whose hands you shake, whose eyes you have looked into. He pretends to be what he is not, and he pretends not to be what he is, so that all is false on his side. And God who hates the false shekel, the false measure, hates the false prophet, the false apostle, the false brother.

III. Consider this in connexion with the Christian Church. The Christian Church is that society which is governed by the spirit of truth. If there were no spirit of truth, there would be no Church, and the spirit of truth is to lead the Church into all truth. Not for any expediency of position or popularity can the Church countenance a lie. A lie in the Church is an outrage on the Holy Ghost. The Church must be true, and speak in the truth.

IV. What is true of the Church of God must be true individually. God requireth 'truth in the inward parts'. You must not say you believe, because you take it for granted, or because you have been told you must believe. Be true men and true women. Do you really love the truth? If you love the truth, I will tell you what happens: As you seek it, it expands in front of you, enlarges, becomes an horizon of infinite capacity and joy. Beyond yonder hill there rises the horizon, and you say, 'If I get to that hill, I might be able to put my hand against the horizon'. But when you climb the hill, it is just as far. So, too, when you know one truth, you shall see another, and it ever expands and enlarges before you. Your reward is in your search, and in the joy of finding what is true.—A. H. STAXTON, Unpublished Sermon.

THE VOICE OF THE CHURCH

'Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves.'—MATTHEW VII. 15.

THIS is the solemn warning of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Our Lord had come to earth to win us grace and to open heaven, that we might reach the end to which God created us. He made Himself the Divine example of our life; and not only so, He came also to reveal to us the Truth. He gave us every proof of the truth of this great claim of His, and when He was about to leave this world, set up His Church and put into it the great instrument of teaching the world, Divine Truth. 'As My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you,' and for that purpose our Lord poured out His Holy Spirit. Wonderful, glorious promise of God!

I. Hear the Church.—It is said that it is so difficult for us to know what is true. Well; we must remember that it is not what this minister or that or the other may say; the question is, What does the Christian Church throughout all the world teach to-day? What it teaches to-day we know is true because Jesus left His Holy Spirit with the Church. That is the standard by which we are to judge. We have not ourselves the right to judge any man. You have not to judge whether your minister is a good or a bad man. However bad your minister may be, it does not affect your salvation, or the Divine Truth which he teaches, for it is not his but his Divine Master's. Thank God it is so. We have not to judge other people. We have only to beware that our ministers teach us the truth as it has always been taught from the time of the Apostles down to this very day. We judge by that.

II. The Church not Narrow.—It has often been said how narrow and hard the Church is to those outside. Not at all! We do not judge others; we do not judge those who perhaps have never had the chance that we have had to learn. All we have to be careful about is that we are not outside the Christian Church. We do not judge; it is not for us to judge; it is for God. He teaches us the truth. We do know the one true Apostolic Church, and we can know by a certain method of those who teach if they teach what is true.

III. Beware of False Teachers.—There never was a time when error was so subtle and the devil was so busy corrupting the faith of the children of the Church. We have to be on our guard against false teachers; against those who set up their own private opinions and their own judgments against the truth. They are, as our Lord says, 'wolves in sheep's clothing'. There is nothing so deadly as heresy; it is deadly for the spirit. The path that is open to us is that we should believe in the revelation of Jesus Christ.

REFERENCES.—VII. 15.—W. Boyd Carpenter, The Great Charter of Christ, p. 279. VII. 15, 16.—J. Hughes, The Saviour's Warning Against False Teachers, a Sermon. VII. 15-20.—E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 333. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 70. J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 535. VII. 16.—H. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 97. H. Harris, Short Sermons, p. 179. VII. 16-20.—J. G. Greenhough, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1904, p. 273.

'Every good tree bringeth forth good fruit.'—MATTHEW VII. 17.

'WHEN a man,' said Bacon, 'has proposed to himself the highest exemplars of noble words and virtues, this done, he need not set himself, like a carver, to make an image, but let his better nature grow like a flower.'

REFERENCES.—VII. 17.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 66. VII. 18; XII. 33.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 47.

'By their fruits ye shall know them.'—MATTHEW VII. 20.

THE tree is known by its fruits; most truly so—but it depends for the maintenance of those fruits, yea, even for its own existence, upon its root in the soil beneath. The Christian life is judged of (and this with the strictest propriety) by that part of it which is seen, but it depends upon the part of it which is unseen for the hold it takes and keeps upon God.—DORA GREENWELL.

THE true evidences of Christianity are the public evidences, the effects upon history, and upon the world, and upon the lives of men in our own time. . . . If, when religion grew, morality increased in an equal measure, and the most fervent Christians were also the most honest and upright in business, the most innocent, the most friendly, we should not need treatises on evidence, for the lives of Christian men would be their own self-evidencing light. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' The great and real source of doubt in which all lesser doubts seem to be swallowed up is the apathy and indifference of Christian men, saying one thing and doing another.—JOWETT.

REFERENCES.—VII. 20.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 51. J. T. Bramston, Sermons to Boys, p. 1. F. W. Farrar, Everyday Christian Life, p. 190. S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 99.

* Not every one that saith unto Me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of My Father which is in heaven.—MATTHEW VII. 21.

THIS text brings very clearly before us that it is quite possible to know the name and the nature of the Lord Jesus Christ, and not to know His spirit. It is quite possible to be orthodox in expression, but not to be orthodox in life.

I. The expression 'Lord, Lord,' is a very proper expression of our faith. 'Ye call Me Master and Lord, and ye say well, for so I am.'

The expression 'Lord, Lord,' is the right expression of our relationship to Him. There is only one Lord, the Lord Jesus Christ, and so we say with David, 'Lord, I am Thy servant'; so with Paul, 'The servant of the Lord Jesus Christ'; so with James, 'The servant of the Lord Jesus Christ'; so with John, 'The servant of the Lord Jesus Christ'.

II. Let us take care when we say 'Lord, Lord,' we really mean it. When we pray, 'Through Jesus Christ our Lord,' let us mention 'Lord' in a vital way to our souls.

III. Let us take very good care that we use not these sacred words, 'Lord, Lord,' for our own interest. What harm has been done to religion when men have taken sacred words and used them as, what shall I say, stock-in-trade. Fancy taking the name of the Lord, Who was born in a manger, and died upon the gallows, and was put in a charity grave, for the sake of making yourself rich! Let us take care, again, that we never make use of religion to put ourselves in a higher position in society. Rise in society if you wish, but do not borrow the lever from Calvary. We must mind that the motive that lies at the bottom of it all is true; that when we say, 'Lord, Lord,' we are true men, and trust Him, and worship Him.

IV. What was the cause of the failure? What did these men not do? They used the right expression, but they did not do the right thing. For the eloquence of life must be always greater than the eloquence of words. If we be orthodox in expression, let us be quite certain we are orthodox in life. If we believe in the Master, let us try and have the Master's spirit. Be sympathetic, kind, gentle, tender, forgiving, and live for others. Be Christlike. Ask Him to make you like Him, 'Lord and Saviour, make me like Thee'. For the sake of God, let us be manly, and for the sake of man, let us be godly.—A. H. STANTON, Unpublished Sermon.

* Not every one that saith unto Me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of My Father which is in heaven.—MATTHEW VII. 21.

'THEY call me a great man now,' said Carlyle in his old age, 'but no one believes what I have told them.'

THE censors of modern literature are continually crying aloud for a new message. . . . Was ever age more rich in prophets and in great messages? But what have we done with them? Have we realized them in our lives, quite used up every available particle of their wisdom? And yet here are we hungry and clamouring again.—RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

REFERENCES.—VII. 21.—C. J. Vaughan, Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, p. 288. R. W. Dale, The Evangelical Revival, p. 104. John Wills, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 133. H. Hensley Henson, ibid. vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 91. W. C. E. Newbolt, Counsels of Faith and Practice, p. 114. H. P. Liddon, Sermons on Some Words of Christ, p. 63. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 341. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xx. No. 1158. M. G. Pearse, Thoughts on Holiness, p. 120. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 97. Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 618. Parker, The Inner Life of Christ, vol. i. p. 265. Parker, A Homiletic Analysis of the New Testament, vol. I. p. 82. M. Dods, Christian World Pulpit, 22 June, 1881.

* Many will say to Me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in Thy name? . . . And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from Me.—MATTHEW VII. 22, 23.

OUR Lord anticipates the time when active zeal for Himself will be no guarantee. And we may observe the difference between Christ and human founders. The latter are too glad of any zeal in their favour, to examine very strictly the tone and quality of it. They grasp at it at once; not so our Lord. He does not want it ever for Himself, unless it is pure in the individual.—MOZLEY.

REFERENCES.—VII. 22, 23.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 161. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 349. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2808. VII. 24.—A. Baker, Addresses and Sermons, p. 34. W. H. Frere, Church Times, vol. xlii. p. 26, 1899. VII. 24, 25.—A. Robertson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1903, p. 247. VII. 24-26.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 353. VII. 24-27.—J. Oswald Dykes, The Manifesto of the King, p. 637. E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, p. 358. A. Benvie, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 27. H. Scott Holland, ibid. vol. lxx. 1906, p. 245. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 87. Henry Varley, Spiritual Light and Life, p. 1. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 918. VII. 25.—H. E. Kyle, On the Church of England, p. 58.

'When Jesus had ended these words.'—MATTHEW VII. 28.

'I CAME away on Tuesday,' writes Cobden in 1857, 'after listening for two hours and a half to Disraeli. I wish there could be some Bessemer's power invented for shortening the time of speaking in the House. My belief, after a long experience, is that a man may say all he ought to utter at one "standing" in an hour, excepting a budget speech or a government explanation, when documents are read. The Sermon on the Mount may be read in twenty minutes; the Lord's Prayer takes one minute to repeat; Franklin and Washington never spoke more than ten minutes at a time.'

REFERENCES.—VII. 28.—J. Barclay, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 154. S. O. Tattersall, ibid. vol.

lxxx. 1906, p. 52. C. F. Aked, Old Events and Modern Meanings, p. 235. C. S. Robinson, Sermons on Neglected Texts, p. 248. VII. 28, 29.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 363. F. E. Ramsdell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lx. 1901, p. 139.

ONE HAVING AUTHORITY

'He taught them as one having authority.'—MATTHEW VII. 29.

I. THERE is an infinite pathos in this simple contrast between the teaching of Jesus and that of the scribes. His words had the ring of authority, and the people instinctively felt that that was not how their scribes spoke. The professional teachers lacked that note of authority without which all teaching is a mockery, not to say a crime. For is it not a crime to attempt to command the heart and conscience of another by the presentation of a truth which does not command and inspire our own? With Jesus, teaching was a matter of life and death; with the scribes it was a matter of profession. They looked upon the surface of the Old Testament, Christ looked into its heart. And is it any wonder that the people were astonished? As some one has said, Jesus spoke with authority, they spoke by authority. They quoted their rabbis; Jesus quoted nobody, because the evidence of the truth was in His heart, and the zeal for it consumed Him.

The hungry souls know very well whether they are being fed or not. Their teachers may array themselves in professional robes, they may give themselves professional airs, they may learnedly discuss religious difficulties, and show themselves conversant with the history of opinion, but to the soul that is striving for a word from God these things are nothing but a cruel delusion. The real question is, Can the teacher speak with authority? Do his words pierce and burn? Do they find me?

II. The great teacher is always rare. When he comes, we recognize him, not only as one who speaks with authority, but as one who is not as the scribes; that is, not as those other teachers whose special training and manifold opportunities should have enabled them to edify and astonish the people more than he. Clearly, there is more than learning and professional training needed to make a man a great preacher or teacher. What, then, is the secret of authoritative speech?

The thing most needful, and almost the one thing needful, is that the speaker should believe what he is saying. This seems an elementary demand; in reality it is the greatest of all demands. There are a hundred men who can speak, for one who really believes, and the only speech which strikes home and leaves its mark upon another soul is the speech of profound and passionate conviction. Man is more than mind, and belief is more than a thing intellectual. The teacher who covets earnestly the power of speaking with authority must believe his truth, not only with the understanding, but with the heart. He utters it, not as a proposition he can prove, but as a truth that has set his heart on fire. The impression he makes lies deeper than his words; it is the magnetism of the man—the inherent, transparent power of his message, and not the logic of his words—that carries conviction. The truth glows in his face, shines from his eyes. It does not so much belong to him as he belongs to it. It is not he that speaks, but a spirit that is speaking in him. He is not his own; he is urged on by an irresistible impulse to tell the thing he knows and lives by. He has mastered the truth, but the truth has also mastered him. He is the ambassador of the highest, and that is why he is lord, and why he can speak as one having authority.

III. And the truth which he believes and passionately utters must be truth by which a man can live. It is one thing to believe that two and two make four; it is another thing to believe that Jesus Christ rose from the dead. The latter belief will change my world for me, and the world of any other man whom I can persuade to accept it. But there is much so-called religious teaching that does not deal with the deepest things. It may tell us of the flowers and trees of Palestine, of the scenery upon which Christ daily looked from His Galilean home, of the manners and customs of those to whom He ministered, of the literary structure of the sacred books which He read. It is well to know these things; the more of them we know the better. But that is not religious teaching, and if the teacher does no more than that for us, he does nothing. It is not enough to tell us the pattern of the hem of Christ's garment. He must touch it, and he must speak to us with the glad enthusiasm of one who has been healed by the touch. He must wake in our hearts the dreams, the imaginations, the visions, the faiths, which throb and glow in the hearts of the men who wrote the Bible. Let him, by all means, do all he can to bring back that bygone world, and restore to us its ancient life; but let him not forget the most living thing of all—the souls of the men whose words he studies, and the mighty messages that came to them from their God.—J. E. McFADYEN, The City With Foundations, p. 97.

THE SPRINGS OF CHRIST'S AUTHORITY

'He taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes.'—MATTHEW VII. 29.

WE can all feel the note of authority in this sermon. Authority is stamped upon every sentence of it. As Dr. Parker says, 'the mountain was a veritable king's throne, and the sermon spoken on it was the royal proclamation'.

I. The Authority of Character.—First of all, then, let me say, it was the authority of character as opposed to the authority of office. If it be office and official position that confer authority, then the scribe, and not Jesus, would have been the man to speak 'with authority'. For all the 'accidents' of authority, all the external badges and insignia of office belonged to the scribe.

In the long run there is nothing so commanding, nothing so regal, as a pure and holy manhood. 'As the man is so is his strength.' We are told that those who listened to Lord Chatham always felt that there was something finer in the man than in anything he said. Accounting for the enormous power a certain preacher, who was neither eloquent nor brilliant, wielded over his people, a member of his congregation said to me, 'There are twenty years of holy life behind every sermon'. Men covet power. But power comes from character, not from any titles and dignities conferred upon a man from without. That was Christ's power. He was in no succession; He belonged to no order; He held no office. But he was without spot and without blemish. Men felt that He came from God. And in virtue of that perfect goodness, in virtue of that regal purity, He exercised a supreme and irresistible authority over the hearts of men.

II. The Authority of Knowledge.—Now pass on to a second element in the authority of Christ. It was not only the authority of character as against office; it was also the authority of knowledge as against the authority of tradition. 'Not as their scribes,' said the people. Now, as a matter of fact, in their own way the scribes were dogmatic and authoritative enough. But everything they said they said at second-hand! The scribes never delivered any authentic message of their own. They spent their lives in retailing what other people had said. But Christ was not as the scribes. For it was not second-hand truth He retailed, but a fresh and authentic message direct from God. Men recognized the note of reality, of conviction, of certitude in Christ's speech. They felt as they listened to Him that here was One who spoke what He knew, One who was at home amid the great realities of the unseen and eternal world.

III. The Authority of Love.—There was yet another quality about Jesus that lent immense authority to His speech, and that was His Love. What a contrast to the scribes Christ was in this respect. 'Not as their scribes,' no, thank God! Not harsh, unforgetting, loveless; but overflowing in pity, tenderness, and love towards all. You cannot read this sermon without feeling that the Preacher loves men. It is bathed in love, steeped in love, saturated in love. We can feel the love to-day, throbbing even through the cold, printed page! But how must they have felt it who listened to this sermon long ago, and heard the tones of the Preacher's voice, and saw the expression on the Preacher's face, and looked upon the light in the Preacher's eyes! They felt the Preacher loved them, and they yielded to love.—J. D. JONES, The Gospel of Grace, p. 56.

CHRIST'S SUPREME SWAY

'He taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes.'—MATTHEW VII. 29.

It is just this character of authority which lifts Jesus Christ high above the level of comparison, and reveals Him, as He is indeed, the Son of God.

I. And yet it is not difficult to discover what are the springs of that authority which gives to Christ the unquestioned obedience of the lives of His followers.

1. Chiefest of all is the convicting truth of His doctrine, which carries the conscience and forces acknowledgment, even from the most unwilling, that He is right in what He says.

2. It is not, however, mere wisdom which gives to Him His authority, but rather expressed knowledge substantiated by manifested character. The inherent quality of His life attested the truth of His doctrine. He not only taught the truth but was the Truth, and hence did not say to men in the formula of the scribes, 'This do and thou shalt live,' but rather, 'Follow thou Me,' and 'He that followeth Me shall have the light of life'.

3. His teaching is the conjunction of perfect ideal with adequate dynamic. He brings to men not merely light but life, so that the one who sets himself to obey the teaching becomes possessed of a power which makes the doing of His will possible. His word is not only enlightenment but enablement—not only guidance, but grace.

4. Further, the strength of His authority is attested by the present power of His Word when brought to bear upon the lives of men to-day.

II. But to draw closer to Him is to discover for ourselves—and that by personal experience—what is the compelling force of this His unique authority. All else is lost sight of and explained in the supreme fact of His love, for love is the greatest power and exercises the vastest authority in the universe. It is the man whose love is recognized whose rule will also be recognized. He who warms the heart with his own affection can always wield the sceptre as unquestioned sovereign. We cannot read the record of Christ's life without recognizing how true and sympathetic is the affection which animated Him, and we cannot stand at the foot of the Green Hill without realizing how deep is the love which took Him thither for men. Calvary's Cross has become love's throne from whence issues the pure stream of Christ's regal authority.

III. This recognition of His authority is not academic nor unpractical, but is the reservoir of all moral force, for love seeks to express itself 'not in word nor in tongue, but in deed and in truth'. The one who loves cannot but labour, and he to whom Christ is Lord will himself become a servant and saviour of men.—J. STUART HOLDEN, Redeeming Vision, p. 40.

'He taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes.'—MATTHEW VII. 29.

TAUGHT them with authority, that is to say, with the title to command, and with the force of command. If God has given us a revelation of His will, whether in the laws of our nature, or in a kingdom of grace, that revelation not only illuminates but binds.—W. E. GLADSTONE.

REFERENCES.—VII. 29.—T. T. Lynch, Three Months Ministry, p. 217. VIII. 1.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 221. VIII. 1, 2.—C. A. Thomson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 202. VIII. 1-3.—M. Guy Pearse, Jesus Christ and the People, p. 121. VIII. 1-4.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 175. A. MacLaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 373.

W. C. Magee, Growth in Grace, p. 271. J. McNeill, Regent Square Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 313. VIII. 1-9.—J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 49. VIII. 1-27.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2434; vol. l. No. 2868. VIII. 2.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. i. p. 81. VIII. 2, 3.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 42. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvi. No. 2162. VIII. 2-4.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 110. John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 105.

THE HEALING OF THE LEPER

'And Jesus put forth His hand, and touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean.'—MATTHEW VIII. 3.

THESE words, spoken to a leper, were the very last words that anyone, save He Who spake them, would have dreamed of saying. Most men, if they had spoken at all, would have bidden him keep his distance; some few might have flung to him a word or two of passing pity; one here and there might have bestowed an alms on him; but not one would even for a moment have thought of saying, 'Be thou clean'. It was left for Jesus to say to the poor wretch at His feet, crying for mercy, 'Be thou clean'. The words might have been words of mere advice to seek the best-known remedies; or words of encouragement to hope for the best; or words of fanaticism, assuming a power to heal, which could only have mocked the misery which it could not remove. But the words on the lips of Jesus were words of real authority, and a mysterious virtue went forth simultaneously with them from the Speaker, and made the leper whole—'Immediately his leprosy was cleansed'.

I. As we listen to His words there rises up before us the outline of a great example to be followed. The words of Jesus not only express the tenderest pity for the sufferer, but likewise His abhorrence of the disease which caused his suffering. When He pronounced deliverance to the sufferer, He likewise pronounced His ban upon the foul disease. 'Be thou clean' means not only 'I abate thy sufferings,' but also 'I hate thy disease'. But what of example can there be to us in this? The mind of Christ is to be the mind of His followers. If it was His mind to wage war upon disease, it is to be the mind of His followers too. If, in His abhorrence of disease, He said those words to the leper, 'Be thou clean,' He means us to say similar words, and it is possible for us to say these words and say them with power.

Every man who refuses to indulge to excess the cravings of his body at the expense of the laws of health; everyone who, by temperance and self-restraint, seeks to defend his body from the attacks of disease; every doctor who studies his science with the view of fighting disease; every community which erects and maintains hospitals to help the poor in their warfare against disease, which attends to drainage, ventilation, and pure water; every landlord who takes good care that his houses are sanitary, and not nests in which disease is bred—all these, in their measure and degree, are taking up Christ's words, following His example, and saying, 'Be thou clean'.

They are bidding defiance to disease, not with the Almighty power of the Son of God, but with a power that is real and true. They are, like the Master, dealing blows at disease, and in proportion to their self-denial and zeal they will invite His blessing, and succeed. Modern philanthropy and the enthusiasts of sanitary science have learned their best lessons and taken their best word from Him, Whom some of them repudiate, Who said, 'Be thou clean'.

II. But when Christ spake those words, He not only pointed out one direction in which He would have us follow His example, He likewise taught us the deep spiritual truths which concern us every one. It was a leper to whom He spake, and leprosy was God's own picture of the soul's disease which He calls by the name of sin. When then Jesus said, 'Be thou clean,' and by His Divine power made the leper clean, it is to us a most blessed revelation of how the cleansing of the soul can be brought about.

III. Remember that it is the cleansing of Repentance which is the one sure guarantee of the cleansing of Pardon. How do you know that God has forgiven you your sins? You may think it to be true; you may hope it; your stirred emotions may persuade you that it is so; but to know of a certainty that the Divine Voice, 'Be thou clean,' has stopped and healed the disease that was corrupting your whole being, this is the great distinguishing message of the Gospel of our Redeemer, and the conviction that God has cleansed and pardoned you, even you, for the sake of Him Who died for your sins upon the Cross, that is God's unmistakable dominion, and is His gift. The Voice of Christ still says to us, 'Be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee'; but He says it upon the one condition which can never be left out of sight, that thou art ready, and willing, and anxious to forsake thy sins; when thy penitence is sincere, and when thou hast placed the sacrifice of thy penitence at the foot of the Cross, then the Voice comes forth, 'Be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee'.

'And Jesus put forth His hand, and touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean.'—MATTHEW VIII. 3.

MEN shrink more from skin diseases than from any others. Jesus could have cured him with a word. There was no need that he should touch him. No need, did I say? There was every need. For no one else would touch him. Of all men a leper, I say, needed to be touched with the hand of love. Spenser says, 'Entire affection hateth nicer hands'. It was not for our master, our brother, our ideal man to draw around him the skirts of his garments, and speak a lofty word of healing that the man might at least be clean before he touched him.—GEORGE MACDONALD.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 3.—C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 173. VIII. 5, 6.—R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. i. p. 59. VIII. 5-13.—A. E. Killon, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 157. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 161. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 184. John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 198.

THE MINISTRY OF KINDNESS

'Jesus saith unto him, I will come and heal him.'—MATTHEW VIII. 7.

I. Jesus Christ, the Healer and Comforter, is our Example.—As Christ hath loved us, we ought to love one another. To us as members of the Holy Church, the great Christian Brotherhood, Jesus has committed this ministry of kindness. To His priests the Lord says, 'Give ye them to eat'. A starving world is fed at the Altars of the Church. To every member of the Church is the command given, 'Be kindly affectioned one to another'. Pure religion is defined as leading us to comfort the sick and suffering, the fatherless and widows, and to keep ourselves unspotted from the world.

II. The Christian's Attitude Towards Sinners.—The legend of the Holy Grail tells how one of Arthur's knights set forth to seek the mystic chalice of the Last Supper which had disappeared. As the knight left his house he saw a leper at the gate, and scarcely heeding him, cast a small piece of money to him. After long years' vain search in foreign lands, the knight returned, chastened and softened by what he had endured. At his gate he found the same leper, but now he pitied this stricken one, and taking the wooden bowl from the well, gave him water. Then suddenly the common bowl was changed into a shining chalice—the Holy Grail, and the leper was no longer visible, but the Lord Jesus stood in his place. 'As ye have done it unto the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me!' Do not go about among those who have fallen into sin with stones of reproach, but with words of comfort and of kindness.

III. The Christian's Attitude Towards the Sick and Afflicted.—In our times of sorrow and spiritual sickness we need those who are healers, who bring love with them, who are a comfort to us. It has been truly said that many people belie their religion in church by their manners at home. If our religion does not make us gentle, patient, long-suffering in everyday life, it is not true. Let us remember that manners have a great deal to do with Christianity. A disagreeable person has no claim to the character of a Christian.—H. J. WILMOT-BUXTON, Notes of Sermons for the Year, p. 75-80.

REFERENCE.—VIII. 7, 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1422.

SOME ASPECTS OF HUMILITY AS SUGGESTED BY THE STORY OF THE CENTURION (Third Sunday after Epiphany)

'I am not worthy.'—MATTHEW VIII. 8.

Is there anything weak, or mean, or contemptible in that Roman officer, as he is presented to us in our Gospel, seeking help from Jesus for his sick slave? He is head of an important household, but is full of courtesy and consideration for the slaves in it; surely we should say here is an open-handed, courteous, considerate officer and gentleman, and yet his whole attitude towards Jesus is marked by two striking features—faith and humility.

I. When our Lord would go with him to his house, he cries out, 'I am not worthy'. Does any one of us look down on him because of his humility? Is it not a robe of honour to him? Men are oftentimes rather flattered than otherwise when they are accused of pride. Poor and rich alike, humility is popular with neither, and yet God's Word teaches us plainly that 'God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble'.

There is indeed a counterfeit humility, which is most odious, that which is mere hypocrisy and servility, whilst the heart within is full of pride and hatred. To see what humility is, in all its beauty and perfection, you must look to Jesus.

II. The example and history of the centurion suggests some of the aspects of this virtue.

1. Observe how it affects his manner of approach to our Lord. The wondrous truth has come home to him, as it has not yet done to any in Israel, that He is Divine, that the power of the Godhead is His, so that all things obey His word, hence he draws near with the deepest sense of his own unworthiness, even while he casts himself on the love of Jesus.

2. How was it the centurion knew about God at all? It was because humility led him to use every opportunity of hearing truth.

3. Does not the centurion stand forth as essentially a man of action of good and holy work? He is evidently an active soldier from his own words; and more, he is the builder of a synagogue for the worship of God, and the eager seeker after help for one in sickness; and so it is even with true humility, it is not slothful or cowardly, it does not shirk from responsibilities, but whilst it is full of weakness, it leans on the strength of God and makes that its own. The man who begins some work with trust in self is soon daunted by difficulties, and gives up, and turns back. He who begins with distrust of self and trust in God will persevere to the end.

The secret of effort and work which will endure is this utterance of humility, 'I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me'.—W. HOWELL EVANS, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 44.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 8.—C. H. Parkhurst, A Little Lower than the Angels, p. 39. W. E. Heygate, Plain Instructive Sermons on Holy Communion, p. 53. VIII. 8, 9.—A. Macclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 377. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2434. VIII. 8-10.—H. W. Webb-Peploe, The Life of Privilege, p. 71. VIII. 8-12.—B. Wilbertforce, Feeling after Him, p. 40; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1894, p. 305. VIII. 9.—G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 37. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 115.

FAITH

'For I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me; and I say to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it. When Jesus heard it, he marvelled, and said to them that followed, Verily I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel.'—MATTHEW VIII. 9, 10.

Our Lord witnesses to the special virtues in the spiritual character of this Roman centurion. He had a faith at which our Lord marvelled. He said that it was the greatest faith He had yet found in all His ministry. We may well, therefore, ask ourselves the question, What is faith? 'Faith,' says the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, 'is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen'. Faith is a superior property bestowed by God whereby the truth is apprehended without the evidence of experience or argument proved; it belongs partly to the understanding and partly to the will.

I. Distrust Brought Sin.—What was it that induced our first parents to eat of that which was forbidden? It was not altogether the desirableness of the thing itself—that was the motive that had to be reckoned with; it was distrust of God, and in that one thought of distrust there lay all the future disobedience of the world. All seems to be centred in that one thought of distrust.

II. Trust Brings Righteousness.—Just as in the one thought of distrust there lies every possible sin, so also in the one thought of trust there lies every possible good. Thus we see why the faith of the centurion was accounted unto him for righteousness, because in that one thought of trust there lay all the activity of his service—'Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed'. There is something very practical in that thought that God the Father does accept our trust, and does reckon it to us for righteousness. We are not to be saved so much for the accuracy of our theology, or for the correctness by which we take in our dogmas; but we are to be saved by a simple trust which can be common alike to the ignorant and the learned; to the man and to the child. That which God the Father asks of us is not so much that our lives shall correctly state all the truths concerning Him and His, and that relationship which lies between Him and His; but that we may stammer with our lips, in childlike ignorance perhaps, but still that our lips should be striving to frame and utter, that one word 'Father,' which seems to convey the existence of the immense love of Almighty God.

III. It is the Foundation of all Spiritual Life.—We see in the centurion the great example of this virtue, that simple faith and childlike trust in God is the foundation of all true spiritual life. He had probably never seen Christ before, but he was ready to accept Him as the Son of God. It is quite true that faith is the gift of God, but it is a gift which we can in a large measure increase by our own co-operation. We look down the roll of God's saints, whose faith has been the wonder of the world, and we see there representatives of every type of temperament, every class of intellect. We cannot say that faith depends on the natural temperament alone; it depends to a very large extent on our moral training.

IV. It Needs the Discipline of the Will.—What is the principal disposing cause of faith? We can learn a lesson from the centurion. In his reply to our Lord there was just one thing brought out, and that is the wonderful state of discipline in which everything connected with him seemed to be. The man seemed to have learnt self-discipline, and we should all of us know the utter hopelessness of attempting to discipline the lives of others without first acquiring power over ourselves. 'I am a man,' he says, 'under authority, having soldiers under me.' He was a man who had learnt to obey and to command. Notice his wonderful humbleness—he called attention first to the fact that he was a subordinate. Are we not all in the same position? Are we not so much so that we may say 'I am a man under authority'—under the authority of God—and just in proportion as I have learned to recognize His authority, and to obey His laws, so shall I be able to command my will'. These faculties, this power that is given to soul and body, this possibility of good and evil, these thoughts, and words, and deeds—as we look upon them and think what a rebellious army they are, and how difficult they are to command, can we not see that our work is to discipline them all? There is only one way in which we are able to get that command strong and clear, and that is by recognizing and obeying a superior authority; by accepting the commands of God and the Church; by obeying the dictates of our own individual conscience.

V. The World to Conquer and Heaven to Win.—We have the world to conquer, and we have heaven to win. St. John tells us the victory which overcometh the world—even our faith. We must lay this foundation first, and then we can go on to learn those other things of hope and love. Step by step we can climb to higher things, faith, hope, and love, the three steps to God, of which St. Paul tells us the greatest is love, yet the foundation on which all the other is to be built is this faith in our Lord Jesus Christ.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 9, 10.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxvii. 1905, p. 72. VIII. 9-13.—W. Hay M. H. Aitken, Mission Sermons (3rd Series), p. 182. VIII. 10.—H. Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 83. H. M. Butler, Cambridge Review, 27 Jan. 1886. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 936; vol. xxiv. No. 1422. Outline Sermons to Children, p. 116. W. Hay M. H. Aitken, Mission Sermons, vol. iii. p. 182. F. W. Robertson, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 114. Parker, Inner Life of Christ, vol. ii. p. 12. H. Melvill, One Hundred and Fifty Sermons from the Penny Pulpit, vol. ii. Homiletic Quarterly, vol. i. p. 54; vol. ii. p. 262.

FAITH THE TITLE FOR JUSTIFICATION

(Easter)

'Many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven.'—MATTHEW VIII. 11.

We may humbly, yet confidently say, that where there is true faith, there justification shall be; where it is promised, it is due, it is coming, somehow, somehow. Whether, as the saints of the Old Testament waited, and were not gifted with Gospel justification till Christ's first coming, these faithful souls will be received into the glory and grace of the Church at His second coming; or whether they enter into the kingdom upon death; or whether, by an extraordinary dispensation unknown to us and to themselves, they receive the gift here; or whether in this world their eyes shall at length be opened, and the Church revealed to them, as the true treasure-house of grace and home of refuge to all believers, and they be led to seek it, and renounce the sect of their birth or of their choice—any how, they have a title; if they call, they shall be answered—if they knock, it shall be opened to them. Who have this true faith we cannot tell, any more than when God rewards it; no, nor what measure of assistance, what power of spiritual influence He gives to those who nevertheless, like the Jews, have not the peculiar gifts and endowments of the Covenant of the Gospel. Yet it is a great comfort to believe that God's favour is not limited to the bounds of His heritage, but that, in the Church or out of the Church, every one that calleth on the name of the Lord with a pure and perfect heart shall be saved.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 11.—C. Parsons Reichel, Sermons, p. 320. VIII. 11.—C. H. Wright, The Unrecognized Christ, p. 74. B. Wilberforce, Following on to Know the Lord, p. 73. W. E. Barton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 12. VIII. 11, 12.—John Wills, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 133. F. D. Maurice, Lincoln's Inn Sermons, vol. iii. p. 59. H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 72; see also Church Times, vol. lviii. 1907, p. 117. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. Nos. 39, 40. VIII. 12.—F. S. Swindell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 134. A. Murray, The Children for Christ, p. 218. VIII. 13.—H. P. Liddon, Sermons on Some Words of Christ, p. 49. R. D. B. Rawnsley, Village Sermons (3rd Series), p. 33. H. R. Nevill, Last Sermon. Henry Alford, Sermons on Christian Doctrine, p. 97. H. P. Cronshaw, Sermons for the People, vol. ii. p. 52. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1422. Wace, Gospel and its Witnesses, p. 89. Cox, Expositions, vol. i. p. 199. Maurice, Gospel of Kingdom, p. 126. Trench, Miracles, p. 236. Homiletic Quarterly, vol. i. p. 350; vol. ii. p. 262; vol. ii. p. 551; vol. iii. p. 90. Kingsley, Village, Town, and Country Sermons, No. 4. C. J. Vaughan, Good Words for 1864, p. 482, and in his Plain Words on Christian Living. Kitto, Daily Bible Illustrations, vol. vii. p. 292. Hall's Contemplations. Expositor (2nd Series), vol. vi. p. 161. Bruce, Galilean Gospel, p. 146. J. O. Davies, Sunrise on the Soul, p. 39. Robertson's Sermons (2nd Series), No. 10. Parker, Inner Life of Christ, vol. ii. p. 12. Stevenson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. p. 59. Liddon, vol. xxii. p. 97. Bishop Moorhouse, vol. xxix. p. 296. Newman, Parochial Sermons, vol. vi. p. 160. Hook on Miracles, vol. i. p. 158. Girdlestone, Parochial Sermons, vol. i. pp. 101, 117. Cumming, Foreshadows, p. 68. Simeon, Works, vol. xii. p. 354. Roberts, Plain Sermons, vol. i. p. 121. VIII. 14, 15.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxi. No. 1836. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 86. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew, I.-VIII. p. 386. VIII. 14-17.—J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 156. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 194.

LIFE'S FEVER

*And He touched her hand, and the fever left her.—MATTHEW VIII. 15.

It is beyond dispute that when our Lord worked physical cure there was underneath the miracle another purpose. On one occasion He said: 'And that ye may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins, I say unto thee, take up thy bed and walk'. There our Lord Himself goes out of His way to accentuate the fact that the miracle is an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace. Let us look at the text in that light.

I. Life's Fever.—So many people realize nowadays that life is a fever, life is something infectious; there is something in it which seizes hold of a man's body, soul, and spirit, and if he cannot resist, and if the Divine hand does not touch him, he will die of the fever.

(a) The voice of history. I look into history, and I find that all men who have spoken truthfully say that life is a fever. We think of the great Roman who said that he had been everything, but that nothing was of the least use. We think of our own great Shakespeare. 'Out, out, brief candle! Life's but a walking shadow.' There never was a more cheerful man than Charles Dickens, yet he had to write at the end, 'Of all sad dreams life is the saddest'. Where can you find a life more full of joy than Walter Scott's, yet he wrote, 'Years ago my heart was broken, and although the pieces were handsomely put together I shall bear the cracks until I die'. If you take your part in the world's rush and bustle and in life's tragedy the fever will catch you, and it will go hard with you unless Christ touches your hand.

(b) The social life. The joys of social life are great, but one thing always strikes me as particularly trying in connexion with it. There is the fuss and fever of life all about one almost before the day has really begun. You are going to see a Mr. and Mrs. So-and-So, and all the rest of it. After all, there are a great many things that must be done, and weightier matters of life should come first. If the fever of life once catches you it will spoil you for the best things.

(c) In political life. Too often the popular thing to do is to legislate in a panic. Whatever is the latest newspaper scare the cry is: 'Legislate, legislate; remedy this; remedy that!' It is a fever. Legislation is not thought out; it is not considered; it is simply pandering to the cry, 'Something must be done'.

(d) Then amusements. What a rush they all are! To get into your day as much as you can crowd and then call it amusement!

(e) Finally, there is the religious life. When other people are on the 'go,' that strange feeling that we must rush too comes over us, whatever may be the latest development of religious energy.

II. And its Remedy.—The remedy is in the text. Now let me point out one or two ways in which we can follow the text.

(a) There is the life of silence. Out of the thirty-three years of our Lord's life thirty were spent in silence. Just imagine what people would say to-day. 'You call yourself a teacher, and out of thirty-three years you have spent thirty years in silence! Here are souls to be saved, here are hearts waiting to be mended, and you deliberately go and shut yourself up.' But these thirty years were years of preparation. You and I want more silence. We are always talking, pursuing, doing something. What we need is quiet—silence.

(b) Association with Nature. Why did Jesus so often go in His boat on the Galilean lake? Why was He always going to those strange, deserted places? Surely because he wished to teach us that Nature was the mantle of God, and that we ought to plunge ourselves among those beautiful things to see that He is speaking to us for everything. In this you will find a rest and a cure for the fever of life.

(c) The possession of loyal friends. Is not the power of friendship a wonderful thing? We are told that Jesus loved Lazarus, that He loved St. John, and that He loved the rich young ruler. Why are there so few modern friendships? Because there are so few modern friends. Friendship means sacrifice, devotion, self-deprivation. You know what the French people say about friendship: 'Friendship is love without its wings'. If you had one or two real friends behind you the fever of life would die down; you could hope, you could suffer, you could die if you felt that behind you there was that strong power which St. John felt when He leaned on the Lord's bosom at supper. The modern life has no time for such friendship.

(d) A tolerant spirit. Is it not strange that men should be so intolerant? A man complains that another man does this or does that, thinks this or thinks that, goes here or goes there. What is it to thee what thy brethren do? The question is, 'Am I a Pharisee?' not 'Is my brother a Pharisee?' You will find that the most tolerant people are those who are devoted to the highest ideals. There never was but one sinless One, and when the woman, stained with her sin, was brought before Him, He said: 'Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more'. If only you were more tolerant you would not have all that fever of unquiet; you would not look out upon other lives, but would recognize that your business was to live up to your own possibilities.

(e) The touch of Christ. But the greatest cure for the fever of life is in the healing touch of the Divine finger. He is with us always—in our triumphs, in our failures, in our broken hopes, in all the disillusiones that come to us. 'The Sacred Presence never leaves us. 'I am with you always.'

REFERENCES.—VIII. 16, 17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvi. No. 2124. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 98. VIII. 17.—J. W. Diggle, Sermons for Daily Life, p. 27. C. Jordan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 266. E. B. Speirs, A Present Advent, p. 130. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 388. VIII. 18.—B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 58. VIII. 18-23. J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 49. VIII. 18-27.—J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 61. VIII. 19, 20.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 397. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xl. No. 2361. VIII. 19-21.—J. Boyd, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 104. VIII. 20.—R. F.

Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 99. Caroline Fry, Christ Our Example, p. 83. VIII. 21, 22.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 405. R. Baldwin Brindley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 61. VIII. 22.—F. E. Paget, The Living and the Dead, p. 158.

CHRIST STILLING THE TEMPEST

'And when He was entered into a ship, His disciples followed Him. And, behold, there arose a great tempest in the sea . . . even the winds and the sea obey Him!'—MATTHEW VIII. 23-27.

AGES ago, the man whose hand was as skilful on the harp as it was mighty on the sword and battle-axe, sang thus to it: 'By terrible things in righteousness wilt Thou answer, O God of our salvation, Who art the confidence of all the ends of the earth, and of them that are afar off upon the sea; which by His strength setteth fast the mountains, being girded with power; which stilleth the noise of the seas, the noise of their waves, and the tumult of the people'. This sublime language was prophetic of the Divine action on the tempest-riven sea of Galilee.

I. The peril of the disciples seemed very real. On the evening of a long day of continuous teaching by the sea-side, Jesus beckoned to His disciples to pass over to the other side. They had not been long on the water when its face, which had been calm as a mirror all day, gave signs of agitation and storm. The Sea of Galilee was an inland sea, and, like all inland seas, was subject to violent hurricanes of wind, which rolled unexpectedly down the gorges of the mountains surrounding it, and created a furious tempest on the waters, which frequently engulfed the small craft floating thereon, and caused the sacrifice of many precious lives. Such a tornado now swept over this sea and lashed it into madness. But, apart from natural causes, who raised this fearful storm? Was it an accident—one of those effects that seem without a cause? No; there was 'a Divinity' in it. But this storm occurred not as that which fell on the sea, and tossed 'the ship going to Tarshish,' in which Jonah was fleeing from duty, until 'it was thought to be broken'; the disciples were doing just as Christ enjoined them; they were in the course of duty, and He was therefore with them; and it was because He was with them that this storm arose. What lessons are here for us!

II. But the Master was asleep. His human nature was exhausted by his Godlike acts; and glad indeed was He to take a piece of sail-cloth for His pillow, while angels spread their broad, white wings over Him, and so fall to sleep. Here is a certain proof of His perfect humanity. Because of such proofs, people, 'in the days of His flesh,' would not believe in His Divinity. If they were to see Him now, as John saw Him on the Isle of Patmos, clothed with a splendour brighter than the sun, and holding in His hand the sceptre of the universe, they would not believe in His humanity (Heb. ii. 9-18).

III. The cry of the disciples showed that they realized their peril. St. Matthew says that his disciples awoke Him, saying, 'Lord, save us; we perish!' St. Mark says that their cry was: 'Master, carest Thou not that we perish?' St. Luke has their cry thus: 'Master, Master, we perish!' All the Evangelists record what they heard. A number of the disciples cried one thing, and a number the other; and doubtless all the Gospels are correct. But what fear their cry indicated! The storm was no ordinary one, and their fear corresponded with its fury.

IV. The chiding of the Saviour was full of tenderness. But why chide at all? Was not the fear of the disciples natural, and also inevitable under the circumstances of their great danger? Yes; but they, in the height of their fear, forgot that their Almighty Saviour was on board, and thought only of the raging tempest. His chiding, therefore, was followed immediately by His acting. 'He arose, and rebuked the winds and the sea; and there was a great calm.' What a contrast!—the sea one moment all storm, as if it had never been otherwise; the next, all calm, as if neither fierce storm nor evening zephyr had ever swept over it! So the wildest tempest hushed by heaven produces the profoundest calm for the believer. The lions' den has often become to him the vestibule of glory—the burning fiery furnace the presence-chamber of the Son of God!

V. The marvel of the men may next be noticed. 'What manner of Man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey Him?' This exclamation evinces their deep feeling. Men who are fearful in the storm should be grateful in the calm. Yet it is not always so: ten lepers were cleansed, one only returned to give thanks; all were glad that they were healed, one only was personally grateful. Gratefulness is sublime, whether felt on sea or on land; it is the virtue which makes heaven musical for ever. 'Oh, that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men?' (Ps. cvii. 21).

REFERENCES.—VIII. 23-27.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 119. C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 203. Stopford A. Brooke, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 339. B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 182. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 412. Jay, Short Discourses, vol. iii. p. 1. J. H. Gurney, Sermons, p. 17. Dean Hook, On the Miracles, vol. ii. p. 207. Isaac Williams, Sermons, vol. i. p. 140. Simeon, Works, vol. xi. p. 292. Dodd, On the Miracles, vol. i. p. 247. Dean Close, Miscellaneous Sermons, vol. ii. p. 253. Trench, Miracles, p. 151. Cox, Expositor's Note-Book, p. 314. Parker, 'Christ's Inward Peace Controlling Outward Storms,' Inner Life of Christ, vol. ii. p. 39. George Huntington in Homiletic Quarterly, vol. i. p. 392. Joseph Hughes, ibid. vol. iii. p. 247. G. W. Barrett, ibid. vol. iii. p. 249. Chapman, 'Christ's Supremacy Over Nature,' ibid. vol. iv. p. 411. Bushnell, 'Christ Asleep,' Christ and His Salvation, p. 119. Kitto's Daily Bible Illustrations, vol. vii. p. 308. Mackennal, Congregationalist, 1878, p. 552. Maclaren's Sermons (3rd Series), No. 19. Liddon's University Sermons, vol. ii. p. 165. Dean Vaughan's, Christ the Light of the World. Jacox, Secular Annotations, etc., vol. i. p. 231. Christian World Pulpit, vol. vi. p. 95; vol. xviii. p. 308. Beecher, ibid. vol. xxiii. p. 51. A. G. Brown, ibid. vol. xxv. p. 309. Sinai and Palestine, pp. 379, 380. VIII. 24.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in a Religious House, vol. ii. p. 601. J. G. Simpson, Sermons for the People, vol. ii. p. 87. VIII. 25.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. i. p. 89. VIII. 26, 28.—F. B. Woodward, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 111.

THE GREAT CALM

'There was a great calm.'—MATTHEW VIII. 26.

I. The Storm and the Calm—a Parable of Life.—The disciples were saved from the storm because they cried unto the Lord. So the Church weathers the storm which beats upon it, because of the prayers of the faithful. The Church is tossed and buffeted, like that boat upon the lake, but not overwhelmed. As it was said of the city of Troy—'Conquered, it shall conquer, and overthrown, it shall yet rise again'. There was a great calm! It is the voice of God speaking to our troubled hearts, which alone can calm them.

Men sometimes laugh at religion while the sun shines, but the tempest drives them to their Lord right humbly. When our ship of life sails calmly over smooth seas, we are tempted to forget that Jesus is with us, but when the sudden tempest arises, we say, 'Master, save us, we perish'.

II. Jesus Manifested as the Ruler of the Spirit World.—There are some in these days who talk as though the power of evil and of Satan were pre-eminent, but Satan is not the ruler of this world, he is the master only of those who choose to serve him. People who foolishly and ignorantly dabble with spiritualism, instead of praying to God, fall into this error. The sacrifice of the swine may have been an object lesson to show the awful results of falling into the power of Satan. The swine, as soon as the devils entered into them, became mad and rushed headlong to destruction, the man who allows Satan to take possession of him is no longer himself, but maddened by angry lusts and passions which drive him to ruin.

III. The Choice.—The people who saw the miracle of our Lord, and His Divine power manifested, begged Him to depart out of their coasts.

Those men in the Gospel preferred their swine to their Saviour, and there are among us now some who would choose a pig-sty instead of a sanctuary, the foul slavery of sin rather than the glorious freedom of the Son of God.—H. J. WILMOT-BUXTON, Notes of Sermons for the Year, pp. 81-86.

'Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?'—MATTHEW VIII. 26.

It is our duty to be on our guard against panics. Panics are the last infirmity of believing souls. It is, of course, easy to denounce them from the standpoint of a philosophical unconcern as to all religious interests; calmness is a cheap virtue when you have, or when you suppose yourself to have, nothing really at stake. It is not, in this sense, that panics are to be deprecated; the most irrational panic of an unlettered peasant who believes that his creed is in danger, is, beyond all comparison, a nobler thing than the tranquil indifference of a Talleyrand. But panics are to be deprecated, not because they imply a keen interest in the fortunes of religion, but because they betray a certain distrust of the power and living presence of our Lord.—LIDDON.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 26.—G. H. Morrison, The Wings of the Morning, p. 34. W. C. Magee, The Anglican Pulpit of To-day, p. 145. A. F. Winnington Ingram, The After-Glow of a Great Reign, p. 15. J. A. Paterson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 266. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. v. p. 1. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2852. VIII. 27.—D. Strong, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 284. Henry Alford, Sermons on Christian Doctrine, p. 108. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 39. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1686. VIII. 28.—W. H. Ridley, Plain Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 162. H. Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 123. F. B. Woodward, Sermons (1st Series), p. 316. VIII. 28-34.—A. MacLaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew I.-VIII. p. 416. J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 218. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 212. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 125. VIII. 29.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 111. R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. i. p. 7. VIII. 34.—A. N. Obbard, Plain Sermons, p. 113. R. W. Dale, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 20. W. G. Horder, ibid. vol. ix. 1901, p. 60. A. N. Obbard, Plain Sermons, p. 113. P. H. Hall, The Brotherhood of Man, p. 141. R. H. McKim, The Gospel in the Christian Year, p. 102. VIII. 58.—R. W. Dale, Christian World Pulpit, vol. i. 1896, p. 124. IX. 1.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in a Religious House, vol. ii. pp. 563, 574. R. W. Dale, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1895, p. 20. IX. 1-8.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 166. John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 178.

ARISE!

'Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee.'—MATTHEW IX. 2.

THE miracle is a parable for the Church in every age. Its teaching is inexhaustible.

1. It should make the heart of the hypocrite, the double-minded man, shrivel.

'Our God is a consuming fire.' Jesus knew their thoughts.

2. It unfolds the Divine power, the personal knowledge of every secret burden of our hearts, the tender individualizing love, of the compassionate Jesus of Nazareth.

Eternity would scarcely be long enough to reveal the fullness of that one word, 'Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven'. This Jesus, by Whom the words were spoken, is 'the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever'. What a comfort there is in that one thought.

3. It suggests to us the unspeakable blessing that is always waiting for every penitent and believing soul, whenever the Bride of Christ, speaking in the name of the Lord, utters the word of Absolution. 'As my father sent Me, even so send I you.' 'Whosoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven.' 'Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven; depart in peace.'

This passage teaches us the power, not merely of Christian intercession, but of Christian fellowship; the force that is brought to bear upon the individual soul, wherever a few believers are gathered together with one accord in one place, with one voice proclaiming the glory of God, and with one heart remembering before God those words of the charter of the New Dispensation, 'Where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them'.

'Jesus, seeing their faith, said unto the sick of the palsy, Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee'. If miracles of healing are to be wrought in our midst, Christians must be found together with one accord in one place, speaking good of the Lord, ascribing glory to His name, praising God.—G. H. WILKINSON, The Invisible Glory, p. 89.

BE OF GOOD CHEER

'They brought to Him a man sick of the palsy.'—MATTHEW IX. 2.

THE first thing that must strike us all in reading to-day's Gospel is the kindness of his friends to the sick man. They brought him to the Saviour. Is there no one you can bring? Directly Andrew knew the Lord, he brought his brother to Him (John i. 41, 42). When the woman of Samaria knew the Christ, she tried to lead her neighbours to Him (John iv. 29). Remember that it was on seeing the faith of his friends Jesus healed the man sick of the palsy (James ii. 18).

Consider:—

I. His Word of Comfort.—'Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee' (v. 2). He makes him see his affliction in the true light—the loving discipline of a father to his child (Heb. xii. 6, 7)—that it yields the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them which are exercised thereby (Heb. xii. 11; Is. xli. 1, 2). He tells him that the cause of his trouble—his sin—is removed. Only let us know that our iniquities are forgiven, and though there may be affliction afterwards, still there is joy and peace in believing (Ps. xxxii. 1, 2; see Hezekiah, Is. xxxviii. 17).

II. His Word of Reasoning (vv. 3-5).—Some murmured when Jesus assured the man of his present forgiveness. They knew nothing of His love to sinners (Luke xv. 2; Matt. ix. 13). They knew nothing of His power to forgive (Luke i. 77). But Jesus says, 'Whether is it easier to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise and walk?' If He has power by His word to give new life and energy to one who is beyond human cure, He must be God; so also if He gave pardon of sin; for salvation becometh unto the Lord (Is. xliiii. 11).

III. His Word of Power.—'Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house' (v. 6). Life and healing accompanied the word (v. 7). Those who are healed by Jesus are immediately called to show their new life by its exercise. They must walk in resurrection-life (Eph. v. 8; 1 Peter ii. 9). They must show to others what God has done for them; and where should they first display His grace but in their own homes? (Luke viii. 39; 1 Tim. v. 8).

Have you learned the power of Jesus to forgive? It is the first step in happiness (Ps. lxxxix. 15). You may learn many other things; but this alone makes us of good cheer (Rom. v. 1).

COURAGE, CHILD

'Jesus said to the paralytic, "Courage, child".—MATTHEW IX. 2, with MARK II. 3-12.

OF all the words of grace that proceeded out of the mouth of Jesus, few are more precious than those which He spoke to the man that was sick of the palsy. There the unhappy man lay, stretched upon his couch, sick at heart, and weak in body, a burden alike to himself and to his friends, unable to move unless they chose to move him. For him the future could be but one long stretch of misery. There was only one hope: if Jesus could but see him and touch him—the wonderful Jesus, who had already shown such strange love for sick folk and such mysterious power over the diseases that vexed them—perhaps he might yet be made well again. It may be that the man himself had no hope; but his friends hoped for him, and earnest friendship availeth much. They were in deadly earnest: and, though under the circumstances a meeting with Jesus was hard to secure—for the place was crowded to the door and He was preaching—they yet contrived, with an ingenuity sharpened by affection, to bring their helpless friend right into the presence of Jesus.

I. What will Jesus say? He was deeply cheered by the faith the friends had shown, and He would not let such faith go away disappointed. So, turning to the helpless man upon the couch, He said, 'Courage, child'. He said more, but He began by saying that. And we can imagine how these two simple words, each in its own way, began to touch the springs of life and hope in the wasted body before Him. The man, if a great sinner, may have been accustomed to words of reproach, or to that cold and shallow consolation which stings more keenly than reproach; and now he is told to take heart again. Here is One who speaks to him as if He believed in the possibility of his physical and spiritual recovery, One who appeals to his slumbering hope and heroism. And so tender an appeal too! He calls him 'child'. Many a year had passed since he had been anybody's 'child'; and the tenderness of the Speaker, no less than His first great, authoritative word, goes to the heart of the unhappy man. His inner world is transformed; a new life courses through his veins, and it will not be long till he will be upon his feet, and going upon his way rejoicing. In the presence of this mysterious One, who speaks to him hopefully, who bids him be brave, who assures him of the forgiveness of sins, and who calls him child, old things are passed away, and a new day has dawned.

II. Doubtless this was one of the favourite words of Jesus. When the woman who had been ill twelve years fell trembling at His feet, after touching the hem of His garment, He reassured her with the words, 'Courage, daughter'. When the disciples, after a tempestuous night, were terrified by what seemed like a spectral figure moving towards them over the waves, their fears were met by a familiar voice, 'Courage, it is I: do not be afraid'. And, when by their Master's death, those same disciples were to be launched upon a still more stormy sea, His parting message to them was the same: 'Courage: as for Me, I have conquered the world'. And this was the message with which He still continued to brace and visit men, after He had risen from the dead. When His servant Paul was in danger of being torn to pieces by a fanatical mob, from whose hands he was only rescued by the forcible intervention of Roman soldiers, 'the following night the Lord stood by him, and said, Courage'; and the intrepid career of Paul is the proof that His Master's call to courage kept for ever ringing in his heart. He knew well that the fierce activities and persecutions of his missionary life were killing him, and once and again, on sea and on the land, he had been face to face with death. 'Nevertheless,' he says, 'we are courageous at all times; yes, we are courageous, I say'—twice over—and well pleased to leave our home in the body, and to go away to be at home with the Lord.' Death had no terror for this man, he faced it with good courage; for it but took him into the nearer presence of his Lord.

III. These experiences, sickness and sorrow, anxiety and death, lie before us all; and in them how can we be better cheered and heartened than just by the kindly word of Jesus, 'Courage, child'. In our Gospels, as we now have them, the words were first spoken to a weak man and to a sick woman. Such we have always with us; and to the world's weak and sick folk those are the words of Jesus for ever. 'Courage,' He said to those who were tossed upon the sea; and still He says 'Courage' to all who are tossed, to all who are sailing through a black and stormy night, made more awful by the presence of spectres. The spectre which strikes a chill into our hearts is but Himself disguised by the mists. 'It is I,' He says; and the moment we are sure of this, we may well take heart again. 'Courage, it is I, do not be afraid.'

Courage, then, for God is good. Courage, for Jesus is with us on the sick bed, and with us in the storm. Courage, for He overcame, and we shall overcome in Him.

He was brave as He was gentle, and gentle as He was brave. He is touched for evermore with a feeling of our infirmities; and while He appeals to our latent heroism, He yet deals with us as little children. Many a gracious word of His rises to our hearts as we think of Him; but with especial gratitude do we remember Him for this brave and gentle word. And in every hour of pain or fear or desolation may we have grace given us to hear that dear voice saying to our troubled hearts, 'Courage, child'.—J. E. McFADYEN, The City With Foundations, p. 157.

REFERENCES.—IX. 2.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 1; see also Obed and Conduct, p. 15. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lii. No. 3016. IX. 2-7.—Ibid. vol. xxxix. No. 2337. IX. 2-8.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 122. IX. 4-6.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 121.

FORGIVEN

'Arise.'—MATTHEW IX. 6.

I. At almost every stage of the Christian life the call to arise to a higher standard is preceded by a sort of paralysis.

This paralysed man was lying there, helpless; and then the word was spoken, 'Arise!' So it is with us. We have gone on very well; we have been good, moral, honest people. Suddenly, we begin to fail in everything. We are inclined to give up in despair. It is the paralysis that God is allowing, to make us ready to receive the free forgiveness through Jesus Christ, the free mercy of God, bestowed without money and without price.

Later on in life, we prided ourselves, perhaps, on our love to others. Suddenly, we found our temper becoming bad. We were more impatient and irritable; less kind and tender-hearted. It is the paralysis that is to prepare us for seeking, not natural affection but the Divine gift of charity, as portrayed by the Holy Ghost in the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians.

So all through life. If we are to be prepared for receiving Sacramental truth, there often comes such an utter impotence of will, such an inability to realize heavenly things, that we are obliged to seek more Divine life; and so the man who used only to come to the holy table at Christmas or Easter is seen among the communicants, month by month, and then begins to yearn for yet more frequent celebrations. The Voice has found him paralysed, and the Incarnate God has said, 'Arise!'

But when the word is spoken, faith is required. Numbers come to the point of paralysis, and remain there all their life, and pass into the other world.

II. How is this faith to be obtained? How did faith give strength to this man, so that he arose?

By listening to the Word of Jesus Christ. There was a spark of faith, probably, before. It was the Word of God that kindled that spark into a burning flame. There was the germ, to begin with; the germ was developed by that one word, 'Arise!' And this is what we are taught by the Holy Spirit in the Epistle to the Romans. Faith, we are told, is not a mere natural confidence; that is, not the mere assent of the understanding. It is that Divine gift of God which enables us practically to realize, as if we saw them, the things which are unseen. 'Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.' Faith is, to the higher part of our being, what the natural eye is to the body. And 'faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God'.

Faith is developed by taking a single text or passage, praying over it, turning it into thanksgiving, reading it, marking it, learning it by heart, and inwardly digesting it, till we have laid hold of the particular portion of everlasting life which God intends at that time to communicate.

III. Just as the paralysed man laid hold of the portion of physical life which was laid up for him in Jesus Christ, so we receive, at different points in our spiritual education, out of the fullness of life which is laid up for us in Christ Jesus, the special portion of spiritual life which we need. 'Out of His fullness have we all received, and grace for grace.'

We receive it by believing, by taking a promise, feeding upon it, listening to it, till it has become incorporated with our being, and the strength has flowed down into the paralysed organs, and we can rise up in hearty willing response to the call of the Everlasting Father.—G. H. WILKINSON, The Invisible Glory, p. 99.

REFERENCES.—IX. 6.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.—XVII. p. 8. C. A. Briggs, The Incarnation of the Lord, p. 3. R. H. McKim, The Gospel in the Christian Year, p. 125. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 187. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in a Religious House, vol. ii. p. 535. W. J. Knox-Little, The Perfect Life, p. 301.

THE CALL OF CHRIST

'And as Jesus passed by from thence, He saw a man, called Matthew, sitting at the place of toll: and He saith unto him, Follow Me. And he arose, and followed Him.'—MATTHEW IX. 9.

I BELIEVE there is no time, no set of circumstances, in which a man may find himself, but if Jesus speaks in his own heart he may then and there respond.

I. The Unlikely Man.—Notice about this man Matthew that Jesus takes the man just as he is. He is the unexpected man, the last man that one would expect to go out after Christ. Here is the man in the very middle of the paraphernalia of his daily calling, he is in the place where he is making his money. He is in the place where his character is known, where his past is known, and what a past it is!

II. What Must be Left.—Though Jesus took this man just as he is, it meant leaving something. It meant leaving everything for this man, and it will mean leaving something for most of you. It means leaving self-will, the ordering of one's life in the way that seems right to his own eyes, and it means the welcome of Christ as the controller of the spirit and as the guide of the life.

III. It also Meant the Confession of Christ's Mastership in the World.—Charles Kingsley, one of the bravest, brightest spirits that this country ever had, said, 'Lest I should play the coward I determined to put myself into a position from which I could not retreat,' and that is what a good many will have to do before they will save their souls alive.—G. C. BRITTON, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII. 1907, p. 294.

THE APOSTLE'S CONVERSION

'And as Jesus passed forth from thence, He saw a man, named Matthew, sitting at the receipt of custom: and He saith unto him, Follow Me. And he arose, and followed Him.'—MATTHEW IX. 9.

ST. MATTHEW was one of the earliest converts to the truth as uttered by Him who was 'the Truth'.

I. The Call of the Man.—Note—

(a) The unerring prescience of Christ. Nothing left to chance. He Himself knew what He would do.

(b) The Divine mercy of Christ. Matthew, a tax-gatherer, despised by the Jews, was selected by Jesus Christ from the teeming multitudes of Capernaum as a special object of His compassion and love! Ah! there never yet was a sinner He would not and could not save. 'The greater the sinner, the greater the Saviour.'

II. The Response of the Saint.—Artful cunning, avaricious greed, love of gold—all, all forsook the heart of the publican under the steady burning gaze of Jesus.

(a) An amazing conversion. The Spirit of Jesus immediately wrought the sinner into the saint; this was truly an amazing conversion—of more importance than the creation of a thousand worlds!

(b) Conversion was followed by Divine command. 'Follow Me.' It was there and then obeyed. St. Luke's account of St. Matthew's immediate response is very explicit: 'And he left all'—gold, and silver, and accounts, and office—'rose up, and followed Jesus'. Where? Everywhere the Master led him until His ascension.

THE DIVINE CALL

(For St. Matthew's Day)

'And as Jesus passed forth from thence, He saw a man, named Matthew, sitting at the receipt of custom: and He saith unto him, Follow Me. And he arose, and followed Him.'

—MATTHEW IX. 9.

THERE is but one subject that can occupy our minds to-day—the wonderful call of the Apostle Matthew to be Christ's disciple. We find the man sitting at the receipt of custom: we see him absorbed in his worldly calling, and possibly thinking of nothing but money and gain; but suddenly the Lord Jesus calls on him to follow Him, and become His disciple. At once St. Matthew obeys: he 'makes haste and delays not' to keep Christ's commandments (Ps. cxix. 60). He arises and follows Him.

I. With Christ Nothing is Impossible.—He can take a tax-gatherer and make him an Apostle; He can change any heart, and make all things new. Let us never despair of any one's salvation. Let us pray on, and speak on, and work on, in order to do good to souls, even to the souls of the worst. 'The voice of the Lord is mighty in operation' (Ps. xxix. 4). When He says by the power of the Spirit, 'Follow Me,' He can make the hardest and most sinful obey.

II. St. Matthew's Decision.—He waited for nothing: he did not tarry for 'a convenient season' (Acts xxiv. 25); and he reaped in consequence a great reward. He wrote a book which is known all over the earth; he became a blessing to others as well as blessed in his own soul; he left a name behind him which is better known than the names of princes and kings. The richest man of the world is soon forgotten when he dies; but as long as the world stands millions will know the name of Matthew the publican.

III. The Lessons for Ourselves.—

(a) The Divine call comes to each one of us. We sing:—

Day by day His sweet voice soundeth, Saying, 'Christian, follow me'.

Has that call made any impression at all upon our lives? Are we conscious of a daily striving to follow in the footsteps of the Master? Or are we still shutting our hearts against His call?

(b) The Christian life consists in following Christ. We may be very careful in all the outward observances of our religion, but unless we are fashioning our life upon the life of the Master, we are not truly His disciples.

(c) Obedience to the call involves self-sacrifice. St. Matthew forsook all. We are not necessarily called upon to do that, but we are called to give all temporal things a second place in our thoughts and lives. The Collect for this day expresses what should be the Christian attitude on such questions. We ask for grace 'to forsake all covetous desires and inordinate love of riches,' and to follow Christ. Covetousness is a sin which destroys the Christian life; and in regard to wealth, we have to remember that at the best it is not our own; we are but stewards. How many a Christian has fallen away because the love of riches has been too strong for him. Self-sacrifice, self-renunciation, self-surrender—these things represent the spirit which animated St. Matthew, and they must be the dominant features of our life if we would follow him, even as he followed Christ.

'He saw a man, named Matthew.'—MATTHEW IX. 9.

SEE Ruskin's fine exposition of Matthew's call in the first supplement to St. Mark's Rest, apropos of Carpaccio's picture.

REFERENCES.—IX. 9.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 253. N. Adams, Christ a Friend, p. 35. J. Fraser, University Sermons, p. 275. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Holy-Tide Teaching, p. 163. J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 211. J. A. Hamilton, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 135. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for Saints' Days, p. 170. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2493. IX. 9-11.—A. B. Bruce, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvi. 1894, p. 282. IX. 9-17.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 18. IX. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 2889. IX. 11.—S. Pendred, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 406. J. A. Bain, Questions Answered by Christ, p. 1. W. J. Knox-Little, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 217. IX. 12.—D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 95. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 239. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 618.

MERCY PREFERRED TO SACRIFICE.

'Go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy and not sacrifice.'—MATTHEW IX. 13.

THE text is a quotation from Hosea, in which God declares to His people the conditions on which they would obtain acceptance with Him. The word there rendered mercy is equivalent to piety or holiness. Idolatrous systems only required the regular observance of a prescribed ritual; Jehovah was satisfied with nothing less than the devotion of loving hearts.

God prefers mercy to sacrifice:—

I. Because it Indicates More Clearly Man's Relation to Himself.—We cannot judge of a man's character by his regard for outward ordinances; but when a man struggles against sin, denies himself, and takes up his cross, we recognize him as a follower of Christ.

II. Because it is More Serviceable to our Neighbours.—Religious exercises may do us good; but when we lead a pure, godly life, and lay ourselves out for deeds of benevolence and love, we are conferring blessings on those around us.

III. Because it Brings the Greatest Happiness to Us.—The worship of God is a source of delight to the sanctified heart; but doing good to others affords an amount of joy and gladness never experienced before.—F. J. AUSTIN, Seeds and Saplings, p. 64.

REFERENCES.—IX. 13.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 77. IX. 14.—J. A. Bain, Questions Answered by Christ, p. 7. IX. 14, 15.—T. C. Price, What is Lent? Sermons, 1872-73. IX. 16.—G. A. Chadwick, Christ Bearing Witness to Himself, p. 95. IX. 16, 17.—D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 106. IX. 17.—C. Gore, Oxford University Sermons, p. 34. IX. 18.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 153. W. H. Brookfield, Sermons, p. 136. IX. 18, 19.—W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 39. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 149. IX. 18-20.—John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 338. B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 134. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 230.

THE HEM OF CHRIST'S GARMENT

‘And, behold, a woman came behind Him, and touched the hem of His garment.’—MATTHEW IX. 20.

THE fact upon which the writers focus our thought is that the woman touched only the hem of His garment.

I. What is the hem of Christ's garment? Where is the hem of Christ's garment to-day? The hem this woman touched was one of the four tassels of blue which hung from the fringe of His coat. The robe with its fringe no longer passes down our streets. But the hem of Christ's garment can still be touched. For what was this hem, and what is this hem, but that through which His virtue passed out of Him? All the world of things seen, all that is beautiful and uplifting and inspiring, all holy influences and wise thoughts and gracious words, are but the channels through which the virtue of Jesus passes to the healing of the issues of body and mind and spirit.

II. Some of the ways in which Christ's virtue passes out of Him:—

1. Think of the hem of Christ's garment in nature. Nature is the visible garment of God, wrought, as Goethe said, by God's fingers in time's roaring loom.

2. Think of the hem of Christ's garment in art. By art I include all that is pure and lovely and noble in literature, in architecture, in music, in sculpture, and painting, and in all the works of men done under the inspiration of the Spirit of God. There are some who never see a lovely hillside but they think of it as a place to parcel out in profitable allotments. These are the soldiers who cast lots for Christ's garment at the foot of the cross. These are becoming fewer every day. Yet there are still many who do not realize that art is also the hem of Christ's garment.

3. Think of the hem of Christ's garment in the Word. This is the tassel of blue which most have touched. The Word of God is the closest garment of His thought. It is significant that Christ is called the Word, simply because God in Christ passed out to reveal Himself, and to work His miracles, in and by a word.

4. Think of the hem of Christ's garment in the ministries of the Church. Newman has a sermon with the arresting title, ‘The Church a home for the lonely,’ in which he shows, in his own deep and simple and lucid way, how solitary, and outcast, and disappointed men find in the service and fellowship of the Church the help and solace they need. There are issues often shameful, sometimes secret, sometimes exhausting, which Christ heals through the ministries of the Church. He heals them as He healed the woman, secretly and with a touch.

5. Think of the hem of Christ's garment in the Sacrament of the Supper. Nothing else brings us so near Christ, and through nothing else does His virtue pass so immediately as the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.—W. M. CLOW, The Cross in Christian Experience, p. 281.

‘And, behold, a woman came behind Him, and touched the hem of His garment.’—MATTHEW IX. 20.

TOWARDS the close of Hazlitt's essay Of Persons one would wish to have seen, he describes how Charles Lamb declared, ‘I would fain see the face of him who, having dipped his hand in the same dish with the Son of Man, could afterwards betray Him. . . . There is only one other person I can ever think of after this,’ continued Lamb; but without mentioning a name that once put on a semblance to Mortality. ‘If Shakespeare was to come into the room, we should all rise up to meet him; but if that person was to come into it, we should all fall down and try to kiss the hem of His garment.’

REFERENCES.—IX. 20.—J. Ker, Sermons, p. 186. IX. 20, 21.—R. Winterbotham, Sermons and Expositions, p. 97. IX. 20-22.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 243. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 157. John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 229. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lii. No. 3020.

THE HEM OF THE GARMENT

‘If I may but touch His garment, I shall be whole.’—MATTHEW IX. 21.

THIS story records a most remarkable instance of our Saviour's treatment of ignorance and superstition. It was a poor conceit of this woman, says good Bishop Hall, that she thought that she might receive so sovereign a remedy from Christ without His heed, without His knowledge. While yet her faith was wholly real and practical, her conception of the manner of the working of Christ's healing power was ignorant and material. Christ healed, so she supposed, not by the exertion of His holy will, but rather by a certain magical influence and power which she thought dwelt in Him. But while this woman's ideas were thus wholly wrong, being tinged with much superstition and ignorance, the result of her practised faith was wholly excellent, for immediately, we read, her issue of blood was stanch'd, and she felt in her body that she was healed of that plague.

And then Jesus turned, and, while He gently showed her how mistaken were her thoughts of Him, He accepted her because of her faith.

I. There is a very frequent temptation for us, to whom has been granted, as we rightly consider, a purer revelation of Christian faith, to think harshly and intolerantly of those avowed Christians whose minds are as yet unenlightened on many points of Divine truth. We are tempted to regard their superstitions as a gulf across which we cannot embrace our fellow-Christians. It is good, therefore, to remind ourselves of this miracle of Jesus Christ's—a miracle where faith and love were so prevailing, even where there was so little knowledge, where a poor woman had faith sufficient to cure her sickness although she had not sufficient knowledge to consider that she could not hide herself from the All-seeing Eye of God. Her faith went before her knowledge; her faith was the first to receive the blessing. Each of us, indeed, as we read this story, can see that there is much spiritual worship in much apparent superstition; and, still more, that there is much spiritual idolatry in that pride of better knowledge which can only think scornfully of our fellow-Christians because, in their guileless ignorance, they have been accustomed to bow their knees before a statue, or to attribute fictitious power to an image of stone. When Henry Martyn, the great and holy missionary, saw once in Spain a poor old crone bowing down and reverently kissing the feet of a stone image and bathing it with her tears, he reflected that, however much his understanding of the scheme of Redemption might be better than hers, very probably in faith and love she was his superior; and it is by our faith and by our love that we shall be accepted in the Last Day. Even when the idolatry is definite and certain, we shall oftener find it the consequence of dullness of intellect rather than of real alienation of the heart from God.

II. Faith and love—these are what we require for this world and the next. We know how human love will invest everything that belongs to its dear ones with a peculiar sanctity, so that any trifle—even the hem of a garment—will easily become identified with the object of its love. So does faith in things Divine; and nothing can show the nobleness and excellence of this poor woman's faith more than this—that she saw a healing in spite of superstition.

Thus, wherever there is human distress to heal and human faith to gain a blessing, the goodness and the power of God will overflow the ignorance and render faith a healing power.

III. There was nothing in the hem of Christ's garment more than in the hem of any other to convey a blessing. A multitude was thronging all round Him, hustling against Him, and yet receiving no benefit. Only one woman in all of that crowd believed that His Sacred Person was full of healing blessing, so that if only she could come in contact with Him she would be at once healed. She recognized that one touch of Christ could overcome all the powers of darkness of this world. And He in turn recognized that touch of timid faith, even amid the pressure of the crowd. It is thus to-day within the Church of Jesus Christ. The Christ still conveys strength and healing to us through outward means. And if the hem of Christ's garment had such power to heal and bless when touched by faith, how much more shall the Body and Blood of Christ, received by faith in our hearts, have power for the strengthening and for the refreshing of our souls!

REFERENCES.—IX. 21.—B. Wilberforce, The Hope that is in me, p. 25. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1809. Trench on the Miracles, p. 200. Dean Hook on the Miracles, vol. i. p. 242. Hall, 'The Bloody Issue Healed,' Contemplations. Cox, 'Healing of Veronica,' A Day With Christ, p. 141. J. O. Davies, 'Jesus Touched by the Way,' Sunrise on the Soul, p. 101. Allon, 'Healing Virtue of the Christ,' Vision of God, etc., p. 75. Maclaren, 'Power of Feeble Faith,' Sermons Preached in Manchester (2nd Series), p. 294. Beecher, 'Healing Virtue in Christ,' Christian World Pulpit, vol. iv. p. 161. W. C. Smith (with Isaiah xlii. 3), 'Survival of Fittest and a Higher Law,' Christian World Pulpit, vol. x. p. 177, and in Three Hundred Outlines on the New Testament, p. 34. Mellor's 'The Hem of Christ's Garment,' Sermons, p. 1. 'Desperate Faith,' Homiletic Quarterly, vol. i. p. 256. 'Confident Timidity,' Homiletic Quarterly, vol. ii. p. 556. T. Sherlock, 'The Woman Who Touched,' Homiletic Magazine, vol. vii. p. 150.

THE REWARD OF FAITH

'Daughter, be of good comfort; thy faith hath made thee whole.'—MATTHEW IX. 22.

THE incident recorded in this passage concerning the woman who came to Jesus is more fully related in St. Luke's Gospel; and we must consider what St. Luke has to say about the striking features in the narrative. They all go to show the preciousness of faith—what it will overcome in getting to Jesus, and what it apprehends in reaching Him. Notice—

I. How Many were this Woman's Difficulties.—There was her own bodily weakness (Ps. xxxviii. 3-8; Mark xiv. 38). There was the crowd thronging round the Saviour (Luke viii. 45). What an impediment is the world! (Luke xix. 3; Matt. xiii. 22; 2 Tim. iv. 10). There was the opinion of man. It was clear that the physicians had pronounced her incurable (Luke viii. 43; Ps. lx. 11; cxviii. 8; Eph. v. 6). She had, besides, no invitation (Eph. iii. 12); cf. the resolution of Esther (chap. iv. 16). She was, moreover, unclean, and by the law therefore prohibited from approach (Lev. xv. 2; cf. Eph. ii. 13).

II. How Simple was this Woman's Faith.—She believed that Jesus could do all for her (Mark ix. 23; Rom. viii. 32; Phil. iv. 19). She therefore pressed through the crowd and touched Him. What was in her touch? Many others thronged and touched Him; but they did not do so intentionally. She put out her hand as wishing to receive. That is what faith does. It simply takes what God has given (Eph. i. 3; 2 Cor. i. 3). We think very little is in a touch; but all through the Bible God shows how important it is (Gen. iii. 3; Exod. xix. 12; Lev. v. 2; Is. vi. 7; Luke xxii. 51).

III. How Complete was this Woman's Cure.—Our Lord said to her, 'Daughter'. She was, therefore, acknowledged as a child of the family (2 Cor. vi. 17, 18; 1 John iii. 1). 'Be of good comfort.' There is no fear in coming to Jesus (2 Tim. i. 7; 1 John iv. 18; Is. xli. 10). 'Thy faith hath made thee whole.' The believer appropriates all the blessings that are in Christ (1's. ciii. 2-5). 'Go in peace.' There is no care for the soul that has come to Jesus (1 Pet. v. 7; Phil. iv. 6, 7). 'He is our peace.'

We have two thoughts, then, here for us in connexion with precious faith: (1) What Jesus can do for us—everything (Eph. iii. 20). (2) That nothing should stop us in coming to Him (Mark. i. 17-20).

REFERENCE.—IX. 23, 24.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. ii. p. 240.

'Thou son of David, have mercy on us.'—MATTHEW IX. 27.

NEVER speak of God without speaking to God. On religious subjects the best meditation is prayer. To have prayed is to have thought. I should almost have preferred not to have had any theology. The best is that which is summed up in the words, 'Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on me'.—VINET.

REFERENCES.—IX. 27-30.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiii. No. 1355; vol. xxvi. No. 1560. IX. 27-31.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 163. IX. 27, 38.—J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 240. IX. 29.—J. Llewelyn Davies, Christus Imperator, p. 108. IX. 32, 33.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 187. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2482. IX. 35.—H. P. Liddon, Sermons Preached on Special Occasions, 1860-1880, p. 304. J. Parker, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 9. A. F. Winnington Ingram, Under the Dome, p. 203. IX. 35-XI.—H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. ix. 1901, p. 328.

THE COMPASSION OF CHRIST

'But when He saw the multitude, He was moved with compassion on them.'—MATTHEW IX. 36.

WHEN did He see the multitude? He saw the multitudes before there were any multitudes to be seen: I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the First and the Last: I was with God before there were any fountains abounding with water.

I. When Jesus saw the multitudes, therefore, He was in eternity, in His own sanctuary of solitude; He was a philanthropist before there was a man created to be pitied. God knew from all eternity that the finite must weep, the finite must suffer.

The compassion of Christ was from eternity, therefore it could take effect in time, and therefore it will continue to take effect until time's last sunset has glowed upon the world. It is eternity that gives explanation and completeness to the Atonement. We are apt to think that the Atonement took place at a time which could be dated; we discourse much about Friday night, and the whole Saturday in the grave, and the dawning of the first day of the week. It is all puerile; any comment dealing with these facts is a comment to be dispensed with; we live in God's eternal purpose, the Atonement was rendered before the sin was done; 'before Abraham was I AM,' and I AM has no time.

II. Compassion is not sentiment, it is redemption. There is a sentiment no bigger than its own tear; there is another sentiment that signifies redemption, something done for the sinner. That was the redemption wrought out by Jesus Christ. He did not cry over men, He died for them. He did not say, It is a pity; He said, I will go down, and I will tread the winepress alone, and I will make suffering the way into the highest eminences and noblest sanctuaries of life and service. To Christ we owe the sentiment that completes itself in redemption. Away with your tears that have no depth! Welcome the love that would die for the prodigal!

III. What a view was that which Jesus Christ took of the multitudes! He saw the multitudes exactly as they were. It was a multitudinous misery, a multitudinous sin, a multitudinous helplessness. We see throngs, and remark on the number: Christ saw multitudes, and remarked on their misery. Alas! there is no gathering of human beings that does not represent a gathered pain, a gathered helplessness: where two or three are gathered together there is at least one broken heart. The street looks well, it is filled with bunting and with festoons, with spring flowers or summer grandeur; but in every house in that decorated street there is a broken heart. Jesus Christ did not see the bunting flying from the windows, He saw the hearts that were dying within the bosoms of human grief: He had compassion.

IV. How was it that Jesus Christ spoke to multitudes and spoke of multitudes? The answer is plain: Jesus Christ was not one of many, He was many in One; that is the explanation. We are only wise in our statesmanship in the degree in which we are Biblical; we must go to God to know what the condition of the world is. That condition has been represented in Scripture in the most graphic and in the most awesome and appalling terms.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. i. p. 190.

REFERENCES.—IX. 36.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII., p. 41. H. C. G. Moule, My Brethren and Companions, p. 41; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1904, p. 233. T. T. Munger, Character Through Inspiration, p. 97; see also The Freedom of Faith, p. 131. G. Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 140. W. H. Murray, The Fruits of the Spirit, p. 290. J. Marshall Lang, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 103. J. Morgan Gibbon, ibid. vol. xlv. 1894, p. 316. C. Gore, ibid. vol. l. 1896, p. 113. IX. 86, 37.—J. Wright, The Guarded Gate, p. 89. IX. 30-38.—J. O. Johnston, Church Times, vol. l. 1903, p. 443. Hugh Ross, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 374. N. D. J. Straton, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 85. T. Barker, Plain Sermons, p. 284.

'The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few.'—MATTHEW IX. 37, 38.

PÈRE GRATRY writes on this text: 'If there is one thing clearer than another, it is that there are a thousand times too few men who are consecrated to the religious and moral education of the human race. An incalculable moral wealth is lost, over all the earth, for lack of labourers in the harvest of souls. "The harvest is plenteous," said Christ, "but the labourers are few." This lack of true workers is one of the characteristic features of the world's history, and we see it in our own day. That is why all the works of men, without exception, are in a backward state. "Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that He will send forth labourers into His harvest." That is the world's chief need; that is what we must ask from God. I do not know any wiser enthusiasm than that which stirs men up to become labourers for God.'

REFERENCES.—IX. 37, 38.—H. Price Hughes, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lili. 1898, p. 308. Lyman Abbott, ibid. vol. lxii. 1902, p. 33. A. E. Garvie, ibid. vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 353. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 112. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1127. IX. 38.—F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 221. E. Fowle, Pray ye the Lord of the Harvest, Sermons, 1872-1873. X. 1, 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 702.

LIST OF THE APOSTLES

'Now the names of the twelve apostles are these; The first Simon, who is called Peter, and Andrew his brother; James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother; Philip, and Bartholomew; Thomas, and Matthew the publican; James the son of Alphaeus, and Lebbaeus, whose surname was Thaddæus; Simon the Canaanite, and Judas Iscariot, who also betrayed Him.'—MATTHEW X. 2-4.

I. THERE are several pairs of brothers: Peter and Andrew; James and John; Judas and James. This points to (1) the need of companionship in Christian work, as solace, and as a curb to excessive individualism. (2) The allowableness of special friendships among Christian workers. (3) That Christianity is more beautiful when the natural bonds of love and kindred are sanctified. It is meant to heighten these and they to provide channels for its operation. (4) But also Christianity separates and dissolves natural ties.

II. There were wide varieties in the characters of the men chosen, which shows that there is room for all diversities in Christ's service and the uniting power of the Christian faith. Christ Himself in His living presence as the centre held all in unity.—A. MACLAREN.

REFERENCES.—X. 3.—H. J. Martyn, For Christ and the Truth, p. 75. X. 4.—J. E. Roberts, Studies in the Lord's Prayer, p. 106. A. F. Winnington Ingram, The Men Who Crucify Christ, p. 11. X. 5.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 55. X. 5-10.—Ibid. p. 68. X. 6.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 179. X. 7.—H. A. Stimson, The New Things of God, p. 267. Lyman Abbott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 372. X. 7, 8.—E. White, ibid. vol. xlv. 1894, p. 389. W. M. Sinclair, ibid. vol. xlv. 1894, p. 56.

THE CONDITION AND OBLIGATION OF SERVICE

'Freely ye have received, freely give.'—MATTHEW X. 8.

I. The Condition, the Source, the Inspiration of Service.—'Freely ye have received;' and here I cannot, dare not, attempt to speak about the greatness of the giving. He who told us most about it called it unspeakable; the riches of the grace are unsearchable, the love beyond all faith's measurement; we can only kneel before it and adore. But about our receiving we may speak, for that, alas! is too often a measurable quantity, and yet upon that depends all the power and willingness of service. It is not the magnitude of the grace, but the proportion of its inflow, that determines all the issues of the Christian life; the sun-rays are poured as plentifully upon the barren rock as upon the vine which creeps around it, but it is the measure of reception that makes the difference between the dead, profitless stone and the living tree that quivers into fruit-bearing. Glad giving comes out of full receiving. Loving God is letting God love us; the outgoings of our love are just the overflow of the Divine love in us. The Apostles tell us often in glowing, rapturous words of God's wonderful gifts to them, but they tell us quite as frequently of their own receiving. It was that which had made the miracle of their lives: 'Out of His fulness we all received, and grace upon grace'.

People who merely move among the crowd about Christ, who stop short of touching the hem of His garment, who perhaps see only His shadow as it passes by, who hardly open the narrowest chink of their being to the healing of His power, cannot be expected to lavish costly ointment at His feet. Only those give Him of their best, and give it with raptures of gratitude, who have been much healed and much forgiven; then they lay at His feet their ointment, or their tears, or their very blood-drops, if He asks, and think it all too small. If we measure with sparing, reluctant hands every coin that we drop into His treasury, every hour that we give to His worship and work, every meagre self-denial which His service imposes, there needs no further proof of the feeble hold which He has upon us and our scant reception of His grace.

II. The Obligation of Service.—Our receipts make our debt. The Lord tells us here, and His words are echoed and repeated in all the confessions of His disciples, that we have received for the very purpose of giving. The Gospel of the blessed God has been committed to us in trust. We are not absolute owners, we are responsible trustees. 'As every man hath received the gift, so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God.' The men who had learned directly of Christ never regarded their spiritual endowments save in this aspect. They never once supposed that the heavenly light had been kindled in them solely for their own glory, that the Divine treasure had been bestowed upon them simply for their own enrichment, and that for their own sakes alone they had been singled out for a benefit so vast, a mercy so wonderful, a salvation so grand and complete. How could they suppose that, unless Calvary had developed in them the Pharisee's pride or the miser's greed? How could they entertain that thought, unless they had been plunged in a blinding maelstrom of intolerable self-conceit? What had they done to deserve this signal grace and the promotion from rude fishermen to companionship with the King of Kings? No, they knew that the Divine love which had fixed itself on them was felt as fully and as freely towards the whole human race, and that the light had shown on their hearts first that through them the illumination might spread everywhere. It was not their own. It was the most sacred and responsible of trusts. It belonged to all men. To withhold it would be to rob men of what God had made their right. Nay, it would be to deny and forfeit their own calling. 'Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel.' And every one feels this who has truly understood and rejoiced in God's great gift. If it has not yet penetrated and suffused the hearts of all Christians, it is because the selfish human elements have counteracted the workings of the Divine, and because man's littleness has brought God's great thought down to the measure of the market and the shop.—J. G. GREENHOUGH, The Cross in Modern Life, p. 162.

REFERENCES.—X. 8.—James Baldwin Brown, The Divine Life in Man, pp. 321, 344. E. Y. Mullins, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 168. H. Montagu Butler, ibid. vol. lxx. 1906, p. 97. H. A. Stimson, The New Things of God, p. 245. F. Paget, The Spirit of Discipline, p. 234. X. 10.—J. O. Wills, The Dundee Pulpit, 1872, p. 185.

'And into whatsoever city or town ye shall enter, seek out who in it is worthy.'—MATTHEW X. 11.

'THERE are some men,' says Mrs. Oliphant in her Life of Edward Irving, 'who seem born to the inalienable good fortune of lighting upon the best people—"the most worthy," according to Irving's own expression long afterwards—wherever they go. Irving's happiness in this way began at Haddington. The doctor's wife seems to have been one of those fair, sweet women whose remembrance lasts longer than greatness. . . . The Annandale youth came into a little world of humanizing graces when he entered that atmosphere; and it was only natural that he should retain the warmest recollection of it throughout his life.'

REFERENCE.—X. 12, 13.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 565.

'And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet.'—MATTHEW X. 14.

COMPARE Wesley's account of how he left Georgia, being hampered by the authorities in his work. 'I saw clearly the hour was come for leaving this place. and as soon as evening prayers were over, about eight o'clock, the tide then serving, I shook off the dust of my feet, and left Georgia, after having preached the Gospel there (not as I ought, but as I was able) one year and nearly nine months.'

REFERENCE.—X. 14, 15.—F. E. Paget, Sermons for The Saints' Days, p. 205.

'Be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves.'—MATTHEW X. 16.

COMPARE Amiel's remarks on prudence, as part of love to men. 'Be ye simple as the dove, and prudent as the serpent,' are words of Jesus. Be careful of your reputation, not through vanity, but that you may not harm your life's work, and out of love for truth.

It was what he called his wisdom of the serpent, says Mr. Morley, that gave Cobden his power in the other arts of a successful agitator, which are less conspicuous but hardly less indispensable, than commanding or persuasive oratory. He applied the same qualities in the actual business of the League that he brought to bear in his speeches. He was indefatigable in industry, fertile in ingenious devices for bringing the objects of the League before the country, constantly on the alert for surprising a hostile post, never losing a chance of turning a foe or a neutral into a friend, and never allowing his interest about the end for which he was working to confuse his vigilant concentration upon the means.

REFERENCES.—X. 16.—J. H. Newman, Sermons Bearing on Subjects of the Day, p. 331. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 118. J. Stark, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 241. J. Stalker, ibid. vol. lxi. 1902, p. 41. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiii. No. 1370. X. 16-31.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 74. X. 19.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 256. X. 22.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 554.

THE CHRISTIAN PALLIATION OF PAIN

'When they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another.'—MATTHEW X. 23.

I. THE days of persecution are past; has this text lost its meaning? No, it is to my mind the revelation of an eternal fact—a fact which distinguishes Christianity from all other religions. Christ's remedy for the immediate pressure of grief is one peculiarly His own. Consider the remedies proposed by some other faiths. The Buddhist says: 'When you are oppressed by any sorrow, think how all your desires will be stilled in death'. The Brahman says: 'When you are oppressed by any sorrow, remember how all finite things are illusions'. The Stoic says: 'When you are oppressed by any sorrow, keep your mind on things that suppress emotion'. The Jew says: 'When you are oppressed by any sorrow, seek out and expiate the sin you have committed'. Christ says none of these things. His recommendation is: 'When you are oppressed by any sorrow, rest your thoughts as much as possible upon some joy that remains; when you are persecuted in one city, flee into another'.

II. Our danger in grief is that of forgetting our untouched joys. We have all some city of refuge—some spot left green. Christ says our first duty is to flee thither. He says we shall be better able to remedy any stroke of fortune if in the first instance we seek comfort in another direction. He practised this Himself in His cures. A paralytic came to be healed; Jesus said, 'Thy sins be forgiven thee'. Was not that irrelevant—to promise a man forgiveness of sin who wanted cure for paralysis? Yes, but in the irrelevancy lay the beauty. The best prelude to curing a man's paralysis is to get him over to the sunny side of the street—to fix his mind upon an actually existing joy.

III. So, too, when Christ tells the labouring and laden in body that He will give them rest to their souls, it seems an irrelevancy; but it is not. What better prelude to a medical cure than a flash of sunshine in the soul; what better preparation for a physical improvement than a state of inward rest? Our Lord would have us first get out from the persecuted into the unpersecuted city and brace ourselves for struggle by an hour of peace.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 149.

'When they persecute you in one city, flee ye into another.'—MATTHEW X. 23.

If religion be the doing of all good, and for its sake the suffering of all evil, souffrir de tout le monde et ne faire souffrir personne, that Divine secret has existed in England from the days of Alfred to those of Romilly, of Clarkson, and of Florence Nightingale, and in thousands who have no fame.—EMERSON, English Traits, XIII.

REFERENCES.—X. 24.—W. J. Knox-Little, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 250. X. 24, 25.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 83; see also Creed and Conduct, p. 89. X. 24-26.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 195. X. 26.—A. Martin, Winning the Soul, p. 181. X. 26, 27.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 49. X. 27.—E. Griffith-Jones, ibid. vol. liii. 1898, p. 195. C. Silvester Horne, ibid. vol. liv. 1898, p. 85. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 2674.

'Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear Him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell.'—MATTHEW X. 28.

COMPARE Carlyle's account, in the first volume of his Cromwell, of Prynne, Bastwick, and Burton, being mutilated, by order of Archbishop Laud, and of how, 'Bastwick's wife, on the scaffold, received his ears in her lap and kissed them. Prynne's ears the executioner "rather sawed than cut". "Cut me, tear me," cried Prynne? "I fear thee not; I fear the fire of Hell, not thee."'

'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father.'—MATTHEW X. 29.

NATURE herself has not provided the most graceful end for her creatures. What becomes of all the birds that people the air and forest for our solacement? The sparrows seem always chipper, never infirm. We do not see their bodies lie about. Yet there is a tragedy at the end of each one of their lives. They must perish miserably; not one of them is translated. True, 'not a sparrow falleth to the ground without our heavenly Father's knowledge,' but they do fall, nevertheless.—THOREAU, A Week on the Concord.

THE PROVIDENCE OF THE TRIFLE

'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered.'—MATTHEW X. 29, 30.

WE are so earth-bound that we half-suspect the competence of any being to exercise a Providence over motes, atoms, and infinitesimal details. We are not sure that we honour the Infinite by such a conception.

I. Our own carelessness about details in the lives that crowd our daily pathway makes it difficult for us to believe in Christ's doctrine of a Providence that regulates trifles. It is only a point in the unmeasured area of human life, not to speak of other uncounted realms of life, that we can touch by our sympathies. How incredible that God should fulfil a Providence that includes the meanest things in nature!

The indifference that warps our judgment of this question is made up of two things—sheer selfishness and rigid limitation of power and opportunity. Selfishness shrivels resource, and the shrinkage of resource seems to justify our selfishness.

II. It is often intimated that our theories of Providence are frequently discredited by the actual facts we see around us. The government of the world often looks as though it were impersonal. The universe, we are tempted to say, is ruled by a necessity that takes no account of the individual. All facts point in that direction.

Could we get into God's secret chambers we should see how He puts Himself into the blindest forces of the universe, and makes them move the fine threads of His counsel, and work out His deepest and most complex designs.

We cannot gauge God's providence over the little things of life by His apparent indifference to the time and circumstance under which the stream of breath in a man ceases. It is His hand which controls that breath, and His hand never forgets its cunning.

Much of our terror of death is due to ignorance of what death is, and to the assumption that it can come to any one of us as mere fate. To God and to us death must seem very different things. We are held in its chain, or at least seem to be. He holds death in chains, and never lets the key of the grim monster's fetters pass for a moment out of His possession.

III. Belief in a Providence that is informed in incalculably minute sympathies is necessary to our habitual communion with God. If God cannot or will not care for little things, we have no encouragement to come to His feet and pour out our tale before Him.

Our belief ought to give calmness in our work and authority to the message we are sent to deliver. Every part of the elect life is under a sacred ordination, and God watches over all the things that concern us as we do His will. We often lack a due sense of our vocation because our belief in a guiding Providence is feeble.—T. G. SELBY, The Lesson of a Dilemma, p. 82.

REFERENCES.—X. 30.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 187; vol. xxxiv. No. 2005. James Vaughan, Sermons Preached in Christ Church, Brighton (7th Series), p. 151.

ON CHURCHGOING

'Whosoever therefore shall confess Me before men, him will I confess also before My Father, which is in heaven.'—MATTHEW X. 32.

WE are told to confess Christ. 'Whosoever therefore shall confess Me before men, him will I confess also before My Father which is in heaven.' Nor is this all. This is only half the truth. There is the dark side as well as the bright one. 'But whosoever shall deny Me before men, him will I also deny before My Father which is in heaven.'

I. In an age when everybody is allowed to believe what they like, the constancy of the martyr and the cowardice of the renegade are alike impossible. Confessing Christ before men is done by all respectable churchgoers, as you may say; what can any one require more? I think God will require much more. And here I would enter a protest against a form of cowardice common at this day. How many among us reverse the language of the prayer and 'profess and call themselves non-Christians'? You hear repeatedly men and women say, 'I don't profess to be a Christian, but I look after sick people. I don't profess to be a Christian, but I am always ready to help. I don't profess to be a Christian, but you will not hear any slander or evil-speaking from me.' This is a common line for people to take up just now, even if they do not put it quite so plainly in words. Examine it, and it means something like this. I will copy the teachings of Christ's gracious life, but I will not acknowledge their source. For who taught the world to seek out the sick and the sorrowing? Who taught the world to help the poor? Who made it a duty to refrain from guileful speech, and to be gentle, compassionate, tender-hearted? Jesus Christ of Nazareth! This fact, however, must be ignored; we must pretend that it is our own superiority that enables us to lead the higher life.

II. We constantly find people taking a sort of pride in assuming this attitude of aloofness about religion. They seem to consider it a mark of intelligence to deny the superior claims of Christianity over other faiths. Buddha, Mohammed, Moses, or Jesus are all treated with the same patronizing approbation. It is a revival of the saying of the Roman cynic, 'All religions are equally false'. To entertain no preference for the best thing in the world is not dignity, but dullness.

People are denying the Master in a new way, and while taking all they can from His system, they revile it and call it outworn and dying.

III. A public profession of Christianity is what is wanted. Since the days of the Apostles it has been the rule that all Christians should assemble themselves together on the first day of the week in open acknowledgment of their allegiance to Christ.—C. H. BUTCHER, The Sound of a Voice that is Still, p. 160.

REFERENCES.—X. 32.—S. Martin, Westminster Chapel Sermons, p. 1. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 173. X. 32, 33.—F. E. Paget, Sermons for the Saints' Days, p. 55. X. 32-42.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 94.

THE SWORD OF DOUBT

'I came not to send peace, but a sword.'—MATTHEW X. 34.

OUR Lord tells us here that the preaching of the Cross is like a sword. When St. John saw the Son of Man in his vision, 'there went a sharp two-edged sword out of his mouth'.

It sounds like a paradox that the Lamb should bear a sword. Yet we know that the preaching of the Cross, wherever it sounded, cut men to the heart, leaving deep divisions and awakening sharp animosities.

I. Now may we not say that this sword of the Lamb is Doubt. In the mind of the seeker after light it is the anguish of indecision. And in the case of the persecutor it is at bottom the same thing.

Ever since the advent of our Lord you find doubt in the world. The heaven immediately began to work, and it worked with great violence, causing a turmoil, a civil war, in the soul, such as had never been experienced before.

What did our Lord do to create this horrid spectre of Doubt and let it loose upon the modern world?

If we are to understand why He sent not peace but a sword, we must fix our attention on the deepest and most characteristic feature of His work and doctrine, and this is certainly to be found in the Cross. It has always been a supreme difficulty, and there is nothing in the whole body of Christian doctrine that has excited so much hostility, so much repugnance, or so much derision, as the notion that vicarious suffering can have any moral value or can in any sense be called a duty or a Divine law. It does not seem reasonable, it does not square with our empirical conception of justice, and it is the very last thing that men desire. Yet it is the specific mark of Christianity, and deep within our hearts there is a voice that tells us that it is Divine and that through it lies the way to the right understanding of God and of life. Here, and here only, we see the full meaning of the sword of the Lamb. Alone of all teachers He dared to proclaim as the goal of human aspiration not happiness nor tranquillity but Life, Life attained through pain and working in Pain, Pain not passive but active, not borne with stoic resignation but cheerfully accepted and sought for, as a ransom for the souls of others and through those others of ourselves. Such a doctrine is exquisitely painful. It offends at every point. It affronts our reason, our dignity, our freedom, our conduct, our physical weakness. Yet no man reads the history of the Passion without feeling its truth.

II. Pain indeed suggests the one and only doubt which is worth a moment's consideration.

Pain is undoubtedly a grave problem, but for this very reason it is of vital importance that it should not be presented in a false or exaggerated light. Nature strikes many people as cruel, yet the suffering which forms part of her system is never inflicted, in the first instance at any rate, from a mere delight in barbarity. Animals are not cruel unless they are depraved. Aimless ferocity is a vice in them as it is in man. They kill for food as man himself does, and almost always in the shortest and least painful manner. Again, it is highly probable that the lower animals are not so susceptible of pain as man himself, and the pain of violent injuries is not to be compared with the lingering torments of disease. Pain is not really a large factor in life, and even what we call brute courage thinks but little of it. These considerations go at any rate some way, and they should debar us from speaking of the world as if it were merely a vast and hideous torture-chamber.

The difficulty of pain is almost entirely modern. It is hardly to be found in Scripture, except perhaps in the phrase of St. Paul about the whole Creation groaning and travailing in sympathy with the evil of man. Our Saviour never touches upon this theme, and the old Psalmist writes without hesitation, 'the lions roaring after their prey do seek their meat from God'.

III. We may say that pain is not an evil because it shortens life but only when it degrades it, that it never degrades the brute and only accidentally degrades man. But still there will remain an unanswered doubt. Why did a good God order His universe in this way? Why did He not content Himself with framing painless angels and leave suffering beasts out of the scheme?

If we fix our eyes on the lower parts of Creation we can discover no satisfactory answer. We do not know the brutes. But man we do know, and in his spirit we can find a law that brings peace, the law of the Cross. And not in his spirit only. The Cross reaches up to heaven and brings suffering into contact with God Himself. As we look upon Calvary we see pain transfigured; it is no longer a burden, but a wing. It is the cement of all society, the spur to all progress, the main link between man and man, and man and God.

Why it should be so we cannot tell. We cannot fully solve those or any other mystery, nor can we banish mystery from life. There is darkness around us, above us, within us. But there is also light; and though it be but a glimmering point, the wise man will turn his face towards it. Aristomenes of Messene, when he was condemned to die and cast into the dark pit, at first gave way to despair. But as he strained his eyes around the black recesses of the Ceadas he caught sight of a thread of sunlight, crawled towards it on hands and knees, and finally escaped through a fox's earth. And this is a parable of the Christian pilgrim. Only he must have faith, that is to say, he must believe that there is open day and freedom, and that the little spark of brightness points the way towards the sun.—C. BIGG, The Spirit of Christ in Common Life, p. 21.

NOT PEACE, BUT A SWORD

*Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword.—MATTHEW X. 34.

I. Not Peace, but a Sword.—The words are written in the whole history of the Church from then until now. The martyrdom of Stephen was the first occasion for the extension of the Gospel, and the law of its progress has never varied. For three centuries Christianity maintained an open struggle with the strongest power which the world has ever seen. The victory was won, the triumph exceeded all human hope; but peace was not yet.

II. Not Peace, but a Sword.—For three more centuries hordes of barbarians poured over the fairest provinces of Europe. Christianity alone was unconquered. Again and again the wild flood swept over our island, but the bulwarks of faith rose secure above them. So again the victory was won. A new family of nations was gathered in the fold of Christ: but peace was not yet.

III. Not Peace, but a Sword.—The nations were Christianized, but the poor were forgotten. The history of the Middle Age is a long record of conflicts between the spirit of the Gospel and the spirit of dominion. When the full time was come the outward unity of Christendom was broken. Christian was armed against Christian in an unnatural strife. But we now are allowed to look back upon that age of the Reformation and see how men, who owned no fellowship on earth, were yet enabled to work out each some fragment of Divine truth and hand it down to us. But with the larger view of the capacities of Christianity, and the truer view of its adaptation to every variety of thought which we owe to them—larger and truer, I believe, than was ever vouchsafed to any earlier age—we have received also an inheritance of division: not peace, but a sword.

IV. But they have also another and a more personal sense. They speak to each one of us in our own peculiar work. In that our battle is to be fought; in that the critical power of Christianity for us is to be manifested; in that we shall find that the Gospel comes not with the soft voice of rest, but with a sterner call.

V. Not Peace, but a Sword.—But the words cheer us when we find the conflict of life hardest. It is Christ's will that it be so.—B. F. WESTCOTT, Village Sermons, p. 298.

THE SENDING OF THE SWORD

'I came not to send peace, but a sword.'—MATTHEW X. 34.

THERE seems to be a glaring contradiction between this word and some other words of Jesus. Life proves many a proposition to be true that logic would readily demonstrate as false. And the strange thing about the words of Christ is, that while they seem to contradict each other at the bar of reason, they link themselves together into perfect harmony when we go forward in the strength of them. They are words of life; meant to be lived out.

I. The coming of Christ sends a sword into the heart. Now this is exactly what I should have expected when I remember the penalties of gain. For everything a man achieves there is a price to pay. There comes a wound with everything we win. All knowledge, whatever joy it brings with it, brings with it in the other hand a sword. All love, though it kindles the world into undreamed-of brightness, has a note in its music of unrest and agony.

To receive Christ is to receive the truth; it is to have the Spirit of Love breathing within us; and if truth and love always bring sorrow with them, I shall expect the coming of Christ to be with pain.

II. There are three ways in which the coming of Christ into the heart sends a sword there.

1. Christ opens up the depths of sin within us. We see what we are in the light of His perfection. We were tolerably contented with our character once, but when Christ comes we are never that again.

2. Christ calls us to a lifelong warfare. The note of warfare rings through the whole New Testament. The spirit is quickened now to crave for spiritual things, and the flesh and the spirit must battle till the grave.

3. Above all, it is by heightening our ideal that the old peace goes and the pain begins. It is in the new conception of what life may be that the sword-stroke cuts into the heart.

III. Christ comes to send a sword into the home. Did you ever think how true that was of Nazareth? Did you ever reflect on our text in the light of that home? It might have been so peaceful and so happy if God had never honoured it like this. But Jesus was born there, and that made all the difference. It could never be the quiet home again. Gethsemane was coming, Calvary was coming; a sword was going to pierce through Mary's heart. He came not to send peace, but a sword.

Develop love, and you develop sorrow. Deepen the heart-life, and you deepen suffering. It is by doing that, through all the centuries, that Christ has brought the sword into our homes.—G. H. MORRISON, Sun-Rise, p. 158.

Illustration—I notice in the engines of our river-steamers that there are rods that move backward as well as rods that move forward. A child would say they were fighting with each other, and that half of the engines were going the wrong way. But though half the engines seem to go the wrong way, there is no question that the ship is going the right way: out of the smoke and stir of the great city into the bays where the peace of God is resting. So with the words of Christ that seem to oppose each other. Make them the driving power of the soul, and the oppositions will not hinder progress, and the contradictions will reveal their unity, and you shall be brought to your desired haven.—G. H. MORRISON, Sun-Rise, p. 159.

'I came not to send peace, but a sword.'—MATTHEW X. 34.

WHAT said Jesus—that He came to send a sword? Of course He did. Every idea is a sword.—W. HALE WHITE.

REFERENCES.—X. 34.—J. Neville Figgis, The Gospel and Human Needs, p. 145. W. Garrett Horder, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 204. A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part II. p. 247. Selected Sermons of Schleiermacher, p. 295. X. 36-38.—C. G. Finney, Sermons on Gospel Themes, p. 319.

THE SUPREME CLAIM OF CHRIST

'He that loveth father or mother more than Me is not worthy of Me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than Me is not worthy of Me.'—MATTHEW X. 37.

It seems to me that the supreme claim of the Lord Jesus Christ rests at least upon three bases. The first basis of His claim is in His own character; the second basis of His claim is in the need of him upon whom He makes the claim; and the third basis is in the need of the world for him upon whom He makes the claim.

I. His Own Character.—Christ claimed it for Himself, mark you, not for a moral ideal, but for Himself as a living Person, and He claimed the same kind of love as we give to father, to mother, or to child. I say that claim was based upon His own character, for Christ was conscious of having an absolute commission from God to men.

He claimed it because He was conscious of His ability to guide men, and all men, and all kinds of men in all kinds of conditions. Christ brings us a message from God, that we know from experience is the last message, not only of God as a Creator, or as a Judge, or even as a Father, but Christ's message as of a forgiving Father, and of a forgiving Father to the uttermost.

II. The Needs of the Individual.—No man ever saw the needs of men as the Lord Jesus Christ beheld them. He saw the individual need—some one to take the supreme place in man's affection. Man needs a ruler who will save him from himself. Every man living knows that he longs for someone to save him, not from the world, not from the temptations without, but from himself; not only to put out the fires which our own stupidity have kindled, but to bring out the treasure that we know God has deposited within us, and which we cannot dig out ourselves.

There are four ways in which we can use our ware. That boy who had the loaves and fishes could have done four things with them. He could have thrown them away; he could have eaten them himself; or he could have distributed them himself among his friends, or as he did—give them to Christ. And we may do these four things with our lives. And that is why Christ claimed the first place in men's lives, because He knew that life must of necessity be a tragic failure without that influence of Divine grace upon it.

III. The Claim of Others Upon Us.—The world has certain demands upon us. We realize it as we never have realized it before, and the supreme claim of Jesus Christ is based upon the claim of other lives upon us. No man who does not live in communion with God can give an original contribution to life. We owe supreme allegiance to Christ in the interest of the world. We owe it in the interests of the unity of the world as well.—J. DOUGLAS ADAM, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII. 1907, p. 86.

'He that loveth father or mother more than Me is not worthy of Me.—MATTHEW X. 37.

In his Anglican days, Newman wrote thus of the Roman Church: 'Considering the high gifts and the strong claims of the Church of Rome and its dependencies on our admiration, reverence, love, and gratitude, how could we withstand it, as we do, how could we refrain from being melted into tenderness, and rushing into communion with it, but for the words of Truth itself, which bid us prefer It to the whole world?' 'He that loveth father or mother more than Me is not worthy of Me.'

REFERENCES.—X. 37.—R. Flint, Sermons and Addresses, p. 166. X. 37, 38.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 585.

'He that taketh not his cross, and followeth after Me, is not worthy of Me.'—MATTHEW X. 38.

To repel one's cross is to make it heavier.—AMIEL.

To take up the Cross of Christ is no great action done once for all; it consists in the continual practice of small duties which are distasteful to us.—NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—X. 38.—R. H. McKim, The Gospel in the Christian Year, p. 166. H. J. Wilmet-Buxton, Holy-Tide Teaching, p. 92. X. 38, 39.—T. B. Dover, Some Quiet Lenten Thoughts, p. 95. X. 39.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 102. J. Vickery, Ideals of Life, p. 181. J. H. Jowett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXIV. 1903, p. 209. H. A. Stimson, The New Things of God, p. 65.

'He that receiveth you receiveth Me.'—MATTHEW X. 40.

For a long time past I have seen into a something most wondrous, in what I fear so many think the accident of our circle of friends. It is no accident. If it be true, 'He that receiveth you receiveth Me,' in one sense, it is also in this. God draws nigh in our friend-circles.—SMETHAM.

REFERENCE.—X. 40.—W. J. Knox-Little, The Perfect Life, p. 289.

THE EXALTATION OF THE OBSCURE

'He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man shall receive a righteous man's reward.'—MATTHEW X. 41.

ONE of the noticeable features of our Lord's earthly ministry was His tender regard for the obscure and undistinguished men and women by whom He was surrounded, closely connected as this feeling was with an unshaken belief in the undeveloped, yet developable, spiritual capacities of the average mass of mankind.

I. So long as we keep Christ's image in view we can never degenerate into pessimists or cynics. The more we know of Him, and the more truly we believe in Him as representing God and man, the greater will be our reverence for the image of God in our fellow-men, and the more clearly shall we see how out of the very fact of men's seeming insignificance may come opportunities of special faithfulness and of service to God and to man. But in order to see this as Christ saw and revealed it, we need first to be changed in ourselves. And some such generous faith in the higher possibilities of commonplace men and women, implied as it is in the doctrine of the Incarnation, is necessary for our own moral support.

II. There is a peculiar glamour about great talents and powerful individualities. Hence comes a natural tendency to undervalue commonplace qualities, and even to assume that those who are not possessed of any remarkable gifts, however worthy they may be individually, are destitute of significance, and hardly count at all as factors in the moral and spiritual advance of mankind.

The same false estimate sometimes has a benumbing effect on character by leading people to disparage their own powers of usefulness.

Strictly speaking, the great question for every man is, not whether he has commanding powers, but what use he proposes to himself, with God's help, to make of the gifts entrusted to him. Be those gifts great or small, few or many, the main concern to each of us is that they are our gifts, given to us by God Himself, a part, therefore, of our own distinct personality, and they are the measure whereby our faithfulness will be tested.

III. But Christ's words carry us even further than this. Not only do they bring encouragement to the hearts of all those who live faithfully a hidden and an obscure life. They lay down the broad principle of an equivalence of reward as between the eminent and the obscure. They tell us that he who welcomes a prophet simply because he is a prophet, out of regard for his prophetic character, shall receive a prophet's reward, and he who welcomes a righteous man for the simple reason that he loves and reveres righteousness, shall receive a righteous man's reward. The words are of a figurative character, but their meaning is plain. They reveal a law of identification by moral sympathy of humble and holy men of heart with the great characters to whom their highest homage is given.—J. W. SHEPARD, Light and Life, p. 60.

A PROPHET

He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man shall receive a righteous man's reward.*—MATTHEW X. 41.

I. A Prophet—a man sent from God to teach us absolute truth concerning our relations with God. Christ was pre-eminently such: the Way, the Truth, and the Life. He still continues to give this knowledge from heaven. No man spake like this Man. No books speak like these books of Holy Scripture: Christ speaks in them from heaven. The real evidence of Christianity is in the Bible; the Word made flesh can only be known through the word made letter as in the writings of the Lord's Apostles.

II. Righteous Men—such as might go forth in God's name. Men's character might be told more by their attitude to the Bible than by anything. The righteous man is one who lives in Christ, and though he may not even be able to read he cannot help saving others—he radiates the saving energy.

III. The Idea of Receiving a Prophet who is able to teach others. The old word 'parlour,' our little social parliament, has given place to the modern term, 'reception room'. Who comes there? Those who like you. Receiving means taking into your confidence, mind, heart, those who are drawn toward you by your character. That man only receives a prophet who receives him to closest intimacy and helps him. To receive a righteous man is to draw him to yourself and help him.

IV. Reception of Prophets: our sympathetic help ensures for us certain participation in their reward both here and hereafter. The reward seems too great, as if the shepherds of Bethlehem should be rewarded for listening to the angels' song by being made angels themselves. But receiving a righteous man goes very deep into character. The impulse to a noble, sympathetic act gains the reward of an inward approving conscience, which is, in fact, the approval of the universal conscience—the love of God. There was no praise in the universe so hearty and vital as God's.

There are many forgotten attributes of God, such as His intensely human sympathies, His love of being loved, the enthusiasm with which He beholds noble and self-sacrificing character.—EDWARD WHITE, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. II. p. 77.

REFERENCES.—X. 41.—W. Ewen, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 220. W. Boyd Carpenter, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 113. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. viii. p. 25. X. 41, 42.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 110. X. 42.—H. Harris, Short Sermons, p. 221. B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 21. XI.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2708. XI. 2.—T. Barker, Plain Sermons, p. 224. XI. 2, 3.—F. D. Maurice, Lincoln's Inn Sermons, vol. iii. p. 33. G. Jackson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 67. T. F. Lockyer, The Inspirations of the Christian Life, p. 76. XI. 2-5.—H. Varley, Spiritual Light and Life, p. 143. G. Salmon, Non-Miraculous Christianity, p. 1. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 121.

J. B. Stedford, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 120. XI. 2-10.—A. B. Davidson, The Called of God, p. 230.

IMPATIENCE

Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another?—MATTHEW XI. 3.

I. It was not by want of faith that the Baptist erred, but by Impatience, which is a different thing, except in so far as it may be said to imply distrust in the Divine wisdom. It is impatience when we would go faster than God, when we would force His hand either to destroy what is evil or to advance what is good, when we complain that He does nothing and hides Himself, because He does not ripen the grain and reap the harvest directly after seed-time. The cause of it is not so much want of faith, as over-estimate of our own insight and power; it arises not so much from lack of devotion as from that most subtle and dangerous temptation, excess of zeal. It is the fault of the too ardent soldier who chafes at the restraints imposed by experience, and starts before his commander gives the word.

It is the fault not of bad men only but of the good, even of the best.

There is another kind of impatience against which we are warned in the Gospel. 'Tell us,' the disciples asked Jesus, 'what is the sign of Thy coming?' If Thou wilt not now take Thy power and reign, if Thou wilt not now strike down the wicked, when wilt Thou come and avenge Thy people?'

You will remember the answer. First there will come false Christs, false prophets—not one but many. Who will they be? Will they not be the Christs of the impatient? And who will they be? Will they not be men who promise to save men, not from themselves, but from suffering: and to do it by short, and easy, and violent methods. Our Lord says, Go not after them; believe them not. First the Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations. He does not say that it shall prevail in all the world: only that it shall be preached, and be a witness.

II. At all times impatience has been a fruitful source of mischief. It has prompted every persecution there has ever been in pagan ages and in Christian. In our own day there are not a few who have abandoned the Gospel altogether, not because they want to live vicious lives, but because the Gospel is not swift enough and not drastic enough for them, because the kingdom seems too far off, while an earthly millennium can be set up at once by the law without the Gospel.

But there are two axioms that ought never to be forgotten. The first is that the good is always the enemy of the better. Men cling to the lower blessings which they know, and shrink from the higher, which they do not know and therefore fear.

The second is that the best is often the enemy of the better. The vision of the best may be given in a moment, but its realization is a long and arduous process, marked by stages which follow one another in a definite order. It was said by a great soldier that all generals alike desire victory; but that a good general differs from a bad one in that he does not take the second step before he has secured the first. To do otherwise is to court defeat. The rule is of universal application.

III. The best remedy for impatience is to be found in the intelligent study of Scripture. It is necessary that the study should be intelligent because only by the scholarly use of the Bible can we discern the patience and long-suffering of God, the slow certainty with which His mills grind, the vast and orderly changes which His spirit has wrought. And the next best is history which, though it may make little mention of God, yet describes accurately His method in the education of the world.

Now what is the teaching of history so far as it throws light upon our present purpose?

1. That, from the remotest past to which our knowledge extends, there has always been progress, slow, intermittent, not always in a direct line, involving much that strikes us as waste, yet progress.

2. That the slowness of the onward march has an explanation, which applies in a degree to Nature, but is more easily discernible in the realm of thought.

IV. May we say that the order of progress in the education of mankind exhibits an alternation of two very different factors? First we have the idea, then the testing, dissemination, assimilation of the idea, then again a new idea, and so on. First the prophet, or revealer, or man of genius; then the patient teacher. It is the second of these—it is the work of the teacher—that takes so much time.

Every teacher, like John the Baptist, prepares the way of the Lord. Not all can be great discoverers, there is perhaps no school of the prophets, nor is it possible to manufacture genius. But all can show what makes the great scholar, the love of truth—patience, humility, reverence. Add to these knowledge of character and sympathy, and you have the great teacher, whose beneficent office it is to 'turn the hearts of the children to the fathers,' to enable the children to grasp and to prize the rich heritage of the wisdom of the past.

And for the learner. Good teaching will greatly expedite your progress, but it will not enable you to fly; you must still go by the road; you will still have need of diligence and self-discipline. Avoid impatience, avoid sloth. Without haste, without rest. Chain up the beast; and seek wisdom before all things. At every step resolutely practise all the truth that you know, and ever, as you go on, be ready to correct the old truths by the new.

These are cardinal rules for all learners. But Christ is the Way, the Truth, and the Life. All truth is His, all discipline is His, all power is His. Absorb Him by growing faith, hope, and love. Let Him be your ideal, and your method, and your zeal.—C. BIGE, The Spirit of Christ in Common Life, p. 153.

LOOKING FOR THE COMING ONE

'Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another?'—MATTHEW XI. 3.

THE first thing we remark in reading the Gospel for to-day is that—

1. John the Baptist was Looking for the Coming One.—It is taken for granted that One should come (1's. cxviii. 26; Is. lix. 20). But why should John ask such a question? He knew Jesus to be the Saviour. He had declared Him to be sent of God (John iii. 34), the Lamb of God (John i. 29, 36), the Son of God (John i. 34), the Baptizer with the Holy Ghost (John i. 33). Perhaps, now that he was in prison (v. 2), his faith had begun to waver (v. 6). It is so with many (Matt. xiii. 21; 2 Tim. i. 15; iv. 16). At all events he was looking for Christ, and would have his faith increased (Heb. xii. 2; Mark ix. 24; Luke xvii. 5). But I think it is more probable that he wished his disciples to know who Christ was (Luke xxii. 32), and would lead them from himself to look for the coming One (John iii. 30, 31). We know his one word with regard to Christ had been 'Behold!' (John i. 29). So all who are looking to Christ and for Christ will teach others to do the same (John i. 41, 42). Christ is to be known as the Saviour by His works (vv. 4, 5; John v. 36). There can be no doubt in looking to Scripture (Is. lxi. 1, 2).

The next thing we have to dwell upon is—

II. The Character of John the Baptist as Looking for the Coming One.—There must be some decided marks of holiness in the character of one who is looking for a coming Lord. The faithful servant will be doing his Master's will (Matt. xxiv. 45, 46). The soul full of hope becomes full of purity (1 John iii. 3). The true convert turns from the service of idols to that of the living God (1 Thess. i. 9, 10). Mark how it was with the Baptist. He was a man of firm resolution. Not like a reed blown about by every wind (Eph. iv. 14). He was firm before the priesthood (John i. 20), firm before Herod (Mark vi. 18), firm before all (Luke iii. 7). He was a man of great self-denial. There was no luxury in him (v. 8; 1 Pet. ii. 11). He stood out as one separate (Matt. xix. 21; Luke ix. 23; Rom. xiii. 14). He was a man of faithfulness in telling of Christ (vv. 9, 10). Never do we find him hesitating boldly and fully to declare the coming One (John i. 7). And in this we have a proof of his faith (2 Cor. iv. 13).

To make this personal, let us see that we know Christ from what He has done for us (Hos. vi. 3), and then let us see that we are looking for Him (Pa. cxxiii. 1, 2).

REFERENCES.—XI. 3.—J. A. Bain, Questions Answered by Christ, p. 15. H. Harris, Short Sermons, p. 118. J. Denney, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 250. J. Stalker, ibid. vol. liv. 1898, p. 100. A. G. Mortimer, Studies in Holy Scripture, p. 207. Benson, Hulsean Lecture (1820), p. 55. Parker, Inner Life of Christ, vol. ii. p. 162, and Christian World Pulpit, vol. xix. p. 8. Raleigh, Little Sanctuary, p. 110. Beecher, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxiv. p. 19. Bruce, Expositor (1st Series), vol. v. p. 11; and see Expositor, vol. ix.

p. 122. Homiletic Quarterly, vol. ii. p. 404. J. O. Davies, Sunrise on the Soul, p. 109. James Denney, Gospel Questions and Answers, p. 19. XI. 3, 4.—W. Ross Taylor, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 341. XI. 3-6. (R.V.).—T. B. Strong, Christian Ethics, p. 47.

'Jesus answered and said. . . .—MATTHEW XI. 4.

It is an excellent observation which hath been made upon the answers of our Saviour Christ to many of the questions which were propounded to Him, how that they are impertinent to the state of the question demanded; the reason whereof is, because not being like man, which knows man's thoughts by his words, but knowing man's thought immediately, He never answered their words but their thoughts.—BACON, Advancement of Learning, xxv. 16.

REFERENCES.—XI. 4, 5.—E. M. Goulburn, Occasional Sermons, p. 191. S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 181. XI. 5.—B. F. Westcott, The Incarnation and Common Life, p. 295; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 401. J. Guinness Rogers, ibid. vol. xlii. 1892, p. 255. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 114. XI. 5, 6.—W. C. Magee, Penny Pulpit, vol. xiv. No. 845, p. 437; see also The Gospel and the Age, p. 205. XI. 6.—W. J. Knox-Little, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 270. J. Denney, ibid. vol. li. 1897, p. 140. A. F. A. Hanbury Tracy, Church Times, vol. xlv. 1900, p. 729. F. E. Paget, Sermons on Duties of Daily Life, p. 83. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1398. XI. 7.—F. E. Paget, Sermons for Special Occasions, p. 41; see also The Preacher in the Wilderness, A Sermon. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 29. H. P. Liddon, Church Troubles, p. 21; see also Expository Sermons on the New Testament, p. 12.

'What went ye out for to see? A man clothed in soft raiment?'—MATTHEW XI. 8.

IZAACK WALTON, describing Hooker's parsonage at Bourne, tells how that scholar had not been settled a year before 'his books, and the innocency and sanctity of his life became so remarkable, that many turned out of the road, and others—scholars especially—went purposely to see the man, whose life and learning were so much admired: and, alas! as our Saviour said of St. John Baptist, "What went they out to see? a man clothed in purple and fine linen?" No, indeed: but an obscure, harmless man; a man in poor clothes, his loins usually girt in a coarse gown, or canonical coat; of a mean stature, and stooping, and yet more lowly in the thought of his soul.'

COMPARE also Newman's description of John Davison, who was 'an instance of the secrecy and solitude in which great minds move, as if they were calling on the world, if it thought it worth while, to "go out into the wilderness after them". In the preface to these Remains it is observed of their author that "perhaps his character might be cast in a mould of severer goodness than this age could easily endure".'

SINCERITY IN RELIGION

(For St. John the Baptist's Day.)

'For this is he, of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before Thy face, which shall prepare Thy way before Thee.—MATTHEW XI. 10.

Few figures in the Bible stand out so impressively as that of St. John the Baptist. Everything we read about him commands our attention. He was a great man in every sense of the word. Above all men, St. John the Baptist stands out as a conspicuous instance of the all too rare virtue of sincerity. I should say that a deep sincerity is the first characteristic of a great man.

I. Every Life to be Sincere must be Animated by a Great Principle, and it is because St. John the Baptist knew a great principle and dedicated himself to it that he gives to us so conspicuous an example of sincerity. Let us ask ourselves, have we any guiding, dominant motive in life, any principle to which we can give ourselves, and which we can recognize as the fact in existence? The principle of the Christian life, the dominant controlling force in all our experience, should be the coming of the kingdom of God.

II. But the Baptist's Sincerity did not save him from Doubt.—There are few more pathetic incidents recorded in the whole of history than that of St. John the Baptist, the model of sincerity, the man who was ready to forfeit life in order to do the work to which God had called him, now that he is languishing in prison losing confidence in the message of Christ. But again, the doubt of the Baptist was the doubt of a sincere man. He goes at once to the source at which his doubt may be resolved. He is not the man who has difficulties and is rather pleased to have them. As a sincere doubter he goes straight to the Lord Jesus Christ.

It is very strange that this virtue of sincerity is so rare when it might be so common. Some of the graces, indeed, seem to be so hard to obtain, but no one can say that he is not called upon to practise the grace of sincerity. Here is a challenge to every one in every sphere of life. And yet we feel how hard it is.

III. Sincerity is not merely Truthfulness, not merely Common Honesty.—It is purity of motive which comes from having one dominant principle in life. How simple it is!—so simple that in its moral grandeur it stands like some great mountain reaching up to heaven above all the virtues for which saints are canonized. Sincerity is the motive force of all true action in politics, social life, commerce, and in our own apprehension of God.

IV. Sincerity does not always Ensure Success.—In the Baptist's case it meant failure. Nothing could seem more incongruous than that this life of absolute sincerity should be ended to please a cruel and licentious woman. You are never told in the New Testament to be successful. You are told to be sincere. Let us resolve that we will so act that when life's tasks are over we shall at any rate be able to feel that they have been faced with a sincere desire to do our duty.

REFERENCES.—XI. 10.—H. P. Liddon, Advent in St. Paul's, p. 26. R. D. B. Rawnsley, Village Sermons (1st Series), p. 19. R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 334. Hemming Roberson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 135. XI. 11.—F. D. Maurice, Sermons, p. 129; see also Lincoln's Inn Sermons, vol. vi. p. 110. John Watson, Christian World

Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 152. J. Farquhar, The Schools and Schoolmasters of Christ, p. 101. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. v. p. 32. W. Leighton Grane, Hard Sayings of Jesus Christ, p. 37. XI. 11-14.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. i. p. 53.

'The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force.'—MATTHEW XI. 12.

SUDDEN conversions, with the ecstatic warmth of feeling which follows upon them, are derided, but only by those who know, even as regards natural things, little of the secret powers, the reserved forces of the human spirit, and are unaware that in the depths of ignorant and hardened and weary and distracted souls, there is still a Strength, blind and fettered like that of Samson, needing a shock to set it free. 'The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force.' Methodism has entered into the heart of this saying.—DORA GREENWELL.

REFERENCES.—XI. 12.—C. Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 156; see also vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 177. J. Morris Whiton, ibid. vol. xl. 1891, p. 147. J. Addison Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 319. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 252. XI. 12-19.—C. Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 200. XI. 13.—F. W. Farrar, ibid. vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 153. A. Barry, The Doctrine of the Cross, p. 35. XI. 15.—J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 402. XI. 16, 17.—C. Silvester Horne, ibid. vol. xlv. 1894, p. 40. XI. 16-19.—D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 127. Stopford A. Brooke, The Fight of Faith, p. 19. George Salmon, Sermons Preached in Trinity College Dublin, p. 249. XI. 19.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 131. W. C. Wheeler, Sermons and Addresses, p. 22. J. G. Adderley, Church Times, vol. l. 1903, p. 200. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 556.

THE HOMELINESS OF JESUS

'The Son of man came eating and drinking.'—MATTHEW XI. 19.

THIS was a strange thing for the Lord to say of Himself. His enemies found in these words an opportunity of vile abuse—'a man gluttonous,' 'a friend of publicans and sinners'. For good or harm, few things are more powerful than a name: a good epithet has determined the fate of many a great effort.

This was how He came, 'eating and drinking,'—the homely, brotherly Jesus interested in the common business of our life. This homeliness meets us everywhere.

I. See this Purpose in the Circumstances of His Birth.—Here in the manger was the Brother of the poorest, the gift of God's love to the whole world, to Whom whosoever will may come—no door to keep back, no attendant to whisper a forbidding word.

II. In His Coming as a Public Teacher.—Wherever Jesus went the people felt the welcome of that great brotherliness. Little children, sinful women, trembling lepers were at home with Jesus.

III. In the Choice of His Disciples.—Men with broad Galilean brogue and simple ways and peasant's dress.

IV. In the Teachings of the Lord.—He told simple exquisite stories which children and the poorest understood.

V. In His Miracles.—Power would only amaze men: He sought to win them. This real Saviour understands us, is at home with us, knowing all the worst, and yet loving, and willing to help.—MARK GUY PEARSE, The Sermon Year Book, 1891, p. 375.

'Then began He to upbraid the cities. . . . I am meek and lowly in heart.'—MATTHEW XI. 20 and 29.

THE man of true humility will not spare the vices and errors of his fellow-creatures, any more than he would his own; he will exercise manfully and without fear or favour, those judicial functions which God has committed in some greater or less degree to every member of the human community . . . but, whilst exercising that judgment in no spirit of compromise or evasion, he will feel that to judge his brother is a duty and not a privilege; and he will judge him in sorrow.—SIR HENRY TAYLOR, Notes from Life.

REFERENCES.—XI. 20.—C. Vince, The Unchanging Saviour, p. 76. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 138. XI. 20-30.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 2704. XI. 24.—H. Hensley Henson, Christ and the Nation, p. 147.

THE OBVIOUSNESS OF THE ESSENTIAL IN QUESTIONS OF FAITH

'At that time Jesus answered and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes.'—MATTHEW XI. 25.

I. WHILST the spiritual rulers of the nation rejected our Lord, the unlearned and childlike people understood and accepted Him. The notion must not be allowed to possess us that it is only through scholarship and subtlety that men reach the secret of revelation. In California in the old days deep-level gold-mining was the fashion; it seemed reasonable to suppose that the gold must lie deep, and be difficult to acquire; yet, in the end, deep-level mining proved an expensive failure. A more careful exploration nearer the surface was then tried, and in almost every instance bodies of ore were found that had been overlooked in the eagerness to penetrate to unknown depths—the searchers missed the gold by getting below it. It is easy to fall into a similar mistake in our treatment of Holy Scripture. The history of theology shows how the truth may be missed through yielding to the temptation of a pretentious profundity. The childlike vision and expression are truest. Theology is a science, yet for the profoundest science simplest words suffice. The obscure may justly be regarded as the mark of the non-essential. The obviousness of revelation must to the utmost be repeated in theology. The river of the water of life is as clear as crystal.

II. This obviousness of the saving truth is a fact to be remembered in evangelization. The gracious truths of Christ appeal to the man in the street, and he may at once discern them to the saving of the soul; the dustman may as readily apprehend them as the dull, the illiterate as the scholar, the outcast as the honourable. Salvation does not filter through the upper strata of rank, genius, and opulence, down to the lower strata of illiteracy and labour; rather, as in Nature, the living water finds its way from the depth to the eminence. The essential truth is on the surface, immediately available for the unsophisticated, whether rich or poor.

III. It is no doubt deeply interesting to get under the earth with the miner, to grope about the roots of things with the geologist; but when all is said, the surface of the earth is the main matter to the million. The mere surface expresses the sum total of all that lies beneath it, as the spirit of man expresses itself in the sparkle of the eye and the bloom of his skin.—W. L. WATKINSON, Themes for Hours of Meditation, p. 58.

REFERENCES.—XI. 25.—J. B. Mozley, Sermons Parochial and Occasional, p. 330. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII., p. 148. XI. 25, 26.—J. Leckie, Sermons Preached at Ibrox, p. 1. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 381. XI. 25-27.—G. Macdonald, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 102. XI. 25-30.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 25. J. J. S. Perowne, Expository Sermons on the New Testament, p. 23. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2781.

‘Even so, Father: for so it seemed good in Thy sight.’—MATTHEW XI. 26.

THIS is the text inscribed in the churchyard of Zermatt, on the tombstone of Mr. Hadow, who perished, at the age of nineteen, in the terrible Matterhorn accident of 1865. Signor Guido Rey, in his book The Matterhorn, says: ‘On the tomb of Hadow, the youthful victim, his parents, with admirable resignation, wrote this verse from the Gospel: ‘Ita, Pater, quoniam sic fuit placitum ante te’.

THE SECRET OF THE SON

‘No one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal Him.’—MATTHEW XI. 27.

I. The Loneliness of Christ.

Blade of grass stands close to blade of grass, but peak is sundered from peak by miles of intervening valley; and here was One who towered above all the rest, and was solitary accordingly.

‘No one knoweth the Son—’ Yes, One, but no finite mind: God knew Him, and only the Father could know the Son. From the coldness, and unresponsiveness, even the well-meaning dullness of workaday humanity, Jesus was always able to retreat into the solitude which for Him was filled with the beatific Presence of that One by whom He knew Himself understood.

Loneliness is the lot of greatness, but it comes to others besides the great. We all need to set our minds more than we do upon gaining this sense of the presence of God, to be communed with—a Presence which we do not summon, but which we may enter at will, if we have learned the way.

II. Who Knows the Father?—For now we approach the real centre, and what many may feel to be the real difficulty, of our saying. ‘Neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal Him.’

Now that consciousness which enabled Jesus to strike this note, to interpret Godhead as Fatherhood, not in a formal sense, but as the symbol of deepest love—that consciousness was something new, which Jesus brought into the world; it was unique, for only He who knew Himself as Son could know God as Father. And only as we become sons can we know that Fatherhood.

III. Next to Jesus Himself, only those know the Father to whom He reveals Him. How does He do so? In the first place, it is He who has in His own Person and character so shown forth the character of God as to assure us of His paternal love beyond all uncertainty; it is just Christ’s perfect Sonship that guarantees to us God’s perfect Fatherhood.

But there is more than this; we are to exert ourselves, we are to do something, to live a certain kind of life, to acquire a certain spirit ere we can know—really know—the Father. ‘Be sons,’ Jesus says, ‘and you shall know God as Father.’ Live the life, do the will, and you shall know of the doctrine; treat God as though He was indeed a parent, and the fact of His being even so will grow more and more clear to you.—J. WARSCHAUER, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 169.

REFERENCES.—XI. 27.—W. M. Sinclair, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1894, p. 88. R. F. Horton, ibid. vol. lix. 1901, p. 128. C. A. Briggs, The Incarnation of the Lord, p. 3. H. J. Martyn, For Christ and the Truth, p. 53. R. W. Dale, Fellowship With Christ, p. 171. A. L. Lewington, The Completeness and the Unity of the Catholic Faith, Sermons, 1818-1883. XI. 27, 28, 29, 30.—E. M. Goulburn, Three Counsels of the Divine Master, vol. i. p. 59.

NATURAL AND SUPERNATURAL RELIGION

‘All things are delivered unto Me of My Father: and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any Man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him. Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.’—MATTHEW XI. 27, 28.

A VERY important contrast is presented in these passages; it is a contrast between natural and supernatural religion. We may take the Bible as the textbook of our study and the standard of our morals, and yet our religion may never rise above the natural. We arrive at the supernatural when the truth which we have in the letter of the Holy Scriptures becomes a revelation of the Word. Natural religion is based upon a man’s effort to come to the knowledge of God; supernatural religion has its foundation in the fact that God has come down to man, and revealed Himself to the soul in the person of Jesus Christ. No river can rise higher than its source! The source of all natural religion is its mental effort and moral sagacity; but the source of all supernatural religion is God by His Spirit revealing Himself in the person of His Son to the souls of men. Revelation means God coming down; natural religion means men seeking to climb up.

There are two or three things which you may learn from the passage chosen.

I. God's Method of Bringing Man to Himself is by Revelation.—We do not at first take in the meaning of that word: we do not grasp its meaning. What is it to reveal? It means to unveil. Two thoughts are involved in the word 'unveil'. First there is the unveiling itself; then there is the object from which the veil is to be removed. We think of some beautiful work of sculpture which is finished and now a veil is over it. You are close to it, but do not see it! Now the day comes for the unveiling; the veil is taken away and you behold the beautiful object beneath. So it is in religion! God has sent His Son, and has fulfilled His word. God is there in all the fullness of His glory, the richness of His grace, the greatness of His love. There can be no addition to His character, but there is the veil. Men do not see that glory; they try to imagine God, they make efforts to follow after Him; that is natural religion. 'No man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him.' Now that is the truth that we have running all through the whole of God's Word. This saving knowledge of the Word of God comes by spiritual unveiling. God has given His Son, redemption is there, yet men do not see it! Does this not strike you as something very cold and repellent? Not if you read the next verse: 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest'.

II. Natural Religion cannot really meet Man's Need.—Do you remember that prayer in the Psalms—'Lead me to the rock that is higher than I'? That is the cry of the supernatural! Nothing on the same level, however intellectual it may be, can satisfy the needs of my soul, so you see that salvation does not come to us as a human attainment. What can I do, how can I find my way up to God? Can man by searching find his way to God? He has revealed Himself to the world, but the world does not see it. It is necessary for us to notice that all things have been delivered into the hands of Jesus Christ.

III. The Secret of Seeking and Finding God is not an Effort of the Intellect, but is a Submission of the Will, and the possession of faith. If you would know God you must believe, and you must come to Christ. Your submission must come through Him; it is the way to grace. He calls us—'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest'.

REST FOR THE WORKERS

'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.'—MATTHEW XI. 28.

In these words our Divine Master asserts His Divinity. No human being—of such a character as Jesus of Nazareth, 'the Truth'—would venture to offer to every age, and to the dwellers in every land, rest: rest to the weary body and to the troubled soul.

I. How then does the Lord Jesus Christ give rest to the workers? By the power of the Holy Spirit. Christ has gone up on high, and has sat down at His Father's right hand. His work in man's heart, and in the Church at large, is carried on through the instrumentality of the Holy Spirit. By the Holy Spirit Jesus Christ conveys rest to all who are called to labour.

Here let us be very careful not to narrow the words to what is technically called religious work. It applies, of course, to all who are working for Jesus Christ in a more direct manner. But the application is universal. 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour'—in parliament, in business, in the home, in the farm, in the counting-house, in the street, sweeping a crossing.

II. How does He give this rest?

1. By enlightening our understanding. All emotion that is not built upon knowledge must sooner or later perish. Religion based merely upon emotion is like a house founded on the sand. Therefore the Lord Jesus Christ, by means of that Blessed Spirit Who is emphatically given to be our Teacher, first enlightens our understanding.

He shows us, first of all, that our work is part of a Divine plan. He shows us that, whether the work in which we are engaged is what men call noble or commonplace, it is part of a great plan by which Almighty God is establishing on earth the kingdom of Jesus Christ. He teaches us that He, the Lord Jesus Christ Himself, very God and very Man, is guiding all this complex machinery; that we are under the direction of a living Head, all-wise, all-loving; with infinite and unfailing resources upon which He can draw. The sense of a crushing weight resting upon us, the sense of everything depending upon our own miserable effort, is removed when the eyes are opened and we see Jesus Christ.

2. He teaches us another great principle, which may be expressed by some such words as 'the law of limitation'. In other words, He shows us that Almighty God is pleased, for reasons known to Himself, to allow every human being in this world to be limited; limited by health and strength, limited by the want of full mental power, limited by the shortness of the period in which he has to work. The Lord Jesus shows us that as long as we live on earth we shall never fully carry out our ideal; we shall be hindered by the devil, hindered by other people, hindered by our own miserable imperfections.

And then, when we have laid hold of that law, the failure in our own special department ceases to perplex and distress and crush us. The mere knowledge that we are only suffering that which is the lot of all humanity, that the particular failure which depresses is only one of the thousand failures which God and the angels are seeing every day, even among the most earnest, gives a calm.

III. Once more. The Lord Jesus Christ, by the Holy Ghost, unveiling to us the meaning of the Bible, lifts us up to see that the victory is certain; that what we consider important may be found afterwards utterly unimportant; that we may have failed in certain departments; that there may have been times of utter crushing discomfiture; but that, in the long run, the victory is certain.—G. H. WILKINSON, The Invisible Glory, p. 23.

REST FOR THE SUFFERERS

'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.'—MATTHEW XI. 28.

ALL the troubles of body and heart and mind and spirit are included in these words: everything that depresses—the weather, poverty, failure, disappointment. There is not a phase in human life which is not liable to a secret trial; and those who have the power of self-restraint know well that the hardest trials are those which we would not allow any human being to share. Everything, great and small, everything which commands human sympathy, and everything which is so commonplace that we should be despised if we were to acknowledge how it affected our happiness—all is known to our God and Father.

I. And how is this promise fulfilled? Through the agency of God the Holy Ghost. Our Lord Jesus Christ, in those wonderful chapters which record His last conversation with His disciples, brings forward perpetually this thought; that it would be by the personal comforting, the personal tender leading and guiding of the Holy Ghost, that He would strengthen them amid all the troubles which were coming on them.

II. The New Testament gives us a distinct teaching on the subject in the book of the Revelation of St. John.

Our Lord Jesus Christ, in the glory of His Ascension life, takes a man like unto ourselves, our 'brother and companion in tribulation,' and places him on a lonely island. And then, before He begins to instruct him, He says, in His tender compassion for you and for me, 'Write these things'; let them be written in a book, that they may be handed on to each succeeding age of sufferers.

And how does our Lord give rest to the mind of St. John? He first teaches His Apostle that there is a secret necessity for suffering. He lifts up the veil, and explains to him, by a number of striking pictures, that there must be, for a certain time, war, famine, pestilence, death, perplexing events, triumph of evil; the devil apparently conquering; the world-power beguiling even God's own people; heresy, divisions, misery of every kind. He teaches him that all this does not come from God, but that it is, for a mysterious purpose which cannot be explained, permitted.

Now do you see the force of all this? We conquer nature by obeying her. We can guide and direct when we find out any of her laws. And so, when once it is understood that suffering is a condition of our humanity, every intelligent man will submit.

III. Our Lord teaches St. John this second principle: that suffering is limited by God.—

IV. In that same book He reveals the ultimate triumph of good. He teaches St. John that this suffering, though a necessity, is limited, not only in amount, but in length of endurance: in other words, that a day is coming—and may dawn to-morrow—when the thin veil shall be lifted up, and this dispensation of trial and disappointment shall be over, and the Christ shall appear.—G. H. WILKINSON, The Invisible Glory, p. 31.

REST FOR WEARY FEET

'I will give you rest.'—MATTHEW XI. 28.

THE world is always full of weary feet, and the days of the Nazarene were no exception. The souls that gathered about Him numbered a great many weary ones, tired self-nauseated, faint. He looked upon them, and saw their weariness, and was moved with infinite pity, and thus appealed to them: 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest'.

Let us look at one or two types of weary feet to which this Saviour will, with infinite gladness, bring the gift of rest.

I. There is no weariness like the weariness which gathers round about a selfish heart. I am inclined to believe that a great deal of the tiredness and weariness of the world, perhaps more than we commonly think, is only the sickly loathing and self-disgust arising from a morbid selfishness, however much we may strive to attribute it to something else.

Listen to the Master: 'Come unto Me ye weary, selfish ones, and I will give you rest'. And how will He do it? By taking us away from ourselves, by giving us leisure from ourselves, by making us unselfish. Jesus will give you rest by giving you His yoke, He will add to your burden, and so make your burden light. He will enlarge your thought to take in others, and so give you leisure from yourselves. He will take away your jadedness, and give you His own rest.

II. The anxious soul moves with weary feet, and would fain meet with one who had the gift of rest. The Master saw how many souls there were who were troubled and anxious about the unknown. And He knew the great secret which, if accepted, would set all their hearts at rest. What did He know? He knew God! If everybody knew God, nobody would be anxious. And so He seeks to turn weariness into rest by the unveiling of the Father. And in what strangely beautiful ways He made the Father known! He told them that to Providence there were no trifles, that God did not merely control great things, and allow smaller things to go by chance. 'The very hairs of your head are all numbered.' Nothing is overlooked; all is full of thought and purpose. To come to Jesus is to take His revelation of the Father, and to live in the inspiration of it, and such inspiration would turn fear into confidence, and confidence into peace. Come unto Me, all ye weary, anxious ones, and I will reveal to you your Father, and in the beauty of the revelation ye shall discover the gift of rest.—J. H. JOWETT, Apostolic Optimism, p. 87.

'Come unto Me.'—MATTHEW XI 28.

IN Cicero and Plato and other such authors I find many an acute saying, many a word that kindles the emotions; but in none do I find these words, 'Come unto Me, and I will give you rest.'—AUGUSTINE.

REFERENCES.—XI. 28.—B. F. Westcott, The Historic Faith, p. 219. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. iii. p. 100. R. H. McKim, The Gospel in the Christian Year, p. 309. B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 43. Henry Wace, Some Central Points of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 335. J. Jarvie, Discourses, p. 86. W. Henderson, The Dundee Pulpit, 1872, p. 217. Canon Reiner, Sermons, p. 22. F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 93. J. W. Sheppard, Light and Life, p. 267. T. Gasquoine, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 83. T. R. Stevenson, ibid. vol. xli. 1892, p. 156. J. Hirst Hollowell, ibid. vol. xlv. 1894, p. 252. C. Gore, ibid. vol. i. 1896, p. 129. H. D. M. Spence, Voices and Silences, p. 223. St. Vincent Beechey, The Excesses of Non-Communicants, p. 18. R. Flint, Sermons and Addresses, p. 155. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1691; vol. xxxix. No. 2298; vol. xlviii. No. 2781; vol. xlvii. No. 2708. F. B. Cowl, Straight Tracks (Addresses to Children), p. 112. J. M. Neale, Readings for the Aged (3rd Series), p. 31. Phillips Brooks, The Law of Growth, p. 133. XI. 28, 29.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 153; see also Creed and Conduct, p. 321. F. D. Maurice, The Prayer Book and the Lord's Prayer, p. 238. J. H. Jowett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 305. XI. 28-30.—H. Ross, ibid. vol. xi. 1891, p. 396. George Macdonald, ibid. vol. xlii. 1892, p. 102. B. S. Snell, ibid. vol. xlii. 1892, p. 102. A. B. Bruce, ibid. vol. i. 1896, p. 205. H. Price Hughes, ibid. vol. lxii. 1902, p. 198. E. Rees, ibid. vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 183. A. F. Winnington Ingram, ibid. vol. lxxix. 1906, p. 81. W. O. Burrows, The Mystery of the Cross, p. 139. S. Cox, The Book of Ruth, p. 149. T. T. Munger, Character Through Inspiration, p. 24. E. M. Goulburn, Three Counsels of the Divine Master, vol. i. p. 72. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 265; vol. xvii. No. 969; vol. xxii. No. 1322.

'Learn of Me; for I am meek.'—MATTHEW XI 29.

AFTER meeting Dr. Chalmers in the autumn of 1818, Erskine of Linlathen wrote to him: 'I hope I have benefited by my visit to you. Certainly I was much struck with some circumstances in your conduct, and I will tell you what these are. You have been much followed, by great and small, by learned and ignorant, and yet you listened, with the meek candour of a learner, to one whom you could not but consider as your inferior by far. If you had opened to me all mysteries and all knowledge, you could not have brought to my conscience the strong conviction of the necessity and the reality of Christianity with half the force that this deportment of yours impressed upon me.'

QUOTING verses 21-30 in his essay on The Incarnation and Principles of Evidence, Mr. R. H. Hutton observes that these, 'to me the most touching and satisfying words that have ever been uttered by human lips, no mere man could ever have uttered without jarring every chord in the human conscience'.

REFERENCES.—XI. 29.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1105. C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 257. J. M.

Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 171. F. E. Paget, Facilities and Difficulties for Belief and Unbelief, p. 113. B. J. Snell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 375. W. Boyd Carpenter, ibid. vol. lxxv. 1903, p. 289. C. Silvester Horne, ibid. vol. lxxvii. 1905, p. 246. A. W. Hutton, ibid. vol. lxxix. 1908, p. 332. Parker, Inner Life of Christ, vol. ii. p. 183. Perowne, Expository Sermons in New Testament ('Clerical Library'), p. 23. Westcott, Historic Faith, p. 229. F. Temple, Rugby Sermons (1st Series), p. 37. Beecher, Sermons (10th Series), p. 141. A. K. H. B., The Graver Thoughts of a Country Parson (3rd Series), p. 203. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (6th Series), p. 126. G. Campbell Morgan, The Missionary Manifesto, p. 143. G. Matheson, Expositor (1st Series), vol. xi. p. 101. A. B. Bruce, ibid. (1st Series), vol. vi. p. 142. Perowne, ibid. (1st Series), vol. vii. p. 348. H. Platten, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxi. No. 809 (4 May, 1887).

THE YOKE OF CHRIST

'Take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest for your souls. For My yoke is easy, and My burden is light.'—MATTHEW XI 29, 30.

How beautiful are these words of Christ! It is one thing, however, to know and to admire, and another thing to feel the power, to acknowledge the authority of them, and to feel their blessedness as a matter of personal experience.

I. The Yoke of Christ is the Discipline of Christ.

—You have seen a young horse being broken in for his work. The youth and spirit of the animal resists the process; but if they are ever to be any good they have got sooner or later to submit. If the animal proves obstinate and obdurate, and firmly refuses the yoke, why it is useless, and there is nothing left but the owner must get rid of it as best he may. That is a parable. Jesus Christ is our Master; He gives each one of us a yoke to bear and a burden to carry. But He is no cruel despot, He is a wise and kind and considerate Master; He knows full well what we, each one of us, can bear; His aim is to discipline not to tyrannize over us, to use not to crush. He has a yoke and a burden for each, but not the same for each; 'every man must bear his own burden,' that is, the burden which is apportioned to him of all the separate spirits of the universe; never an ounce too heavy is the yoke He puts on each one of us. If we look at it in the right way it will prove to be just exactly what we can rightly deal with; for His word is true, 'My yoke is easy, My burden light'.

II. The Yoke of Christ is the Cross of Christ.—

What is a cross? Two pieces of wood put one athwart the other. But what is the spiritual cross? Your pride and selfish will checked, disciplined, crossed by God's good and perfect will. That is what the cross is which Christ says His followers, each one of them, must bear. That is the yoke He puts upon our neck, the will of God to be done, to be suffered, whether it falls in with our inclination or not. Yes, there is the yoke, and its edges are sometimes sharp and rough as we bear it upon our shoulders. And yet for all that His yoke is easy, and His burden is light. How and why, the reason?

Because of love. The service may be hard, but the Master is good; the trial may be bitter, but the hand which sends it is kind; the task may be difficult, but He Who imposes it is faithful and wise. Love makes all the difference when you feel sure, as we may, that the Lord Who orders all truly cares for you and considers you and seeks alone your good, and that He makes no mistakes, and He spares every atom of pain which He can spare consistently with His good purpose for you; then you feel that you have got courage to bear and patience to endure. Faith and love make all the difference; where love shines on you the yoke that might have been grievous becomes easy; the burden which might have been crushing becomes light.

III. The Yoke of Christ Lifts up to God.—Listen to this parable: There was a time, so says the tale, when the birds had no wings, and they were the most miserable creatures on the face of the earth, they were so piteously helpless. One day, so says the tale, when they got up in the morning they observed that the ground around them was strewn with coarse brown objects such as they had never seen before. They looked at them with curiosity and apprehension, and as they were looking, lo! a shining one, an angel, came down from heaven and bade each one of them take up two of those brown objects and carry them on their backs. Then they broke out in loud lamentations. What! were they not wretched enough already! Already had they not trials more than any others, and must they now bear this new burden! The shining one insisted, however, and so there was nothing for it but they had to submit. So each bird took up two of those brown objects and began to carry them. And now a strange thing happened; after a day their new burdens seemed to grow into their backs and to become part of themselves, and they found that they could move and wave them about; and then some of them began to flutter in quite a new way, and even to rise a little from the ground; and as they fluttered and rose they began to sing. Up they rose, more and more, higher and higher, and as they rose, louder and louder did they sing; for their burdens, instead of being carried by them, were carrying them. Burdens, yes; but also wings; wings to lift them up to freedom and joy. Up they rose, higher and higher, and as they rose they sang. A yoke is a yoke, and a burden is a burden; but if it is the yoke of Christ and the burden of Christ, it can prove so easy and so light that it can, if borne and looked at aright, lift you to Him, lift you too up to your God.

REFERENCES.—XI. 29, 30.—J. W. Shepard, Light and Life, p. 279. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 186. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. v. p. 67.

THE YOKE OF CHRIST

'My yoke is easy, and My burden is light.'—MATTHEW XI. 30.

CHRIST has a yoke and a burden. The yoke is laid on the shoulder to harness the draught animal, the ox. It is the common and natural image of submission, and it is employed here. Christ demands absolute submission. He controls all life. Then the yoke is put on for the sake of fitting for work. It exists for the burden, the practical duties which prove and exercise obedience.

I. Christ's Yoke and Burden are Hard and Heavy.—The yoke and the burden of Christianity are very real, and very severe. Christ's precepts are ideal perfection. 'Be ye perfect.' And that is why men accept them. No system ever lasts long which condones imperfection, and pitches the standard low. Bad as men are, they still desire that their law should be good.

II. Still they are Light and Easy.—A yoke is something easy, soft, padded, fitting comfortably, so that it may even suggest the idea of being pleasant and good to wear—a joy and a delight to obey, and of being a mark of His love. Then while the yoke expresses the thought of the blessedness of submission, the burden light speaks of the ease of service. The yoke and burden are light (1) by reason of the motive that impels them: Love which makes submission a joy, and all distasteful deeds sweet. (2) By reason of the strength that is given: There are two ways to lighten a load, one diminishes the burden, one invigorates the back. (3) By reason of their harmony with all nature. People fancy they like to do as they like, but they really like and need an authority to which to submit. (4) By reason of the joy and peace that flow from obedience.

III. Christ bears our burdens before He bids us bear His. There are burdens heavier than any He lays which each man has to carry—Sin, Self, the World, are harder masters than He, and none but He can take away the burden of sin, of self-will, of isolated effort after goodness. His commandments are not grievous. It is not a Gospel of an easy life. It does not seek to draw by looking at the statuesque purity of the ideal, but by giving us grace to do. He bears us and our troubles. All things are possible to him that believeth. Love fulfilling the law.—A. MACLAREN.

REFERENCES.—XI. 30.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2832. XI. 41.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 26. XII. 1-14.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 163. XII. 3, 4.—Phillips Brooks, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 13. XII. 3-7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxv. No. 1503. XII. 6.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. i. p. 535; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 71. A. MacLeod, Days of Heaven Upon Earth, p. 140. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1275. XII. 9-13.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 148. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 257. XII. 9-14.—John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 189. XII. 10-13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxv. No. 1485. XII. 12.—Henry Van Dyke, Sermons to Young Men, p. 3. S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 246. C. F. Aked, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 182. W. G. Rutherford, The Key of Knowledge, p. 75. J. Martineau, Hours of Thought, vol. ii. p. 288. XII. 18-21.—S. Chadwick, Humanity and God, p. 91.

STARTLING ABSENCES

'He shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear His voice in the streets. A bruised reed shall He not break, and smoking flax shall He not quench.'—MATTHEW XII. 19, 20.

'Nor strive,' not 'cry,' not lift up His voice 'in the streets,' not break 'the bruised reed,' not quench 'the smoking flax'! These are some of the rarest and finest features of a character that is altogether lovely. They are negative characteristics. The character of the Christ is no less unique in its striking absences than in its majestic presences. Its valleys are as conspicuous as its mountains. The Holy Ghost works in the way of a certain exclusion. His handiwork is differentiated from all others by its incomparable restraints.

I. Mark the first of the suppressions in the life that is filled with the Holy Ghost. 'He shall not strive.' The spirit of wrangling shall be absent. For what is wrangling? Wrangling is the spirit which subordinates the triumph of truth to the triumph of self. When a man begins to wrangle, his sight has become self-centred; he has lost the vision of truth. You never find the wrangling spirit in the main highways of the truth. Wrangling always nourishes itself on side issues. But Christ would not strive. He would not be diverted from the main issues of life and destiny. He had not come to engage in strife, He had come that we might have life. That is how the Spirit of the Lord will work in us. It will make us feel most at home in the heavenly places. It will make us feel out of place in small disputes.

II. 'He shall not strive, nor cry.' The Messiah shall not cry. He had not come to startle, but to win; to conciliate, not to coerce. 'Come now and let us reason together' was the pervading tone of His ministry. And so He put restraint upon His power, but gave no limit to His grace. He was almost niggardly with miracles; He was prodigal with love. Such is the fruit of the Spirit! The man who is filled with the Spirit of God has no desire to make a sensation.

III. 'Neither shall any man hear His voice in the streets.' Christ abhorred a mere street-religion. He loved the religion that prayed and glowed in the closet, and that radiated its influence out into the street. He could not do with a piety that advertised itself to gain public applause. Christ revealed the Father! Not to honour Himself, for then He said, His honour would be nothing, but to honour His Father—that was the end and purpose of speech and of work. When the Holy Spirit possesses a man, religion is not an affair of the street corner; it is not a medium of self-advertisement; it is not a means for gaining public applause. Life, filled with the Spirit, 'vaunteth not itself,' it hides under 'the shadow of the Almighty,' and it makes its boast in God.

IV. 'A bruised reed shall He not break, and smoking flax shall He not quench.' Then there is to be an absence of harshness, an absence of severe pitilessness, an absence of that spirit of savage recoil from those who have deceived us. The Lord was ever pitiful with the faint-hearted, with those whose light was burning only dimly, and He ever sought, by a tender and reinforcing sympathy, to nurse them back again into a bright and passionate spiritual life.—J. H. JOWETT, Apostolic Optimism, p. 99.

'He shall not strive, nor cry.'—MATTHEW XII. 19.

Will not men look up at a rainbow, unless they are called to it by a clap of thunder?—LANDOR.

'Neither shall any man hear His voice in the streets.'—MATTHEW XII. 19.

MORE than half a century of existence has taught me that most of the wrong and folly which darken earth is due to those who cannot possess their souls in quiet; that most of the good which saves mankind from destruction comes of life that is led in thoughtful stillness.—GEORGE GISSING.

REFERENCE.—XII. 19-21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1147.

THE LOVING-KINDNESS OF JESUS

'A bruised reed shall He not break, and smoking flax shall He not quench, till He send forth judgment unto victory.'—MATTHEW XII. 20.

It is a frequent expedient of artists to paint pictures in pairs. A landscape will be depicted as it appears in the pearly light of early morn; and, corresponding to it, the same or a similar scene will be painted as it appears in the glowing colours of the evening. In the Gospels we frequently have pictures in pairs. The Pharisee and the Publican; the Rich Man and Lazarus; the Man seeking goodly Pearls and the Treasure hid in a field, these will serve to illustrate the statement. And we have an instructive pair of pictures brought before us in the following words quoted by Matthew from Isaiah's prophecy: 'The bruised reed shall He not break, and smoking flax shall He not quench'. The first picture is an exterior. The region represented is a flat and marshy one; the locality is lonely and desolate. Growing amid shallow but cold and swirling waters, we see tall reeds and rushes. The sky is grey and heavy, with clouds fleeting before the blast: the reeds bend under the storm: you can almost feel the nipping wind as you look at the picture. And the reeds are swayed hither and thither, being bruised and battered as they jostle one against the other. Look closely at those reeds, and you will scarcely find one that is not scarred and mangled. They are bruised reeds.

The other picture is an interior. 'The smoking flax shall He not quench.' The picture is that of an Eastern room. We dimly see the low divans or lounges around the walls, and if the light were brighter we might discern the features of the persons reclining there. There is a low table in the centre of the room, and upon it stands a lamp. In shape this lamp is something like a modern teapot; the receptacle being for the oil, and the wick protruding from what would be the spout. That wick should be burning brightly; instead of that, however, there is only a dull red glow, and there is more smoke than light. It is a 'smoking lamp'. From these two pictures we may learn something as to Christ and Christian character.

I. Let us look at the latter picture first—the smoking lamp. Now a lamp that does not give a good light is not fulfilling the function of its design and manufacture. What is the use of a knife that will scarcely cut? or of a pen that splutters when an attempt is made to write with it? Yet how many professing Christians there are who are not burning and shining lights, but smoking lamps! and what a trouble they are both in the Church and out of it! In a village church lighted with lamps, if one among them smokes, it attracts a great deal of attention and criticism; the others are scarcely noticed. Just so is it with Christians who are symbolized by a smoking lamp. Everybody observes them, and everybody criticises them. They bring dishonour upon themselves and upon their Church. Will any such who may happen to read these lines suffer a word of exhortation? Often when a lamp smokes, what is needed is simply more oil; and oil is the emblem of grace. The lamps of the foolish virgins were 'going out' because they had no oil—that is, no grace. They had neglected the means of grace, and so were found wanting.

We must not quench the smoking lamp. 'Comfort the feeble-minded,' cries Paul in another place: stretch out a helping hand to him; speak a word of encouragement. Forgive such an one even unto seventy times seven. As long as the ship floats, it must never be abandoned; as long as there is a vestige of life in the plant, it must not be uprooted. We dare not extinguish the smoking lamp.

II. But we turn now to the first picture, that of the 'bruised reed'. It is humbling enough that mankind should be compared to reeds. The fragrant cedar, the spreading oak, the towering poplar, these would seem to be more appropriate emblems of humanity—that is, in the estimation of some. But the Word says, 'bruised reeds'. And, indeed, symbols of humanity in the Scriptures are none of them flattering. 'I am a worm,' cries Job. 'Like the chaff,' is the word of the Psalmist. 'Like sheep,' declares the Prophet. 'That fox,' ironically says the Saviour, of one man at least. Yes, and the man who has learnt to accept this view of himself is far on the way to salvation, for 'he that humbleth himself shall be exalted'.

Yet, though God permits men to be bruised, He does not allow them to be broken. Much we may be called upon to endure, but never too much. There shall never be ground for complaint and murmuring; there shall always be room for thankfulness.

III. Lastly. Not only care and trouble, but sin also bruises men. Perhaps the idea here is of a man plucking up, or cutting down, the reeds, for commercial purposes. As such a toiler proceeds he comes to a reed which is so twisted and broken that he regards it as useless, and he flings it aside. Not so does the Saviour deal with mankind 'bruised and mangled by the fall'. He never flings sinners away; He receives them and saves them.—HERBERT WINDROSS, The Life Victorious, p. 197.

'A bruised reed shall He not break, and smoking flax shall He not quench.'—MATTHEW XII. 20.

It has often been remarked that Vinet praised weak things. If so, it was not from any failure in his own critical sense; it was from charity. 'Quench not the smoking flax'—to which I add, 'Never give unnecessary pain'. The cricket is not the nightingale; why tell him so. Throw yourself into the mind of the cricket—the process is newer and more ingenious; and it is what charity commands.—AMIEL.

REFERENCES.—XII. 20.—W. Ralph, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 132. F. Mudie, Bible Truths and Bible Characters, p. 139. C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 289. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. p. 6. XII. 20, 21.—A. G. Brown, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 268. XII. 22.—Parker, Homiletic Analysis on the New Testament, vol. iii. p. 127. Birkett Dover, The Ministry of Mercy, p. 102. Parker, The Inner Life of Christ, vol. ii. p. 205. T. S. Evans, Expositor (2nd Series), vol. iii. p. 7. F. B. Woodward, Sermons (1st Series), No. 16. Ashley, Homilies of St. Thomas Aquinas for Advent, etc., No. 6 of Lent. J. Keble, Sermons for the Christian Year, No. 22. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, No. 22; see also A. B. Bruce, 'On the Sympathy of Christ' in The Galilean Gospel, p. 128. XII. 22, 30.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 187. XII. 22-37.—John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 218. XII. 24.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 171. XII. 28.—G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 93. A. F. Winnington Ingram, Under the Dome, p. 93. XII. 30.—G. H. Morrison, The Wings of the Morning, p. 216. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 190. W. J. Knox-Little, Church Times, vol. xxx. 1892, p. 338. XII. 30-34.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 400. XII. 30-32.—R. W. Dale, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 168. C. Kingsley, Sermons on National Subjects, p. 395. C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 104. R. Scott, Oxford University Sermons, p. 64. W. Lee, University Sermons, p. 104.

THE SIN AGAINST THE HOLY GHOST

'Whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of Man, it shall be forgiven him: but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, nor in the world to come.'—MATTHEW XII. 32.

THE sensitiveness of this critical age is very wonderful. Considering the immense number of insignificant persons who are favoured with paragraphs and biographies in papers, one might imagine that the great majority would regard with composure what was written about them. This patience might at least be looked for from those whose main occupation it is to abuse their fellow-creatures. As a matter of fact, this equanimity is very rare, even among the greatest. Mr. Gladstone, in his curious chapter of autobiography, tells us that a silly electioneering placard once almost unmanned him. 'It freezes the blood in moments of retirement and reflection for a man to think that he can have presented a picture so hideous to the view of a fellow-creature.' More authors than would easily be believed have the criticisms of their books 'broken' to them. George Eliot and Dickens could not read theirs at all. There is something very ignoble about this. At all events, the person who cannot endure criticism should refrain from criticising.

I. In singular contrast with this is the majestic and calm temper of Christ, summed up in that marvellous saying, Whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of Man, it shall be forgiven him. Mark the tremendous assumption—that the critic is always wrong. Never a word is said against the Son of Man that can be justified. More, no one ever speaks against the Son of Man without sinning. But the sin does not place him beyond the reach of mercy. He will be—forgiven. The sentence might have ended differently. It might have been, Whosoever shall speak against the Son of Man shall be—answered? silenced? punished? No—forgiven. Did Christ ever assert His Divinity more absolutely and yet more benignantly?

II. Whosoever shall speak against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, nor in the world to come. There is one sin so heinous that it closes for all ages and in all worlds every door of mercy. The soul that sins it will never be revived by any Divine spring. It is no mysterious transgression to be struck upon at an unknown stage in the prodigal's path. It is no sudden, angry blasphemy. Whoever fears that he has committed it and prays for pardon is worlds away from it. It is the sin of those who know Christ in His essence, who realize His Spirit for what He is, and who deliberately call Him unclean. The historical Christ may be misjudged. Our teachers may misrepresent Him. We may speak a word against Him without the purpose deliberately to sever our life from His. But when His Spirit—the Spirit of compassion and purity—is known and hated, then the endless alienation has begun.

III. Compassion is the first word which describes the Spirit of Christ. It is a deep word—deeper almost than love, as the mother knows who has seen her child in the delirium of fever. Christ came to bring in the reign of righteousness, but before and after justice is pity. The march of justice is slow: to be tracked by altars of sacrifice. Slowly we come to purer laws, but meanwhile deepest in man's lot is suffering that cannot wait. To this Christ stretched forth His hand. Marking as He did with pity those who knew their evil case, and with a deeper pity those who did not, He went about healing all manner of sickness and disease among the people. He set in motion the while those mighty forces that are gradually transforming the world. But compassion had to do its work first, and when justice is done in the ideal commonwealth, compassion will take up the work again. But He saw the universal misery as the result of sin. The fangs of the Serpent had done this. He set Himself, therefore, not to reform, but to save. He believed that men could be saved. His inseparable following from the very dregs of society proclaimed that the kingdom of heaven was for publicans and harlots. He lowered not a jot the standard of purity while He declared that those who came to Him would in no wise be cast out. When at last He lifted His eyes to God from His long brooding over earthly woe, His thought was of peace and joy. This is the Spirit of Christ—the Spirit of compassion, of purity, and hope. To see this and to speak against it is the blasphemy that eternally severs the creature from the Creator.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, Ten Minute Sermons, p. 95.

THE UNPARDONABLE SIN

'Whosoever shall speak against the Holy Spirit, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this age, nor in that which is to come.'—MATTHEW XII. 32 (R.V.).

I. To take these words as an authoritative declaration of the unending duration of evil, and the ceaseless retributive punishment of the evildoer, is to interpose an immeasurable barrier between God and the humanity for the existence of which He is solely responsible; and hopelessly to confuse the standard of moral rectitude, by implying the inability of God to act upon the command He has enforced on men to forgive one another, even until seventy times seven.

It is instructive in this context to note the quotations in Bingham's Antiquities from the early Fathers of the Christian Church in connexion with what is called the 'unpardonable sin'. 'The notion,' he says, 'that the ancients had of the sin against the Holy Ghost was not that it was absolutely unpardonable, but that men were to be punished for it both in this world and the next, unless they repented of it.'

II. Consider, then, what is the cogency and extent of this dread declaration which remains in the page of Holy Scripture as a warning to the hardened and impenitent. The eternal truth is that wilful, continuous opposition to an elemental principle is unforgivable, in the sense of the removal of the inevitable consequences of the opposition, either in this world or in the spiritual world. If man, in the exercise of what he calls his freedom, blasphemes an elemental law of the natural world, he commits the unpardonable sin against nature.

Now, in the passage of Scripture before us, this declaration is made with regard to the ultimate factors of being both in the natural world and in the spiritual world. But, it may be asked, can rebellion against elemental law in the natural world be designated rebellion against the Holy Spirit? The answer to the question is found in a reverent consideration of the nature, place, power, and revealed functions of that particular operation of the Eternal which is named in the Nicene Creed, 'the Holy Ghost, the Lord, the Life-giver'. For the Holy Spirit is the universal life, the 'I am' in whatever is, the essential vitality creating all, pervading all, sustaining all.

III. When we, with the awakened God-germ striving within us, with the guarantee of our baptism that we are in very deed the Lord's, persistently, consciously resist, ignore, blaspheme that 'gentle voice, soft as the breath of even'—when we deliberately become empty of the Spirit that we may be full of self, the question of 'forgiveness' does not enter into it, for forgiveness does not remake character.

Man's safety, man's happiness, man's illumination, the formation of man's character—all depend on his being filled with the Spirit, for 'the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, self-control'.—BASIL WILBERFORCE, Sermons Preached in Westminster Abbey, p. 84.

REFERENCES.—XII. 33.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 181. Lyman Abbott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 120. XII. 34.—C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 85. W. G. Rutherford, The Key of Knowledge, p. 160. John Ker, Sermons, p. 121.

CHARACTER THE SPRING OF LIFE

'A good man out of the good treasure of the heart bringeth forth good things; and an evil man out of the evil treasure bringeth forth evil things.'—MATTHEW XII. 35.

THIS is the compact statement of a truth upon which Jesus laid the last emphasis—that everything depends on character. The word has two meanings. And according to its original sense character is the mark made upon a stone by engraving. It is therefore the stamp of the soul and the expression of a man's being. Character has also come to acquire a secondary meaning. It is not now what the man is, and will continue to be, but what he says he is or appears to be. It is the outer show of the man: it is his reputation.

I. One profound difference between our Master and the Pharisees turned upon the reading of this word. With the Pharisees, character was reputation, and their whole strength was given to performing a religious play. With Jesus character was nature, and He was ever insisting that a man must be judged not by appearance but by the heart; not by what he says, or even by what he does, but by what he is.

II. Common speech betrays our implicit conviction, and every day we ourselves acknowledge the supremacy of character. One man may use the most persuasive words, but no one gives heed because they are not the outcome of a true soul; another may speak with rough simplicity, and his neighbours respond because every word bears the stamp of a brave heart.

III. If character be the spring of life then two things follow.

1. That every man's work is the expression of himself. Just as the Almighty is ever creating under a Divine necessity, because He must express Himself, and just as His character can be discovered by those who have eyes to see in the parable of creation, so every man works under the same compulsion, and reveals himself by the fruit of his hands. According as a man is true, so is his work; in proportion as he is false, so is his work. One of the secrets of great art is sincerity, but if the soul be crooked the work will be a makeshift.

2. Conduct as much as work springs from the heart, and by the heart must be judged. Both God and man try conduct by subtler tests than the outward appearance, and two actions of the same kind may have a different moral complexion. Is calculating prudence on the same level as devout consecration, and do they prove an equal quality in the soul? We ourselves pass behind acts to motives; we also trace the life up to its birthplace. Men are loved who have been able to give but little because they gave it brotherly, fragrant with love; men are hated who have given largely because they gave ostentatiously and inhumanly with cold and careless hand.—J. WATSON (IAN MACLAREN), The Inspiration of Our Faith, p. 157.

REFERENCES.—XII. 36.—F. E. Paget, Sermons on Duties of Daily Life, p. 123; see also F. E. Paget, Studies in the Christian Character, p. 79. XII. 36, 37.—G. Buchanan Gray, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 140. Stopford A. Brooke, Short Sermons, p. 278.

THE GIFT OF SPEECH

'By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned.'—MATTHEW XII. 37.

WE should do well, perhaps, to see what is our responsibility as possessors of the gift of speech, to examine that common endowment which is the distinction and glory of the human race, the gift of language, and what is the responsibility which belongs to us for the right use of our words. We all of us know that we must answer to God for this great gift wherein, as the outward expression of His reason, man stands forth as the acknowledged head of creation.

I. Words of Beauty.—It is to God that we have to answer for our speech, and every misuse of this gift is an offence against Him. A man ought to see to it that he does nothing with his tongue which will break the harmony of this world's prayers or insult the God of beauty, to Whom the homage of creation is unceasingly offered.

II. Words of Truth.—Our words are uttered not only in the presence of the God of beauty, they are uttered in the hearing of the God of truth. We ought to think most earnestly about this division of the subject, because there must be a deep-seated tendency in human nature to abuse this gift of language, to use it in the service of untruthfulness. We are startled from time to time by revelations of gigantic frauds, and wholesale impostures built up by lies. Coming nearer home, are we not obliged to make a wide distinction between things which we hear and things which we see? In our hatred of hypocrisy we have gone to the other extreme. Why are good people so shy in their religious professions? God ought to come first and not the consciousness of men. The man who makes no secret of his principles is the man who in the end suffers the least persecution, and is not tempted really so much to deny his Lord. It is a bad thing to be a hypocrite, but it is also a very bad thing to be a self-conscious coward.

III. Words of Comfort.—Our words are uttered in the face of Him Who is called the God of all comfort, Whose mission it is to strengthen and cheer, as well as in the face of Him Who is the God of beauty and the God of truth. How much can be done by words to help and cheer and advise. How much can be done to pull down, damage, and destroy. When we think of what language has done to enrich the race we may well shrink from the unutterable degradation and base ideas, couched in unworthy and squalid language, while in all our conversation there must always be set before us the importance of truth and honour and respect and love for others. If these be absent, then too soon there sets in that moral warp of character which causes it to lose its hold on the true, the beautiful, and the good. For men despise one who is not true; they mistrust the smart controversialist, and the envenomed critic; they drive him at last from their company, and dethrone him from the pinnacle of their respect. What is this but a reflection of that righteous wrath which, in the end, will cast away for ever from the golden city and the home of truth whatsoever defileth and whatsoever loveth and maketh a lie.

JUSTIFICATION BY WORDS

'By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned.'—MATTHEW XII. 37.

MANY a battle royal has been fought over the doctrines of justification by faith and justification by works, but perhaps we have heard less than we ought about justification by words. It is not an Apostle, but the Master Himself, who urges the too much neglected truth that men are justified by their words.

This great utterance of Jesus was called forth by the malevolent criticism of the Pharisees. He had just performed a great healing miracle which had astonished the assembled crowds, and convinced them that He was the Messiah. The spiteful Pharisees have another explanation. He casts out demons, they said, by the prince of the demons. They do not and dare not deny the fact, but they explain it by asserting that He is in league with the powers of evil. And nothing could have troubled Jesus more than this, that men should look upon His beautiful and gracious deed, and deliberately pronounce it the work of the Devil. Men who could do that were not only lost to all sense of honour, but were devoid of moral sensibilities. Their world was turned upside down. They were the sworn foes of beneficence. They called good evil and evil good. No words, therefore, were too severe to characterize their moral brutality, and our consciences instinctively acknowledge the justice of this great utterance of Jesus, 'By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned'.

I. It is a great thing, this human speech of ours—a terrible thing! Some, who know the awful powers and dangers that lie hidden in the heart of a word, have thought it the highest wisdom to keep the lips sealed. 'Speech is silver, silence is golden.' There are few nations without a proverb which expresses the superiority of silence to speech. Like most words which tersely embody the wisdom of humanity upon its average levels, this proverb is only partly true; it partly needs to be supplemented by a more courageous word. There are indeed times when silence is the highest wisdom; there are other times when silence is a crime! It is a crime to say, in a moment of passion, the thing that wounds; but it is no less a crime to leave unsaid the thing that might have helped or soothed or cheered. The wise man is not always the silent man; he is the man who uses words for God.

II. There is much that is pathetic in the history of human speech. Case-endings, which were originally full of significance, lose their freshness and force, and often vanish altogether, their place being taken, perhaps, by some prepositional phrase, whose clumsiness would have astonished the ancient men. And what has happened to the inflections has too often happened to the words themselves. They have steadily but surely been emptied of their great original content. An 'awful place' used to mean a place which could touch the spirit to awe—such a place as the rugged hill-side where the lonely Jacob saw the angels of God ascending and descending. It would mean something very different to-day. Great words have so often passed through careless and insincere lips that they no longer mean what they once meant. 'Awfully, has, in much colloquial speech, usurped the place of 'very'. We use superlatives where sincerer men would use positives; for this is, in part, a question of individual and social sincerity. As strong and noble words gradually lost their meaning, they had to be reinforced by other words, and these again by other words, till the old simplicity and strength became little more than a philological tradition. To say that a thing is good, or that we like it well, ought to be one of the highest expressions of appreciation; but that is hardly the market value of those great words to-day. The careless application of these and many similar words has deprived them of their primal strength and flavour; and part of the Christian problem to-day is just to learn to use the strong common words of our English speech with that noble sincerity which can dispense with superlatives and exaggerations.

III. In the last resort, this is a question of character. A man necessarily speaks as he is. It is himself that he utters. His words are his spirit rendered audible. They show what manner of man he is; they justify or condemn him. A good man will therefore be careful of all his words, but he must especially beware how he uses the great words of the Christian faith. He must be jealously on his guard lest his use of them deplete them of their Divine content. There are some words whose original nobility is gone, perhaps beyond all hope of recovery; but there are others which every man should count it a privilege to keep bright and clean. We shall not lightly, for example, call every one a Christian whose name is written upon the books of the visible Church.

We shall reserve that word for those who love Christ, not in word only, but in deed and truth. The right and conscientious use of words will strengthen the sincerity of our own soul, and will constitute our tiny contribution to the maintenance of at least one lofty ideal among the men and women about us. We shall, even in the common converse of our life, strive to realize both the dignity and the responsibility of human speech; and we shall use it cheerfully indeed, but humbly and carefully, as men who will one day have to give an account.

REFERENCES.—XII. 37.—H. Harris, Short Sermons, p. 174. M. G. Glazebrook, Prospice, p. 141.

ON POWER

'Master, we would see a sign from Thee.'—MATTHEW XII. 38.

I. PEOPLE are always asking why miracles no longer happen and inferring from their cessation that they never did happen. It seems to me that the answer to this question is writ large in the history of mankind, and the answer is this—man can very rarely be safely entrusted with any exceptional power. The experience of the world proves this. It is really the moral of the Old Testament Scriptures. Such phrases as 'God's spirit striving with man,' simply means, God, seeing how far man can be entrusted with what, for want of a better word, I must still call supernatural truth, or supernatural powers.

Man at his best has been tested and failed. Moses and the Prophets had been tried with the trust of exceptional power, and had used it badly, as pride and passion prompted. To all in turn had been committed extraordinary gifts, and all in turn had employed them badly. What was left? St. Paul shall answer us: 'When the fullness of time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law'.

II. Christ was sent, and, at the outset of His career, was tempted as Moses and Elias had been tempted. In the wilderness, on the mountain, and on the pinnacle, He was given three deliberate choices. He was solicited, first, to make bread out of stones—that is, to employ His supernatural power to satisfy His own hunger—a personal want. Secondly, to fling Himself from a pinnacle of the Temple—to show at the outset of His mission, in the face of all the people, a sign that should compel their recognition of His Divine power; thirdly, to worship—to acknowledge—the power of evil, for gain.

On each of these occasions of making a deliberate choice Christ made the right choice, and the choice I am afraid man would not have made.

Christ had supernatural power, but He never used it to gratify curiosity. He never used it without a practical purpose. He did miracles, but they were in nearly every case miracles of mercy and kindness.

III. Thus we may say Christ knew how to use power, and from His time to the present day we have no excuse for not using power for good. In a word, one of the chief lessons of Christ's life was to teach men how to use their powers; and that the powers we have are sufficient for our need. He taught men that the power shown in not using power is often the most sublime exercise of power. If whole centuries elapse in which 'miracles do not happen,' and people begin to deny that they ever did happen, this is due only to the fact that men are not found who can fulfil the necessary conditions; and also, I think, if one may say so reverently, that God prefers a more excellent way—that men should learn, not by signs and wonders, but by humble faithful use of the natural reasoning powers He has given them.—C. H. BUTCHER, The Sound of a Voice that is Still, p. 122.

REFERENCES.—XII. 38.—Hugh Black, Christ's Service of Love, p. 181. C. J. Vaughan, Last Words in the Parish Church of Doncaster, p. 181. J. Fraser, University Sermons, p. 67. P. Ausley Ellis, Old Beliefs and Modern Believers, p. 154. XII. 38-45.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2779. XII. 39, 40.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, p. 273. XII. 41.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 192. W. M. Punshon, Privilege and Responsibility, A Sermon, p. 731. XII. 42.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, God's Heroes, p. 128. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 196. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ix. No. 533; vol. xlviii. No. 2777. XII. 43-45.—F. E. Paget, The Spirit of Discipline, p. 131. J. H. Jellott, The Elder Son, p. 268. J. W. Mills, After-Glow, p. 157. C. A. Scott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 13. C. A. Berry, Vision and Duty, p. 171.

PARTIAL REFORMATION

'He findeth it empty, swept, and garnished.'—MATTHEW XII. 44.

I. The Partial Reformation.—The three predicates are all significant. Empty, the old tenant has gone out, but no new one come in. Swept, some of the dirt is cleared away. Garnished, some attempts at decoration made. So it is a perfect picture of superficial reformation of morals without religion. Swept, representing suppression of vice. Garnished, representing some alteration for the good. But the failure of the whole thing because it is empty. There is no lofty enthusiasm, no high principle, no seed of a Divine life. Most accurately of all, there is no indwelling Christ.

II. The End of it In Complete Submission.—All reformation which leaves the heart empty is precarious. There is danger from strength of habit, power of circumstances, weakness of our will. It is like an empty bottle, let down into the sea, the sides smashed in. Christ must fill it if we would have it whole, otherwise there is no reason why the demon should not enter again. Whitewash and beautifying will not keep him out.

Partial reformation which fails makes a man very much worse. 'Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself.' Sometimes worse vices come instead of the original, i.e. a man gives up one vice and takes to others, as a gardener changes the things he grows.

III. The Only Thorough and Secure Way is to Cast Out the Evil Spirit.—A stronger than he cometh, i.e. goes out because Christ comes in, fills the heart and is garrison and guard to keep it. There is the presence within of a new nature, the expulsive power of a new affection. As regards our lower nature, there is no better way of curing a lower desire than to kindle, if it were possible, a higher, which will expel the lower taste. So we are not to go fighting in our own strength, but to open our hearts for Christ's entrance. He will come and fill our souls.—A. MACLAREN.

REFERENCES.—XII. 45.—J. B. Mozley, Sermons Parochial and Occasional, p. 118. XII. 46-50.—C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 123. H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (1st Series), p. 284. XII. 48.—H. W. Morrow, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 69. XII. 48-50.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. i. p. 109. XII. 49, 50.—W. H. Murray, The Fruits of the Spirit, p. 474. J. P. Chown, The Penny Pulpit, vol. xiv. No. 846, p. 445. XII. 50.—R. C. Fillingham, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 339. XIII. 1-9.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 201. XIII. 1-23.—J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 49.

THE PARABLE OF THE SOWER

'Behold, a sower went forth to sow.'—MATTHEW XIII. 3.

IN regard to the figure here. None—not leaven with its assimilating power, nor light with its illuminating rays, nor bread with its nutritious elements, nor water as it springs sparkling from a mossy fountain to parched and thirsty lips—none sets forth the Word of God better than this of seed. For example:—

I. There is Life in Seed.—Dry and dead as it seems, let a seed be planted with a stone—flashing diamond, or burning ruby; and while that in the richest soil remains a stone, this awakes and, bursting its husky shell, rises from the ground to adorn the earth with beauty, perfume the air with fragrance, or enrich men with its fruit. Such life there is in all, but especially in Gospel truth.

II. There is Force in Seed.—Buried in the ground a seed does not remain inert—lie there in a living tomb. It forces its way upward, and with a power quite remarkable in a soft, green, feeble blade, pushes aside the dull clods that cover it. Wafted by winds or dropped by passing bird into the fissure of a crag, from weak beginnings, the acorn grows into an oak—growing till by the forth-putting of a silent but continuous force, it heaves the stony table from its bed, rending the rock in pieces. But what so worthy to be called the power as well as the wisdom of God as that Word which, lodged in the mind, and accompanied by the Divine blessing, fed by showers from heaven, rends hearts, harder than the rocks, in pieces?

III. There is a Power of Propagation in Seed.—Thus a single grain of corn would, were the produce of each season sown again, so spread from field to field, from country to country, from continent to continent, as in the course of a few years to cover the whole surface of the earth with one wide harvest—employing all the sickles, filling all the barns, and feeding all the mouths in the world. Such an event, indeed, could not happen in nature, because each latitude has its own productions, and there is no plant formed to grow alike under the sun of Africa and amid the snows of Greenland. It is the glory of the Gospel, and one of the evidences of its Divine origin that it can: and, unless prophecy fail, that it shall. There is not a shore which shall not be sown with this seed; not a land but shall yield harvests of glory to God and of souls for heaven.—THOMAS GUTHRIE, Parables of Our Lord, p. 222.

IS CHRISTIANITY A FAILURE?

'Behold, a sower went forth to sow.'—MATTHEW XIII. 3.

I. ONE day there came to Christ those who asked the question: 'Are there many that be saved?' What a field here for an interesting discussion! But He sent them back with the warning: 'Strive ye to enter in at the strait gate'. And so sometimes, when in a broad and interesting fashion we would treat great questions in a somewhat detached and impartial manner, He often sends men back to the more commonplace task of examining their own hearts and their own lives. We can quite imagine that when such a question as 'Is Christianity a failure?' is put up for discussion, He would rather that each one of us put the question to himself in a somewhat more personal fashion, namely, 'Am I a failure?'

II. It is that question which the parable of the sower partly answers. Our Lord, indeed, in this parable admits that Christianity is a failure again and again; failure on the hard ground, failure on the shallow ground, failure on the unclean ground, failure, as it would seem, everywhere. But He bids men remember that the cause of the failure lies not in the seed, but in the soil; not in the Word, but in the hearts of men.

III. We see as we read this parable that it is assumed from the very beginning that there is in man, at least in certain limits, a power of free will; that there is in every heart some capacity for reception, and the great central lesson and meaning of the parable is simply this, that it is in the co-operation of the seed and the soil, of the grace of God and the will of man, that there lie all the possibilities of that harvest which in the individual is character and in society the kingdom of God.

The whole programme of life may really be summed up in a single sentence:—

Our wills are ours, we know not how,
Our wills are ours to make them Thine.

H. R. GAMBLE, Church Family Newspaper, vol. xv. p. 218.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 3.—R. H. McKim, The Gospel in the Christian Year, p. 147. H. Scott Holland, God's City, p. 121; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 141. Henry Alford, Sermons on Christian Doctrine, p. 120. E. W. Attwood, Sermons for Clergy and Laity, p. 76. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2842. XIII. 3-5.—R. Winterbotham, Sermons and Expositions, pp. 108-51. XIII. 3-9.—The Dundee Pulpit, 1872, p. 17. G. Salmon, Non-Miraculous Christianity, p. 195. XIII. 3-8, 18-23.—Cosmo Gordon Lang, Thoughts on Some of The Parables of Jesus, p. 13. XIII. 3-9, 18-23.—B. W. Maturin, Practical Studies on the Parables of Our Lord, p. 1.

SOCIAL REFORM

'Some fell by the wayside.'—MATTHEW XIII. 4.

THERE is a kind of soil which is content to remain hard and barren. The verse gives a picture of many men and women who have no spiritual receptiveness. They do not understand the language of the Psalmist: 'Like as the hart desireth the water brooks, so longeth my soul after Thee, O God'. This kind of nature is to be found in many different places, and among many kinds of men.

I. Hard circumstances often make men unresponsive to any spiritual ideal to the higher nature. We know very well with some circumstances need not be, and sometimes are not, in themselves a fatal drawback. Some men can resist all the evil influences of environment. There were saints in Cæsar's household, and we have seen that in the dullest and dreariest slums some wear the white flower of a blameless life. But of men in the mass it is true that the outward conditions of life must tell upon the spiritual state. Here social reform has its part to play. The only hope for the hard soil is that it should be broken up, and this is what wise social reform can do. It cannot make men Christians or give them spiritual life, but it can prepare the soil for the seed. 'Take away the stone,' said our Lord to His disciples, ere He summoned Lazarus to come forth. The one act can be done by the disciples, the other only by the Lord Himself.

II. There are those who are influenced strangely by heredity to an indifference to spiritual things. These are not the victims of untoward circumstances. Often they lead the pleasantest lives, and live in the pleasantest places, but religion comes to them without appeal. They do not understand it, and they do not want it. What are we to do for them? We can only wait for the discipline of life and the training of love to break up the hardened soil. Love and sorrow are the chief openers of the heart which enable the Divine Grace to enter in.

III. We must not forget that men often harden themselves. They neglect opportunities and refuse light. And so we find the obdurate conscience which once was soft; the hard heart which once was tender. All this is the story of neglected grace and of rejected light. The old judgment is uttered: 'Take the talent from him'. As we think of this possibility coming so near us all, the hardening that arises from neglected opportunities, there are two passages which occur to our minds: 'Take heed how ye hear,' and 'To-day, if ye will hear His Voice, harden not your hearts'.—H. R. GAMBLE, Church Family Newspaper, vol. xv. p. 218, 13 March, 1908.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 4, 5, 6, 18.—J. Sidmouth Cooper, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 152. XIII. 5, 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2844. XIII. 6.—F. E. Paget, The Spirit of Discipline, p. 142. XIII. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2040.

GOOD SOIL

'Other fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit, some an hundredfold, some sixtyfold, some thirtyfold. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.'—MATTHEW XIII. 8, 9.

OUR Lord describes for us here the characteristics of good soil. He tells us what sort of man he is who profits by the Sunday sermon, and he tells us first of all that the right hearer has an honest and good heart.

I. An honest and good heart means that kind of heart in which there is some affinity to the message received, a correspondence which we sometimes take for granted. It may well be that the soil of our heart has ceased to become honest and good because we have not kept it informed or receptive or interested in the highest things which form the object matter of our intelligence. It is a matter of supreme indifference to many men whether the Creed be maintained in its integrity or not. The Atonement is a doctrine in which they have no practical interest, and never even attempt to understand. The Incarnation is a truth which they cannot imagine to be worth all the disputations which surge round it. Heaven and the joys of Paradise may be all very well for those who like them, but for themselves they would much rather stay where they are. It is no satisfaction to them to be told about Christian holiness; the ways of society and the ordinary code are quite sufficient. The ways and doings of Scriptural characters awake in them no responsive interest whatsoever. If religion is a department of human learning which we can take up as an extra subject or let alone, well and good; but if religion is a question which concerns our well-being here and our eternal salvation hereafter, it is nothing short of a disaster to have reached a state where religion and religious things fail to awake even a languid interest. It is not a good sign if sermon subjects fail to interest us. Ask God to give you an interest in these topics, which are the most serious that can occupy a man's heart.

II. But the man with an honest and good heart is more than receptive; he is retentive. Having heard the Word he keeps it. This is the trouble: how to keep what is heard in face of the birds, and the pressure of the rock, under the adverse growth of thorns which spoil the results. It is impossible for the message to stick if we have no place for it in our hearts, if we are not in a condition to be either instructed or advised. If we only set ourselves to practise what we have heard, if only we would act on the advice we receive, or carry out some of the things we know, what different men and women we should be!

III. 'Fruit with patience.' It is the unchanging Gospel which needs patience. So also does the hearer, too, need patience in the presence of forgotten truth, now perhaps for the first time revealed to him. It is a good thing for us to hear from time to time all the counsel of God set before us, and to learn patiently to investigate the claims made upon our faith and understanding.

Take heed how ye hear. The responsibility of the preacher is, as it must always be, immense, but there is a responsibility which rests with the hearer to offer that honest and good heart, to retain and develop with patience the seed which is to bear fruit unto everlasting life.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 8, 9.—Canon Newbolt, Church Times, vol. i. 1903, p. 285. XIII. 9.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 211. XIII. 10.—J. A. Bain, Questions Answered by Christ, p. 22. XIII. 10, 11.—S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 217. XIII. 10-13.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 161. XIII. 10-17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2304. XIII. 11, 12.—T. Chalmers, Sermons Preached in the Tron Church, Glasgow, p. 84. XIII. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxv. No. 1488. J. Service, Sermons, p. 159. P. Young, Plain Preaching to Poor People (7th Series), p. 107. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 220. XIII. 13.—Ibid. p. 230. XIII. 14.—J. H. Thom, A Spiritual Faith, p. 35.

'Seeing they see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand.'—MATTHEW XIII. 13.

In our own generation, and our own land, are many pariahs, sitting amongst us all, nay, oftentimes sitting (yet not recognized for what they are) at good men's tables. How general is that senuous dullness, that deafness of the heart, which the Scriptures attribute to human beings! 'Having ears, they hear not; and seeing they do not understand.' In the very act of facing or touching a dreadful object, they will deny its existence. Men say to me daily, when I ask them, in passing, 'Anything in this morning's paper?' 'Oh no, nothing at all.' And, as I never had any other answer, I am bound to suppose that . . . every day was a blank day, yielding absolutely nothing—what children call a deaf nut, offering no kernel; and yet the total product has caused angels to weep and tremble.—DE QUINCEY.

THE service of philosophy and of religion and culture as well, to the human spirit, is to startle it into a sharp and eager observation.—PATER.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 14, 15.—R. W. Church, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 62. XIII. 15-23.—B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 157. XIII. 18-23.—J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 65.

'The care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word.'—MATTHEW XIII. 22.

'AFTER this,' George Fox writes in his Journal for 1650, 'I was moved to go into Derbyshire, where the mighty power of God was among Friends. And I went to Chesterfield, where one Britland was priest. He saw beyond the common sort of priest, for he had been partly convinced, and had spoken much on behalf of Truth, before he was priest there; but when the priest of that town died, he got the parsonage, and choked himself with it.'

REFERENCES.—XIII. 22.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2040. XIII. 24, 25.—W. Lee, University Sermons, p. 34. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. i. p. 120. XIII. 24-30.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 234. G. Monks, Pastor in Ecclesia, p. 252. W. Arnot, The Parables of Our Lord, p. 75. R. C. Trench, Notes on the Parables, p. 86. R. Winterbotham, Sermons and Expositions, p. 122. H. Calderwood, The Parables of Our Lord, p. 199. Homiletic Quarterly, vol. i. p. 470. A. F. Barfield, Christian World Pulpit, vol. v. p. 135. M. Lucas, ibid. vol. xv. p. 355. Clergyman's Magazine, vol. ii. p. 80. J. Sherman, Thursday Penny Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 163. A. B. Bruce, Parabolic Teaching of Christ, p. 38. Parker, Inner Life of Christ, vol. ii. p. 235. S. A. Tipple, Sunday Mornings at Norwood, p. 339. W. H. Brookfield, Sermons, p. 239. Preacher's Monthly, vol. vi. p. 189. R. D. B. Rawnsley, Village Sermons (3rd Series), p. 43. XIII. 24-30, 36-43.—B. W. Maturin, Practical Studies on the Parables of Our Lord, p. 23. R. Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven, p. 33.

'While men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat.'—MATTHEW XIII. 25.

'THE reformers speedily found,' observes Ruskin, 'that the enemy was never far behind the sower of good seed: that an evil spirit might enter the ranks of reformation as well as those of resistance; and that though the deadly blight might be checked amidst the wheat, there was no hope of ever ridding the wheat itself from the tares.'

DESCRIBING the French countrywoman, Reine Chrétien, in her novel of The Village on the Cliff, Miss Thackeray observes that 'she was a woman with love in her heart, but she was not tender, as some are, or long-suffering; she was not unselfish, as others who abnegate and submit until nothing remains but a soulless body, a cataleptic subject mesmerized by a stronger will. She was not humble, easily entreated, unsuspecting of evil. The devil and his angels had sown tares enough in her heart to spring up in the good soil thick and rank and abundant; only it was good soil in which they were growing, and in which the grain of mustard-seed would spring up too, and become a great tree in time, with wide-spreading branches, although the thick weeds and poisonous grasses were tangling in a wilderness at its root.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 25.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. i. p. 96. XIII. 25, 26.—S. A. Tipple, Sunday Mornings at Norwood, p. 339. XIII. 27-30.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 196.

THE ENEMY IN THE FIELD

'An enemy hath done this.'—MATTHEW XIII. 28.

I. The Field is the Church.—For it is the kingdom of heaven which is itself the field, and if our Lord adds also that the field is the world it is only because His Divine confidence was looking forward to that day when His Church should be universal. It is then inside and not outside the Church that this confusion is to be looked for. It is within the society of the baptized that the tares and the wheat are to be found side by side. And often the tares look so like the wheat that it is only in the fruit, not in the early growth, that the difference can be found out at all. The danger of a too early separation of the two lies not only in that disturbance of the soil which will chill and kill the roots of the healthy plant, but still more in the risk of making a real mistake and plucking up the true instead of the counterfeit growth. In very early days in the Church's history Christians began to see in this parable a counsel of warning and one of encouragement.

II. A Counsel of Warning.—It forewarned them against that kind of disappointment which arises from a confusion of ideas—the confusion of failure with imperfection. The results of the Gospel are real even when they are not complete. It is not the less true that Christ is the Saviour because all men will not come to Him. It is no argument against grace that men who seek it not do not receive it. It is no defect of the Gospel that that should come to pass which its Founder foretold—that amongst the children of the kingdom there should be a plentiful growth of spurious plants, whether they take the form of unbelief or ungodliness or hypocrisy.

III. A Counsel of Encouragement.—Not that this maxim is meant to forbid the proper exercise of discipline. It was not so that our Lord's Apostles understood it. It is not so that our own Church interprets it. But it does mean to tell us that discipline has for its object the restoration not the condemnation of the offender. It means to encourage in us a spirit of watchfulness and fear, but not to encourage any deceptive hope that any kind of purging can guarantee the purity of what remains. Has not every man a right to be taken on his own profession—a right to pass through life unchallenged as to his claim to be a follower of Christ?

IV. The Enemy in the Field.—There is an enemy in God's field. Nowhere does the good sower carry his basket but a watchful foe follows in the night. That staggering question often suggests itself—how can this be? God made the powerful mind. He made the beautiful form. Did He unmake the one, did he debase the other? The parable gives us the answer, still leaving it all in deep mystery. An enemy hath done this. But it is chiefly in one broad direction that the parable sets before us the danger of this hostile sowing. It is the danger to the good of the presence with them—at their very side—of the evil. The tares look like the wheat; it is often impossible to discriminate between them. But in these words our Lord teaches us decisively to disconnect all evil from the hand of God. Evil, He teaches us, is God's absence, and we need never be away from God. It is not His will that we should be. If anything now is drawing you to evil it is not from God. Resist the devil and he will flee from you. Strong as he is, he is weaker than God, Who will help us. If you live in this faith of the omnipotence of the All Good, then shall your heart be steadfast and fear no evil.

'An enemy hath done this.'—MATTHEW XIII. 28.

NAMES matter little; sin desolates us widely, pain racks us keenly, whether we account for their existence upon a positive or a negative theory. Yet it is remarkable that our Saviour, while He does not explain this awful problem, does not explain it away. To the old, ever-recurring question, 'Whence these tares?' He answers simply, 'An enemy hath done this'. Man has striven to bridge over this chasm between his soul and God with theories contradictory to the reason they profess to satisfy, and false to the moral sense they desire to soothe, but He who spake as never man spake does not reason upon this subject. He sees this great gulf set; He knows what its mouth has devoured of earth's best and noblest; one thing most precious of all remains—He flings Himself within it.—DORA GREENWELL.

'ENVY,' observes Bacon at the close of his essay on this vice, 'is also the vilest affection, and the most depraved; For which cause it is the proper attribute of the Devill, who is called; The Envious Man, that soweth tares amongst the wheat by night. As it alwayes commeth to passe, that envy worketh subtilly, and in the darke; And to the prejudice of good things, such as is the wheat'.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 28.—J. G. Adderley, Sermons for the People, vol. ii. p. 103. H. Scott Holland, God's City, p. 181. Adam Scott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1896, p. 22. XIII. 29.—W. H. Brookfield, Sermons, p. 239.

THE TWOFOLD DEVELOPMENT

'Let both grow together until the harvest.'—MATTHEW XIII. 30.

THIS affirmative of the parable involves two facts. Howsoever, on the one hand, wickedness may increase, it shall never so increase that there shall not be still in the world some of God's wheat, some of the children of the kingdom. And howsoever, on the other hand, the number of true Christians may at any time increase, they will never so increase as that before the harvest, which our Lord tells us is the end of the present age, all men shall be truly converted.

I. The first affirmation of the parable has given us very momentous information as to the future course of human history. (1) Observe that it is impossible to understand this increase in numbers. Growth in character is the reference intended, not growth in number. (2) Observe that in this prophecy no account is taken of time. The Lord surveys human history in its totality from His own day to the end, from His first to His second coming. The total number of the children of the kingdom from the first to the second advent He calls wheat; the total number of the children of the wicked one from the first to the second Advent He calls tares.

II. The true nature of those tares which so cumber God's wheat-field is not by many fully recognized. Whatever changes in the form of wickedness there may be, they will be such as to bring out ever more and more distinctly its essentially diabolic, God-denying character. Even although the proportion of the converted to the unconverted should greatly increase, which may easily be, yet wickedness in those who remain unconverted will ever become more and more intense in its God-defying and law-rejecting spirit. This is what Jesus clearly means when He says that the tares shall 'grow until the harvest'.

III. The lessons of this subject are self-evident.

(1) The words of Christ rebuke and should silence all baseless fears because of increasing wickedness. (2) The parable no less truly rebukes all false hopes, so common with many in our day, as if we might for an instant hope to see in the present dispensation the church triumphant over the power of the devil, or to see evil at least suppressed if not destroyed. The parable tells us in so many words that this shall not be. (3) And has not the truth of the text a very solemn and searching personal application? Growth is a law of life. It is a law of the life in God. It is equally a law of the life in sin. And it is as with the wheat and the tares in the field: the very same influences which make the wheat grow make also the tares to grow. The truth which, if from the heart you receive it and obey it, saves you and makes you more like Christ; that very truth, if you do not believe it and obey it, makes you more the child of the wicked one and the slave of him in sin than you were before. In the spiritual life, as in the natural life, there is no standing still.—S. H. KELLOGG, The Past a Prophecy of the Future, p. 275.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 30.—R. D. B. Rawnsley, Village Sermons (3rd Series), p. 43. R. W. Church, Cathedral and University Sermons, p. 29. B. Wilberforce, Sanctification by the Truth, p. 65. S. H. Kellogg, The Past a Prophecy of the Future, p. 275. Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 163.

THE PRINCIPLE OF THE PARABLES

‘The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard seed.’—MATTHEW XIII. 31.

WHY may the grain of mustard seed be compared to the kingdom of heaven? It is not that they are like one another, for in the ordinary sense of the word they are not alike at all. But they are connected as it were by a cord, along which, if you feel your way, you will be guided from one to the other. And why is that? Because the same God who made the grain made also the soul of man and the Church. Every work of the same hand depicts the whole mind of him that made it.

I. The Parables are built upon the belief that everything that exists was made by a wise and good God, and that anything in the world can lead you up to the great Father of All. Now let us notice that we have there the one motive of all learning. Why do we want to know anything at all? Why do men study the rocks, or the flowers, or the stars? Because they believe that they enfold a secret, the secret of their birth. Because they believe that they are symbols, and that they can be made to reveal the mystery that lies behind them. Because, again, they believe, that that mystery, when revealed, must needs be beautiful and good.

II. Again, we find in the Parables not only the motive, but the process of all learning. Always we begin with the grain of mustard seed, with the plain, unattractive, obvious little fact. Most people pass it by. They want something grand and showy, and do not see what these common things can have to teach. But at last an eye that can see falls upon the despised little grain, and finds it worthy of patient study. And immediately it opens out, expands, etherealizes itself, revealing its wonderful mechanism, and behind the mechanism the laws of all life.

III. It is in this way that knowledge grows. We begin with the love of God's works. We put ourselves into the hands of Nature, and ask to be taught what she can teach us. We approach her in the disciple's spirit, the spirit of humility and patience, putting away all our own ideas and submitting to be led, trying to see things just as they are, counting nothing too small, nothing common or unclean. We stand in the path of light and the light comes, sometimes from teachers or fellow-workers, sometimes straight from above. This is the way of the intellectual life; and our Lord tells us in His Parables that the way of the spiritual life is the same. So He led His chosen disciples on from the grain of mustard seed to the confession of Peter, and from this again to the lessons of the Cross and of the Resurrection, always step by step and line upon line. But first of all we need the blessing ‘Blessed are your eyes, for they see’. For we may see without seeing; what we want is the second sight.

What is it that we see first of all? A family gathered by the fireside, a group of young men at a lecture or a game, two friends walking together, the crowded street of a town, the trivial scenes that make up social life.

There, in the universal craving of man for companionship and communion and affection, you have the grain of mustard seed, the simple road-side fact. It is as necessary, as common, as the air that we breathe, and that is why we fail to see its meaning.

We must take this little fact of friendship into our hands, as the botanist takes the little grain of mustard seed, and ask what it means. If you approach it in the right spirit, in the teachable spirit, the spirit of discipleship, it will open for you, and show you how the whole Gospel, the kingdom of heaven, is wrapped up in the love of a friend for a friend. Wherever two or three are gathered together, there is Christ—for those who have eyes to see.—C. BIGG, The Spirit of Christ in Common Life, p. 241.

DIVINE ENERGY

‘The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard seed.’—MATTHEW XIII. 31.

I. THE future can only belong to a Church which believes and preaches the forth-reaching, energizing, and active love of God.

To be out of the warmth of the Love of God is to be in the darkness, and how great is that darkness no one painted more clearly than Jesus Christ Himself. But it is the warmth of the sun which makes the soul cast off the cloak of its reserve, and not the terror of the darkness.

After all, why did God make anything except in love? Why did He redeem the world, except to his fatherly heart it was impossible to leave one in the darkness? And no Church will save the world, and especially those thousand millions who have not yet had a chance of making up their minds as to the truth of Christianity, except a Church that believes and proclaims and lives out the love of God to every child that He has made.

II. And with the gospel of the Love of God must go the message of a free salvation. That the Eternal Son of God came into this very world in which we live, and gave Himself for His brothers, that the Christian religion does not consist in a belief in a good man named Jesus Christ dying on the Cross, but consists in a belief in the Sacrifice of God Himself.

III. The greatest danger of the Church is worldliness. In one sense it is impossible for the Church to mix too freely with the world. But on the other hand, to catch the spirit of 'push,' to run a Church as a man runs a successful business, to depend upon cleverness and management, rather than the grace of God, to neglect prayer and intercession in favour of influence with the Press, to lower the teaching of the Church or its moral standard in order to suit an easy and self-indulgent age, is to spell ruin and failure and shame for the most orthodox Church in the world. In a voice which still rings down the centuries, Jesus Christ Himself proclaimed: 'My kingdom is not of this world'.

Only a Church whose weapons still are faith and hope and love and prayer can hope to win the world. —BISHOP WINNINGTON INGRAM, The Church Times, vol. LVIII. p. 503, 18 October, 1907.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 31.—Bishop D. L. Lloyd, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 158. G. Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 168. XIII. 31, 32.—R. Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven, p. 52. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, p. 105. F. D. Maurice, Christmas Day and Other Sermons, p. 347. J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 81. B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 166. H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1903, p. 88. W. W. Battershall, Interpretations of Life and Religion, p. 213. XIII. 31-33.—F. Temple, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 188. C. G. Lang, Thoughts in Some of the Parables of Jesus, p. 41. B. W. Maturin, Practical Studies in the Parables of Our Lord, p. 40. XIII. 32.—J. Parker, Studies in Texts, vol. i. p. 185. S. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 108. XIII. 33.—H. Scott Holland, ibid. vol. xl. 1891, p. 216. R. S. Stores, ibid. vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 121. F. Pickett, ibid. vol. xlv. 1904, p. 19. J. Scott Lidgett, ibid. vol. xlix. 1906, p. 104. Henry Scott Holland, God's City, p. 143. J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 81. T. G. Selby, The Strenuous Gospel, p. 336. M. J. McLeod, A Comfortable Faith, p. 179. R. Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven, p. 70. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 244.

THE PARABLE OF THE LEAVEN

'The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal until it was wholly leavened.'—MATTHEW XIII. 33.

I. The woman takes the leaven to lay it not on, but in the meal, where, working from within outwards, it changes the whole substance from the centre to the surface. It is through a corresponding change that the man goes to whom the Spirit of God communicates His grace. It is hidden in the heart. The change begins there; the outward reformation not preparing the way for regeneration, but springing from it; growing out of it as a tree grows out of its seed, or a stream flows out of its spring. In consequence of its being lodged in their hearts, true Christians, so far from being hypocrites, have more of the reality of religion than of its appearance.

II. So soon as leaven is embedded in its substance, a change immediately ensues; a process of fermentation is set agoing, and, extending from within outwards, goes on till by a law of nature the whole lump is leavened. Neither art nor nature could supply a better simile of the grace of God than this.

The peculiarity of grace is this, that like leaven it changes whatever it is applied to into its own nature. For as leaven turns meal into leaven, so Divine grace imparts a gracious character to the heart; and this is what I call its assimilating element. Yet let there be no mistake. While the grace of God changes all who are brought in conversion under its influence, it does not impart any new power of passion, but works by giving to those we already have a holy bent; by impressing on them a heavenly character.

III. It is said of the meal in which the woman hid the leaven, that 'the whole,' not a portion of it, large or small, 'was leavened'. The Apostle brings out the same diffusive character of this element when he says, 'A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump'. Even so, teaching us not to despise the day of small things, a little grace lodged in the heart spreads till it sanctify the whole man. Some things diffuse themselves rapidly. There are deadly poisons so rapid and indeed sudden in their action that the cup falls from the suicide's hand; he is a dead man before he has time to set it down. To these grace stands out in striking contrast, not only because it is saving, but because it is ordinarily slow in bringing its work to a holy and blessed close; and in that respect grace and sin correspond well to their figures of life and death.

Still, let God's people thank Him, and take courage. Though grace, unlike sin, and like leaven, is slow in its progress, it shall change the whole man betimes.—THOMAS GUTHRIE, Parables of Our Lord, p. 9.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 33.—M. Dods, Christ and Men, p. 151. XIII. 33-35.—W. J. Knox-Little, The Light of Life, p. 312. XIII. 34, 35.—J. Martineau, Hours of Thought on Sacred Things, vol. i. p. 270. XIII. 37, 38.—J. G. Greenhough, The Cross in Modern Life, p. 72. Ibid., Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 339. XIII. 37-39.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. i. p. 217. XIII. 38.—C. J. Vaughan, Words from the Cross, p. 152. B. W. Maturin, Practical Studies on the Parables of Our Lord, p. 53. XIII. 39.—Plain Sermons by Contributors to the 'Tracts for the Times', vol. vi. p. 219. Malan, Plain Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 175. XIII. 43.—W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 227. E. L. Hull, Sermons, p. 237.

'The kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found . . .'.—MATTHEW XIII. 44.

'I WANT you,' writes James Smetham to a friend, 'to . . . try to realize while you seek that as soon as your foot is turned to the fields of gold, all heaven is astir to help you. Strange helps will come to you—hints, intuitions, breathings, curious allurements.'

THE kingdom of God is as treasure hid in a field; and of those who profess to help us to seek for it, we are not to put confidence in those who say—Here is the treasure, we have found it, and have it, and will give you some of it; but in those who say—We think that is a good place to dig, and you will dig most easily in such and such a way.—RUSKIN, On the Old Road, II.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 44.—A. J. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 328. T. Guthrie, Parables of Our Lord, p. 150. H. Scott Holland, God's City, p. 161; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 177. W. H. Brannan, ibid. vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 292. Trench, Parables, p. 121. Winterbotham's Sermons, p. 139. Prof. Calderwood, 'The Exceeding Value of Spiritual Good Found in God's Kingdom,' Parables, p. 234; Biblical Things not Generally Known, vol. i. par. 146. XIII. 44-46.—B. W. Maturin, Practical Studies on the Parables of Our Lord, p. 65. Woolcot Catkin, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 104. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 251. C. G. Lang, Thoughts on Some of the Parables of Jesus, p. 63. Kitto's, 'The Treasure and the Pearl,' Daily Bible Illustrations, vol. vii. p. 314. Parker's Inner Life of Christ, vol. ii. p. 256. A. B. Bruce, in Homiletic Quarterly, vol. ii. p. 360 (and same in his Parabolic Teaching of Christ). Allon, 'How Men Find Christ,' Pulpit Analyst, vol. iii. p. 601. Barfield, Christian World Pulpit, vol. v. p. 167. Wray, 'Kingdom of Heaven,' ibid. vol. xvi. p. 360. W. M. Metcalfe, 'The Twin Parables,' Expositor (2nd Series), vol. viii. p. 54. J. Henry Burn, ibid. vol. viii. 468.

THE PARABLE OF THE PEARL OF GREAT PRICE

'The kingdom of heaven is like to a merchant seeking fine pearls. And finding one pearl of great price he goes away and sells all that he has and buys it.'—MATTHEW XIII. 45-6.

SOME lessons taught by this figure of a merchant:—

I. It Teaches Us to Make Religion our Chief Pursuit.—Such is to the merchant his business. To it he does not allot merely some hours stolen from the pursuits of pleasure. In its pursuit he is all energy and activity.

II. It Teaches Us to Guard Against Deception.—The money which has a suspicious look the wary trader rings on his counter; knowing what frauds are practised in business, the wise merchant often puts such goods as he receives to the test; and the utmost care is taken in such a trade, especially as that of this parable, to guard against mistakes or imposition. The dupes of fraud, men have paid immense sums for pearls which were found to be only paste.

But, through the deceitfulness of the heart and wiles of the devil, men have been greater dupes and suffered unspeakably greater losses. As it is not all gold that glitters, it is not all grace that seems so. There is a righteousness which is ours, as well as one which is Christ's. Such being the case, no merchant needs to be more on his guard against fraud and deception than those who may flatter themselves that they are regenerated when they are only reformed.

III. It Teaches Us to Examine our Accounts with God.—The wise merchant takes stock, balances his books, and, in some businesses at least, strikes a balance on every day's transactions. In this, as in the energy and toil and self-denial and resolution of worldly, how much is then worthy of the imitation of Christian men? Why should not we, at the close of each day, recall and review its transactions to see how our accounts stand with conscience and with God. And as I have seen the workman, ere he retired to rest, throw himself into stream or sea to wash away the sweat and dust of his daily toil, from such a review the Christian would repair each evening to the fountain of Jesus' blood to be cleansed of the guilt of daily sins; and rise each morning to seek the aids of the Holy Spirit to do his work, to keep his watch, to bear his burden, to fight his battle better.—THOMAS GUTHRIE, Parables of Our Lord, p. 188.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 45.—J. H. Jowett, Meditations for Quid Moments, p. 63. H. Scott Holland, God's City, p. 226. Ibid., Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 205. XIII. 45, 46.—Morgan Dix, Sermons Doctrinal and Practical, p. 208. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 60. Bishop Creighton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 91. R. Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven, p. 90. B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 147. Benjamin Keach, 'The Pearl of Great Price,' Gospel Mysteries, book 1. p. 157. Charles Simeon, Works, vol. xi. p. 414. Trench, Parables, p. 131. Winterbotham's Sermons, p. 142. Prof. Calderwood, 'Wisdom in Seeking and Distributing Spiritual Good,' Parables, p. 246. McDougall's Sermons, p. 283. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1424.

'He went and sold all that he had, and bought it.'—MATTHEW XIII. 46.

THE pearl is a free gift! What then is meant by saying that the merchant-man who had found it went and sold all that he had, and bought it? The meaning is, that there is no room for it in a heart which is filled with other things; he who would possess it must make room for it. It is not and cannot be enjoyed unless it occupies the whole heart.—ERSKINE OF LINLATHEN.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 46.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 123. Spurgeon in Christian World Pulpit, vol. xiv. p. 160. C. J. Vaughan in Three Hundred Outlines on the New Testament, p. 21. XIII. 47.—H. Scott Holland, God's City, p. 204; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 157. J. L. Fraser, ibid. vol. xli. 1892, p. 348. C. W. Stubbs, For Christ and City, p. 106. XIII. 47-50.—R. Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven, p. 103. The Dundee Pulpit, 1872, p. 209. B. W. Maturin, Practical Studies on the Parables of Our Lord, p. 80. XIII. 51, 52.—J. O. Bevan, The Spheres of Action of Science and Religion, p. 1. E. B. Speirs, A Present Advent, p. 66.

CHRIST IS GOD

'Then said He unto them, Therefore every scribe which is instructed unto the kingdom of heaven, is like unto a man that is an householder, which bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old.'—MATTHEW XIII. 52.

IN a large church in Havana, where the black worshippers sit in a different part of the church from the white worshippers, and enter by a different door, outside the door by which the white men enter a white marble statue of the Christ stands, while outside that by which the black men enter a facsimile of the same statue stands in black marble.

The arrangement embodies in a crude form a very fundamental expression of the Christian spirit. It is a parable of very deep truth. Each race of man, before it can accept Christ, must interpret Him for itself in the terms of its own characteristic qualities. It is because it finds its own highest possibilities realized in Him, and its own deepest needs and aspirations satisfied in Him, that it acknowledges Him as its Lord, and what is true of a race of men is true of each generation of that race, and of each individual man belonging to that generation.

I. How did Christ's First Followers arrive at the Assurance that He was the Incarnate Son of God?—Christ did not make His claim to men indiscriminately. He distinctly said again and again that He came not to call the righteous, that is to say, the morally and spiritually satisfied, but sinners, those who were morally and spiritually dissatisfied, and He again and again reiterated the statement that the majority of those who heard Him, though they had ears to hear, could hear not, and though they had eyes, could see not, that only to those whose soul-ears and soul-eyes were open could He make His appeal, that they only were capable of recognizing His nature and His claim. To the former class He spoke in parables and hard sayings, to the latter He unfolded the mysteries of the kingdom without reserve. He came to them with the declaration 'I am the Way. No man cometh to the Father but by Me'—the Father, the fountain source of that life which they craved, the supreme Lawgiver behind the Law, Whose voice they could hear speaking with more or less distinctness, through the depths of their own consciences. 'The way to the Father'—this was what Christ declared Himself to be. Those who joined themselves to Him joined themselves to His Father, for He and His Father He declared to be One.

II. The Conviction of the Divinity of Christ rests on the Testimony of Conscience, on the instinctive recognition by the power with which God has endowed every human soul to be its medium of communication with Him. As the eye responds to light, so conscience responds to Christ. 'This is light,' is not the outcome of any argument; it is the statement of an instinctive and immediate judgment that no argument can change. And so it is with conscience, the eye of the soul. Its recognition of Christ in God is not the outcome of any argument, any external evidence. It depends only on its own activity and on Christ's presence.

III. Outward Stimulus is Necessary to stir the conscience into activity. Doubtless, too, the intellect can help in clearing away the prejudices, misunderstandings which often hinder the eye of faith from seeing its true object, but the act of faith transcends all external evidence, all intellectual processes. It is quite complete in itself, bringing its own assurance with it, an assurance that no external evidence can produce and no external objection can shake. It is a supernatural act, a conscious recognition of the Divine by the Divine, a conscious union of God with His own. Surely the teaching of the New Testament is quite clear with regard to this. No man cometh to Him unless the Father draws him, unless the God within him draws him to the God outside him.

IV. What then is the Ultimate Basis of Christian Faith?—It is found in man's ultimate moral and spiritual needs, the needs of his complete manhood, and in the fact that Christ has satisfied these needs. Thus it was that the first followers of Christ attained to a sure conviction that He was indeed God incarnate in the flesh. That conviction was common to them all, but their interpretations of its content and its claim depended on the kind of satisfaction that they had individually attained, and that in turn depended on the individual needs to which this satisfaction was related. On the Day of Pentecost the Divine Spirit was poured out on the whole body of believers assembled together. Notice the enormous significance of that fact. The Christ life in which these believers shared, the life in which they lived and moved and had their being, was no mere private endowment of each individual Christian. It was the common possession of the whole body.

It is only in the light of this conception of the essential character of the Christian life, the essentially supernatural on the one side and the essentially corporate on the other, that the eye of faith can see its way clearly through the clouds of intellectual and practical embarrassment which obscure its vision at the present day.

'Every scribe which is instructed unto the kingdom of heaven, is like unto a man, an householder, which bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old.'—MATTHEW XIII. 52.

IN 1870 Jowett noted down the following list of 'subjects which ought to be, but never are, treated in sermons: Love. The passions—not generally but particularly. Good manners. Differences of rank. The right use of money. The influence of art. Self-dedication. The limits of self-denial. Failure in life'.

It is the mission of the genius to show that portion of the wealth of Nature, which he has been permitted to remove, to those incapable of finding it for themselves, or even of suspecting its presence.—MILLET, Notes on Art.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 52.—J. Parker, Studies in Text, vol. i. p. 162. H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 4. Bishop E. C. S. Gibbon, The Old Testament in the New, p. 177.

THE UNACCOUNTABLE MAN

'Whence hath this man this wisdom, and these mighty works? Is not this the carpenter's son?'—MATTHEW XIII. 54, 55.

I. THE astonishment of the Nazarenes, among whom Jesus had been brought up, was the greater because they knew all about the Preacher's home and upbringing. When we see a man endowed with special and unique qualities, we always try to account for them. And we look for the secret of these extraordinary qualities chiefly to two things: (1) to a man's parentage, and (2) to a man's education. Again and again you may read in the biographies of great men sentences like these? 'He inherited his strength of will from his father. He derived his gentleness of disposition from his mother.' Mental as well as physical characteristics descend from parents to children, and heredity supplies the key to many a man's character. In fact, since the idea of evolution has become one of our dominant intellectual ideas, we are almost inclined to think that every man's career can be fully explained by an investigation of his family history.

Next only to parentage in importance in the formation of a man's character is education. And I use education in a broad sense, including not only the means at his disposal for the training of his mind, but also the influences, the political, social, religious, intellectual influences that have played upon a man in the formative years of his life. The age a man lives in; the ideals and aspirations of his time; the teachers he comes in contact with—all these things go a long way towards the make-up of his character. And the Nazarenes thought of these things as they listened to the Preacher that day. He was an unaccountable Man.

II. Amongst all classes and sections of the people Christ created a feeling of wonder. The doctors were 'amazed'; the multitudes were 'astonished'; the disciples 'wondered'; the governor 'marvelled'. Jesus everywhere created the impression that He was unique. Men could not, on ordinary lines, explain Him. He suggested questions which none could answer. 'Whence hath this Man this wisdom, and these mighty works?' How knoweth this Man letters, having never learned? 'By what authority doest Thou these things, and who gave Thee this authority? Whence art thou?' He was a mystery, a puzzle, an enigma to them. From the human standpoint, He was to everybody in Palestine, from the humblest peasant in Galilee at the bottom, to Pontius Pilate the governor at the top, an 'unaccountable Man'.

Now, I want to go a step farther still, and say, that the wonderful phenomenon Jesus appeared to the Nazarenes, and what He was to the people of Palestine generally, that He is to the men and women of to-day. Starting from the purely human standpoint, Christ is to this day the world's unaccountable Man.

1. Consider the wisdom of Christ. 'Whence hath this Man this wisdom?' The Jews had their great rabbis, like Shammai and Hillel, but the wisdom of Shammai and Hillel was as dust and dross compared to the wisdom that fell from the lips of Jesus. How was it that a village Carpenter was able to surpass the wisest of the ancients? How came it that their most learned doctors were mere children in their knowledge of Divine things compared to this peasant Preacher? Whence hath this Man this wisdom?

2. The authority of Christ. 'They were astonished at His teaching,' we read, 'for He taught them as one having authority'. Yes, that is a mark of the teaching of Christ—He speaks with authority.

And this 'authority' which Jesus takes to Himself, conscience freely and gladly admits. As Dr. Dale says, we do not argue the matter out, but we perceive, instinctively and intuitively, that Jesus is our Moral Ruler, that He is the Lord of our moral and religious life. We feel towards Him as we feel to no other teacher in the world. We discuss the conclusions of other teachers; we submit to His.

3. The 'mighty works' of Christ. 'Whence,' said the Nazarenes in their bewilderment, 'hath this Man this wisdom and these mighty works?' The 'powers' of Christ astonished them as much or even more than His words. For Christ not only spoke wonderful words, but He also wrought the most wonderful deeds. His 'powers' (for that is the literal meaning of the words translated 'mighty works') created astonishment and wonder wherever He went.

And Christ still confronts the world and challenges it to account for Him. He healed the sick, He cleansed the leper, He cast out devils; He gave speech to the dumb; He gave sight to the blind; He gave life to the dead; and that question faces us and demands an answer—How came Christ by this wondrous power? Whence hath this Man these mighty works?—J. D. JONES, Elms of Life, p. 25.

REFERENCE.—XIII. 55.—W. C. Magee, The Gospel and the Age, p. 311.

'A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country, and in his own house.'—MATTHEW XIII. 57.

CRABB ROBINSON notes in his diary how once, when he was in the Lake Country, 'Mr. Hutton, a very gentlemanly and seemingly intelligent man, asked me, "Is it true—as I have heard reported—that Mr. Wordsworth ever wrote verses?"'

MEN, and almost all sorts of creatures, have their reputation by distance. Rivers, the further they run, and more from their spring, the broader they are and greater.—BEN JONSON.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 5-7.—P. W. Dainton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 13. XIII. 5-8.—H. J. Wilmoth-Buxton, Common Life Religion, p. 188. J. M. Hodgson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 214. H. A. Stimson, The New Things of God, p. 132. T. Teignmouth Shore, The Life of the World to Come, p. 69. XIV. 1-12.—A. MacLaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 262.

'John said unto him, It is not lawful for thee to have her.'
—MATTHEW XIV. 4.

It is an hard condition that the necessity of our calling casts upon us, in some cases, to run upon the pikes of displeasure. Prophecies were no burdens, if they did not expose us to these dangers. We must connive at no evil; every sin unreprieved becomes ours.—BISHOP HALL.

REFERENCE.—XIV. 4-8.—W. Lefroy, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1904, p. 118.

'The daughter of Herodias, being put forward by her mother, saith, Give me the head of John the Baptist.'—MATTHEW XIV. 6, 8.

No sign of a nation perishing is so sure as the corruption of woman—Messalina was more ominous than Nero, Herodias than Herod.—DR. JOHN KER.

To be nameless in worthy deeds, exceeds an infamous history. The Canaanitish woman lives more happily without a name than Herodias with one. And who had not rather have been the good thief than Pilate? —SIR THOMAS BROWNE.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 10.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 109. XIV. 10-12.—F. E. Paget, Sermons for the Saints' Days, p. 221.

TELLING JESUS

'His disciples . . . went and told Jesus.'—MATTHEW XIV. 12.

THEY told Jesus. They did something before that. They took up the body of their master, the Baptist, and buried it, and went and told Jesus. They were two men. They had conveyed and expressed the doubt of their imprisoned master; they said to Jesus, 'Art Thou He that should come, or look we for another? This is our master's question, and we wish to take back a reply.' At the moment of the text their stern, austere, commanding master was dead, killed, beheaded by a cruel sword. When they took up the body and buried it they went and told Jesus; they who had once been the bearers of a doubt were now the bearers of a fact that did little to dissipate that doubt. They went from one master to another, and they went along the road of misery—a well-frequented path. They transferred their allegiance from the Baptist to the Saviour of the world, and they joined hands with Him, so to say, over the dead body of their master.

Is this the only text in the New Testament which represents the truth that men come to Jesus Christ in trouble? It is not, but I think it is the jewel; I believe there is no brighter diamond in all the cabinet of grace. They came to Jesus in trouble; they had a tale to tell, they had a story full of blood to relate to this unique Listener. There are certain people to whom we do go in trouble; we go to them by a kind of natural right of instinct; we are sure they will understand, we are specially sure that they will listen to us: and there is a listening that is sympathy, and there is a sympathy that is a resurrection. They went and told Jesus.

I. There must be something about the dear Jesus that drew everybody to Him who had a tale of sorrow to tell. Once a message was sent to Him to the effect that 'he whom Thou lovest is sick'. Why did they not go to some other man? Why did not the suffering sisters call in some neighbourly helper? No matter what his name or what his vocation, he is a man, he is human and by so much he will sympathize: go, tell him. Why go a mile or two when your neighbour is next door? Your neighbour may be a thousand miles away. Always discriminate between proximity and identity in all its deepest significance as a sympathetic ministry. What a tribute to Jesus that He could listen to men's trouble! Let such listening be one of His credentials.

II. Go to tell Jesus about your successes. The disciples returned to Him and said, 'Master, even the devils were subject unto us through Thy name'. See the radiance of their faces, see how they misconstrue the kingdom of heaven, see in what an elementary atmosphere they live and move and have their being. 'Lord, even the devils.' They thought He would applaud them, they thought He would stand up His full stature and say, 'I told you it would be so, you must believe Me ever after this; this is exactly what I prophesied, and I call upon you to bear witness accordingly'. That was not the Son of God. What did He do? He said, 'Rejoice not that the devils are subject unto you, but rejoice rather that your names are written in the book of life'; and their brows fell, their chief toy was taken from them, they were disappointed. We always report the wrong thing. We tell of numbers, statistics, and balance-sheets, and great successes, and wonderful funds a quarter of a million strong, and half a million, and a whole million; and Jesus says, 'Rejoice not in your million-fold funds, but rejoice rather that you have brought a blind soul into the light and a bound soul into liberty'.

III. They went and told Jesus about their zeal for His cause, they almost outran one another in the race; it was who was to be there first to tell Jesus all about it. About what? 'Master, we saw one casting out devils in Thy name, and we forbade him.' Jesus would be delighted, Jesus would say, 'My dear allies and brethren, how faithful you are, how strongly I am lieutenant by such men as you! You forbid the man who was casting out devils in My name; I congratulate you, I will telegraph this over all the spaces of the universe.' Nothing of the kind; that was not the Son of God. He said, 'Forbid him not'; He went dead against the whole policy of the crude, zealous, undisciplined disciples. They were always doing foolish things, they were often doing the wrong thing, they were prone to set the pyramid on its apex. The same spirit prevails to-day. Do not laugh at these centuries-old people, they are living now, all the men are living now.

'Casting all your care upon Him'—why? 'For,' or because, 'He careth for you'. Not because He is great, majestic, infinite, incomprehensible; these are more or less empty words in such circumstances as my soul's need. But the Apostle says, 'Go to Him be-because He wants you to go, because He is waiting for you to go, take all your tears and leave them with Him, all your sorrow, for, because, He careth for you.' The shepherd that cares for the flock will abide with it all the night, though the wind be troubled by the howling of the wolf.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. VI. p. 40.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 12.—Mark Guy Pearse, Jesus Christ and the People, p. 212. XIV. 12; XXVIII. 8.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 269. XIV. 13-21.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 268. J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 74. XIV. 13-26.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. liii. No. 3046.

CHRIST'S COMPASSION

'And Jesus went forth, and saw a great multitude, and was moved with compassion toward them, and He healed their sick.'—MATTHEW XIV. 14.

CHRIST had sought retirement by crossing the lake for two reasons, the murder of John, and the return of the Apostles from their mission. The need for rest is emphasized in St. Mark's Gospel.

There were crowds because of the approach of the Passover, and these crowds outran them round the head of the lake, so that when the boat neared the landing-place, they were all there, and the hope of retirement and privacy had gone. So our text is very emphatic as showing us a glimpse into our Lord's heart, in circumstances that would have annoyed most of us.

I. The Unwearied Toil and Endless Patience of the Master.—How valuable these and the like hints are of Christ's true humanity. His weariness in body, His longing for quiet and repose of mind, and how gladly He puts it aside without a word of reproach for intruding on His leisure, or a word of regret that it is so broken in upon.

II. The Penetrating Look.—He saw the multitude. Why was compassion the emotion? Possibly this refers primarily to their weary travel-stained appearance. The visible taken as a symbol. So, a crowd is ever a pathetic sight.

III. The Compassion of Christ.—If we could see a man as he is we should pity. Christ's eye beholds all our hidden evils and sorrows, and the result is pity, not aversion, not anger, not indifference.

The true human sympathy of Jesus. This sympathy was a spring of His action. Some of His miracles are drawn out by entreaty, and some are wrought by His unsought love—spontaneous. This pity is the revelation of God. This pity is eternal. This pity is extended to each of us.

IV. The Work to which Compassion Leads.—(1) The healing—His care for the body. (2) The teaching—His revelation of the greatness of His compassion. It comes before we ask, is brought near to each of us, but cannot be forced upon us. Take it, and we become of His flock, the Lamb which was slain and is alive for evermore.—A. MACLAREN.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 14.—H. M. Butler, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 94. XIV. 14-16.—J. Flanagan, ibid. vol. lxi. 1902, p. 291. XIV. 14-33.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. li. No. 2925. XIV. 15-21.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 217.

THE ALL-SUFFICIENCY OF CHRIST

'They need not depart; give ye them to eat.'—MATTHEW XIV. 16. The miracle was meant for a token of Christ's Messiahship, no doubt. But, also, it was the natural expression of His real loving care for men's bodily wants, and, in that aspect, is along with the others quite invaluable. Also it was meant as a symbol. He is the Bread for men's souls. And so regarded, the words of the text may carry lessons not unimportant in their bearing upon the great task of the Church to hold forth the Bread of life to the whole world. The Church has enough to feed the world.

I. The All-Sufficiency of Christ.—He is the Bread of life, and is enough to satisfy the desires of every single soul. It addresses itself to the great primal wants universal, and deep as manhood, the sense of sin, the longing for deliverance, the gropings after God, the need of guidance, enlightenment, authority. 'This all-sufficiency of Christ is (1) shown in the very nature of the message; (2) attested by the experience of all Christians, for if one heart can so be satisfied, then the world must be; (3) confirmed by the history of His Church. There are many failures, but successes enough to show the divinity of the message. (4) The Gospel in its development is the natural root of all progress for society. 'They need not depart.' The relations between Christianity and moral, social progress are clear enough. The Gospel develops into all moral, social, political reforms and perfections and enters every sphere of human life. But the relations between the Church and these have been wrong on both sides. Christian men have tended to neglect them, and others have shoved Christianity on one side.

II. Adequacy of our Resources.—They are sufficient if Christ's command be observed: (1) if all are occupied; (2) if each acts in the spirit of Scripture; (3) if we are conscious of our own inadequacy; (4) if we bring them to Christ.—A. MACLAREN.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 16.—H. C. Shuttleworth, The Church of the People, p. 40. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 311. Archdeacon Colley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 253. P. McAdam Muir, ibid. vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 369. J. Marshall Lang, Sermon, 1887, 'They Need not Depart,' p. 1. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. liii. No. 3046. XIV. 17, 18.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. viii. No. 453. XIV. 19.—Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 273. XIV. 19, 20.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 282; see also Sermons Preached in Manchester, p. 354. XIV. 19-21.—J. Martineau, Hours of Thought on Sacred Things, p. 164.

SUPERABUNDANT BLESSINGS

'And they did all eat, and were filled: and they took up of the fragments that remained twelve baskets full.'—MATTHEW XIV. 20.

BUT the fact that there were twelve baskets full of fragments, after five thousand had been fed, did display the resources of the Saviour, whose we are and whom we serve; and displayed them for our comfort and encouragement. As we look at those well-filled baskets of fragments, we perceive them to be a reminder of the truth that giving does not impoverish God, nor withholding enrich Him. And that, surely, is a reflection worth meditating upon. God has given us much, in manifold ways: yet His resources are not exhausted. Indeed, they are scarcely touched; for there are twelve baskets full of fragments left—more to be bestowed than has been received. What a word of cheer for the life that lies before us!

I. The thought here expressed is true in regard to the material things of life. The resources of Nature have been amazingly displayed and developed in the past. 'As for the earth, out of it cometh bread; and under it is turned up as it were fire. The stones of it are the place of sapphires; and it hath dust of gold.' And men have delved in and cultivated the earth these many years, so that the world's myriad inhabitants have been fed and enriched. But we may be assured that what is to come out of the earth is immeasurably more than has hitherto been extracted.

Sometimes philosophers and savants would scare us by gloomy prophecies of the exhaustion of those supplies upon which we depend for our very existence day by day. The earth is to be so impoverished that it will not yield its increase, and men of science will have to extract solid means of subsistence out of thin air. Our coal and iron strong-rooms are being steadily depleted of their wealth. The limits of the gold and silver output are within sight. And then what shall we do? We may be satisfied that He who so arranged matters that there were twelve baskets full of fragments after the five thousand had been fed with a handful of barley loaves and fishes will not fail the men who trust in Him now.

There are twelve baskets of fragments remaining.

II. But this fact of superabundant blessing is true in regard to spiritual things. The Almighty has infinite resources, and we may confidently anticipate greater spiritual victories, wider religious conquests, more enduring Gospel triumphs, in the future than any the Church has known, even in the palmiest of the days which lie in the sunny and azure past. 'What hath God wrought!' exclaimed England's greatest evangelist, echoing Balaam's shout. And truly God had wrought much. It is said that at Benneceur, in France, there are steep, stony slopes which formerly only produced paving-stones; but now those slopes grow all varieties of fruits—apricots, cherries, black currants, green peas, asparagus. The soil has been scientifically treated, with almost incredibly successful results. So was it, spiritually, in the days of Wesley and his itinerants. They treated the hard, rocky human soil of Britain religiously and evangelically; and the glorious result has become historic. But how much has happened since! After all that God had wrought, there were twelve baskets full of fragments remaining. In Him all fullness dwells, and He has proved that He possesses inexhaustible treasures of power and truth.

III. And, lastly, this consoling thought of the abounding sufficiency of Divine resources is true in regard to personal needs.

We can all say, 'Hitherto hath the Lord helped us'; and not only helped us, but helped us bountifully. For God 'giveth liberally'; our 'cup runneth over'; it is not half-filled, or even brimming full; it is more than full. We could, most of us, live on less than we have. Our necessities have all been met, and undeserved luxuries have been bestowed upon us. Notwithstanding which, there are twelve baskets full of fragments remaining. Let fear and all its trembling kith and kin be evicted from heart and mind. Looking back, some of us may well wonder how our manifold necessities have been supplied through many and many a year. God's protection has been vouchsafed. Life is full of risks; we are in peril with every breath we draw. The prick of a pin, the scratch of a thorn, a breath of air, a speck of dust—all these may be more potent than sword-thrust or cannon-shot for our destruction. Verily we live with the sword of Damocles suspended ever over our heads. And it is only by the good providence of God that the fragile hair by which it has been suspended all these years has not been severed. What then? Are God's resources for our preservation and protection exhausted? Surely not. We may step out bravely, 'leaning upon the top of our staff,' which is the tested promise, 'He careth for you'. He who provided in the years gone by has twelve baskets of fragments still available.—HERBERT WINDROSS, The Life Victorious, p. 3.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 22, 23.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 228. XIV. 22-33.—J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 87. A. B. Davidson, Waiting Upon God, p. 231. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 282. XIV. 22-36.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 298. XIV. 23.—Stopford A. Brooke, Short Sermons, p. 195. XIV. 24.—T. L. Cuyler, Christian World Pulpit, vol. i. 1896, p. 286. XIV. 24, 25.—R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 272. XIV. 24-27.—J. H. Newman, Christ Upon the Waters, p. 3. XIV. 25.—J. H. Hitchens, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 393. XIV. 26.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 957.

HE SAID, COME

'And Peter answered Him and said, Lord, if it be Thou, bid me come unto Thee on the water. And He said, Come. And when Peter was come down out of the ship he walked on the water, to go to Jesus.'—MATTHEW XIV. 28, 29.

FIRST we must lay down this as a certain truth: Peter made a brave attempt and partly failed in it, but the having made it, though with partial failure, is to his eternal honour.

I. Notice that all the Twelve were in darkness and storm, and this by no act or deed of their own, but by their Lord's command, and by His overruling Providence.

But of these Twelve one, by his own act and deed, desired to be nearer to His Lord, and to be more like Him. All in a certain sense were then like Him, all in the storm; but yet with a difference too. He, alone and undefended; they, protected by the ships. He, standing by His own power on the waves; they, borne up by the vessel. Peter desires, alone of them all, to be more like Him still. He will leave the rest, so he may be nearer to his Lord. He will have none of the shelter of the ships, so he may have the upholding of His Master.

'Peter said unto Him, Lord, if it be Thou, bid me come unto Thee upon the water.' Will that Lord, Who knoweth all things, call the offer rash, presumptuous, boastful? Will He command the Apostle to remain where he was placed, and not to court unnecessary dangers, and leave the safeguard that he had? Not so; 'He saith unto him, Come'.

II. But with Peter's leaving the ship his difficulties commenced. Then first he began to understand how boisterous was the wind, and how unruly the sea; then first he comprehended his own weakness. And because he there stopped, therefore he began to fail. He should have gone on, and leant more and more upon the strength of that arm on which he had begun to lean. And yet, even then, he was the true and loving servant. He cried out, it is true: but to Whom? Not to his companions, but to the Giver of all help. He did not seek to get back to the boat, he pressed forward all the more to his Lord.

Remember Peter's prayer. There cannot well be a shorter, for it contains only three words, 'Lord, save me'. There cannot be a more effective one, for on the instant it brought Omnipotence to his aid.

'And immediately.' One naturally pauses there, for it was not immediately that the Lord heard the prayers even of His truest followers. The nobleman of Galilee, and the Syrophenician woman lead the band of those who have to ask again and again before they have been heard. And yet how the comfort they had besought was delayed, while a prayer of three words finds it immediately! yes, and that although it were confessedly a prayer of weak faith. But there was a reason for this, a reason set forth fourteen hundred years before in the Jewish law. All the sacrifices offered to the Lord were to be without spot or blemish. But there was one exception. A free-will offering needed not to be so; why was this? Doubtless to show the infinite value in God's eyes of a sacrifice which is not made of necessity, but only because of the willing heart of the giver. And so of St. Peter's free-will offering now. Because it was a free-will offering, because not for the sake of any worldly benefit, as the centurion and the Syrophenician woman, but only for the sake of being with the Lord, he made it; therefore, was there an immediate answer to his prayer.

III. And it was with no stern rebuke that Jesus rebuked the weakness of His disciple. 'He caught him by the hand, and said, O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?' We know what wonders one glance of that loving eye has wrought; we see what strength one touch of that loving hand can give. So to be upheld by it, so to lean on it, that is the privilege of those who go out into the storm; who leave the ship's company to go to the Lord of the ship; who would walk upon the water to go to Jesus.—J. M. NEALE, Occasional Sermons, p. 144.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 28.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 305. XIV. 28-31.—N. Adams, Christ a Friend, p. 143. XIV. 28-33.—J. McNeill, Regent Square Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 113. XIV. 29.—C. S. Robinson, Simon Peter, p. 226.

'And beginning to sink, he cried, saying, Lord, save me.'—MATTHEW XIV. 30.

THE sincere Protestant accepts the new revelation; he piously abandons what God has taught him to recognize as error, and he gathers strength by his fidelity. The insincere Protestant, forgetting the meaning of the names under which he was enlisted in the war against falsehood, closes his eyes and clings to his formulas. Therefore, like St. Peter failing through want of faith, he finds the ground turn to water under his feet. His mortal eye grows dull. His tongue learns to equivocate.—FROUDE.

REFERENCE.—XIV. 30.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 154.

'O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?'—MATTHEW XIV. 31.

'I HAVE been reading the New Testament,' says Eckermann in his Journal for 1831, 'and thinking of a picture which Goethe showed me lately, where Christ is walking on the water, and Peter coming towards him, on the waves, begins to sink, in a moment of faintheartedness.' "This," said Goethe, "is one of the most beautiful legends, and one which I love better than any. It expresses the noble doctrine that man, through faith and hearty courage, will come off victor in the most difficult enterprises, while he may be ruined by the least paroxysm of doubt."

REFERENCES.—XIV. 31.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 246; vol. xxxi. No. 1856; vol. xxxvi. No. 2173; vol. II. No. 2025.

MIRACLES

'When the men of that place had knowledge of Him, they brought unto Him all that were diseased; and besought Him that they might only touch the hem of His garment; and as many as touched were made perfectly whole.'—MATTHEW XIV. 35, 36.

I. HERE is the adequate cause for the miracles narrated in the Gospels. Christ, the Son of God, must manifest His Divine character, and He manifested it chiefly in three ways:—

1. By His holy doctrine, in which He taught all men to love God, Who is Truth, Righteousness, Purity, and Charity, and to love one another as brothers.

2. By His absolutely holy and stainless life.

3. By His power over the material universe around Him, ending in His resurrection from the dead. Had He not shown this power, there would have been something lacking.

II. Consider the fact that miracles are not attributed in the Bible to all great teachers.

John the Baptist, who was the greatest representative of the Prophets, wrought no miracles. But in Christ we see one Whose shoe latchet John was not worthy to bear. Had Christ wrought no miracles His opponents would have made that a reason for disbelieving Him when He said, 'I and the Father are One'. They would have asked how it was that He Who bade all men honour the Son as they honour the Father, showed no sign that He was possessed of power over nature greater than that of other men.

III. Note that the miracles attributed to Christ are all worthy of Christ, they are works of mercy and beneficence. They are works which show that hunger and thirst, disease and death are things temporal, which are in God's good time to pass away.

The miracles were an essential feature in the great work of our Incarnate Lord, in bringing about the chief event in the world's history. They are established by historical testimony of the most trustworthy kind. They accord with reason. Without them we should have been less able to accept the testimony of Christ about Himself. The record of them fills our hearts and minds with faith, hope, and love, for how can we do less than believe in, trust and love that Lord of Whom it is said, 'They brought unto Him all that were diseased, and besought Him that they might only touch the hem of His garment, and as many as touched were made perfectly whole'.—CANON CHARLES BODINGTON, The Twelve Gates of the Holy City, p. 155.

Illustration.—We say that all portents are contrary to nature, but they are not so. For how is that contrary to nature which happens by the will of God, since the will of so mighty a Creator is certainly the nature of each created thing? A portent, therefore, happens not contrary to nature, but contrary to what we know as nature.—ST. AUGUSTINE, City of God, book XXI. chap. viii.—CANON CHARLES BODINGTON, The Twelve Gates of the Holy City, p. 157.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 36.—W. J. Knox-Little, The Journey of Life, p. 177. XV. 1-13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2487. XV. 1-20.—J. Morgan Gibbon, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 184. XV. 2.—J. A. Bain, Questions Answered by Christ, p. 23. XV. 8.—T. G. Selby, The Strenuous Gospel, p. 296. XV. 9.—W. H. Murray, The Fruits of the Spirit, pp. 212, 224, 235. XV. 10-31.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2597. XV. 11.—T. G. Selby, The Cross and the Dice-Box, p. 241.

'Every plant, which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up.'—MATTHEW XV. 13.

If I had not had a hope fixed in me that this Cause and Business was of God, I would many years ago have run from it. If it be of God, He will bear it up. If it be of man, it will tumble; as everything that hath been of man since the world began hath done. And what are all our Histories, and other Tradition of Actions in former times, but God manifesting Himself, that He hath shaken, and tumbled down, and trampled upon, everything that He had not planted?—CROMWELL to the Parliament of 1655.

REFERENCES.—XV. 13.—F. D. Maurice, Lincoln's Inn Sermons, p. 1. G. Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 170. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 423. XV. 14.—H. Scott Holland, Church Times, vol. lvi. 1906, p. 285. XV. 18-31.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2481. XV. 19.—Ibid. vol. xlii. No. 732. W. M. Sinclair, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1894, p. 328. XV. 21-28.—J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 247. J. McNeill, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 369. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 280. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 295. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2481; vol. xlii. No. 2446. Archer Butler, Sermons (1st Series), p. 201. Parker, Inner Life of Christ, vol. ii. p. 331. Kingsley, All Saints' Day, p. 76. Stopford Brooke, Spirit of Christian Life, p. 164. Stanford, Homilies on Christian Work, p. 133. Bruce, Galilean Gospel, p. 146. Guthrie, Way to Life, pp. 210 and 228. Laymen's Legacy, p. 208. Lynch, Sermons for my Ourates, p. 317. Phillips Brooks, Sermons in English Churches, p. 157. C. Wordsworth, Sermons, vol. i. p. 109. Bishop Wilberforce, Four Sermons, p. 53. Pusey, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 167. W. F. Hook, On the Miracles, vol. ii. p. 33. XV. 21-31.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 314. XV. 21-39. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2253. XV. 22.—C. Silvester Horne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1904, p. 225. C. Leach, Mothers of the Bible, p. 95. XV. 22, 23.—Eugene Bersier, Twelve Sermons, p. 128. R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. i. p. 129. XV. 22-28.—Andrew Murray, The Children for Christ, p. 228.

'My daughter is grievously vexed with a devil.'—MATTHEW XV. 22.

I DOUBT whether she had inquired after Christ, if she had not been vexed with her daughter's spirit. Our afflictions are . . . the files and whetstones that set an edge on our devotions.—BISHOP HALL.

DIVINE SILENCE

'But He answered her not a word.'—MATTHEW XV. 23.

HAVE you prayed? In what way have you prayed? Have any of your prayers been unmistakably answered? It is a curious fact that some persons never look for answers to their prayers, and they, of all persons, would be most astonished if God took them at their word and granted their request. Some people make mistakes in the requests they make to God. It is absolutely necessary for us to keep before us one or two thoughts in connexion with prayer. Prayer in this way is a science just as much as any other sciences, and having just as many special laws. You may rest assured that any legitimate prayer is never left unanswered, but the answer may not perhaps be as our special desires dictate; in fact, we sometimes look for the answer to come in at the front door when it is already in the house by the back door.

We have a wonderful illustration in connexion with the subject in the text—'He answered her not a word'. Has that been your experience?

I. It is Just Possible that You Yourself were not Ready for the Answer.—God may have seen that there was some rectification of character necessary. It may have been some inconsistency, some unworthiness, some selfishness, or even some secret sin that prevented God from answering. Here is a very good illustration. A man may be seen in a boat rowing, rowing, rowing, but the boat never moves. Why? Because the boat is anchored. The boat is floating on the surface of the water, yet the anchor holds it fast. That is the picture of a man's spiritual life. He may feel in his heart that he wants to know God, but finds his progress arrested because his real affections are fastened or anchored on to something of this world. He does not make progress, and God does not answer his prayers.

II. It is Just Possible that Your Exterior Circumstances are not Ready for the Answer.—Take the case of Joseph when he was in prison. Joseph prayed that he might be delivered from the prison, but it pleased God to keep him there for a time that he might be a comfort to his fellow-prisoners. And so it may be with you. God may have His own reasons for not granting you some timely blessing at once. The circumstances may not be favourable; God may be dealing with some other member of your household at the same time; He has not completed His purpose, and the delay should not distress you or disturb you if you reflect that God may choose to confer His blessing in some special way.

III. It is Just Possible that Circumstances have to be Rearranged and Readjusted to Bring Greater Benefits.—Take the case of Moses and his remarkable prayer when he besought the Lord to let him go over and see the good land which was beyond Jordan. Why did not God grant his request? Because he had something better in store for him. Was it not much better for Moses to see his Lord transfigured on the Mount than to cross over Jordan with the Israelites? There is the illustration of St. Paul when he prayed that a thorn in his flesh might be taken away from him. God did not answer his prayer. He had something better in store for him. He was going to give him more grace, and when St. Paul knew that, he said he would rather keep the thorn and have the grace. Then with regard to the woman in the text, the Lord gave her at first no encouragement whatever; but the delays and hindrances that He put in her path only increased her faith and made her more earnest and more determined to get that which she required, and she stands out as one of the great figures of all spiritual history. What a biography! only a verse or two, but the biography of a woman whose faith in the Redeemer could not be shaken. Her pleading became more earnest, and at last—may I say it?—the Lord is conquered by her, and then He praises her for her faith.

REFERENCES.—XV. 23.—W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 60. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2841. XV. 24, 25.—Ibid. vol. xxx. No. 1797.

'Then came she and worshipped Him, saying, Lord help me.'
—MATTHEW XV. 25.

CONSIDER: it is not failing in this or that attempt of coming to Christ, but a giving over of your endeavours, that will be your ruin.—JOHN OWEN.

REFERENCES.—XV. 25.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2597. M. Guy Pearce, Jesus Christ and the People, p. 142. XV. 26, 27.—H. H. Carlisle, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1906, p. 268. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1309.

'And she said, Truth, Lord: yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their masters' table.'—MATTHEW XV. 27.

A RETORT quite Greek in its readiness, its symmetry, and its point! But it was not the intellectual merit of the answer that pleased the Master. Cleverness is cheap. It is the faith He praises, which was as precious as rare. . . . The quickness of her answer was the scintillation of her intellect under the glow of her affection. Love is the quickening nurse of the whole nature.—GEORGE MACDONALD.

REFERENCES.—XV. 27.—W. P. Balforn, Lessons from Jesus, p. 59. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 715; vol. xxxvi. No. 2129. XV. 28.—E. B. Pusey, Parochial Sermons, vol. ii. p. 167. B. F. Westcott, The Historic Faith, p. 3. R. H. McKim, The Gospel in the Christian Year, p. 184. Henry Wace, Some Central Points of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 251. S. C. Malan, Plain Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 262. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 509. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. i. p. 182. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xcvii. No. 2173; vol. xxxviii. No. 2253; vol. xlii. No. 2446. XV. 29-38.—J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 105. XV. 30, 31.—Walter Brooke, Sermons, pp. 125, 135. XV. 32.—B. Wilberforce, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1597, p. 113. Hugh Black, ibid. vol. lxi. 1906, p. 189. XV. 32-39.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 293. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 307. XV. 33.—G. F. Browne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 161. J. A. Bain, Questions Answered by Christ, p. 34. James Denney, Gospel Questions and Answers, p. 61. XVI. 1-4.—H. Bremner, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 87. C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 245.

SPIRITUAL DISCERNMENT

'Ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times?'—MATTHEW XVI. 3.

JESUS CHRIST found that He was in the midst of a number of weather-wise people; they were quite experts in the reading of the cloudy signs, they knew what the weather would be to-day and perhaps to-morrow, and they published their forecasts of the weather; but when it came to higher reading, reading on another level, they were as moles and bats from whom the genius of daylight penetration had been withheld. Do we make one another up? do we hold varied trusteeships? and are they brought under one grand obligation, so that we may, thus supplementing one another, constitute a great social unit? Are there not really readers of the clouds and readers of the unseen? could they not meet now and then in common counsel to see how things stand and what the general outlook is? They must not despise one another; for one man can do this, and another man can do that, and neither man can do both. So that we are mutual trustees, we supplement each other; if we could enter into the spirit of this arrangement, we should have brotherhood, free, frank interchange of opinion, and work together in a great and beneficent association.

I. But whilst we recognize these great common gifts, we recognize also a partition of ability, so that one man is an expert along line A, and another man is an expert along line B, and each must work out his own vocation. As there are great commonwealth blessings of nature, so there are great republican blessings in moral and spiritual regions. God did not intend any man to be born a slave. Liberty belongs to every responsible creature; his responsibility will limit and define his liberty, and thus give him the very best of it. Liberty that wantons itself into licence really conducts itself into the worst bondage. Regulated liberty is freedom. God means every soul in this sense to be free. There are common instincts, common privileges. And yet singular to say, and yet necessary to say, there are limitations which are round about the individual, so that he has his talent, his two talents, his five talents, himself not to be numbered with other men in certain great generalities. The individuality of the soul is never lost; it is never drowned in the river of mean compromises; it should stand forth individual and yet associated; a great personality, yet part of a greater humanity. To combine the whole and the part, the great universal gift and the special endowment: this is the problem, and Christianity alone sufficiently and finally solves it.

II. By the text we are entitled to enlarge what we can see into what we cannot see except by the vision of the soul. Here is a great lesson in inductive reasoning. Because such and such is the direction of the wind and such and such are the indications of the clouds, therefore we shall have such and such weather. Quite right; I do not oppose your forecasts; but why not carry up the idea, and endeavour to reason concerning the things you see with the eyes of the heart in the spiritual realm, and draw your inductions according to the great basis of fact, phenomena, and experience available to every student who faithfully and humbly and lovingly endeavours to discover the will of God? There is a spiritual barometer, there is a spiritual thermometer; there are many ways appointed and therefore approved of God by which we can put this and that together and draw wide inferences from great spiritual premises. If we had eyes to see we should know that from the beginning God has a certain purpose and will surely accomplish it. That purpose is a purpose of beneficence.

III. We must recognize the fact that there is a difference in sight. We recognize this in the sight of the bodily eyes; why not recognize it in the inner and truer sight of the soul? Can you read a placard fifty yards off? Your answer is, I certainly cannot do so. Are you entitled from that consciousness to declare that there is not a man in the world that can read it? You have to admit that there is sight longer than yours. Can you read the Bible without lenses, glasses, or mechanical aids of any kind? You may possibly reply, Certainly I cannot do so. Does it therefore follow that no other man can read it without such aids? In a moment you say that to make any such contention would be simply absurd. That is right; why not apply that fact to a higher level, and find for it a broader and deeper interpretation? We must listen to the higher voices. We are at liberty to test the spirits whether they are of God; that may often be a bounden duty which we cannot shirk under any plea or pretext. Yet there remains the great fact that we have a book which is filled with holy messages from the holy God, and these have been so often confirmed that their very confirmation becomes not only an argument but a starting-point of the most profound and elaborate reasoning. If any man has read the book of Genesis aright he knows that there is a book coming that shall be full of anthem, song, and triumph; for the kingdoms of this world have become the kingdom of our God and of His Christ. He read that in the very first verse of the Bible if he was a prophet when he read that opening verse. There is a great philosophy of implication; one thing means another, points to another, and gives assurance of another.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. III. p. 175.

'Ye cannot discern the signs of the times.'—MATTHEW XVI. 3. CARLYLE opens his Latter-day Pamphlets with this paragraph: 'The Present Time, youngest-born of Eternity, child and heir of all the Past Times with their good and evil, and parent of all the Future, is ever a "New Era" to the thinking man; and comes with new questions and significance, however commonplace it look: to know it, and what it bids us do, is ever the sum of knowledge for all of us. This new Day, sent us out of Heaven, this also has its heavenly omens;—amid the bustling trivialities and loud, empty noises, its silent monitions, which, if we cannot read and obey, it will not be well with us! No;—nor is there any sin more fearfully avenged on men and Nations than that same, which indeed includes and presupposes all manner of sins: the sin which our old pious fathers called "judicial blindness";—which we with our light habits, may still call misinterpretation of the Time that now is; disloyalty to its real meanings and monitions, stupid disregard of these, stupid adherence, active or passive, to the counterfeits and mere current semblances of these. This is true of all times and days.'

'FRENCH revolutions teach nobody! . . . So with the Jews of old,' wrote F. W. Robertson in one of his letters. 'They were very weather-wise, but could not read the signs of the times. Jewish ladies were a good deal surprised when they found themselves sold as slaves to Romish voluptuaries; and Parisian ladies were equally astonished when, after having spent such enormous sums on their coiffures and ribbons, they one fine day found their head-dress arranged for them at the national expense, à la guillotine.'

IN his Life of Gibbon (pp. 48, 78), Mr. Cotter Morison notes how in the latter half of the eighteenth century, 'scholars, men of the world, men of business passed through this wonderland [of Parisian society] with eyes blindfolded. They are free to enter, they go, they come, without a sign that they have realized the marvellous scene that they were permitted to traverse. One does not wonder that they did not perceive that in those graceful drawing-rooms, filled with stately company of elaborate manners, ideas and sentiments were discussed and evolved which would soon be more explosive than gunpowder. One does not wonder that they did not see ahead of them—men never do. One does rather wonder that they did not see what was before their eyes.' Even as a member of Parliament, he adds, Gibbon failed to read the signs of his age. 'He lived at one of the most exciting periods of our history; he assisted at debates in which constitutional and imperial questions of the highest moment were discussed by masters of eloquence and state policy, and he hardly appears to have been aware of the fact.'

In the second volume of his Cromwell, Carlyle also writes: 'Human crimes are many; but the crime of being deaf to the God's voice, of being blind to all but parchments and antiquarian rubrics when the Divine Handwriting is abroad on the sky—certainly there is no crime which the Supreme Powers do more terribly avenge!'

REFERENCES.—XVI. 3.—H. Hensley Henson, Christ and the Nation, p. 193. H. S. Lunn, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. p. 60. A. T. Pierson, ibid. vol. xli. 1892, p. 273. J. Guinness Rogers, ibid. vol. lv. 1899, p. 6. C. M. Sheldon, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 1.

'There shall no sign be given, but the sign of Jonas.'—MATTHEW XVI. 4.

THE sign was that quality in the preaching of Jonah itself which is represented as producing repentance in his hearers. The appeal of Jesus to His race must, he said, be judged by itself. It accepted no testimonial from any external result, even when such external result was present.—MISS WEDGWOOD.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 4.—R. T. Talbot, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 107. E. Aldom French, God's Message Through Modern Doubt, p. 43. XVI. 4-12.—J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 105. XVI. 6.—J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 269. XVI. 6, 12.—D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 135. XVI. 12.—R. Scott, Oxford University Sermons, p. 161.

FAITH

* When Jesus came into the coasts of Cæsarea Philippi, He asked His disciples, saying, Whom do men say that I the Son of man am? And they said, Some say that Thou art John the Baptist: some Elias; and others, Jeremias, or one of the prophets. He saith unto them, But whom say ye that I am? And Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but My Father which is in heaven.'—MATTHEW XVI. 13-17.

I. Two truths lie upon the surface of this narrative. The first is the importance attached by our Lord to the faith in Himself, and the other the supernatural character of such faith as the gift of God.

1. The importance attached by our Lord to faith in Himself—for here there comes to the surface the end for which He had separated and was training the twelve. It was that they might gain a firm and unqualified faith in Himself—that they might know how to confess and profess His name.

2. 'Whom do ye say that I am?' St. Peter it is who obeys the promptings of the Spirit which all were secretly acknowledging. 'Thou art the Christ,' he cries, 'the Son of the living God.' This is what our Lord had wanted. This is what He was waiting for. 'Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona; blessed art thou, for faith in Jesus Christ is the one necessity of man's redemption. Blessed art thou, because this fundamental act of faith is not of thyself, or of anything visible or tangible, or merely human. Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee; but My Father which is in heaven.' He means that humanity of itself can never discover God or find Him out. The recognition of God must always be God's own disclosure of Himself in the heart of man.

3. We pass a stage downwards in Church history. St. Paul, like his Master, asserts the necessity of faith and also its supernatural character. 'No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.'

II. These old lessons are what we again and again must learn and relearn, and lay to heart. Faith is necessary—that first—if we would share the Christian hope and life.

And, again, faith is supernatural. That means it is the gift of God, not the result of the mere action of our own faculties. It is only by an act of faith of our own that we can set to our seal that God's offer in Christ is true, and this act of faith, this giving out of ourselves in loving venture of surrender, is always a motion which we know, even in the making of it, to have its origin far beyond ourselves. It comes upon us as a movement from above, a movement in us of the Divine Spirit.

III. There are two sorts of faith. There is the faith by which we come to believe, and there is the faith in which we Christians are meant to live. Both are supernatural—both, that is to say, are the work of God in us, though they correspond to different states of the Holy Spirit's activity, for He works upon men to make them Christians, and He dwells, as in a temple, in the hearts of them who are already Christians. Always we need to remember that, as the creation, so also the sustaining, of the life of faith is a Divine gift, and demands on our part a reverent waiting for the gift of the Divine Spirit.—BISHOP GORE, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 1.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 13.—J. Parker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 282. J. D. Jones, The Elms of Life, p. 43. XVI. 13-15.—J. Clifford, The Secret of Jesus, p. 3. C. J. Ridgeway, Is Not This the Christ? p. 1. XVI. 13-16.—H. C. Beeching, The Grace of Episcopacy, p. 34. J. Marshall Lang, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 168. A. W. Potts, School Sermons, p. 47. G. Critchley, The Penny Pulpit, vol. xii. No. 694, p. 221. XVI. 13-17.—B. D. Jones, Pulpit Notes, p. 173. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2041. XVI. 13-18.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 229. J. H. Rigg, Scenes and Studies in the Ministry of Our Lord, p. 116. XVI. 13-19.—J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 283. XVI. 13-28.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 322.

ELIJAH OR JEREMIAH

'Some say that Thou art . . . Elias ; and others Jeremias.'—
MATTHEW XVI. 14.

It is of the deepest interest to discover what was the common impression about Jesus, and in this report conveyed by the disciples we get a hint of the utmost value. Did you ever think of the vast difference there was between the characters of Elijah and Jeremiah? Yet some said about Christ, 'This is Elijah,' and others said, 'No, it is Jeremiah'. The one is ardent, enthusiastic, fierce sometimes. The other is the prophet of the tender heart and tears. And the remarkable thing is that the common people should have taken these types, which are so wide apart, and should have found in them both the character of Christ. In other words, the impression which Jesus made was that of a complex, inclusive personality. And I want to try to bring before you some of these qualities of different natures, which harmonize so perfectly and wonderfully in the human nature of our Lord.

I. I am arrested in Christ's character by the perfect union of mastery and charm. It is one of the rarest things in the world to find the masterful man possessed of the indefinable quality of charm. Some men are born to be obeyed, some to be loved; but Jesus pre-eminently was born for both. That is why people said, 'Lo, here is Elijah,' and others, 'No, it is Jeremiah'. All that had marked the noblest of the prophets was harmonized and reconciled in Him.

II. I am arrested in Christ's character by the union of remoteness and accessibility. There is something in Christ that always suggests distance. There is much in Christ that tells us He is near. Now there are many people who convey the impression of remoteness, though none in the same way as Jesus did. What you feel is, when men are so remote, that you must not trouble them with your small matters. You must not look to them for the sweet word of sympathy. You must not expect them to bother about you. The strange thing is that though Christ stood thus remote, men should have come to Him with every worry.

III. I am arrested in Christ's character by the union of enthusiasm and tranquillity. His feelings were often powerfully stirred, yet the whole impression is one of profound peace. It is very easy to be cold, yet calm; to be uninterested, unimpassioned, and so tranquil. It is very easy to deaden down the feelings, till a man has made a solitude and called it peace. But the abiding wonder about Christ is this, that He had an ardent, eager, enthusiastic heart; yet breathed such a deep, such a superb, tranquillity, that men instinctively felt He was at rest.

IV. There is the union of abnegation and appreciation. What is the last word in the ideal of Jesus—is it asceticism, or is it joy?

The wonder of Jesus is not this or that; the wonder of Jesus is this and that together. In the deepest of all senses Christ renounced the world and trampled all its glory underfoot. The first condition of following in His train was that one should lead the life of self-denial. Yet he who so followed Him was never deadened to the call of lovely or delightful things; he was led into a world where birds were singing, and which was beautiful with the lilies of the field.—G. H. MORRISON, The Wings of the Morning, p. 76.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 14.—A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 281. XVI. 15.—Marcus Dods, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxii. 1902, p. 116; see also vol. lxix. 1906, p. 149. G. Jackson, ibid. vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 171. XVI. 15, 16.—J. D. Jones, ibid. vol. lxv. 1904, p. 276. E. W. Moore, Life Transfigured, p. 177. XVI. 15-17.—E. B. Pusey, Parochial Sermons, vol. ii. p. 283. XVI. 15-18.—R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 606. XVI. 15-17, 21.—C. W. Furse, Sermons Preached at Richmond, p. 22. XVI. 16.—Hastings Rashdale, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 8. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for Saints' Days, p. 141.

I WILL BUILD MY CHURCH

'And Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said, . . . thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.'—MATTHEW XVI. 16, 18.

THE words were drawn from Christ by the confession of Peter. The disciple said, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God,' and the Saviour answered, 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My Church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it'.

I. In many lives, by no means in all, the purpose for which life was given, for the fulfilment of which life is to be spent, disengages itself in one lustrous moment. The clouds are scattered, and the meaning of life is written as with a pencil of lightning. This does not mean that all is new. A man may, in the depths of his feeling and thought be aware of his place and work, and yet things change when the significance of his destiny crystallizes itself in a sentence. As Browning makes Childe Roland say—

Burningly it came on me all at once,
This was the place!

So men have said to themselves in one of these moments that count as years in a lifetime, these moments when mists lift off—I will make this discovery—I will write this book—I will love this woman—I will serve this cause—I will extend this Empire. It is as if they had suddenly turned and seen the revealing angel. So our Lord, Who from the beginning knew His work, put everything into the words—'I will build My Church'.

II. Let us ask how Christ builds his Church. I shall borrow from Ruskin's famous book, The Seven Lamps of Architecture. As Ruskin himself says: 'We know not how soon all architecture will be vain, except that which is not made with hands'. I take three of his seven lamps to help us in expounding how Christ builds His Church, how we must build it, if we are to be labourers together with Him.

1. In the first place, there is the Lamp of Sacrifice. The Church is built on sacrifice, and by sacrifice. It is built on the one Sacrifice offered for sins for ever, and built by the continual sacrifice of the members, on the sacrifice which will make up at last that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ.

2. In the second place, there is the Lamp of Power. We see it shining in these calm words, 'I will build My Church'. Says the French aphorist: 'Attempt difficult things as though they were easy, and easy things as though they were difficult'. Christ addressed Himself to His long and terrible task with a certain repose of mind and temper. He was filled with the Spirit. He had the Sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God.

3. Once more, there must be the Lamp of Beauty. He will present it to Himself a glorious Church, for if the Church is to be fair with the beauty of the Lord, love and joy must go into the building. 'We are not sent into the world to do anything into which we cannot put our hearts.' Unless we put our hearts into our building we cannot put our intellects. And it may be true, as the great critic has said, that 'objects are noble and ignoble in proportion to the amount of the energy of the mind which has visibly been employed upon them'. We know what heart Christ put into the building of His Church. The zeal of God's House consumed Him. It was His meat to do the will of the Father, and to finish His work. In the old days men and women put their souls into church building. A French writer describes the rebuilding of Chartres Cathedral after its destruction by fire. All the country over, every one grieved and wept. Whole populations stopped their regular work, left their homes to help, the rich bringing money and jewels, and the poor putting in their barrows everything that could serve to feed labour and men, or help in the work. It was a constant stream of emigration, the spontaneous exodus of a people. Every road was crowded with pilgrims, all, men and women alike, dragging whole trees, pushing loads of sawn beams. What seems more incredible and is nevertheless attested by every chronicle of the time, is that this horde of old folks and children, of men and women, was at once amenable to discipline. And yet they belonged to every class of society, for there were among them knights and ladies of high degree. But Divine love was so powerful that it annihilated distinctions and abolished caste. The nobles harnessed themselves with the labourers to drag the trucks. Patrician dames helped the peasant woman to stir the mortar and to cook the food. 'The old Durham Cathedral was completed in a similar way. The entire population of the district, from the Coquet to the Tees, headed by the Earl of the Northumbrians, readily rendered all the help they could. Christ has built His Church with joy unspeakable, and we can build it worthily with Him. He does not need us for the building. He said Himself, 'I will build My Church'. He will carry His banner on to victory, though the hands of all of us relax their hold. Perhaps our work may be nothing more than a discipline for our souls, and in itself useless.

But, as Ruskin nobly says, 'Since our life must at the best be but a vapour that appears for a little time and then vanishes away, let it at least appear as a cloud in the height of heaven, not as the thick darkness that broods over the blast of the furnace, and rolling of the wheel'. It needs all—sacrifice, power, joy.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, The Lamp of Sacrifice, p. 113.

'Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but My Father which is in heaven.'—MATTHEW XVI. 17.

ANY acknowledgment of Him that rests on merely outward evidence must necessarily fall far short of that good confession for the utterance of which St. Peter's Master pronounced him blessed. This, on that Master's own testimony, was the expression of a deep, inward conviction wrought by God Himself upon the soul; and it was not because Christ had been manifested to St. Peter in the flesh, but because He had been revealed to him in the spirit, that he was able to answer our Lord's question, 'Whom sayest thou that I am?' in the words which drew forth this comment.—DORA GREENWELL.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 17.—C. Gore, Church Times, vol. xxviii. 1890, p. 665. H. J. Martyn, For Christ and the Truth, p. 147. XVI. 17, 18.—H. C. Beeching, Inns of Court Sermons, p. 155.

'Blessed art thou. . . Thou art an offence unto Me.'—MATTHEW XVI. 17 and 23.

THINK what change has passed on Peter's mood before the second of these words could be addressed to him to whom the first had just been spoken. The Lord had praised him. Peter grew self-sufficient, even to the rebuking of him whose praise had so uplifted him. But it is ever so. A man will gain a great moral victory: glad first, then uplifted, he will fall before a paltry temptation.—G. MACDONALD in The Seaboard Parish, chap. xviii.

THE UNSHAKEABLE CHURCH

'And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.'—MATTHEW XVI. 18.

1. What was the Rock?—First, then, what was this rock on which the Saviour said He would build His Church? Was it Peter, as the word seems to imply, and even directly to state? Sometimes Protestants have vehemently denied it, because they were afraid that by admitting so much they would be conceding all the claims of Rome. I have no such fear. I think in a sense it was Peter, and the company of Apostles of whom he was the acknowledged leader; for it was indeed upon their rocklike witness, against which all the powers of the world could not prevail, that the Church of all the ages grew. It was built, as we read in another place, upon 'the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner-stone'. But if the rock was Peter, it was Peter made a new man by the mighty truth which he had just confessed—this truth, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living

God'. The Apostles, after all, were only the upper stratum of the rock, if we might so speak, the part which jutted above the surface, while underneath was the solid bed-layer, deeper than the earth, deep as the universe, this solid bed-layer of truth that Christ their Master was Divine, that the words which He spoke were true as heaven, and that His life and power were eternal and indestructible. And we are all rocks if we believe that, from Peter down to the humblest person of the present day. The veriest human feebleness becomes as solid and immovable as the ground under your feet as soon as there enters into it the conviction that Christ is God, that His word cannot be broken, and that you are held fast by Him and His promises in changeless power and everlasting love.

There is room in the Church for the weakest faith. We read that hay, and wood, and stubble even, get in, to be purified by fire; but the strength of the building is in its rocklike souls. Upon rock does Christ build His Church, and He wants rock for the building up of any Church — rocklike members, rocklike deacons, rocklike teachers in the Bible classes and Sunday schools, rocklike preachers, men that know in whom they have believed and what they have believed, and speak out with clear, unfaltering certainty the things which they have seen and felt and heard of God.

II. Shifting Sands.—I think there never was a time when that was more needed than it is to-day, there never was a more urgent demand made for it. We live in an age of almost general unsettlement. You can hardly think of a department in which there are not doubtful minds, and divided opinions; all questions seem to be in a state of solution, nothing fixed and determined.

We want rock; and the real deep hearts of men everywhere, whether they know it or not, are always saying, Away from us, ye who preach negations and doubts and darkness, who come and sit upon the threshold of our hearts like some poet's raving croaking out a dismal 'Nevermore'; away with you; and come ye, John and Paul, and all such clear-voiced witnesses, with the glow of hope on your faces and the music of conviction in your tones. That is the message we need; that is the message which this age needs, and which Christ would have His representatives give. He builds His Church upon rock.

III. What is Christ's Church?—The Church is the company, now indeed quite innumerable, of disciple-like souls who are for ever and ever learning of Him, some of them, the greater number, beholding His face, and serving Him day and night in His temple; and the rest not seeing Him yet, but rejoicing in Him with joy unspeakable and full of glory. In a word, the Church is the faithful souls of every place and name known and unknown to whom His name is unutterably dear, His words more precious than fine gold, who love Him with a love that is more than human, who trust Him with a trust that is stronger than life or death, whose eager desire is to obey Him and serve Him, and whose fervent prayer for ever and ever is to get His truth made known, His salvation proved, and His name lifted above every name, until at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow. Upon all these, wherever they are, the Saviour looks down as with the joy of one who looks upon a noble possession, and He says, 'They are My Church, My Church; and there is no other, no other'.

IV. The Church's Indestructibility.—Lastly, this Church of living and loving souls was to be and will for ever be indestructible. From the first He gave this solemn pledge about it, staking His truthfulness upon the word, and His very existence, indeed, upon the word, 'Upon this rock I will build My Church; and the gates of hell'—and He meant by that all possible forces that could come out of hell—'shall not prevail against it'. The Church is indestructible. That which He called My Church, which was to Him as the apple of His eye, His dear and peculiar possession—the Church of living souls cemented together, and bound to Him by an infinite and immortal love—that will never know change or decay. There will always be upon this earth a never-diminishing and ever-increasing number of souls, men and women to whom He is more than all things else in the world, who serve Him with the perfect liberty of a joyful self-surrender, who would rather die than deny Him because He died for them, and to whom the hope of seeing His face and enjoying Him for ever is the main strength, consolation, and ecstasy of living.—J. G. GREENHOUGH, The Cross in Modern Life, p. 105.

ST. PETER'S CONFESSION

'And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.'—MATTHEW XVI. 18.

THE story of St. Peter's confession is a story of the utmost significance in the life of our Lord. As He scanned the faces of the disciples He seems to have hesitated to put the question upon which everything turned, because He does not ask them point-blank, 'Who do you think I am?' but asks first, 'Whom do men say that I, the Son of Man, am?' And in reply they tell Him of the rumours they have heard. And then we can imagine the pause, and at last the question of questions, 'But whom say ye that I am?' And Simon Peter answered and said, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God'.

I. Well, then, this is the root faith of Christendom according to its Founder—the faith that He is Divine. And I would suggest to you in passing that with us, as with St. Peter, this faith must express itself in a confession. People nowadays are a little shy of creeds. They have got a habit of calling their creeds 'dogmas' and 'formularies,' which they consider bad names. But I would ask you whether this very modern and common dislike of formularies and dogmas ought to be pressed so far as to exclude an answer to our Lord's own question, 'Whom say ye that I am?' A Christian must be now, as always, a man who, as he reads the record of Christ's life in the Gospels, is drawn to love and reverence and worship Him as the Messiah of the invisible God, and to accept His commandments as the guide of life; and if this is our faith, why should we hesitate to put it into words and say, 'I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God'? It is on this rock of confessed faith that the Church is built.

II. We are all what we are, and we all achieve in life what we achieve, by virtue of the religious faith that is personally ours, by what we believe; and secondly, I would say that we are what we are, and we achieve what we achieve, by the intensity of what we do believe, and not by our denials. Of these denials very likely we think more and talk more, and perhaps even teach and preach more, but the important things for us are our active positive beliefs. Let me apply a familiar instance. In an essay upon George Eliot, written by one of our most accomplished critics, the author describes a conversation between himself and that gifted novelist on the subject of religion. 'I remember,' he says, 'how, at Cambridge, I walked with her once in the Fellows' Garden of Trinity on an afternoon of rainy May, and she, stirred somewhat beyond her wont, and taking as her text the three words which have been used so often as inspiring trumpet-calls to men—the words "God," "Immortality," "Duty,"—pronounced with terrible earnestness how inconceivable was the first, "God"; how unbelievable was the second, "Immortality"; and yet how peremptory and how absolute the third, "Duty".'

Every Christian must regret that George Eliot's faith in God and immortality should have given way, but her power in the world was given her by what she did believe, and not by her denials of what other people believed. What gave her her great force over men's consciences was her strong faith in duty. Let us take account of our faith; let us ask ourselves what article of our creed is so solid, is such a rock as this; what religious conviction have we so firm and sure, because based upon evidence so convincing to us that we would hold it if need be against the world?

You can see how different it would have been with George Eliot if she had held the Christian faith with the same intensity as she held her own. It does matter what we believe, but it also matters how we believe—whether we believe with our heart and mind and soul and strength; because right belief is not, in itself, faith. And this is, perhaps what people sometimes have in mind when they protest against dogmas or call themselves Christians without dogma, as though dogmas were antagonistic to faith. They cannot be antagonistic to faith, because the faith of a rational being must be capable of expression in rational speech, and that is dogma. But it is true that assent to a dogma about Christ is not necessarily unclouded faith in Him. Assent to a doctrine implies the action of only a part of a man's being; and it does not follow that, because the mind assents to the Divinity of Christ, the heart must, as a consequence, admire and trust and worship Him, and the will compel the action into conformity with His commandments. Right opinions are most valuable, but we may hold right opinions without the personal relation of love and trust between the soul and God, which is faith and the essence of religion.

'Lord, to Whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life,' and we believe that 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God'. To be able to say that to Christ is to have faith in Him; and that is the faith that saves the soul.

'The gates of hell shall not prevail against it.'—MATTHEW XVI. 18.

WE understand ourselves to be risking no new assertion, but simply reporting what is already the conviction of the greatest of our age, when we say—that cheerfully recognizing, gratefully appropriating whatever Voltaire has proved, or any other man has proved, or shall prove, the Christian religion, once here, cannot again pass away; that in one or the other form, it will endure through all time; that as in Scripture, so also in the heart of man, is written, 'The gates of Hell shall not prevail against it'.—CARLYLE ON Voltaire.

'Tis said with ease, but never can be proved,
The Church her old foundations has removed,
And built new doctrines on unstable sands:
Judge that, ye winds and rains! you proved her, yet she stands.—DRYDEN.

MAN against Hell, without the help of God, is as a rabbit against the Russian Empire.—COVENTRY PATMORE.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 18.—T. Hanley Ball, Persuasions, p. 314. G. Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 139. D. Fraser, Metaphors in The Gospels, p. 144. C. J. Ridgeway, Is Not This the Christ, p. 76. J. G. Greenhough, The Cross in Modern Life, p. 105; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 237. R. F. Horton, ibid. vol. l. 1896, p. 33. J. A. Brinkwater, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 243. G. Gladstone, ibid. vol. lxi. 1903, p. 53. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. v. p. 148. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 195. XVI. 18, 19.—S. Chadwick, Humanity and God, p. 269. J. Fraser, Parochial and Other Sermons, p. 302. XVI. 19.—C. S. Robinson, Simon Peter, p. 253. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 152.

THE LOVE OF THE TRINITY IN THE RESURRECTION

'He must be raised again the third day.'—MATTHEW XVI. 21.

THE words used by our Lord in the text clearly seem the solemn rehearsal of a previous plan made long before by the Holy Trinity; 'The Son of man must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day'.

The Atonement, again, was clearly another wonderful conception of the Holy Three in One. But what we have to face is what would have been the position of the human race if the Love of the Trinity had stopped at the Atonement, for to do so will enable us to appreciate more fully the joy of Easter Day.

I. We should have had no certainty that death was not the end. We might have guessed that it was not; we should, no doubt, have made the best of the instinct of immortality which we all possess; we should have got what comfort we could from the teachings of science about the persistence of force, but how should we have looked the dying or the mourner in the face unless Jesus had said, 'I am the Resurrection and the Life; though he were dead yet shall he live, and he that believeth in Me shall never die,' and unless He had proved the truth of that promise by being raised Himself on the third day. With misty aspirations, and vague hopes, and stumbling guesses we should have followed our dear ones to the grave; and it was because the Trinity in Their love knew this that They planned to Themselves, 'Not only must the Son of Man be knit to the human race, "closer than breathing and nearer than hands and feet," not only must He suffer many things of the elders, the chief priests and scribes, but He must be raised up the third day'.

II. The sinner would have been left 'unhouselled, disappointed, unaneled'. The Atonement must not only be made, but it must be ministered; the Blood must not only be shed, but it must be sprinkled on the sinner; the Sacrifice must not only be offered, it must be pleaded; and for this the death must not only be endured, but be transfigured.

III. We can scarcely realize the blow to every effort for the uplifting of the human race if the Love of the Trinity had stopped short of the Resurrection.

It makes no difference whether we say, 'God raised Him from the dead,' or 'the Spirit raised Him from the dead,' or 'He rose Himself from the dead'—all expressions are used—the fact was that the Holy Trinity were at work, and when the Holy Trinity are at work nothing can stop that work.—BISHOP A. F. WINNINGTON INGRAM, The Guardian, 22 April, 1908, p. 649.

SYMPATHY AND SACRIFICE

'From that time forth began Jesus to shew unto His disciples, how that He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day. Then Peter took Him, and began to rebuke Him, saying, Be it far from Thee, Lord: this shall not be unto Thee. But He turned, and said unto Peter, Get thee behind Me, Satan: thou art an offence unto Me: for thou savourest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men. Then said Jesus unto His disciples, If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me.'—MATTHEW XVI. 21-24.

SIMON PETER had discerned and declared the great secret that his Master was the Messiah, the Christ of God. No sooner had the confession been made than the Master set Himself to prepare His disciples for the consequences, the hardships which loyalty to that discovered truth would involve. For such a sudden reversal of their expectations the disciples were not prepared. Peter's impulsive kind-heartedness broke out in protest. 'This be far from Thee.' The rebuke that fell from the Master's lips sounds even now as we read it in the pages of the New Testament startling and unexpected, 'Get thee behind Me, Satan: for thou art an offence unto Me'. The refusal to accept stress, struggle, and hardship as the conditions of loyalty to truth the Master saw to be the very mind of the world, the very spirit of its prince. The disciples from the first must be taught to steel their hearts and minds against it. Then saith Jesus unto His disciples, 'If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me'.

I. The Cross of Jesus Christ.—To the Christian the Cross of Jesus Christ is the centre of his deepest hopes, memories, associations. It speaks to him of the revelation of the deepest truth, the love of God manifested in fullness of self-sacrifice. It speaks to him of the satisfaction of his deepest need, the forgiveness of his sins. It speaks to him of strength and stay in the midst of his sufferings and trials. But more simply, and, alas! less acceptably, it is meant to speak to him of the inevitable fate of all high ideals in the world. They are crucified; they are realized only through struggle and suffering. It is sometimes worth while to remember that there was nothing, so to say, supernatural in the circumstances of the Passion of the Saviour. They were the mere consequences of the antagonism of the spirit of the world to truth; and our Lord accepted them with loyal obedience. The disciple is not above his Master, and the Cross remains the symbol of combat quite as truly as the symbol of consolation.

II. The Gospel of Comfort.—Is there not need at this present time of reasserting these first principles of the Christian life? It is of all things the most futile to rail at the times in which we are called to live. For us, because they are ours, they are the best; they are the times in which the Providence of God has seen that we individually have the best chance of fulfilling the purpose for which we exist, and of rendering Him the service which is His due. Yet the true spirit of service in our own day and generation is to see in its characteristic dangers the appointed opportunities of Christian witness. I think we should all agree that one of the characteristics of the present day is its shrinking from the Cross, from the truth that high ideals mean exacting demands, that loyalty to them does not bring ease but struggle, and that their consequence is hardship rather than comfort. This danger comes indeed from one of the very merits of the time. It is the result of the excess of one of its special virtues. There never was a time when kindness of heart was more real, eager, and widespread. There is scarcely any class or any individual who is not filled with the desire to remove hardships, who is not sensitive to hard cases of human suffering, perplexity, and difficulty. Everywhere the one point upon which all sorts and conditions of men are united is in the ambition to spread around us the comforts of life. This diffusion of kindness of heart is indeed a thing for which to thank God and take courage. It is full of hope; it is a most cheering indication of the soundness of the heart of the people. Yet it brings its dangers with it. It is apt to spread around us a certain softness and weakness, to loosen the moral fibre, to sap the foundations of resolute endurance and strenuous effort. Instead of speaking of the right to be comfortable, the Christian has rather to dwell upon the duty to be noble, to be self-respecting, strenuous, and ready to accept the law of stress and struggle in the moral life. The gospel of comfort which is being so sedulously preached at the present time becomes a danger unless it is checked, disciplined, and deepened by the Gospel of the Cross.

Men shrink, like St. Peter, from the approach of the Cross. It is just here that the Church of Jesus Christ must restore the balance. It must, in St. Paul's vigorous metaphor, openly placard the Cross before the eyes of men. Assuredly let it make wide its appeal, and attract men to itself and its cause by popular services and social recreation. Even more assuredly let it take its proper place in the van of all movements of charity, of all efforts to alleviate the lot of the poor, or increase and spread the opportunities of worthy human life. But when it has gained a hearing and won a place in the world let it never hesitate to set forth the Cross, to make it plain that Christianity means still a moral demand, stern and exciting. No greater service can be rendered at the present time to the nation by the Church than the service of strengthening its moral force by giving witness in its midst to the reality of moral discipline and by spreading through it the saving salt of sacrifice.—ARCHBISHOP GORDON LANG, The Guardian, 10 June, 1910.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 21.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 333. Newman Smyth, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 221. XVI. 21-23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2733. XVI. 21-24.—S. Chadwick, Humanity and God, p. 113. XVI. 21-26.—J. Parker, Hidden Springs, p. 61. XVI. 23.—F. E. Paget, Sermons for the Saints, p. 239. C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 189. W. H. Murray, The Fruits of the Spirit, p. 345.

THE MARK OF THE DISCIPLE

'Then said Jesus unto His disciples, If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me.'—MATTHEW XVI. 24.

THE mark of the disciple, the characteristic which Jesus Himself looks for, is that we, like Him, deny ourselves, take up our cross and follow Him.

I. In the Scripture there are three words which express, with perfect insight, the darker and the more difficult experiences of a religious life. The three words are 'burden,' 'thorn,' and 'cross'.

1. By the word burden both the Old Testament and the New means all the inevitable care and strain of earthly life.

2. By the thorn we mean the experience of a keener anguish. It always points to some one singular trial. It describes some humbling infirmity, some mortifying disability, some weakness which makes us miserable, because it unfits us for our task.

3. The cross. Every man must bear his own burden. Every man has his thorn in the flesh. But the cross is not universal, and the cross can be escaped. Many men and women never bear a cross at all. Many can refuse if they will, and many do refuse. The whole spiritual tragedy of many who are not disciples of Christ will be found to lie here, that when the cross lay before them they refused it.

II. This truth is clear in the experience of Christ.

1. Jesus had His burden. The Gospels tell us a part of the story. His subjection to His parents, the toil of the carpenter's shop, the poverty of the home, His weariness and pain, the hunger and thirst, His enduring of the scorn and contempt of the rich and well-placed and successful—these were the burdens He shared with men.

2. Jesus had His thorn. I do not know, and no one knows, what Christ's thorn was. The thorn that Jesus could not escape, until released by death, may have been the hunger and the thirst of a heart famished for the sight of God's face.

3. But Jesus had His cross. He took it up. He might have laid it down. He faced His cross all through His ministry. At His baptism He laid it on His shoulders. In His temptation He bound it to Him with cords. As He passed on through life it was the invisible weight He carried. In the garden of Gethsemane He might have flung it down and gone out to make His peace with Caiaphas, to sit at Herod's table and talk enchantingly to him, and to find Himself an honoured guest in the house of Pilate. His cross was that life and death for sin which came to its consummation in His dying hour.

III. When we follow the suggestion of our text, we find—

1. That cross-bearing begins with a definite act. It begins in the hour when, in the depths of our will, we resolve to follow Christ.

2. Cross-bearing continues in a daily experience.

There are two reasons for this. The first is that life does not stand still. We are continually passing into new circumstances, facing changed situations, meeting new problems and fresh temptations. And the second reason is that we ourselves change in character and in ideal. We grow into the grace and knowledge of Jesus Christ.

3. Our cross can be borne only as we follow Christ. 'Let him deny himself,' said Jesus, declaring the first definite act. 'Take up his cross,' He adds, indicating the daily experience. 'Follow me,' He continues with a deeper note of appeal, giving us the secret of continuance.

What is the issue of this bearing of the cross? The issue of our cross is in our measure the same as the issue of Christ's cross. He bore His cross that He might save men, and we bear our cross that we may also be the saviours of our fellows. Whenever in the simplest and humblest way we bear our cross after Him, we save some life from sorrow and pain, some tempted one from his fall, some soul from death. And it is the men who have borne the burden and accepted the thorn who have also carried the cross.—

W. M. Clow, The Cross in Christian Experience, p. 231.

Illustrations.—1. Woe to him who seeks his own ease! Woe to him who shuns the Cross! because he will find others so weighty that they will overwhelm him.—S. VINCENT DE PAUL.

2. Life is a burden; bear it.
Life is a duty; dare it.
Life is a thorn crown; wear it.
Though it break your heart in twain,
Though the burden crush you down;
Close your lips, and hide your pain:
First the cross, and then the crown.

3. Let us go on full of cheerfulness, and be sure that all our crosses will bear Christ with them, and that His help, which will never be wanting, will be more powerful than the combined efforts of all our enemies.—S. IGNATIUS DE LOYOLA.

WHY A YOUNG MAN IS NOT A CHRISTIAN (Because he does not understand what Christianity is)

‘Then said Jesus unto His disciples, If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me.’—MATTHEW XVI. 24.

It may be a bold thing to say, but it is perfectly true, that a great many men are not Christians because they do not know the conditions of Christianity. The Christian Church is such an elaborate institution, with her buildings and her services, her sacraments and her ministers; and the Christian theology is so profound and complicated, with its doctrines about God and man, sin and salvation; and the Christian life has become so conventional, with its rules and customs,—that not one man out of twenty has ever got through the forms to the spirit or has ever looked at Christ in the Gospels with his own eyes and heard Him speak with his own ears. It does not matter that Christ spoke with the utmost clearness upon all occasions and was never plainer than in laying down the conditions of discipleship. If a hundred were placed at a table with a pencil and a sheet of paper before them, one wonders how many could write down what Christ demanded of His followers. One hazards the guess that there would be twenty different answers, and half of them at least would be beside the mark. This is a misfortune. Many more men would be Christians if they distinctly grasped the necessary elements of Christianity, but they have heard so much about Christianity that they really do not know what it is. In fact they cannot see the wood for the trees.

For instance, there is the man—and that is my point now—who is unable to call himself by the name of our Master upon intellectual grounds, either because he thinks he understands the doctrines of Christianity and cannot accept them, or because he thinks he is not fit to understand them, and so of course gives them up in despair. One is too honest, and the other is too modest to be a Christian; and the barrier in both cases is, say the Doctrine of the Trinity, or the Deity of Christ, or Election, or Future Punishment. This religion they feel is too theoretical and too learned, too much taken up with things which cannot be proved and which have no bearing on our present life. If Christianity were only stripped of her doctrines, and there never had been such a thing as the Nicene Creed; if Christianity had been only simply a practical principle of life, they also might have been Christians. And they give pledges of sincerity in this desire by listening to any voice that will speak plainly to the heart and conscience, and by openly admiring any Christian who lives the Sermon on the Mount. Here they say is something intelligible, and here is something excellent.

I. The theory of Christianity has nothing whatever to do with its practice. People use the telephone every day without understanding in the slightest degree how sound is conveyed by the electric wire, and we walk beneath the light of the stars without even knowing their names. Jesus left it to others, to St. Paul and to the theologians, to argue out Christianity; but He Himself brought Christianity near and made Christianity plain. From the beginning of His ministry to the end He asked no one to accept any creed, except to believe in Him; and there must be something wrong in the man who does not believe in Jesus Christ. What ails him in regard to Christ? What is wanting in Christ? Where did he ever see one better? Can he imagine any master greater? Christ indulged in no speculations, however fascinating, and however fruitful, from the day He met His first disciples on to the night He bade them good-bye. He always called to action, and was much more concerned about what a man did and what a man was than what he thought and said. Jesus did not make His plea with arguments about the origin of things and the nature of things, but with invitations to abandon that which was evil and to cleave to that which was good. A New Testament has been published in which our Lord's words throughout the whole book are printed in red, and it were worth while that a man should purchase that red-letter Testament in order to see what Christ really said. He will find that the words of the Lord are flung into relief not merely by the coloured type, but by their simplicity and beauty, by their reality and attractiveness.

II. What then does Jesus lay upon His disciples as the condition of Christianity if He does not lay doctrine? Two things; and both of them are most reasonable. He must be prepared to deny himself. And that does not mean that he should torture his body, or refuse the joy of life, or fetter himself by conventional habits, or be an ascetic in any shape or fashion; but it does mean that he should watch and curb his lower self. There are the remains of the beast in every one of us; and Christ expects a man to keep his passions in order, to live cleanly, to regulate his temper, to beat down envy, to overcome avarice. And the other demand is that he cultivate his higher self, for there is the prophecy of a saint in every one of us as well as the trace of a beast. Most of us indeed are half-way, and neither one nor the other. 'You must carry the Cross,' said Christ; and by this He meant that we must live for other people and not for ourselves, that we must make sacrifices to fulfil great ends, that we must accept heavy burdens to lighten weak shoulders, and that we must not be afraid of a little suffering. 'If any man would be My disciple,' Christ says, 'he must pledge himself to a great effort in his soul and life to kill the bad and feed the good.' Is not this intelligible, is not this reasonable, is not this admirable? Well, the man who is doing this with purpose of heart is a Christian.—JOHN WATSON, Respectable Sins, p. 83.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 24.—R. Winterbotham, Sermons and Expositions, p. 360. R. Higinbotham, Sermons, p. 162. H. P. Liddon, Sermons on Some Words of Christ, p. 78. C. Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 219. J. H. Odell, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 324. S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 239.

SACRIFICE

'If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me. For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for My sake shall find it'—MATTHEW XVI. 24, 25.

I. WOVEN into the very texture of life, giving to it its sternness and its pathos, making it oftentimes a marvel or a tragedy, fixed by a mysterious law as the condition of fuller life of fruitful work and of assured glory, is the principle of sacrifice.

II. Sacrifice is the highest and the noblest act of a loving soul. There is a royalty in it that wins our instinctive homage. In it a man's or woman's true self—the God-like regenerate self—that is so generally hidden and cramped by selfishness and conventionality is shown in its beauty and majesty: too loving to be selfish, too great to be conventional, splendid in its scorn of falsehood and wrong, it is a power of God which accomplishes an eternal work.

But we look away from this idealized manhood and womanhood, and we learn the secret of this transfiguring power of sacrifice.

Upon a Cross, uplifted between earth and heaven, pouring out His life in shame and agony, in darkness and dereliction, hangs the Son of Man, conquering the world and the devil, sin and death, by the uttermost sacrifice, and winning the victory and glory and crown of sacrifice for all humanity, consecrating pain and sorrow, and throwing upon the dread mystery of evil the light of the eternal purpose there fulfilled in love. 'It is finished.'

III. The disciples of the Crucified should be as their Master. Sharers of His life, they must follow Him in sacrifice.

Consider first some of the things that concern chiefly the outward life:—

1. Time is to be offered as a perpetual offering. First, by withdrawing, saving it from selfish uses. Secondly, by the watchful seizure and use of opportunities.

2. Work is an acceptable offering as we do it for God, and not as only for man.

3. Speech is a faculty to be used in God's service. So, too, in the things that belong to the inward life, sacrifice should find scope and material, as the human will is merged in the Divine will.

1. Thought should be so directed in prayer and watchfulness, so taught by meditation on holy things, that it may be won from the folly and evil, the malice and the passion, the foolish imaginations and the sentimentality that so often hold it, and that it may be surrendered, held as a little kingdom in which God only shall reign, a place in which He shall ever speak and be always heard, the voice of eternal Truth.

2. The affections, too, must be sincerely offered, ruled in the spirit of sacrifice that they may be both centred and satisfied in God.

Our inclinations, too, often conflict with the call of God, with the duties and claims of life, with Christian principles as we have been made to understand them. These also must be yielded lovingly and patiently.

IV. And there is another form of sacrifice. What is the particular sorrow, suffering, loss, that is the trial of life? It is a matter in which the will may be offered to God. As Christ completed the offering of His life upon the cross, so our spiritual troubles are a cross on which we, too, may truly offer ourselves as a complete and consummated sacrifice, which will effect to the full all that love can ask or desire.—G. BRETT, Fellowship With God, p. 33.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 24, 25.—J. Vickery, Ideals of Life, p. 295. XVI. 24-26.—W. Hay M. H. Aitken, Mission Sermons (2nd Series), p. 125. XVI. 24-28.—F. D. Maurice, Sermons, p. 127; see also Lincoln's Inn Sermons, vol. iv. p. 110. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2729.

LOSING THE SOUL TO SAVE IT

'Whosoever will save his life, shall lose it.'—MATTHEW XVI. 25.

I. THE sense of the passage turns upon one prominent word—what is meant by the soul or the life of man? The soul is the living principle.

And obviously the health or the sickness, the saving or the losing, the life or the death of this soul must be a matter of infinite moment to a man, both in time and in eternity, for it guides his actions, it regulates his affections, it influences his feeling; it is to his whole being what the mainspring is to a watch. It is in health when it works in harmony with purity and truth, and righteousness and love, which are the expression of God's own will, and when in the language of Scripture it is guided by the mind of the Spirit. It is diseased, it is dying, and is lost when it abandons itself to the jarring, jangling, lacerating, corrupting forces of a lower world, whose order is disorder—when, in fact it is given over to the mind of the flesh.

II. But how save the soul? The text gives the response: 'Save your soul by losing it, for you will never lose it by saving it'. So far as concerns the primary application of the words to the contrast between the earthly life and the heavenly, between God and the world, the meaning is obvious and easy. Whosoever prefers self, where truth, or honour, or love, or purity, or reverence, demands self-abnegation, self-abandonment, that man loses his soul, loses his life by saving it. But though the man who saves his soul is sure to lose it, yet it does not follow conversely that he who loses his soul will as certainly save it. In this latter case an important proviso is added, 'for My sake'.

'For My sake.' We dare not limit the words as if they applied only to sacrifices made consciously and directly in the cause of Christianity. If Christ be the very eternal word of God, the very expression of the Father's truth, of the Father's righteousness, of the Father's purity, of the Father's love, then the sacrifice of self to any one of these things is a saving of the soul by losing it.

III. Within the sphere of religion itself the same contrast and the same alternative may exist. It is possible to be anxious about saving the soul, to be extremely religious in a certain sense, but yet to risk the losing of it in the very desire of saving it. There are two ways of pursuing salvation, the true and the false. The false view takes a valetudinarian view of the soul and the functions of the spiritual being; it confines the soul to the sick chamber, withholding it from all healthy and vigorous exercise, and the soul pines and sickens and dies under the treatment. It is ruined by inconsiderate care; it is lost by being saved. The true method treats the soul as an active, healthy, living vitality, exposes it, adventures it, abandons it. The soul must brace itself by vigorous exercise; and that it may drink in the free air and genial sunshine it must commit itself to the struggles and vicissitudes of life, must spend and be spent, must lose itself that it may be saved. The true method of salvation is a great venture of self, a forgetfulness of self, a going out of self.—J. B. LIGHTFOOT, Penny Pulpit vol. XII. No. 672, p. 43.

REFERENCE.—XVI. 25.—A. H. MONOUR SLIME, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 388.

THE SOUL: ITS MEANING AND VALUE

'What is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?'—MATTHEW XVI. 26.

THE word 'soul' is a great word; it is a religious word; it is made sometimes too narrowly a religious word.

I. Put the word 'soul' out until we need it. Let us read, 'What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his sight?' That is a term you can comprehend. 'Soul' is metaphysical, spiritual, transcendental; but you know what you mean by your own eyes. What is a man profited, if he shall gain the world, and lose his eyes? What is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his hearing? Not a man amongst you would give his sight for the world, would give his hearing for the world, and yet the man will give his soul for nothing. Such fools are men. You would not expect it to be so, but this is the miracle that is performed every day, that a man who would not give his sight for a mountain of gold, will sell his soul for one hour's forbidden pleasure. Where is the wisdom? Here is impudent prudence, here the sagacity that quickly turns in upon itself and slays the soul that is proud of it.

II. Now we come back to the other point, and say that when you have given your soul you have given your sight. It is the soul that sees. For you have no pictures if you cannot see them; and you cannot see them if you have no soul. You can have acres of canvas, but no pictures. When you have paid your soul for your pleasures you have paid your hearing. It is the soul that hears. Oh, see the great master there, the one musician out of whom all other musicians seem to have been cut; you say, 'He is deaf,' but not in the soul, only in the flesh: it is his soul that hears; it is the soul that was Beethoven.

Take care of your soul—yourself. He that would save his life shall lose it. You will save your soul—yourself—best by giving yourself away in the spirit of Christ, under the inspiration and benediction of His Cross.

The soul is the secret and value of all things that are called practical.

The one thing that men forget, who boast of their being practical at the expense of their being religious, is the soul being required of them; they omit the element of responsibility, they omit the element of having to face God; their very calculation is absurd in its first line, and vicious in its mocking result. He is practical who works from the soul-centre.

III. Jesus came to save the soul. He did not come to save the body only. There was nothing so easy as healing sick bodies; Christ's difficulty was in saving the soul. He said, 'Nothing is worth doing but saving men'; and when He said men He meant souls, spirits, immortalities, the entity within that outlives the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds; that mysterious thing that will not die, that upper fruit that death's black hand cannot wrench from the living tree.—JOSEPH PARKER, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 172.

THE NOTHINGNESS OF THIS WORLD

'What shall a man give in exchange for his soul.'—MATTHEW XVI. 26.

WE still crave for something, we do not well know what; but we are sure it is something which the world has not given us. And then its changes are so many, so sudden, so silent, so continual. It never leaves changing; it goes on to change, till we are quite sick at heart: then it is that our reliance on it is broken. It is plain we cannot continue to depend upon it, unless we keep pace with it, and go on changing too; but this we cannot do. We feel that, while it changes, we are one and the same; and thus, under God's blessing, we come to have some glimpse of the meaning of our independence of things temporal, and our immortality. And should it so happen that misfortunes come upon us (as they often do), then still more are we led to understand the nothingness of this world; then still more are we led to distrust it, and are weaned from the love of it, till at length it floats before our eyes merely as some idle veil, which, notwithstanding its many tints, cannot hide the view of what is beyond it; and we begin, by degrees, to perceive that there are but two beings in the whole universe, our own soul, and the God who made it.—J. II. NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 26.—S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 24. R. W. Dale, Fellowship with Christ, p. 147. W. J. Knox-Little, The Journey of Life, p. 41. J. L. Muirhead, Pulpit Discourses, Berwick Presbytery, p. 50. J. W. King, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 161. D. M. Ross, ibid. vol. li. 1897, p. 122. H. P. Liddon, Sermons Preached on Special Occasions, p. 75. M. R. Vincent, God and Bread, p. 21. J. Fraser, Parochial and other Sermons, p. 23. J. H. Newman, Parochial and Plain Sermons, p. 15.

FROM THENCE HE SHALL COME TO JUDGE THE QUICK AND THE DEAD

‘The Son of man shall come in the glory of His Father with His angels; and then shall He render unto every man according to his deeds.’—MATTHEW XVII. 27.

I. CONSIDER exactly what we mean and what we do not mean by judgment. Most of us admit that there is need of some readjustment of things if the Ruler of the world is to deserve the name of just. Apart from revelation there would seem a probability amounting to a certainty that a day of rectification must be in store for a world now such a confusion and chance medley. Our holy Faith meets the human craving, and the Church presents a picture none can see unmoved of a last great and terrible day, with the Judge standing between the saved and the lost, and bidding one company enter heaven and the other depart to hell.

Men rehearsed the solemn words in which Christ describes the last judgment all through the ages of faith. The grandest music described the bliss of the saved, and the terrors of the lost. Painters like Michael Angelo and Tintoretto painted both in colours glowing with splendour.

II. How is it now? The reality which these images represented has been clouded and sicklied over by doubt owing to two mistakes. (1) Men have vulgarized the judgment side of the picture; (2) men have made free with the attributes of pardon and grace.

So we require the final judgment—to confirm some verdicts and to reverse others. The question of the method of the Advent Assize of the universe is left in darkness. But that a process like that which the Bible represents must conclude the world drama we may confidently believe.

III. Do not think of the final judgment as a grand pageant invented by theologians and embodied in colour and music by painters and musicians. It will be as real as life itself. And if you ask, what shall I do now? this minute I say, ‘Judge therefore yourselves that ye be not judged of the Lord’. There is a saying of Christ which shows very clearly how we are being judged now, and by what we are judged. ‘He that rejecteth Me and receiveth not My words hath One that judgeth him; the word that I have spoken the same shall judge him in the last day.’ We shall be judged by the standard Christ set up.

At that last judgment there will be not only a scrutiny but a readjustment. After the scrutiny there will be a reversal of man's judgments in many cases. Those who are now considered saints and heroes may prove to be pretenders; the humble and neglected will meet recognition and reward. In the great day the judge will be our Lord, who is all-knowing, so we may be as sure of His charity as of His wisdom, for charity is the daughter of knowledge.—C. H. BUTCHER, The Sound of a Voice that is Still, p. 87.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 27. —W. Garrett Horder, The Other World, p. 71. B. F. Westcott, The Historic Faith, p. 87. George Salmon, Gnosticism and Agnosticism, p. 272. XVI. 28.—H. C. Mabie, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxviii. 1906, p. 374. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 594. XVII. 1.—J. D. Jones, The Gospel of Grace, p. 189. XVII. 1, 2.—Reuben Thomas, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 182. H. Scott Holland, ibid. vol. lv. 1899, p. 33. ‘Plain Sermons’ by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. iii. p. 223. XVII. 1-5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2658. XVII. 1-7.—R. Bickerdike, Penny Pulpit, vol. xiv. No. 820, p. 241. XVII. 1-8.—A. B. Davidson, Waiting upon God, p. 139. W. A. Gray, The Shadow of the Hand, p. 217. XVII. 1-13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2729. A. McLaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 343. XVII. 2.—G. Campbell Morgan, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 364. W. G. Davies, ibid. vol. lxxiv. 1903, p. 411. W. Alexander, The Great Question, p. 213. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2729. XVII. 3.—W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 163.

THE USE OF RELIGIOUS EXCITEMENT

‘Lord, it is good for us to be here: if Thou wilt, let us make here three tabernacles; one for Thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias.’—MATTHEW XVII. 4.

ALTHOUGH there is no necessity to give much heed to the words of one, who, when he spoke them, was so startled and confused, that he knew not what he said, yet I suppose, in truth, St. Peter was right in the former part of his saying, and wrong in the latter.

I. Why did God bestow upon us the power of religious emotion? It is certain that no power, no faculty of the soul was given in vain. Each has its proper use and end; its proper exercise, its proper degree, and its proper relation to other powers and faculties. It must be so with religious emotion. God sends this religious emotion to many persons in many ways. A deep stirring of the heart and conscience comes to most people in the events of their own lives. What is to be said of these occasional times of excited feeling?—

1. That no man must take religious feeling for religion.

2. That God gives these periods of strong feeling as mighty helps to our weak and wavering courage; that they are a spur to the halting obedience, and a goad to the reluctant will.

II. But I think these times of unusual religious fervour have another use. They open to the soul visions of a state of love, and joy, and heavenly mindedness, which, if afterwards they turn into nothing but regret and longing, nevertheless, leave behind them a blessing.

III. How far is religious emotion to form any part of our daily religious life, or, in other words, how far are the feelings to be regularly employed in the service of God? I have done with exceptional religious emotion. What shall we say as to ordinary religious emotion? Is it a good thing, or a bad thing? Assuredly, our feelings were not given us for the purpose of being crushed out. Our religion is not one of mere dry duty. The very fact that love holds so prominent a place in it is a proof that, at least, some amount of religious feeling is necessary for a true religious life. But supposing there is in the daily religious life of some more of the element of excitement. Supposing that there are not a few, in whom nothing better than a naturally restless disposition, or a craving after emotional stimulants in spiritual things, accounts for their enjoyment of many church services, much preaching and the like, no one will affirm that the motive which actuates such persons is a very high one. Their religious acts must rank far lower than such as are done from principle and a sense of duty; and though I do not wish to speak of those acts as very meritorious, I come back to the old question: why did God make us able to enjoy certain things more than others? why did God implant in us, though far more in some than in others, a craving after what may move, and stir, and perchance elevate the soul? Take any keen, eager, impulsive, excitable person, may I not believe that God gave such person the power of quick impulse and eager aspiration for some worthy end?—W. WALSHAM HOW, Penny Pulpit, vol. xii. No. 705, p. 309.

THE TRANSFIGURATION

'Lord, it is good for us to be here.'—MATTHEW XVII. 4.

THE probable locality was Mount Hermon, not Tabor, as tradition says. The event occurred, according to Luke, while Christ was praying. It was good to be with Christ anywhere. It was good for the disciples now, for the following reasons:—

I. It Confirmed Their Belief in a Future State.—Centuries had passed since Moses died on Pisgah and since Elijah ascended to heaven in a chariot of fire, yet here they were alive, talking with Jesus.

II. It Taught Them that there was a Spiritual body.—Moses and Elias evidently appeared in a bodily form.

III. It Revealed to Them Christ's Divine Character and Mission.—Here were Moses, the lawgiver, and Elijah, the chief of the prophets, bearing witness to Him. They spake of His death, which had been foreshadowed in the ancient sacrifices and in the utterances of prophecy. Their sudden disappearance, connected with the words, 'This is my beloved Son,' indicated that type and prophecy were now fulfilled, and that Christ was Prophet, Priest, and King.

IV. It Prepared Them for Coming Trials.

Sorrow often follows closely upon joy.
The joy prepares us for the sorrow.

In conclusion: it was good to be there; it would not have been good to remain there. There was work to be done, sorrow to be lightened, sin to be grappled with and overcome.—F. J. AUSTIN, Seeds and Saplings, p. 13.

REFERENCES.—XVII. 4.—J. H. Thom, Laws of Life, p. 379. E. W. Moore, Life Transfigured, p. 1. C. H. Wright, The Unrecognized Christ, p. 29. H. J. Willmot-Buxton, Holy-Tide Teaching, p. 150. H. D. M. Spence, Voices and Silences, p. 153. T. B. Hindsley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1904, p. 236. E. G. Baines, ibid. vol. lxx. 1906, p. 157. XVII. 4, 5.—H. E. Ryle, On the Church of England, p. 112. XVII. 5.—C. S. Macfarland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 21. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 909. XVII. 5, 6, 7.—Ibid. vol. xxix. No. 1727.

JESUS ONLY

'And when they had lifted up their eyes they saw no man, save Jesus only.'—MATTHEW XVII. 8.

CHRIST gave to His timid followers a glimpse of His glory, but He would not allow them to rest upon it, but upon Himself in the human nature that He had assumed; and so, 'when they lifted up their eyes, they saw no man, save Jesus only'.

I. There is a danger, especially for the young, in letting their religion be based on mere love or regard for a minister or a religious friend. Such personal attachment is natural, but it is neither wise nor safe. Use their teaching as far as you may, but do not lean upon them, or upon any human stay. In the matter of the soul's salvation fix your heart and fix your hope on no man, but on Jesus only.

II. Others there are who allow their religion to be unduly influenced by particular places and circumstances. This is letting association get too great power over us.

III. And, in the days when we feel burdened with a sense of our sin, may we then look to no man, save to Jesus only. The memory of our sins must always make us sad: we must always, to the end of our days, look back upon our sins with shame, and sorrow, and pain; but if we look to no man save to Jesus only for pardon, we need not despair; nay, the true penitent is assured of immediate pardon of his sin. We may gratefully accept the comfort of absolution, the assurance of cancelled guilt, if we lift up our eyes in the time of trouble, determined to see no man, save Jesus only.

IV. But, besides sin, sorrow often makes the people of God go heavily. In the hour of heart-break and of bitter grief, in the time of privation and of sore distress, may we be able to take comfort from the thought that though men are miserable comforters yet the Son of Man, our unseen Friend, is able to bind up every wound.

V. And if this be so with you in sorrow, then in the hour of your own death you will have the one Friend with you who can go down with you into the dark valley, where all other friends must leave you.

VI. Lastly, if Jesus be with us, loved and trusted in the common hours of the common life, not only will He comfort and sustain us when we are called to pass under the cloud and the shadow of sorrow, not only will He uphold us in the hour of death, but He will even give us promised strength, beyond the thought of man to conceive!—He will even give us boldness in the Day of Judgment.—ERSKINE CLARKE, Penny Pulpit, vol. xii. No. 676, p. 75.

‘And when they had lifted up their eyes, they saw no man, save Jesus only.’—MATTHEW XVII. 8.

For the Word of the Law and Wrath must give place to the Word of Life and Grace; because, though the Word of Condemnation be glorious, yet the Word of Life and Salvation doth far exceed in glory. Also, that Moses and Elias must both vanish, and leave Christ and his Saints alone.—JOHN BUNYAN.

REFERENCES.—XVII. 8.—W. Baxendale, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 195. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, pp. 79, 138. W. J. Knox-Little, Church Times, vol. liv. 1905, p. 165. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 924. XVII. 14.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 124. W. T. Houldsworth, Church Times, vol. xxxvii. 1897, p. 139. XVII. 14-21.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 319. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 299. J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 278.

UNBELIEF

‘O faithless and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you! how long shall I suffer you?’—MATTHEW XVII. 17.

THE disciples had the power to cast out devils. They tried and failed. They were weak in Christ’s absence; they had been dejected by His previous words about His death, and now by His withdrawal to the mountain, and so they had been unsuccessful. They could not cast out because of their unbelief. The child’s father was at his wit’s end. He had had a poor trembling faith, if any. The scribes and others with none at all, were maliciously chuckling over their failure. To them all Christ comes straight from the Transfiguration, and when He sees their grief, these words which express holy impatience, endless pity, and personal sorrow are wrung from Him. They are:—

I. A Cry of Pain.—We can understand how the sight should have been more than ordinarily sorrowful to Him, from its sharp contrast with the Transfiguration, and therefore there was pressed out what was ordinarily hidden, the sharp pain and real grief which it was to Him to walk among men.

We all know what uncongenial society means, but perhaps we do not give sufficient prominence to this phase of Our Saviour’s life. He was the ‘man of Sorrows’; ‘Himself bare our sicknesses,’ and other passages speaking of Him as bearing the burden of sin, do not point only to His death on the Cross, but to all His earthly life. Remember His nature, perfect purity, perfect love, perfect knowledge, acute human sensibility, and take all these as heightening the daily martyrdom which it was to Him to dwell among men. We see but little of it, but it was most real, and all this was borne for us, and He bears it all still.

II. A Word of Loving Remonstrance.—It is not a word of anger, but of remonstrance, seeking to cure, and that is how He stands before human unbelief.

III. A Promise of Infinite Forbearance and Abiding Presence.—Christ recognizes in the disciples’ weakness without Him a necessity for His still continuing with them. He is staid by their need of Him, as a mother by her tottering child. And in like manner the second clause is really: ‘How long will you draw on my forbearance with nothing but the under thought that it is inexhaustible?’ So we have the assurance of His pitying presence with us, and that presence is the cure, if we will, for all our ills, and of His endless long suffering. He never goes away from any of us. We cannot break the covenant of His love.—A. MACLAREN.

REFERENCES.—XVII. 17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 821. W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church’s Year, p. 48. W. J. Knox-Little, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxviii. 1905, p. 97. XVII. 17, 18.—H. Scott Holland, ibid. vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 193. XVII. 19.—J. E. C. Weldon, The Spiritual Life, p. 243. E. A. Stuart, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 342. James Denney, Gospel Questions and Answers, p. 39. XVII. 19, 20.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew IX.-XVII. p. 352. XVII. 19-21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 549; vol. xlii. No. 2454.

THE VICTORY OF FAITH

‘If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed . . . nothing shall be impossible unto you.’—MATTHEW XVII. 20 (with 1 JOHN v. 4).

I. Faith is a Quality which ensures Man’s Growth and Expansion.—It does not operate suddenly or effect miraculous changes; it takes time like the grain of mustard seed, but it is victorious in the end even against overwhelming odds. In one way or another all the greatest things we know of have been and are achieved by its power. It is faith that removes mountains of difficulty, that overcomes the manifold dangers, oppositions, weaknesses, impossibilities, of this mortal life of ours, and casts them into the sea of human triumph.

(a) Take the realm of commerce by way of example.—What is it that enables a man to launch forth into enterprises that startle the world, but faith in the practicability of some great scheme which to the cautious and prudent seems only foolhardy and chimerical?

(b) What is it that buoys up the lonely scientific worker, through years of painstaking calculation and experiment, but faith in the certainty of an ultimate discovery?

(c) Or what, in the sphere of intellectual effort, accounts for the difference between the good or the bad teacher, but that one believes and the other does not believe in the efficacy of the training and instruction it is their business to give. The good teacher is one who believes that his or her efforts will never be wasted, however unpromising the soil on which the good seed is sown.

(d) It is faith which has inspired and carried through all the crusades against evil and all the reforms and revolutions that have helped to rid the world of tyrannies, abuses, cruelties, and depravities of every kind.

II. Faith is the Conquering Principle in Religion.—For Christian faith is not a thing apart from one's ordinary human nature and imposed upon it from without; it is the expansion of an original inherent moral quality, common to us all; it is the spiritualization of a natural faculty; it is the daily energizing, vitalizing power in which we live and do our best work, brought into contact with the Divine power. So glorified it overcomes the world—the worldly spirit with its carnal aims, countless temptations, and unholy methods, being the hardest thing there is to overcome. But even unglorified, it has this overcoming power, and if we only get to see this clearly, we shall not find so much difficulty in transferring to the life of religion a quality which we have learnt to regard as the supreme essential in every secular sphere.

THE MUSTARD SEED OF FAITH

'Verily I say unto you, if ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove, and nothing shall be impossible unto you.'—MATTHEW XVII. 20.

This text seems to tell me three things:—

I. The Infinite Value of even a Little Faith.—That little bit of faith which you have, though it is only like a little grain of mustard seed, is the most valuable treasure you have got. We never know when we plant a seed and water it what it will grow to. Therefore, while not despising the little grain of mustard seed of faith in ourselves, let us not despise it in others. Scatter the seed when you can, and go on bravely, leaving it to the Eternal God to water the seed and make it grow.

II. The Absolute Certainty that Faith Grows.—I heard the other day an address by a very able and devout man, who is a great authority in science, and I was very much struck with one thing he said. 'I look back over twenty years, and I would not exchange for anything the solid certainty of to-day for the warm feelings of twenty years ago. I would not give up the way that my faith has grown for the more ardent feelings of my youth.' We are taught by feeling, but we walk by faith. And if there are any people discouraged in middle life by the little warmth of feeling they now have, the question for them is. Has their faith grown?

III. The Wonderful Power of Faith.—'If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you.' One hardly dare say to oneself that there is almost an exaggeration in such a statement as that, and yet, when you look at life on a large scale, that is exactly what happens. You could not possibly describe it more precisely. Faith removes mountains.

IV. How is that Faith to grow and Expand that it may become this Strong and Useful Tree?—We must see to it that the seed of faith is not dissipated by some flippant remark, is not snatched away by the Evil One in waiting. The seed has no chance unless you give it a chance. But when you have done your part, remember that God is ready to do His part.—BISHOP WINNINGTON-INGRAM, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXVIII. p. 331, 1905.

REASONS OF FAILURE

'Because of your unbelief.'—MATTHEW XVII. 20.

I. THE text covers all failures. 'Because of your unbelief.' Jesus had but one explanation. You do not get on in life because of your unbelief. The reason you fail in business is because of your unbelief; the reason why you wither in intellect is because of your unbelief. You do not know how deeply faith goes, you cannot tell what a penetrating power it has and how it takes up all things along with it, and secures them all in one multifold and compendious blessing. Faith is not sentiment, but power. The mystery is that you have been believing the wrong thing, you have been working at the wrong end, and you have been miscalculating the whole purpose of the kingdom of God, which is power—power to live, power to think, power to overcome temptation, power to drive out of the life everything that sucks out of it the very pith of existence. You must know that without power you die. And faith is not only power, faith is beneficent power. Power of the beneficent sort would make a new world. Beneficent power never goes about the streets seeking what it can gain for itself; beneficent power parades the road in order to take out of that road everything that can hinder life, everything that can keep back the light, everything that can prevent the soul growing, expanding, blossoming in God.

II. If faith is beneficent power, then the want of faith inflicts serious injury on society. It is not what you are doing, but it is what you might be doing, that is the great and solemn question, that is continually before the serious mind of the serious man. If I have not faith it is not I who lose only, it is the other man.

Faith conquers all, rules the whole kingdom, and will prosper and succeed and fructify into blessed, beneficent fruits when all your intellectual framework has melted away and is no longer to be seen, for it is not only of works, but of the meanest kind of works, works with which you have nothing to do, it came to you without your seeking, and will wither away because of your mere wordy, tumultuous pride.

III. You are never a man in the full sense until you have faith. Faith is manhood as well as a gospel. Faith is the secret of commerce as well as the secret of eternity. Unless you have faith you cannot be really at your best estate. That is a proposition which must be thought out and thought out carefully, so that you can lay hold upon it and live by it. You were meant to believe that all that ever came before Christ were thieves and robbers; they had not got the right idea of manhood. Manhood is faith; faith is manhood, and unless you have faith you cannot come to the full estate of manhood as God meant you to come to it.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. VI. p. 146.

REFERENCES.—XVII. 20.—Stopford A. Brooke, The Fight of Faith, p. 38. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 201. T. F. Lockyer, The Inspirations of the Christian Life, p. 63. XVII. 21.—Archdeacon Colley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 115. J. H. Jowett, Meditations for Quiet Moments, p. 110. XVII. 24-7.—J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 116. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 307. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 331. XVII. 25, 26.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew, IX.-XVII. p. 374; see also Obed and Conduct, p. 374. XVII. 27.—T. Champness, New Coins from Old Gold, p. 102. C. S. Robinson, Simon Peter, p. 294.

SPIRITUAL SINS

'At the same time came the disciples unto Jesus, saying, Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?'—MATTHEW XVIII. 1.

I. Spiritual Envy.—Our text relates to the first occasion. Our Lord has just taken St. Peter, St. James and St. John away from the other disciples into the Mount of Transfiguration. The other disciples had doubtless plied them with questions, but they could get no information from them as to what had happened. We can understand their thought—how on the part of the nine disciples there may have been envy at this time, envy of the other three because of the greater privilege which they enjoyed. There is, I am afraid, a disposition on the part of very many to envy those to whom Heaven has given blessings it has withheld from ourselves. We imagine that others are the favourites of Heaven. How does our Lord rebuke this spirit in the disciples? He takes a little child and sets that little child in the midst of them, as much as to say, 'God has no favourites. God loves all, even this little child.' You must receive this little child, and you must not imagine for a single moment that though God gives certain privileges to certain men which He denies to other men, these men therefore are the special favourites of Heaven. He has denied them to you because for your work they are not necessary. So it seemed good to the Father for the working out of His own great purposes in the world.' On the other hand there may have been on the part of the other three a creeping in of pride that they had been thus singled out by the Master, that they had been admitted, as it were, into a great secret, and there was a temptation, it may be, to be proud towards the others. If there is anything of that kind, how the great Master scorns it. He tells these very men, that if there is one thing they are to beware of it is of this pride. Christ would teach both those who envy others and those who may be tempted to be proud of their gifts. He wants them to remember that these gifts are given for the building up of the Church, and not on account of their own merit.

II. Spiritual Ambition.—In St. Matthew xx. 20 the circumstances are quite different. Our Lord has just foretold His coming death, and St. James and St. John are able to look through this announcement of the coming Cross and see the Kingdom beyond, and so they came to him and asked Him that they might sit one on His right hand and the other on His left in His kingdom. The other disciples are moved with envy of these two, and so our Lord speaks to the other ten. 'Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister.' There is an ambition which our Lord Jesus Christ does not blame. He does not blame this ambition of St. James and St. John. It was splendid faith, which was able to believe that even though there was to be the Cross there was certain to be the Crown. It was splendid faith which, just at that moment, when He foretold His Cross, was able to keep its eye fixed upon the Throne; and there was courage which enabled them to endure everything for the sake of that Throne. And Jesus Christ tells us how it is to be obtained. God helping, it is to be obtained by resignation, by submission, by drinking of the cup, by being ready to be baptized with the death. There must be a perfect submission of your life to God. The only man who really commands the homage of other men is the man who is willing to serve.

III. Spiritual Pride.—The third occasion upon which there is this strife as to who shall be the greatest is in St. Luke xxii. 24. They have now entered the upper chamber, and our Lord has told them, 'One of you shall betray Me'. And we read in the twenty-fourth verse, 'There was also a strife amongst them, which of them should be accounted the greatest'. Now it is more difficult to see exactly what led to strife on this third occasion, but I think, putting all the verses together, this strife, seems to have arisen after our Lord said, 'One of you shall betray Me'. They seem to have looked one upon the other, doubting to whom He spoke. No doubt afterwards they began to ask, 'Lord, is it I?' I do not think they asked that question first. At first they began to think it must be one of the others who was going to betray Him. I fancy then one and the other began to think, 'At any rate I will never betray Him'; and I fancy that this strife as to who was the greatest may be accounted for by that attitude at that moment. Our Lord rises from supper, takes a towel and girds Himself, and then goes round and washes all their feet, and then He comes and takes His garments and sits down again. Then they had learnt the lesson, and I venture to think that this third is an occasion of spiritual pride, looking down upon others because of some fancied superiority in spiritual things. How does our Lord deal with it? He teaches them that all need cleansing—St. Peter as well as all the rest—and He will go round and wash all their feet; and then they learn the lesson. Then, instead, of looking one upon another, doubting of whom He speaks, they begin to ask, crestfallen, 'Lord, is it I?' They begin to imagine there are signs of sin in themselves which could produce even such a dastardly deed as that.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 1.—J. A. Bain, Questions Answered by Christ, p. 40. James Denney, Gospel Questions and Answers, p. 98. XVIII. 1-3.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 267. J. H. Thom, A Spiritual Faith, p. 199. J. Martineau, Hours of Thought, vol. ii. p. 304. XVIII. 1-4.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1894, p. 161. XVIII. 1-6.—Stopford A. Brooke, ibid. vol. xli. 1892, p. 393. XVIII. 1-6, 10-14.—D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 158. XVIII. 1-14.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 1.

A CHILD IN THE MIDST

(Christmas)

'And Jesus called a little child unto Him, and set him in the midst of them.'—MATTHEW XVIII. 2.

I. AT Christmas time, especially, we bethink ourselves of those words of His. Whatever other meanings this sacred festival may have, this perhaps is the most prominent thought of it. Once a year a Divine child is set in the midst of us. Incarnate God and yet a little child. One who grew up to a perfect man and to possess all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, yet never left behind, as we do, the things which make childhood attractive. One who was called by His disciples to the last, 'Thy holy child Jesus'.

II. All grown-up people at some time or other have longed for or dreamed of a return to childhood, and sighed as they realized the impossibility of it. Truly the lessons which we most need to learn are just those which are breathed forth from the artless lips and shouted in the innocent delights of a happy, hopeful child. And so at Christmas time, the child Jesus seats Himself in the midst and speaks to us. He bids the doctors depart, and the sages be silent, and the world's science hold its lips, and the din of politics hush itself, and the clamours of prejudice and passion be still, that we may take in His heavenly teaching of faith, and innocence, and joy.

III. There are times when we get a little weary of all the grand talk about knowledge, and genius, and brilliant statesmanship, and the march of science and invention, and the cleverness of human foresight, and the omniscience of intellect, and the victories won over material forces, and the triumphs of civilization, and the cunning of worldly men. We have a suspicion that it is not doing for us all that the boasters say, that civilization does not quite mean paradise, and that grasp of mind is not the same thing as rest of soul. And therefore we will sit down at the feet of the child Jesus, and pray together that science may learn His humility, that intellect may have His reverence, that commerce may drink from His wells of purity and justice, that riches may clothe themselves with His simplicity and be filled with His self-denying spirit, that education and enlightenment may have their cold, freezing light made warm and gentle with His love, and that the nations as they ring the bells in honour of His nativity may bethink themselves of the spirit of the Divine child whom they worship, and gather from His simple innocence lessons of sublimest wisdom.—J. G. GREENHOUGH, Christian Festivals and Anniversaries, p. 220.

THE CHILD IN THE MIDST

(For Holy Innocents' Day)

'Jesus called a little child unto Him, and set him in the midst.'—MATTHEW XVIII. 2.

TO-DAY'S festival reminds us of the majesty with which childhood is invested in the Gospel.

I. Characteristics of Little Children.—Fresh from the waters of baptism, they are worthy to be companions to the holy angels. Theirs is the life spiritual, unsullied as yet by the life natural. Then, as intelligence begins to dawn, we notice their guilelessness and simplicity; their trustfulness and confiding faith; their truthfulness. They forgive most readily and forget right soon. They are ever hopeful. The memory of past sorrow passes from them with incredible swiftness; and straightway the mirror is as bright as ever. Is it fanciful to note the very slender hold they have on the things of earth? Their hold upon the things of earth is, at all events, speedily relaxed; while possessions, infancy has none.

II. There seems to be much Tender Beauty and fine catholic instinct and Gospel grace in this Feast of the Holy Innocents—this day kept in honour of the babes of Bethlehem, whereby God caused infants to glorify Him by their deaths.

III. There was the Further Design of administering a yearly word of consolation, in this way, to parents. Scarcely a family is there in which some blossoms of hope have not been snatched away before they opened into flowers of promise, or ripened into fruits of joy. A balm has been provided in this day's commemoration for the heart of many a parent whose child has been taken home. The Lord Jesus has called the child and set him in the midst, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 2.—E. A. Draper, The Gift of Strength, p. 60. E. Fowle, Plain Preaching to Poor People (7th Series), p. 49. T. E. Ruth, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 97. XVIII. 2, 3.—H. Jones, ibid. vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 86. W. H. Brookfield, Sermons, p. 47.

CONVERSION

'Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.'—MATTHEW XVIII. 3.

WHAT is there about little children which must also be found in those of a ripe age who would be citizens of the kingdom of God?

I. Pure Affection.—In childhood, affection is spring-water. It just bubbles up most naturally, and is pure and delicious. In manhood, affection is too often tap-water. It has flowed through pipes of expediency, prudence, and calculation, and it has lost its sparkle and limpidity. 'Master, who shall be greatest in the kingdom of heaven?' There you have affection which is losing its purity, affection with a selfish aim, affection yoked to personal ambition. The Lord wants us to have the pure, uncalculating love of little children. He wants us to live so much with Him that to love Him shall be our highest bliss.

II. Fine Sensitiveness.—A child's spirit is like a photographer's sensitive plate, exceedingly impressionable, responding to the daintiest touch of the softest light. The joys and sorrows of the world find in children a most ready and sympathetic response. This fine sensitiveness is apt to be lost as childhood is left behind. Our impressionableness is prone to lose its delicacy. The grief and happiness of the world do not move us with the same facility as of old. Our character is inclined to harden in one of two directions—towards a gloomy pessimism or towards a glaring worldliness. The child-disposition may be symbolized by the month of April. April weather easily breaks into sunshine, and quite as easily melts into rain. We pass either into the dull heavy, pessimistic gloom of November, and it is difficult to move us into smiles, or into the hard, worldly glare of June, when it is difficult to melt us into tears.

III. Open-Mindedness.—Childhood is an age of eager questionings, and not of dogmatic conclusions. It is a season of keen receptiveness, of intense love of the sweet light. Now that open-mindedness is apt to be lost with the growth of our years. Revelation is regarded as closed; the volume as ended; all light as given; so that our knowledge can now be arranged in final forms. That was certainly the condition of the people among whom Christ's earthly ministry was passed. Their minds were closed, shut up tight against the reception of any new revelation from God. There were two forces actively at work closing their minds, and they are quite as active to-day, the forces of pride and prejudice. When these abound in a life, every door and window is closed, and the 'Light of the World' will seek admission in vain.—J. H. JOWETT, Meditations for Quiet Moments, p. 35.

LITTLE CHILDREN

'Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom.'—MATTHEW XVIII. 3.

THE call to be children is Christ's supreme call. Failure to meet it was the cardinal sin of the respectable religious people of that day.

I. We must repent, and be like children. How easy and simple it is for a child to repent—how bitter for us! The truth is we are afraid—afraid to repent lest love and faith should carry us we know not where. We cover ourselves with many wrappings of position, calling, philosophy, just because we are cowards, and dare not face ourselves. Half the problems we think so dark, half the difficulties we multiply so proudly, take their origin in this. We dare not be alone. 'I was afraid and hid myself, because I was naked.'

And yet the natural line is that of Christ—to feel sorry like a child, humble like a small schoolboy who knows he is at the bottom. This is all we can do, when the facts stream in upon us. This, above all else, divides us from the world. We do, they do not, think repentance and humility a duty. Our enemies tell us that we are not better than they are, and often worse. Alas! we know it. It is because we are bad that we want to touch the hem of His garment, not because we are good.

II. But though it begins with humbled grief, repentance does not end there. The child who says he is sorry always adds, I'll try and never do it again. That faith in the future, even more than the grief, is the note of the Christian. He believes, the world does not believe, that with God's help he may become better.

III. For the child's repentance, and the child's amendment we need the inexhaustible faith of childhood, its infinite and inalienable romance. That which springs up naturally in human childhood is for us the supreme gift, a grace to be sought with prayer—this faith, that is at the root of the careless gladness of children, and of the ease and buoyancy of saints like St. Francis—this faith so uplifting, so hard to win, yet so essential. For without it where are we? Whether we look at the prospects of the Church or our own life, probability, rational calculation, common sense are all ranged on the cynic's side.

People talk of the Church in danger—the Church is always in danger; the miracle is not in her weakness, but in her existence. It is only as we throw ourselves on God that we shall certainly conquer—for 'of ourselves we have no power to help ourselves'. Yet with that aid victory is not merely likely, but certain.—J. NEVILLE FIGGIS, The Gospel and Human Needs, p. 155.

BECOMING AS LITTLE CHILDREN

'Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven.'—MATTHEW XVIII. 3.

WHAT did our Lord mean by bidding us become as little children? Let us recall the circumstances in which our Lord spoke about the children; and we shall at once see.

I. The most striking of His references to children comes in that very solemn warning against despising them. 'Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones, for I say unto you that their angels in heaven do always behold the face of My Father in heaven.' The imagery is drawn from the court of a king. Those who see the king's face are they who stand immediately in his presence and are especially in his confidence. It is the privilege of innocent children to be very sure of God, to speak to Him familiarly in prayer, to rest in the assurance of His protection.

II. A second childlike quality which if we lose we must recover before we can be of the kingdom, is sincerity. The prayer, 'I thank Thee, O Father,' etc., was uttered after the rejection of His Gospel by the elders of the Jews and its acceptance by the band of Apostles; and to that it must refer. And, I would ask you, is not one of the most characteristic qualities of children this habit of theirs of looking straight at things and people and judging them to be the best of their power without either prejudice or fear of consequences? This is the characteristic recognized in Hans Andersen's delightful story of the Emperor's Robe, which everybody pretended to see and admire, until a child cried out that there was no robe at all to see. Plainly it was this childlike sincerity in the Apostles—what our Lord called 'the single eye'—that distinguished them from the Pharisees and enabled them to receive a new revelation.

III. There is a third childlike quality to which our Lord calls attention, which also, if we have unhappily lost, we must labour to win back again—unpretentiousness, the absence of self-importance.

How can this temper be recovered? Clearly we cannot recover the unconscious unpretentiousness of childhood. But there are two or three things we can do. (1) We can aim at taking a real and unaffected interest in others, looking for their good qualities and valuing them. (2) We can make ourselves give exact reasons for any dislikes we feel. (3) We can at anyrate apply the check at the point where the unchristian feeling passes into word or deed.—H. C. BEECHING, Church Family Newspaper, 3 April, 1908, p. 302.

'Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.'—MATTHEW XVIII. 3.

You have the child's character in these four things—Humility, Faith, Charity, and Cheerfulness. That's what you have got to be converted to. 'Except ye be converted, and become as little children.' You hear much of conversion nowadays; but people always seem to think they have got to be made wretched by conversion, to be converted to long faces. No, friends, you have got to be converted to short ones; you have to repent into childhood, to repent into delight and delightsomeness.—RUSKIN, Crown of Wild Olive.

WORDSWORTH has told us the law of his own mind, the fulfilment of which has enabled him to reveal a new world of poetry: Wisdom is oft-times nearer when we stoop, Than when we soar. That it is so likewise in religion, we are assured by those most comfortable words, Except ye become as little children, ye shall not enter the kingdom of heaven. The same truth is well expressed in the aphorism, which Charles the First, when he entered his name on the books at Oxford, in 1616, subjoined to it: Si vis omnia subjicere, subice te rationi. Happy would it have been for him, if that which flowed thus readily from his pen had also been graven upon his heart. He would not then have had to write it on the history of his country with characters more glaring and terrible than those of ink.—JULIUS HARE.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 3.—M. Dods, Christ and Man, p. 226. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. iii, pp. 67, 116. F. B. Woodward, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 1; see also Selected Sermons, p. 58. XVIII. 3, 4.—S. H. Kellogg, The Past a Prophecy of the Future, p. 157. XVIII. 4.—Stopford A. Brooke, Short Sermons, pp. 152, 158. XVIII. 4, 5.—A. Murray, The Children for Christ, p. 233. XVIII. 5.—J. B. Mozley, Sermons Parochial and Occasional, p. 297. XVIII. 6, 7.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (1st Series), p. 511.

CAUSING OTHERS TO SIN

'Woe unto the world because of offences! for it must needs be that offences come; but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh!'—MATTHEW XVIII. 7.

THERE is a sin which very many people think little about, the sin of making others sin. It is a real sin, a common sin, and a very dreadful sin. It was the first sin committed in the world, for it was the sin of the tempter who tempted the woman to disobey God; and it was the first fruit of the Fall of man, for the first thing which the woman did when she had sinned herself was to make the man sin also. It has ever been the great means of keeping sin alive and strong in the world; one generation has taught the next, and handed on its fatal tradition of evil.

I. Besides all sins, then, that we may commit ourselves for our own pleasure or advantage, out of the wickedness and folly of our own hearts, there is yet this burden, the sin of making others sin. And this may be in two ways. It may be in the way of direct temptation. I am not speaking of those who tempt others, as the devil tempts men, for the sake of making them do wrong. I am speaking of people who, when they are doing wrong themselves, do not care about, or see the additional harm and sin, of dragging others into it with them.

II. But the sin of making others sin comes in yet another way than that of direct temptation to others. It comes more subtly and secretly, and in a sense more awfully, because less under our direct control, in the example which others see in us and follow. We forget what we are doing merely by our example. We forget what wrong things we are sanctioning, not by trying to make others do them, but by letting them see that we do them without check or fear. We forget that the sins which we thus, often from mere thoughtlessness, encourage, are apt to increase tenfold in those who quote us for their warrant and pattern.

III. And is this a sin to think little about—the sin of making others to sin? Surely it is one which we ought to take account of when we are trying to realize to ourselves what will be the strict and just judgment of God on our heart and life.—R. W. CHURCH, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 255.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 7.—J. B. Lightfoot, Cambridge Sermons, p. 248. W. G. Rutherford, The Key of Knowledge, p. 134. A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part iii. p. 178.

SELF-MUTILATION FOR SELF-PRESERVATION

'If thy hand or thy foot causeth thee to stumble, cut it off, and cast it from thee.'—MATTHEW XVIII. 8 (R.V.).

WE mark these three points. First, the case supposed, 'If thy hand or thy foot cause thee to stumble'. Then the sharp, prompt remedy enjoined, 'cut them off and cast them from thee'. Then the solemn motive by which it is enforced, 'It is better for thee to enter into life maimed than, being a whole man, to be cast into hell-fire'.

I. 'The case supposed.'

1. Hand and foot and eye are, of course, regarded as organs of the inward self, and symbols of its tastes and capacities. Our Lord takes an extreme case. If members of the body are to be amputated and plucked out should they cause us to stumble, much more are associations to be abandoned and occupations to be relinquished and pleasures to be forsaken if they draw us away. But it is to be noticed that the whole stringency of the commandment rests upon that if. 'If they cause thee to stumble,' then, and not else, amputate. The powers are natural, the operation of them is perfectly innocent, but a man may be ruined by innocent things. And, says Christ, if that process is begun, then, and only then, does My exhortation come into force.

2. Then there is another point to be observed in this case supposed, and that is that the whole matter is left to the determination of personal experience. Nobody else has a right to decide for you what it is safe and wise for you to do in regard of things which are not in themselves wrong. Do not let your Christian liberty be interfered with by other people's dictation in regard of this matter.

3. But, on the other hand, do not you be led away into things that damage you because some other man does them, as he supposes, without injury. There are some Christian people who are simply very unscrupulous and think themselves very strong; and whose consciences are not more enlightened, but less sensitive than the 'narrow-minded brethren' upon whom they look.

4. It does not mean that we are to abandon all things that are susceptible of abuse, for everything is so; and if we are to regulate our conduct by such a rule, it is not the amputation of a hand that will be sufficient.

5. Nor does the injunction mean that unconditionally we are to abandon all occupations in which there is danger. It can never be a duty to shirk a duty because it is dangerous.

II. 'Cut it off and cast it from thee.'

Entire excision is the only safety. I myself am to be the agent of that. That is to say, we are to suppress capacities, to abandon pursuits, to break with associates when we find that they are damaging our spiritual life and hindering our likeness to Jesus Christ. We have to empty our hands of earth's trivialities if we would grasp Christ with them. We have to turn away our eyes from earth if we would behold the Master; and rigidly to apply this principle of excision in order that we may advance in the Divine life.

Then it is not to be forgotten that this commandment, stringent and necessary as it is, is second best. The man is maimed, although it was for Christ's sake that he cut off his hand, or put out his eye.

His hand was given him that with it he might serve God, and the highest thing would have been that in hand and foot and eye he should have been anointed, like the priests of old, for the service of His Master. But until he is strong enough to use the faculty for God, the wisest thing is not to use it at all.

III. Christ rests His command of self-denial and self-mutilation upon the highest ground of self-interest. 'It is better for thee.'

The maimed man may enter into life, and the complete man may perish. The maimed man may touch Christ with his stump, and so receive life, and the complete man may lay hold of the world and the flesh and the devil with his hands, and so share in their destruction.—A. MACLAREN, Christ in the Heart, p. 293.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 8.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 9. F. B. Woodward, Sermons (1st Series), p. 47; see also Selected Sermons, p. 9. XVIII. 8, 9.—P. N. Waggett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 205.

DYING TO LIVE

'And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee.'—MATTHEW XVIII. 9.

THERE is and there can be (according to our Lord) for all men but one supreme end and aim—to 'enter into life'. To 'enter into life' means (if we may attempt to define the expression) to enter into conscious and purposeful fellowship with God: first, here; and then, hereafter. This is the supreme aim; and all that interferes with it—even though it be good in itself, as it often is—must be ruthlessly sacrificed.

I. It is clear that this conception of our Lord's is opposed to two widely contrasted ideals.

1. It is opposed to asceticism, in the more common use of that word. For it is evident that while our Lord regards the possession of 'two eyes' or 'two feet' as good in itself, and only counsels their sacrifice for the sake of something better, asceticism regards the sacrifice as in itself desirable and praiseworthy. Our Lord would prefer that we should use and enjoy all our faculties; that the world should be full of men with keen eyes and strong arms; asceticism would regard the one-eyed or the one-armed man as superior to normal and healthy human beings; it would exult in a maimed and mutilated humanity.

2. It is equally opposed to what is sometimes called aestheticism. Aestheticism proclaims that the main object of man is to see and to feel. It declares that art is free, and must be free, from all moral considerations. It professes to worship the beautiful—the eye must see, both eyes must see, all that is to be seen, whether they 'offend,' 'cause one to stumble,' or no. Its aim—preserved at all costs—was to have two eyes and two hands—to enjoy what it would call a 'full and complete life'.

II. Now let us be quite sure that the religion of Christ is no enemy to art or culture. But while the religion of Christ finds full scope—in its teaching and in its practice: in architecture, in stained-glass windows, in the music of the Church—for the love of beauty to find its expression even in worship, it has never been forgetful of the awful danger which may beset, and often has beset, those who make the pleasure of the senses, even in their most refined forms, the great end of life.

This, at any rate, is what the Christian religion says. It says that a full life is a good thing, but a sound life is a better; and that to have a sound life—a healthy life—to ‘see salvation’—we must, if necessary, be prepared to sacrifice some of the fullness.

III. It is better ‘to enter into life’. For notice that whatever the sacrifice required in the present, the end is to be a fuller, not an emptier existence. If the lower is to go, it is only that the higher may be preserved. ‘Whosoever will lose his life shall save it.’—H. R. GAMBLE, Christianity and Common Life, p. 105.

Illustration.—All parts of our nature were made by God. The best thing is that we should be able fully to exercise all our faculties; but we must be safe at the centre before we can be free at the circumference. Whatever exposes us to temptation that is too strong for us must at any cost be abandoned.—BISHOP GORE.

‘See that ye despise not one of these little ones.’—MATTHEW XVIII. 10.

WHAT is Contempt, George Meredith asks in his Essay on Comedy, ‘but an excuse to be idly minded, or personally lofty, or comfortably narrow, not perfectly humane? . . . Anger is not much less foolish than disdain.’

HE who despises mankind will never get the best out of either others or himself.’—DE TOCQUEVILLE.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 10.—G. H. Morrison, Sunrise, p. 62. Morgan Dix, Sermons Doctrinal and Practical, p. 40. H. Varley, Spiritual Light and Life, p. 161. H. P. Liddon, Penny Pulpit, No. 467. F. E. Paget, Sermons for the Saints’ Days, p. 89. W. Boyd Carpenter, The Burning Bush, p. 21. J. S. Maver, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxii. 1902, p. 438. A. J. Forson, ibid. vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 313. XVIII. 10, 11.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. ii. p. 315; see also Readings for the Aged (3rd Series), p. 227. XVIII. 11.—R. Davidson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 26. Horace Bushnell, Christ and His Salvation, p. 67. XVIII. 12.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 19. XVIII. 12, 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxv. No. 2083. XVIII. 12, 14.—Cosmo Gordon Lang, Thoughts on Some of the Parables of Jesus, p. 263. XVIII. 13.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 29. XVIII. 14.—C. Vince, The Unchanging Saviour, p. 103. H. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 230. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. iv. p. 257.

‘If thy brother trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone.’—MATTHEW XVIII. 15.

With a little more patience and a little less temper, a gentler and wiser method might be found in almost every case; and the knot that we cut by some fine heady quarrel-scene in private life, or, in public affairs, by some denunciatory act against what we are pleased to call our neighbour’s vices, might yet have been unwoven by the hand of sympathy.—R. L. STEVENSON, Across the Plains, p. 314.

‘Go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone.’—MATTHEW XVIII. 15.

WHEN a man is to be amended, it becomes the office of a friend to urge his faults and vices with all the energy of enlightened affection, to paint them in their most vivid colours, and to bring the moral patient to a better habit.—BURKE.

You reprove me like a friend, and nothing comes so welcome to me as to be told of my faults.—WALPOLE to Mason.

PROFESSOR YORK POWELL describes Richard Shute, the Oxford scholar, as a man ‘who had devotion enough for his friends to tell them when he thought they had got on the wrong path, and he would manage this with singular tact, so that a man, however young and vain, could hardly feel his raw self-respect hurt, even though Shute spoke plainly enough to show him his full folly. Not many men of his years have courage to help their friends in spite of themselves.’

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 15-17.—E. Griffith Jones, The Cross and the Dice-Box, pp. 53, 69. Lyman Abbott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. p. 156. XVIII. 15-27.—G. Jackson, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 284. XVIII. 17.—W. Binnie, Sermons, p. 202. W. Farquhar Hook, Hear the Church, p. 3. XVIII. 18.—C. Silvester Horne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 35. XVIII. 18-20.—J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 283. XVIII. 19.—R. W. Church, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 274. K. Lahusen, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 363. XVIII. 19, 20.—‘Plain Sermons’ by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ii. p. 206.

SOCIAL WORSHIP

‘Where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them.’—MATTHEW XVIII. 20.

THIS text has no special reference to meetings for worship, but includes these as well as all others. Christ’s own definition of a Church is independence of all times and places.

I. Social Worship—its Grounds.

(1) The necessity of worship as the expression of religion. (2) The necessity of private worship from the individuality of man and the tensely individual character of the acts of religion. (3) Necessity of social worship from the equally obvious destination of man for society.

II. Social Worship—its Nature.

(1) ‘In My name.’ That is, He, Christ, is the bond of union. It must be in conscious obedience to Him, as opposed to a mere formal meeting. (2) It should be as far as possible the engagement of the whole man. (3) It should be common prayer involving the participation of all, possibly formal. (4) It should have the two parts, speaking to God and to man.

III. The Blessings of Social Worship.

(1) The help to deeper devotion in the outward associations of fixed times and places. These material helps are like reservoirs which hold supplies that feed a town. (2) The expression and help to highest unity. A counterbalance to personal cares and peculiarities. Our prayers are apt to take one special form; selfish wishes, personal peculiarities. (3) Revelation of the oneness beneath all social and intellectual distinctions. (4) That the Gospel alone has preaching thus embedded in its services. The living voice will always be the most potent instrument for the conversion of men.—A. MACLAREN.

'Where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them.'—MATTHEW XVIII. 20.

THE devout meditation of the isolated man, which flitted through his soul, like a transient tone of Love and Awe from unknown lands, acquires certainty, continuance, when it is shared by his brother men. Where two or three are gathered together in the name of the Highest, then first does the Highest, as it is written, appear among them to bless them; then first does an Altar and act of united Worship open a way from Earth to Heaven; whereas, were it but a single Jacob's ladder, the heavenly Messengers will travel, with glad tidings and unspeakable gifts for men.—CARLYLE.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 20.—A. A. Bonar, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 237. B. F. Westcott, The Historic Faith, p. 115. C. C. Collins, Public Worship in the City Churches, Sermons, 1895-99. F. S. Webster, In Remembrance of Me, p. 11. J. Wright, The Guarded Gate, p. 171. Lyman Abbott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 156. H. Scott Holland, ibid. vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 385; see also vol. lviii. 1900, p. 393. F. Temple, ibid. vol. liii. 1897, p. 216. J. G. Stevenson, ibid. vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 17. E. Cornwall-Jones, ibid. vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 245. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1761. XVIII. 21.—J. A. Bain, Questions Answered by Christ, p. 46. C. Parsons Reichel, Sermons, p. 362. XVIII. 21, 22.—G. Jackson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 38.

'How oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times? Jesus saith unto him, Until seventy times seven.'—MATTHEW XVIII. 21, 22.

When thou turn'st away from ill,
Christ is this side of thy hill.

When thy heart says, 'Father, pardon,'
Then the Lord is in thy garden.

When to love is all thy wit,
Christ doth at thy table sit.—

GEORGE MACDONALD.

'If you are exchanging measurable maxims for immeasurable principles,' wrote F. W. Robertson in a letter, 'you are surely rising from the mason to the architect. "Seven times?"—no—no—no—Seventy times seven. No maxim—a heart principle. I wonder whether St. Peter wholly understood that, or got a very clear conception from it.'

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 22.—C. S. Robinson, Simon Peter, p. 310. A. MacLaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 37. XVIII. 23-25.—A. Brown, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 68. R. Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven, p. 111. T. Guthrie, Parables of Our Lord, p. 242. XVIII. 25.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 184. XVIII. 27-34, 35.—J. H. Jellott, The Elder Son, p. 55. XVIII. 28.—A. R. Buckland, Christian World Pulpit, vol.

xliv. 1803, p. 316. XVIII. 32, 33.—W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches (2nd Series), p. 221. A. G. Mortimer, Life and Its Problems, p. 71.

'Shouldest not thou also have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, even as I had pity on thee?'—MATTHEW XVIII. 33.

THE correcting, hallowing, consoling rush of pity.—PATER.

'NOTHING,' says Charlotte Brontë, of her sister Emily, 'nothing moved her more than any insinuation that the faithfulness and clemency, the long-suffering and loving-kindness which are esteemed virtues in the daughters of Eve become foibles in the sons of Adam. She held that mercy and forgiveness are the Divinest attributes of the Great Being who made both man and woman, and that what clothes the Godhead in glory can disgrace no form of feeble humanity.'

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 33.—F. E. Paget, Faculties and Difficulties for Belief and Unbelief, p. 201. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. v. p. 184. A. MacLeod, Days of Heaven Upon Earth, p. 100.

THE UNJUST STEWARD

'So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses.'—MATTHEW XVIII. 35.

THIS parable does not deal with the limits of human mercifulness, but with its ground and pattern. If we understand these, we shall not need to ask, as St. Peter asked, 'How often?' for the question will answer itself.

I take the whole parable for consideration, and I think we shall find that it yields us great thoughts about our relations to God and men.

I. The King and his Debtor.—The analogy between sin and debt is imperfect, and we are not to look for correspondence between the details of the parable and the realities of men's relation to God.

The one point is the immense sum owing. The debt is stated in talents—each talent represents a large sum. So each sin against God is great.

II. The Debtor's Prayer.—Here again the imperfect analogy, for no future righteousness can wipe out past sin. 'I will pay thee all.' How long would it take a penniless bankrupt to amass 10,000 talents?

III. The King's Mercy.—This is as great as his severity had been. He is moved with compassion. He goes far beyond the debtor's petition. What seems all but incredible in men and rarely found in them represents God's mercy.

IV. The Contrast between the Treatment Shown to the Forgiven Debtor and his Treatment to his Debtor.—He had just been the object of mercy which should have made his heart glow. He had come through the agonies of an experience which should have made him very tender and very ready to do as he had been done by. The hands which were wrung in agony and entreaty are now throttling his 'fellow-servant'. Such inconsistency excites the notice of his fellow-servants, who tell it to the Lord. The world will be quick to notice if Christians show malice and unmercifulness. Note that 'wrath' comes in here for the first time. Unmercifulness in a recipient of God's mercy is a worse sin than many which are more recognized. The cancelled debt is revived. It is a solemn thought that if we cherish any feelings but those of merciful readiness to forgive, our possession of the sense of God's pardon is dimmed. No man can at the same moment feel God's mercy lapping him in its warm folds, and give way to the emotions which are naturally excited by another man's faults to us. Observe that the parable lays down the principle that the personal reception of God's mercy in Christ precedes our showing mercy to others. And, with equal clearness, that showing mercy is the proper result of having received that Divine mercy, and the condition of retaining it.

So the two lessons are: (1) Recognize your debt to God and seek forgiveness by Christ. (2) See that you imitate what you hope in, and keep the grace received by letting it shape your lives and characters. —A. MACLAREN.

'From your hearts forgive every one his brother his trespasses.'
—MATTHEW XVIII. 35.

In a letter to James Boswell, Dr. Johnson observes: 'I had great pleasure in hearing that you are at last on good terms with your father. Cultivate his kindness by all honest and manly means. Life is but short; no time can be afforded but for the indulgence of real sorrow or contests upon questions seriously momentous. Let us not throw away any of our days upon useless resentment, or contend who shall hold out longest in stubborn malignity. It is best not to be angry; and best, in the next place, to be quickly reconciled.'

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 35.—G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 195. Canon Wilberforce, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xvi. 1844, p. 280. W. R. Huntington, ibid. vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 141. XIX. 4-6.—E. W. Langmore, The Divine Law in Relation to Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, Sermons, 1818-83. XIX. 5.—Canon R. E. Sanderson, Church Times, vol. xxxvi. 1896, p. 110. D. M. Ross, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 301.

'And great multitudes followed Him; and He healed them there.'—MATTHEW XIX. 2.

GOETHE describes, in his autobiography, how Marie Antoinette passed through Strasburg on her way to Paris: 'Before the Queen's arrival, the very rational regulation was made that no deformed persons, cripples, or disgusting invalids, should show themselves on her route. People jested about this precaution, and I made a little poem in French upon the subject, in which I contrasted the advent of Christ, who seemed to wander through the world for the special sake of the sick and lame, with the arrival of the Queen, who scared such unfortunates away.'

REFERENCES.—XIX. 5, 6.—Lyman Abbott, ibid. vol. xlix. 1896, p. 204. W. J. Knox-Little, The Perfect Life, p. 319. XIX. 6.—D. C. MacNicol, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lii. 1897, p. 150. XIX. 9.—W. Allan Whitworth, Church Times, vol. xxxiii. 1895, p. 538.

'If the case of the man be so with his wife, it is not good to marry.'—MATTHEW XIX. 10.

No temper in the world is so little open to reason as the ascetic temper. How many a lover and husband, how many a parent and friend, have realized to their pain, since history began, the overwhelming attraction which all the processes of self-annihilation have for a certain order of minds!—MRS. WARD.

REFERENCES.—XIX. 12.—Paul Bull, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxv. 1904, p. 342. XIX. 13.—F. Pickett, ibid. vol. lxxx. 1905, p. 138. T. Sadler, Sermons for Children, p. 1. XIX. 13-30.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2517.

WHEN THE CHILD-SPIRIT DIES

'Of such is the kingdom of heaven.'—MATTHEW XIX. 14.

It is a beautiful conception, daring and fresh as it is beautiful, that the one attribute of all the citizens of God must be the possession of the childlike heart.

I. Now of course to be childlike is one thing; and it is quite another to be childish. To be childlike is to have the spirit of the child, to have the touch of the Divine about us still. It is to live freshly in a glad fresh world, with a thousand avenues into the everywhere out of this dull spot that we call now. But to be childish is to be immature; to have no grip of things, never to face facts squarely; and he is a poor Christian who lives so. It is one distinguishing glory of our Lord that He looked the worst in the face, and called it bad.

There can be little doubt, too, that in claiming the childlike spirit Jesus was reaching up to the very highest in man. Jesus, stooping to the little children, was really rising to the crown of life. Show me the greatest men in human history—the men who were morally and nobly great—and I shall show you in every one of them tokens and traces of the childlike heart. Great souls, with the ten talents flaming into genius, live in a world that is so full of God, that men say they are imprudent, careless; and Jesus sees that they are little children.

And you cannot read the story of Jesus Christ without feeling that to the very close of it the child-spirit was alive in Him. No scoffing hardened Him. No disappointment soured Him. No pain dulled the keen edge of His love. He still believed, spite of Iscariot. He had still a Father, spite of Calvary. And that sweet spirit, as of a little child, has been the dew of heaven to the world.

II. There is no loss more tragic for a soul than the loss of that spirit of the child.

There are three penalties that follow when the child-spirit dies:—

1. That we cease to be receptive. The joy of childhood is its receptivity. The child knows nothing of a haunting past yet, and it is not yet anxious about the future. Its time is now, with its magnificent content, and now is God's time too.

2. No doubt it is that very receptivity that makes the little children dwell apart. I have long thought that the aloofness of the Christian, his isolation in the busiest life, was closely akin to the aloofness of the child. For the Christian also dwells apart, but not in the solitude of emptiness. He has his world, just as the children have; old things have passed away from him in Christ.

3. When the child-spirit dies, then the simplicity of faith is gone. There is an exquisite purity about the faith of children; sometimes they make us blush—they trust us so. But better than to be trusted, is to trust; to walk by faith and not by sight; and when the spirit of the child dies out, it is not possible to walk that way again. For when we cease to be childlike we grow worldly, and to be worldly is always to be faithless.

4. When the child-spirit dies, then the feeling of wonder disappears. For the child is above all else a wonderer, and is set in the centre of a wonderful world.

'I had rather,' said Ruskin, 'live in a cottage and wonder at everything, than live in Warwick Castle and wonder at nothing.' You have all felt the trials of existence, I want you to feel the wonder of it now; and the great wonder that the Lord should be your Shepherd, and should have died upon Calvary for you.—G. H. MORRISON, Sun-Rise, p. 187.

REFERENCES.—XIX. 14.—J. Page Hopps, Sermons of Sympathy, p. 63. A. Murray, The Children for Christ, p. 241. W. H. Murray, The Fruits of the Spirit, p. 494. J. H. Thom, Lives of Life, p. 253. XIX. 16.—Marcus Dods, Christian World Pulpit, 1890, vol. xxxviii. p. 152. J. A. Bain, Questions Answered by Christ, p. 52. W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 53. XIX. 16-26.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 46.

FAITH AND OBEDIENCE

'If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments.'—MATTHEW XIX. 17.

WHAT is meant by faith? it is to feel in good earnest that we are creatures of God; it is a practical perception of the unseen world; it is to understand that this world is not enough for our happiness, to look beyond it on towards God, to realize His presence, to wait upon Him, to endeavour to learn and to do His will, and to seek our good from Him. It is not a mere temporary strong act or impetuous feeling of the mind, an impression or a view coming upon it, but it is a habit, a state of mind, lasting and consistent. To have faith in God is to surrender one's self to God, humbly to put one's interests, or to wish to be allowed to put them into His hands Who is the Sovereign Giver of all good. . . . To believe is to look beyond this world to God, and to obey is to look beyond this world to God; to believe is of the heart, and to obey is of the heart; to believe is not a solitary act, but a consistent habit of trust; and to obey is not a solitary act, but a consistent habit of doing our duty in all things. . . . Works of obedience witness to God's just claims upon us, not to His mercy; but faith comes empty-handed, hides even its own worth, and does but point at that precious scheme of redemption which God's love has devised for sinners.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—XIX. 17.—F. W. Farrar, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 257; see also, The Anglican Pulpit of

To-day, p. 220. George Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 243. J. J. Tayler, Christian Aspects of Faith and Duty, p. 184. XIX. 19.—A. Pinchard, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 236. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 145. XIX. 20.—F. E. Paget, Sermons on Duties of Daily Life, p. 43. James Denney, Gospel Questions and Answers, p. 1.

'If thou wilt be perfect.'—MATTHEW XIX. 21.

THEY who are living religiously, have from time to time truths they did not know before, or had no need to consider, brought before them forcibly; truths which involve duties, which are in fact precepts, and claim obedience. In this and such-like ways Christ calls us now. . . . Nothing is more certain in matter of fact than that some men do feel themselves called to high duties and works, to which others are not called. Why this is we do not know. But so it is; this man sees sights which that man does not see, has a larger faith, a more ardent love, and a more spiritual understanding. No one has any leave to take another's lower standard of holiness for his own. It is nothing to us what others are. If God calls us to greater renunciation of the world, and exacts a sacrifice of our hopes and fears, this is our gain, this is a mark of His love for us, this is a thing to be rejoiced in.—NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—XIX. 21.—W. J. Knox-Little, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1894, pp. 184, 211. H. Price Hughes, ibid. vol. liv. 1898, p. 72.

'He went away sorrowful.'—MATTHEW XIX. 22.

EVERY light of moral beauty, permitted to enter but not allowed to guide us, becomes, like the after-image of the sun when idly stared at, a dark speck upon the soul which follows us at all our work, adheres to every object, approaches and recedes in dreams, and is neither evaded by movement, nor washed out by tears. If the fairest gifts are not to be turned into haunting griefs, it can only be by following in the ways of duty and denial, along which they manifestly lead.—MARTINEAU.

'A rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven.'—MATTHEW XIX. 23.

TEMPTATIONS connected with money are indeed among the most insidious and among the most powerful to which we are exposed. They have probably a wider empire than drink, and, unlike the temptations that spring from animal passions, they strengthen rather than diminish with age.—W. E. H. LECKY.

REFERENCES.—XIX. 23-26.—D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 169. XIX. 27.—Henry Gee, Sermons for the People, vol. ii. p. 65. J. A. Bain, Questions answered by Christ, p. 57. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 210. J. T. Bramston, Sermons to Boys, p. 59. XIX. 28, 29. J. Wright, The Guarded Gate, p. 117.

'Every one that hath forsaken . . . for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold.'—MATTHEW XIX. 29.

In his volume on French and English (p. 162), after describing the arduous labours of the French nuns among the poor and sick, Mr. Hamerton adds: 'The active sisterhoods are repaid to some extent in this world by a beneficent law of human nature.

They have one remarkably uniform characteristic: they seem to be invariably cheerful, with bright moments of innocent gaiety. This serenity of mind . . . is gained by the ever-present sense of duties accomplished in the past and the determination to face them in the future. It is the spirit which inspired Wordsworth's 'Ode to Duty' with a health surpassing all songs of love and wine.

BE VIGILANT

'But many that are first shall be last; and the last shall be first.'—MATTHEW XIX. 30.

THE question of St. Peter is wrong in spirit. So while Christ recognized rewards, He rebukes the spirit which seeks them, in these words of warning.

The first case dealt with in the text is one of priority in time. A man may have had a start in the race of life and be overtaken and passed. Advantages of any kind, such as talents, opportunities, etc., may be neutralized and disadvantages conquered. So at the end the order in which men stand is widely different from what it was at the start, as in a race.

I. Look at the Working of it in the Christian Life.—No man however advanced can relax vigilance, care, effort. There is no height beyond the reach of gravitation. The spring must never be uncoiled. The higher we go, the steeper the slope down and the worse the fall. The 'First' have temptations which yielded to will make them 'Last'. There is no such conquest of sin for us here that without perpetual vigilance it will never recur again. We may have long overcome it, and holier habits may have supervened, but still the thing is there, and we can feel the temptations stirring now and then.

Then there are temptations which belong to each stage, and the more advanced are not without their special ones. Temptations to rely in some degree on past attainments; to get into a mechanical mode of life; to lose early fervour and freshness without gaining fixed principle; to become weary even in well-doing.

And there are temptations which belong to the older stages of any career—the Christian as well as any other—irrespective of the degree of advancement which we have made. Just because we have been doing something for a long time, we are apt to think that we can do it well. To become slaves of habit, to become conceited, to get deep into the ruts, to lose fresh interest, to take it easy, as a spring works more feebly near the end.

II. There are no Disadvantages which need be Permanent.

1. Take the case of the Penitent Thief and of St. Paul. Many a man coming late to Christ's service, and crowding a life of work into a few years.

2. Take the case of inferiority in attainments.

3. Take the case of inferiority in Christian character. That need not be permanent. It is the grand confidence of Christianity that any man may reach the highest levels.

III. The Practical Discipline.

1. The constant realization of the two facts—the stern possibility of falling to make us vigilant; the grand hope of ability to rise to make us full of effort.

2. The constant cherishing of the same graces and emotions with which we began.

So let us labour, as knowing that there are infinite resources in His hands. There is no reason why you and I should not rise far above our former selves, 'Forgetting the things which are behind'.—A. MACLAREN.

REVERSAL OF JUDGMENT

'But many that are first shall be last; and the last shall be first.'—MATTHEW XIX. 30.

I. THIS is a saying to make us pause, full of deep suggestiveness, applicable to many spheres of life and religion. It should lead to self-scrutiny to be thus told authoritatively that in the spiritual world there will be a complete reversal of human judgment, such moral surprises as that the first and the last should change places. How true it is we sometimes see even here, true of men, and nations, and Churches. Innumerable are the illustrations of how God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty. It is a commonplace of history and experience. The fable of the hare and the tortoise is only a parable of life. Again and again has first in time been last in reaching the goal; first in privilege been last in achievement; first in position been last in permanent power.

II. And if this is so even in such palpable instances, how much truer is it in the things of the spirit, in the kingdom of Heaven which cometh not with observation. The spiritual world is a secret world. There an act is judged not by its size, not even by its good result, but by its motive alone; and a man is judged not by the place he fills in men's minds, not by the splash he makes in the world, but by his spirit alone. Character will be stripped bare, and only moral worth will remain. The things we thought goodness, the things which deceived us, which we looked on as of first importance, will be seen as they are. So that many that are first are last, and many that are last are first.

Even now, though often late, justice is done, and contemporary judgment is reversed, and we can see the truth of our text. The Jews were first in privilege, but the Gentiles laid hold of eternal life, and the favoured people were left a broken branch on the tree. And in the Christian Church again and again it has been not the mighty, the noble, the wise, those patently first to the eye, who have been called to high service, but the poor and the weak, and the foolish; and the last has been first. There is another judgment, according to intrinsic spiritual worth, and that will be the final judgment of all.

III. Above all, let us ask the question of ourselves as individuals. Our virtues and graces, the things that people admire in us, or that we admire in ourselves, may be only tending to our deterioration, if we have lost sight of the essential thing, if our hearts are not pure from the taint of self.

IV. But there is more than warning in these deep words. There is also a message of hope to all who feel themselves last, the despondent, all who think themselves overmatched in the warfare of life, and outrun in the race of life. What God asks from all, the high and the low, the first and the last, is a sincere heart in which burns the pure flame of love. Whatever be our scale of earthly precedence, though it be reckoned last in our purblind judgment, that is first—so far first that it has no second.—H. BLACK, Edinburgh Sermons, p. 123.

THE WEAPONS OF SAINTS

'Many that are first shall be last ; and the last shall be first.'—MATTHEW XIX. 30.

LET us understand our place, as the redeemed children of God. Some must be great in this world, but woe to those who make themselves great ; woe to any who take one step out of their way with this object before them. If we are true to ourselves, nothing can really thwart us. Our warfare is not with carnal weapons, but with heavenly. The world does not understand what our real power is, and where it lies. And until we put ourselves into its hands of our own act, it can do nothing against us. Till we leave off patience, meekness, purity, resignation, and peace, it can do nothing against that Truth which is our birth-right, that Cause which is ours, as it has been the cause of all saints before us. But let all who would labour for God in a dark time beware of anything which ruffles, excites, and in any way withdraws them from the love of God and Christ, and simple obedience to Him. This be our duty in the dark night, while we wait for the day, while we wait for Him Who is our Day, while we wait for His coming, Who is gone, Who will return, and before Whom all the tribes of the earth will mourn, but the sons of God will rejoice. . . . It is our blessedness to be made like the all-holy, all gracious, long-suffering, and merciful God ; Who made and Who redeemed us ; in whose presence is perfect rest, and perfect peace ; Whom the Seraphim are harmoniously praising, and the Cherubim tranquilly contemplating, and angels silently serving, and the Church thankfully worshipping. All is order, repose, love, and holiness in heaven.—J. H. NEWMAN.

'Many that are first shall be last ; and the last first.'—MATTHEW XIX. 30.

Nor a day passes over the earth, but men and women of no note do great deeds, speak great words, and suffer noble sorrows. Of these obscure heroes, philosophers, and martyrs, the greater part will never be known till that hour when many that are great shall be small, and the small great.—CHARLES READE.

THERE is so much inevitable ignorance in our judgments now, so much mistake, so much exaggeration in what we praise and in what we condemn ; so much good of which we know and imagine nothing, so much evil of which we know nothing ; such strength of virtue which we never suspect, never give men credit for, such depths of sin which perhaps here are never found out. Who can doubt what awful discrepancies will, in many cases, appear between God's judgment and ours, beyond the veil ?—R. W. CHURCH.

IN Hawthorne's American Notebooks, one suggestion for a tale is, 'A person to consider himself as the prime mover of certain remarkable events, but to discover that his actions have not contributed in the least thereto. Another person to be the cause, without suspecting it.'

THAT solemn sentence which Scripture has inscribed on the curtain which hangs down before the Judgment Seat.—MOZLEY.

REFERENCES.—XIX. 30.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Holy-Tide Teaching, p. 100. J. B. Mozley, Sermons Preached before the University of Oxford, p. 72. G. Salmon, Non-Miraculous Christianity, p. 307. T. Teignmouth Shore, The Life of the World to Come, p. 137. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvii. No. 2221. XX. 1.—F. B. Woodward, Sermons (1st Series), p. 228. H. Harris, Short Sermons, p. 256. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. i. p. 265. W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 61. XX. 1, 3, 5, 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 664. XX. 1, 6, 7.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 156. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2602. XX. 1-8.—Sanday, Expositor (1st Series), vol. iii. p. 81. Hill, ibid. (1st Series), vol. iii. p. 427. Bruce, Parabolic Teaching, etc., and in Homiletic Quarterly, vol. iii. p. 447. Cox, Expository Essays, pp. 239, 251. Calderwood, Parables, p. 291. Trench, ibid. p. 166. Dod, Parables of Our Lord (1st Series), p. 151. Pusey, Sermons for Church's Seasons, p. 133, and Selections from Pusey, p. 102. Parker, Inner Life of Christ, vol. iii. p. 73. Parsons, Sermons, p. 413. Cumming, Foreshadowers, p. 137. A. Roberts, Plain Sermons, vol. i. p. 161. S neon, Works, vol. xi. p. 484. C. J. Vaughan, Sermons, 1853, p. 309. XX. 1-16.—E. A. Lawrence, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 262. J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 147. Rayner Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven, p. 121. T. Guthrie, Parables of Our Lord, p. 269. W. Gray Elmslie, Expository Lectures and Sermons, p. 217. B. W. Maturin, Practical Studies on the Parables of Our Lord, p. 93. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2517. Ibid. vol. xliii. No. 2517. XX. 6.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 157. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2602.

WORK IN GOD'S VINEYARD

'And about the eleventh hour He went out, and found others standing idle, and saith unto them, Why stand ye here all the day idle? They say unto Him, because no man hath hired us.'—MATTHEW XX. 6, 7.

THIS fragment of the parable is itself a parable. With the main scope of the parable I am not concerned. I desire to separate from the rest of the parable just these five words : 'No man hath hired us'.

I. God's Care.—The text shows us that there is a God Who concerns Himself about us. That is the teaching of Jesus Christ as contrasted with the cold creed of the Deist who would have us believe that God created the world and peopled it with mankind, but needs it no longer. We are told by Jesus Christ of a God Who looks upon us with a gaze as keen as it is merciful, a God Who knows what we are, a God Who knows by what precise steps of ascent or descent we have reached our present standing-place, a God

Who comes in, as it were, day by day to notice and to question—nay, who rather does not need to come in, for He is here—here in necessity of a Divine omnipresence.

II. God's Call.—God has a work going on everywhere. The work for which He employs men is the work of man's moral culture. He has to form in man a God-like character. All His redeemed are the workmen. The work which God permits to every man is a twofold work.

(a) Each Individual Soul is a Vineyard, and he has charge of it—the weeding and tending of that heart out of which issues the life. He must free the soil from noisome and deadly weeds, he must plant it with the choicest vine, he must subject it to God's watering, he must seek for it evermore the dew of His blessing, the rain of His Grace, the sunshine of His countenance.

(b) Life Itself is a Vineyard—the life of a man as it is lived amongst his fellows. The life of the family in which each one of us is a son, a brother, a daughter, a sister—here is a sheltered spot of the vineyard in which God bids us work, and in which many stand in God's sight all the day idle. I think that the lazy selfishness of many a young man in his home life, though he is active enough in a wider sphere, is neither creditable to himself nor to the Christian name he bears. There must of necessity be great variety in the work to be done by each in the vineyard of life, but amidst all this variety there is unity. Go where you may, you cannot escape the call to be God's workman. God bids a clergyman go into the vineyard, but the call to him is not substantially different from the call to any other man. God calls the soldier, the lawyer, the business man to work in his vineyard. Neither is sex any restriction. God calls the woman in her many duties to work in His vineyard. God bids us set before ourselves in youth as in age this one object—so to live as to make others better, so to live as to make God known.

III. What Answer are We Making?—We are here some of us in the early morning of life, and some have reached the eleventh hour. Still the same call, patient and long-suffering, is in all our ears. Honestly, are we really at work in God's vineyard, or are we in God's sight still standing idle? The selfish life is an idle life, and this is the point I wish specially to emphasize. Are we saying in reply to God's question, 'Because no man hath hired us'? The parable speaks of the heat and burden of the day. That burden is not avoided, that burning sun is not escaped by those who stand idle. For each of us life will have its load. The toils, cares, and sorrows of life are not lightened, but rather multiplied, by living for ourselves. Yet the scorching sun will beat upon those equally within or without the vineyard. Only there will be this difference. Shall we have a friend constant in life and changeless in eternity, or shall we be living and dying by ourselves? Even to the longest life comes an evening which is both a sunset and a dawn.

REFERENCES.—XX. 6, 7.—H. Scott Holland, Church Times, vol. xlii. 1899, p. 347; see also, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 193. C. Herbert, ibid. vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 93. XX. 7.—W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 65. A. Legge, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 138.

'When even was come, the Lord saith, Call the labourers, and give them their hire.'—MATTHEW xx. 8.

We are not sent into this world to stand idle all the day long, but to go forth to our work and to our labour until the evening. Until the evening, not in the evening only of our life, but serving God from our youth, and not waiting till our years fail us. . . The end is the proof of the matter. That evening will be the trial; when the heat, and fever, and noise of the noontide are over, and the light fades, and the prospect saddens, and the shades lengthen, and the busy world is still.—NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—XX. 8.—Bishop A. Pearson, Sermons for the People (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 161. XX. 9.—R. Collyer, Where the Spirit Dwelleth, p. 37. XX. 13.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. i. p. 113. XX. 13-16.—A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part iv. p. 191. XX. 14.—J. Baldwin Brown, Misread Passages of Scripture, p. 25. A. W. Potts, School Sermons, p. 29. W. J. Butler, Sermons for Working Men, The Oxford Sermon Library, vol. ii. p. 99. J. H. Jellott, The Elder Son, p. 43. XX. 15.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ii. No. 77. W. Cunningham, Church Times, vol. xxxii. 1894, p. 642. S. Cox, Expositions, p. 208. H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 65. F. E. Paget, Sermons for Special Occasions, p. 181. R. Flint, Sermons and Addresses, p. 241.

MANY CALLED, BUT FEW CHOSEN

'Many are called but few are chosen.'—MATTHEW xx. 16.

Few are choice: such surely is the thought of our text. There are such distinctions among the adherents of the Kingdom. It does not follow that because all are enrolled in the same service they are all either equally efficient or equally worthy. Some wear their loyalty with a difference. They are the élite of the Christian society, the flower and chivalry of the band; whose number, unhappily, is soon counted. Consider then this outer Christian circle—how wide it is: and this inner Christian circle—how select it is: also how one may hope to pass from the one within the other.

I. This outer circle—consider how large it is. 'Many,' says our Lord, 'are called.' By which it is evident that He means not merely privileged to hear God's merciful invitation addressed to them, but inwardly drawn to obey it as well. He is thinking of the Kingdom's bona fide servants, who wear the genuine livery and render a service which will be rewarded in its measure one day; and of such He says that they are 'many'.

II. Nevertheless it remains true that amongst the many few are 'choice'. The inner circle is select always. They are 'choice'; that is, they are men chosen or picked out of the Christian band. You note in them a selectness, a refinement, and a Christian grace, which put them in a category quite different from the ordinary, and merit for them the name of Christ's 'chosen' or 'choice' disciples.

1. For example, there is what may be termed the unworldly type. Very often such a man is more thoughtful than other men—more prone to meditation than they, and loving no exercise more than to place himself in the presence of God, and brood there over the deep things of existence.

2. There is what you may call the more especially Christian type. That is to say, there are Christians of whom it is in a peculiar degree true that Jesus Christ is the Alpha and Omega of their lives.

3. There is what you may call the filial type. I mean the Christians whose grand endeavour manifestly is to live here the life of a son of God.

III. The means by which any of us may hope to pass from the outer to the inner circle of Christ's followers.

1. First, it is a thing never to be forgotten that the makings of a saint are in every Christian. Sometimes it is supposed that it is only specially favoured natures that may dare to aspire so high. Nature may give some men the start, but gracefully improved must surpass nature in the long run.

2. And again remember that the scene in which a believer is to attain all this is just the life—the very ordinary and commonplace life, as a rule—he already has. You know the other misgiving that haunts men here. No sooner do they waken to the high aims God sets before them than they are apt to sigh for better opportunities of realizing them. We may be sure that if there had been another life in which we would have been more favourably placed for parting with our old nature for the image of the heavenly, He would have given us that life, for He is God and can give nothing but the best.—A. MARTIN, Winning the Soul, p. 117.

REFERENCES.—XX. 16.—B. Wilberforce, Feeling After Him, p. 171. Henry Alford, Sermons on Christian Doctrine, p. 134. J. Fraser, Parochial and other Sermons, p. 105. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvii. No. 2221. XX. 17-19.—Ibid. vol. xxxvii. No. 2212. XX. 20-23.—R. Rainy, Sojourning with God, p. 80. F. D. Huntington, Christian Believing and Living, p. 232.

'Grant that my two sons may sit, the one on Thy right hand, and the other on Thy left.'—MATTHEW XX. 21.

NEARLY all the evils in the Church have arisen from bishops desiring power more than light. They want authority, not outlook.—RUSKIN.

REFERENCES.—XX. 21, 22.—A. F. Winnington Ingram, Church Times, vol. lli. 1904, p. 145. See also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxvi. 1904, p. 105.

'We are able.'—MATTHEW XX. 22.

'Words are given prodigally,' says F. W. Robertson in a letter, 'and sacrificial acts must toil for years to cover the space which a single fervid promise has stretched itself over.'

'It has for many generations been an Italian error,' says Agostino in Mr. Meredith's Vittoria, 'to imagine a positive blood relationship—not to say maternity itself—existing between intentions and deeds.'

THE VENTURES OF FAITH

'They say unto Him, We are able.'—MATTHEW XX. 22.

Success and reward everlasting they will have, who persevere unto the end. Doubt we cannot, that the ventures of all Christ's servants must be returned to them at the Last Day with abundant increase. This is a true saying, He returns far more than we lend to Him, and without fail. But I am speaking of individuals, of ourselves one by one. No one among us knows for certain that he himself will persevere; yet every one among us, to give himself even a chance of success at all, must make a venture. As regards individuals, then, it is quite true, that all of us must for certain make ventures for heaven, yet without the certainty of success through them. This, indeed, is the very meaning of the word 'venture'; for that is a strange venture which has nothing in it of fear, risk, danger, anxiety, uncertainty. Yes; so it certainly is; and in this consists the excellence and nobleness of faith; this is the very reason why faith is singled out from other graces, and honoured as the especial means of our justification, because its presence implies that we have the heart to make a venture.

THE OLD AGE OF ST. JOHN THE DIVINE

[St. John] had to bear a length of years in loneliness, exile, and weakness. He had to experience the dreariness of being solitary, when those whom he loved had been summoned away. He had to live in his own thoughts, without familiar friend, with those only about him who belonged to a younger generation. Of him were demanded by his gracious Lord, as pledges of his faith, all his eye loved and his heart held converse with. He was as a man moving his goods into a far country, who at intervals and by portions send them before him, till his present abode is wellnigh unfurnished. He sent forward his friends on their journey, while he stayed himself behind, that there might be those in heaven to have thoughts of him, to look out for him, and receive him when his Lord should call. He sent before him, also, other still more voluntary pledges and ventures of his faith, a self-denying walk, a zealous maintenance of the truth, fastings and prayers, labours of love, a virgin life, buffetings from the heathen, persecution, and banishment. Well might so great a saint say, at the end of his days 'Come, Lord Jesus!' as those who are weary of the night, and wait for the morning. All his thoughts, all his contemplations, desires, and hopes, were stored in the invisible world; and death, when it came, brought back to him the sight of what he had worshipped, what he had loved, what he had held intercourse with, in years long past away. Then, when again brought into the presence of what he had lost, how would remembrance revive, and familiar thoughts long buried come to life! Who shall dare to describe the blessedness of those who find all their pledges safe returned to them, all their ventures abundantly and beyond measure satisfied?—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—XX. 22.—E. B. Pusey, Parochial Sermons, vol. ii. p. 98. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 234. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Holy-Tide Teaching, p. 143. J. M. Neale, Sermons for Some Feast Days in the Christian Year, p. 204; see also, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 130. A. Fleming, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1904, p. 294. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for Saints' Days, p. 180. XX. 22, 23.—Bristow Wilson, The Communion of Saints, p. 180.

NEXT THE THRONE

'To sit on My right hand, and on My left, is not Mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of My Father.'—MATTHEW XX. 23.

THE seats by Christ's side.

There is distinctly, in the words of my text, the principle of diversity of degree corresponding to what we call rank, and that diversity depends upon, and is, diversity in closeness to Jesus Christ. All shall be close to Him, and all shall be every moment getting closer, but there shall be diversity in the proximity, and some shall sit on the right hand and on the left.

Of course we start with the conception of equality. All get the penny in the parable. All 'sit down with Him on the throne,' which is the apex of the universe. But perfection does not exclude growth. Equality does not exclude variety, and perfection is not inconsistent with progress, and if there be progress there must necessarily be diversity of stages. Such diversity is a necessary result of the very conception of the future, as being the retribution for the present.

Nor let us forget, in reference to this diversity, that we are taught in the context to discharge from our minds, in connexion with it, all earthly ideas of superiority, wherein the excellency of the one is the inferiority of the others, and pre-eminence for A means degradation for all the rest of the alphabet.

II. The law of precedence in the kingdom.

It belongs to them 'for whom it is prepared of My Father'. The language is strongly metaphorical.

The seats are prepared, first, for those that have drunk most deeply of Christ's cup.

The measure in which we Christian people incorporate Jesus Christ into ourselves here will determine all our future.

The context gives a second condition of that pre-eminence. It falls to those who most fully imitate His life and death of service and sacrifice. Unselfish service for His sake is the only path.

These words about the preparation by the Father further suggest the certainty that these seats thus prepared shall be ours if we adhere to the conditions.

III. My text speaks of Jesus Christ as, under the aforesaid laws and restrictions, the Giver of the precedence.

To take the words before us as being an unconditional disclaimer, on His part, of His authority to give heavenly places would be to run counter to the whole tenor of Scripture. For His disclaimer must necessarily be interpreted with reference to the conceptions to which it is the answer. And these conceptions were that He could give the kingdom, and pre-eminence in it, as a pure piece of partiality, and arbitrary favouritism, with regard to fitness. The gift is surely from His hand, for if the hand had not been pierced with the nails it never had been able to give the crown. And all that we hope for in the future, or possess in the present, is alike the purchase of His blood and the result of His great sacrifice.—A. MACLAREN, The Unchanging Christ, p. 24.

THE CROSS AND THE THRONE

(For St. James the Apostle's Day)

'To sit on My right hand, and on My left, is not Mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of My Father.'—MATTHEW XX. 23.

THE incident recorded in the Gospel is a familiar one in the life of St. James and his brother St. John. Salome, their mother, was evidently jealous of the sons of Jonas, the late neighbours and partners of her own sons; and as she, like all other mothers, loved her own above all others, she yielded to the temptation to desire from Christ that they should occupy the most exalted position in His kingdom (Mark x. 35-37).

I. But She Asked for a Wrong Thing; and St. James and St. John did wrong when they prevailed upon their mother to intercede with Christ for them. Ambition is a salutary stimulus if free from selfishness; but when it is allied to selfishness, it is a passion charged with pride, envy, and covetousness, and most injurious to the soul. Christ declared His emphatic disapprobation of such selfish ambition. 'If any man,' said He, 'will come after Me, let him deny himself and take up his cross, and follow Me.' The cross, therefore, must be borne ere the throne be occupied. And this St. James and St. John found out in their after-experience; they were both baptized with the baptism of Christ, and drained the same cup of suffering. This toned down their ambition, chastened their spirit, and sanctified their life.

II. The Martyrdom of St. James.—In the forty-fourth year of our Lord, about the time of the Passover, St. James was accused by some of the Jews to Herod, who, to conciliate them, ordered his apprehension, and condemned him to death. On his way to execution, it is said that St. James performed a miracle of healing upon a paralytic, by which one Josias—a principal witness against the Apostle—was so affected that he fell at his feet and implored his pardon. Surprised at this sudden change, St. James raised him up and embraced him; and after he had imprinted a kiss on his cheek, he saluted him, saying, 'Peace be to thee, my brother'. This return of good for evil, of love for hate, so wrought on Josias that he there and then declared that he was, too, a believer in Christ. This bold confession led to his condemnation also; and he was beheaded at the same time and place as St. James. St. James had thus the great honour of being the proto-martyr of the Apostles, as St. Stephen had that of being the proto-martyr of the Church. Such was his pre-eminence at last; and now his desire is gratified—he sits with Christ in His throne.

FROM THE FOUNDATION

'To sit on My right hand, and on My left, is not Mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of My Father.'—MATTHEW XX. 23.

THIS is part of Christ's answer to the mother of Zebedee's children. It was a little family gathering; they had made it all up among themselves. There are many toy-makers. They thought it would be well if the kingdom of heaven could be in some way divided amongst the family. Some people's notion of heaven never gets beyond some family arrangement. They are themselves little, and can only do with little notions. We think that God is living from hand to mouth, inventing a new policy for every day, introducing surprises into the economy of His kingdom. Jesus Christ rebukes that foolish and truly atheistic notion, for there is no God in it, and He says in effect, The kingdom is already apportioned; the right-hand seat and the left-hand seat are already reserved. God does nothing by surprise and offhand and at the bidding of human suggestion; from the foundation every seat was settled.

I. 'From the foundation;' and where is the foundation? It is in the thought of God, in the purpose of the Eternal, away beyond all the little candle-stars, away where no comet has ever been seen by mortal vision, away to the everlasting, the unbeginning, the inconceivable, the ineffable—that wondrous position that we want to define by polysyllables, and cannot.

Now Jesus Christ was with the Father from the foundation; He was part of the foundation; yea, He was an essential element in the foundation; He was before all things, and by Him all things consist, and by Him all things will be judged. When there were no fountains abounding with water He faced the Eternal Love. So when He speaks thus to the mother of Zebedee's children He does not renounce His majesty, He uses His limitation that He may help her beyond her own. All things, according to the teaching of Christ, have been settled from the foundation, part of the Divine purpose, part of the Divine nature, wondrous, ineffable things, before even dreams began or poetry fashioned a harp.

II. See how the Incarnation is defined. Let us reverently paraphrase the music of the Son of God: Lord, I have come to do Thy will in the prepared body; I have come to show the world something of what the world could never see, the glory I had with Thee before the world was.

This was the purpose of the Incarnation, to show all men and women in all ages that everything was in the purpose of God and will be settled according to the Divine purpose; and as for the front seats and the back seats and the intermediate seats, woman, man, mother of ambitious sons, all these things were settled from the foundation.

III. And then see how it not only defines the Incarnation, but how it interprets the great ministry of providence. How many things are settled for us, if we would only believe it, and how many prayers are answered which are never offered except by some Divine intent which is a great mystery in the heart of every man. We have the most of things without asking for them. There are some things it would be absurd to ask for. We owe all the greatest things to prayers we never uttered and never can utter, and would de-Christianize ourselves if we attempted to utter them. We live in the greater prayer.

The only happiness is consonance with God, unity with that which was from the foundation—I mean the foundation below the foundation, the base below the base, the other base that makes the superficial base a possible term in geometry or economy.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. IV. p. 127.

'Ye shall drink indeed of My cup, and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with.'—MATTHEW XX. 23.

THERE was never wedge of gold that did not first pass the fire; there was never pure grain that did not undergo the flail. Let who will, hope to walk upon roses and violets to the throne of heaven: O Saviour, let me trace Thee by the track of Thy blood, and by Thy red steps follow Thee to Thine eternal rest and happiness.—BISHOP HALL.

REFERENCES.—XX. 23.—J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. IV. p. 127. E. L. Hull, Sermons Preached at King's Lynn, (3rd Series), p. 58. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 56; see also Sermons Preached in Manchester (3rd Series), p. 351. XX. 25.—R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. Ixx. 1906, p. 225. XX. 25, 26.—J. Clifford, ibid. vol. xliii. 1893, p. 280.

'Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister.'—MATTHEW XX. 26.

THE great cry with everybody is get on, get on! just as if the world were travelling post. How astonished people will be, when they arrive in heaven, to find the angels, who are so much wiser, laying no schemes to be made archangels!—JULIUS HARE.

It is a beautiful and salutary arrangement which we seldom reflect on as we ought, that, as a rule, men can only become rich and great by supplying some want of their fellow-men, by doing some work for others which others need and are willing to pay for, be that work moral guidance or material provision. We cannot rise to command except by stooping to serve; we cannot obtain conspicuous station among men or power over them without in some way or other rendering ourselves useful or necessary to them.—W. RATHBONE GREG, Literary and Social Judgments, p. 486.

GREATNESS BY SERVICE

'Whosoever would become great among you, shall be your minister; and whosoever would be first among you, shall be your servant. Even as the Son of Man came not to be ministered to, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.'—MATTHEW XX. 26-28.

I. CHRIST stood forth before men, and said, 'Behold I am among you as He that serveth'. St. Paul singled out this as the characteristic feature of his Divine Master that, though He was in the form of God, He emptied Himself of all honour and glory, and took upon Him the form of a slave.

Yet, in spite of Christ and His Apostles, in spite of the influence of the Church as a moral force, the idea still survives in many quarters that to serve others in a menial or subordinate capacity is degrading, while to be served by others is an honourable and dignified estate.

We commonly speak of our Lord's 'human ministry'. But do we reflect that the word 'ministry' simply means service, the doing of helpful, assisting work, and that a large space of Christ's time was spent in healing the sick and the suffering (which was reckoned in those days to be the work of a slave), and more generally in surrendering His own personal freedom for the sake of bearing the burdens of the obscure and friendless.

II. Service, however lowly, when willingly rendered in the spirit of sympathetic concern for others' good, exalts the doer. But the service must cost the doer of it something. It is best and rarest when the heart's blood is distilled into it: it is worth most when combined with careful thought and intelligence.

True service, such as confers greatness, is the ripe fruit of a long discipline of the impulses and the emotions, carried on through many stages, and only perfected after many ambitious failures. Doing good and being good are indissolubly united, being the active and the passive sides of the Christian character. And, like all beautiful things, both are arduous.

III. No one—not even the best of us—who feels the call to minister to others' good, and nobly ventures along that difficult path, can be sure that success will attend his efforts. But no one who does this in sincerity and humbleness can make of his life half so dismal a failure as he who is always demanding from others the willing service that he never thinks of repaying.—J. W. SHEPARD, Light and Life, p. 254.

REFERENCES.—XX, 27.—Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. i. p. 61. XX, 27, 28.—Lyman Abbott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 226.

THE SERVANT-LORD AND HIS SERVANTS

'Even as the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister.'—MATTHEW XX, 28.

I. LET us look first at the perfect life of service of the Servant-Lord.

In order to appreciate the significance of that life of service, we must take into account the introductory words, 'The Son of Man came'. They declare His pre-existence, His voluntary entrance into the conditions of humanity, and His denuding Himself of 'the glory which He had with the Father before the world was'. We shall never understand the Servant-Christ until we understand that He is the Eternal Son of the Father. His service began when He laid aside, not the garments of earth, but the vesture of the heavens, and girded Himself not with the cincture woven in man's looms, but with the flesh of our humanity, 'and being found in fashion as a man,' bowed Himself to enter into the conditions of earth. It was much that His hands should heal, that His lips should comfort, that His heart should bleed with sympathy for sorrow. But it was more that He had hands to touch, lips to speak to human hearts, and the heart of a man and a brother to feel with us as well as for us.

But then, passing beyond this, we may dwell upon the features, familiar as they are, of that wonderful life of self-oblivious and self-sacrificing ministration to others.

1. The life of Jesus Christ is self-forgetting love made visible. The source from which his ministrations have flowed is the pure source of a perfect love.

2. No taint of bye-ends was in that service; no side-long glances at possible advantages of influence, or reputation, or the like, which so often deform men's philanthropies and services to one another. Like the clear sea, weedless and stainless, that laves the marble steps of the palaces of Venice, the deep ocean of Christ's service to man was pure to the depths throughout.

3. That perfect ministry of the Servant-Lord was rendered with strange spontaneity and cheerfulness. On His cross He had leisure to turn from His own physical sufferings and the weight of a world's sin, which lay upon Him, to look at the penitent by His side, and He ended His life in the ministry of mercy to a brigand. And thus cheerfully, and always without a thought of self, 'He came to minister'.

4. Think, too, of the sweep of His ministrations. They took in all men; they were equally open to enemies and to friends, to mockers and to sympathizers. Think of the variety of the gifts which He brought in his ministry—caring for body and for soul; alleviating sorrow, binding up wounds, purifying hearts; dealing with sin, the fountain, and with miseries, its waters, with equal helpfulness and equal love.

5. And think of how that ministry was always ministration by a Lord. For there is nothing to me more remarkable in the Gospel narrative than the way in which, side by side, there lie in Christ's life the two elements, so difficult to harmonize in fact, and so impossible to have been harmonized in a legend, the consciousness of authority and the humility of a servant.

6. That ministration was a service that never shrank from stern rebuke. For it is not service but cruelty to sympathize with the sinner, and say nothing in condemnation of his sin. And yet no sternness is blessed which is not plainly prompted by desire to help.

II. Secondly, note the service that should be modelled on His.

There is no ground on which we can rest greatness or superiority in Christ's kingdom except this ground of service. The servant who serves for love is highest in the hierarchy of heaven. If we are ever to be near the right and the left of the Master in His kingdom, there is one way, and only one way to get it, and that is to make self abdicate its authority as the centre of our lives, and to enthrone there

Christ, and for His sake all our brethren. Be ambitious to be first, but, remember, Noblesse oblige. He that is first must be last.—A. MACLAREN, Christ's Musts, p. 55.

‘The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister.’—MATTHEW XX. 28.

THIS was one of the three texts which Dean Colet quoted in addressing Wolsey at his installation as Cardinal in Westminster Abbey. The others were, ‘He who is least among you shall be greatest in the kingdom of heaven,’ and ‘He who exalts himself shall be humbled, and he who humbles himself shall be exalted’.

REFERENCES.—XX. 28.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 181. C. J. Ridgeway, The King and His Kingdom, p. 50; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lii. 1897, p. 285. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. pp. 71, 80. Hugh Black, Christ's Service of Love, p. 23. W. H. Murray, The Fruits of the Spirit, p. 441. H. Scott Holland, Logic and Life, p. 227. XX. 29-34.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 351. J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 323. XX. 32.—Henry Alford, Quebec Gospel Sermons, vol. iii. p. 146. XX. 34.—J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 98.

SEEING AND FOLLOWING

‘Their eyes received sight, and they followed Him.’—MATTHEW XX. 34.

HERE is the greatest of all prayers: ‘Lord, that our eyes may be opened’. We can do nothing until that great miracle is worked. It is just there that God comes in; after that, certain consequences will happily flow, but those consequences are impossible until a certain miracle has been wrought. ‘Lord, that our eyes may be opened.’ We have eyes, but the very possession of them is a trouble to us, because it is a continual mockery; our very eyes seem to be groping after the light, and cannot find it. ‘Lord, that our eyes may be opened.’ It is the inclusive prayer. Give us our eyesight, and then we may learn how to do certain little things at least for ourselves; but we cannot do them until our eyes are opened, and there is only one power that can open them: Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on us!

I. Prayer is educational. Always pray for the thing you need, and let the things you want stand on one side. To want is one thing, to need is another. Mere want cannot pray; true need can do nothing but pray, it must cry. If we have this great faculty of discernment, we can make some little progress.

II. They ‘received’ sight. Why did not they give themselves sight? Notice that word ‘received’. It was through no power of their own; they had often rubbed their eyes, they had often touched their sightless eyeballs, but they had not that touch that would enable the eyes to receive the morning; they could only receive the kiss of the sun, not its smile. And we must make this a spiritual faculty, as it was a physical fact in the instance before us. We have nothing that we have not received. Is that so? Yes; and until you realize it you have no religion. True religion is an impossibility to your experience until you know that you are receivers and not originators. We are miracles of grace. The Apostle says, ‘What hast thou that thou hast not received?’ Art thou an eloquent man? thou art not eloquent of thyself, but thine eloquence explains some great act of reception.

III. And here is the right use of faculty—‘they followed Him’. ‘They received sight, and they followed Him.’ That is the kind of action which we call the true profession of Christianity. It is not nominal profession, it is not an offhand profession, but they followed Him. Why, they could see His footprints then. The joy of putting my feet into the very print on the ground made by Christ! Now that is impossible literally, but it signifies what is possible—namely, the spiritual following of Christ, the keeping on the road He trod, the doing of the things He did, the entrance into the very spirit of redeeming love.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 98.

‘And they followed Him.’—MATTHEW XX. 34.

If pardon be, even for a moment, severed from a moral process of renovation, if these two are not made to stand in organic and vital connexion with one another, that door is opened through which mischief will rush.—W. E. GLADSTONE.

REFERENCES.—XXI. 1-3.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. i. p. 1. XXI. 1-5.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 208. XXI. 1-16.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 89. XXI. 2, 3.—Jesse Brett, The Soul's Escape, p. 77. XXI. 3.—H. P. Liddon, Passion-Tide Sermons, p. 107. J. M. Neale, Sermons for the Church's Year, vol. ii. p. 80. XXI. 4.—C. Kingsley, Sermons on National Subjects, p. 1. XXI. 4, 5.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 97. Harvey Goodwin, Parish Sermons, p. 275. C. A. Berry, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 273. XXI. 5.—J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 279. C. J. Ridgeway, The King and His Kingdom, p. 50. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. i. p. 183. C. Kingsley, Sermons on National Subjects, p. 306. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 405; vol. xviii. No. 1038. XXI. 7, 8, 9.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 249.

PALM SUNDAY AND ITS LESSONS

‘And the multitudes that went before, and that followed after, cried, saying, Hosanna to the Son of David.’—MATTHEW XXI. 9.

PALM Sunday ought to have something to say to us, if we can hear its voice and learn its lessons.

I. One thing we learn here is that the sympathies of the multitude are right. This great mass of people, untaught, ignorant, simple-minded, with no one to guide them, instinctively gave their honour and adoration to Christ. They had heard of His kindly works, His sympathy with all who were in sorrow, His uniform goodness and purity, and their hearts went out to Him. Their instincts, as we may call them, were right. But their opinions and judgments were weak and easily swayed. And when a few crafty priests and glib-tongued Pharisees had been in and out among them saying this and that false thing of Christ, slandering and reviling Him, and declaring that He sought not the people's good, but to subvert their customs and destroy the nation, that was quite enough to change the sentiments and voices of all who had greeted Him with Hosannas. You can get any sort of music from a crowd, if you know how to play skilfully enough. Everything depends upon those to whom they lend their ears—their guides and leaders.

II. The ideals of the multitude are often coarse and material, and sorely need to be purified and raised. On that Palm Sunday they were chanting praises, not to the real Christ as He was, but to the imaginary Christ which they thought He ought to be. When they spread those palm branches for Him to tread upon, they had no idea that He had come to save them from their sins and uncleanness, and to purify their hearts. They thought He was the Messiah whose purpose was to enrich them and the nation with wealth and bodily comfort, to relieve them of Rome's bondage and heavy taxation, and bring in a time of plenty and prosperity for the very poorest. That was what the shoutings and songs of Palm Sunday meant. And that sort of glorying and huzzaing could not last. It was soon to pass away, like so much empty breath, simply because it came out of a falsehood. They found out very soon that that coarse material work was not Christ's purpose at all, and then they turned against Him. There is no real worship of Christ save that which is founded on a true understanding of His character and mission. He comes not to change things without, but to make the world slowly new by a change of the heart within.

III. Palm Sunday bids you go steadily on. You are not to be elated by temporary triumphs, or cast down by the proved fickleness of those among whom you labour. If you are engaged in any sort of public work you will have the palm branches waved around you at one season, and ere long there will be no palm branches, but something not unlike the shadow of a cross. And you need to steady your heart's purpose by sitting at the feet of Christ.—J. G. GREENHOUGH, Christian Festivals and Anniversaries, p. 20.

ADVENT

'And the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna to the Son of David: Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest.'
—MATTHEW XXI. 9.

THE Advent, or coming of Christ, in one sense or other is the message of all Scripture. This coming of Christ is manifold in its nature.

I. Christ came to visit us in great humility. At first men found no room for Him, and then they slew Him. There were occasions, however, when the power of His Divine majesty claimed their wonder and adoration even at this season. A great multitude spread their garments in the way as though He were some mighty king; others strewed palm branches before Him, as though He were some triumphant conqueror; and all cried to Him as unto their Saviour—Hosanna. And yet in one short week the King—the Conqueror—the Saviour—was forgotten; and men cried Away with Him—Crucify Him—and mocked Him as He hung upon the cross.

This advent of Christ into Jerusalem is but a figure and a pattern of His general reception in the world. We must not only be willing to confess a conquering King, but ready also to believe in a crucified Saviour.

II. Think of the Second Advent—of Christ's entrance into a new Zion not to die but to reign—when He shall 'return in glorious majesty to judge both the quick and the dead'. Think then of the witness which our own conscience will bear against us when Christ shall judge the world; and so judge yourselves that ye be not judged. We know nothing perhaps so little or so badly as our own heart. It will not be so at that day. Then we shall see our sins as God sees them. No one speaks carelessly of death and the judgment after death but he who knows nothing of himself—nothing of God. The first lesson which we learn of our own nature, if we deal sincerely with ourselves, must be one of deep, inexpressibly deep humility. The first lesson which we learn from the Bible, if we truly realize its teaching, must be one of deep, inexpressibly deep gratitude.

III. But there is yet a third Advent full of joy and peace and hope and comfort to every troubled soul. Christ comes to each one of us who have been made His in especial manner—as He once came to His own, in love and tenderness.

If Christ be already with you, labour more and more earnestly that your whole life may be devoted to God through Him. If Christ be not found in you, pray faithfully for the presence which He has pledged to you. Pray faithfully, earnestly, ceaselessly, and be very sure that your prayer will be heard, and Christ will come to you, and make His dwelling with you.

But that Christ may thus come to us, we must cast out all that is hostile to Him. We must patiently wait for Him. We must be silent. We must pray to Him, as the multitude prayed, Hosanna. Save now, we beseech Thee.—B. F. WESTCOTT, Village Sermons, p. 1.

REFERENCES.—XXI. 9.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 72. W. C. E. Newbolt, Church Times, vol. xlix. 1903, p. 489. R. W. Church, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 1. M. G. Glazebrook, Prospice, p. 98. H. P. Liddon, Passion-Tide Sermons, p. 196. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvii. No. 2196. Parker, Inner Life of Christ, vol. iii. p. 91; and see his Homiletic Analysis of Matthew. Homiletic Quarterly, vol. iii. p. 136. Pulpit Analyst, vol. iii. p. 654. Dr. Arnold's Sermons (3rd Series), No. ix.

'WHO IS THIS?'

'And when He was come into Jerusalem, all the city was moved, saying, Who is this? And the multitude said, This is Jesus, the Prophet of Nazareth of Galilee.'
—MATTHEW XXI. 10.

Who is this? The question was asked by some, no doubt, in idle curiosity; by some, perhaps, in doubting hesitation, for the days were evil, and the glory seemed to have departed from Israel; by some with eager hope that the answer would announce their King.

I. So is the question asked still in varying moods. Who is this? Who is the Leader of the great Christian procession of the ages? The Chief Figure in that procession is now as of old a Master of men. But who is He? Why do men go after Him?

It is a great question for every soul. You can hardly escape it. That great procession passes by your doors, incessant and unending. You must have an answer. It is answered in the text, you say. This is the Prophet, Jesus, from Nazareth of Galilee. Yes, that was a true answer as far as it went; but we cannot forget that the men who gave it seem soon to have lost their faith in the Prophet.

II. Who is this? The question comes to us still, and meets, alas! at times with as poor an answer. Men and women still follow the great Christian procession. They join in the Confession, which declares that He on whom their eyes are fixed is the Christ, the Redeemer, 'Very God, of Very God'. But they have not really thought of what they are saying. And so when the question comes to them, as come it surely does one day, Who is this? they receive a shock. It is best left to theologians, they suppose; and so they take refuge in an answer which nobody can gainsay: This is Jesus, the Prophet. He was the world's greatest Teacher, who spake as man never spake, who brought men a message of holiness and peace. They do not see that they have given the lie to all their previous professions; they have robbed their half-hearted allegiance of the only element which justified its existence at all.

III. It is a real danger that we should acquiesce in this way of thinking about our Lord. The devotion of the Christian centuries is not devotion to the memory of a great Prophet of the past, but love to an ever-present Lord and King who still lives and reigns among men. We cannot replace the one conception by the other without disaster to our spiritual life, without a shipwreck of faith, without peril to our souls.

And thus the story of the text with its terrible sequel teaches us the miserable insufficiency of any such view of the Christ as that which regards Him only as a great Teacher, a great Prophet. Such a belief as that will not nerve men and women with courage to trust Him in an hour of spiritual darkness, in days of perplexity and distress and pain.—J. H. BERNARD, Via Domini, p. 136.

REFERENCES.—XXI. 10.—J. Cameron Lees, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1895, p. 116. H. P. Liddon, Advent in St. Paul's, p. 1. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. li. No. 2939. XXI. 10-16.—Selected Sermons of Schleiermacher, p. 103.

And Jesus went into the temple of God.—MATTHEW XXI. 12.

As the good husbandman, when he sees the leaves grow yellow, and the branches unthriving, looks presently to the root; so didst Thou, O Holy Saviour, upon sight of the disorders spread over Judea and Jerusalem, address Thyself to the rectifying of the temple.—BISHOP HALL.

WHEN nations are to perish in their sins,
'Tis in the Church that leprosy begins.

—COWPER.

REFERENCES.—XXI. 12-14.—V. R. Lennard, Passion-Tide and Easter, p. 33. XXI. 13.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. i. p. 7. T. H. Ball, Persuasions, p. 1. R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 8. F. D. Huntington, Christian Believing and Living, p. 502. XXI. 15.—W. H. Lyon, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 269. XXI. 15, 16.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1785. XXI. 17.—W. P. Balfern, Glimpses of Jesus, p. 167. XXI. 17-20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxv. No. 2107. XXI. 17-22.—J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 125. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 357. XXI. 18, 19.—V. R. Lennard, Passion-Tide and Easter, p. 33. XXI. 18-22.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 412.

PUNISHMENT

'And (Jesus) said unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever.'—MATTHEW XXI. 19.

'LET no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever;' and presently the fig-tree withered away. A stern sentence surely, and executed with dreadful swiftness, and for that very reason, worthy of our notice; since it concerns us very deeply to remember, that although the Lord our God is gracious and merciful, slow to anger and of great kindness, He who is very Holiness cannot bear with wilful and unrepented sin. He Who is the Truth itself may not endure hypocrisy, and the pretence of righteousness in those that have it not.

Consider carefully what the real forgiveness of sins is, and what are its conditions. There are two great facts about sin and forgiveness:—

I. In this World there is no 'Forgiveness of Sins'.—Nature is unflinchingly, cruelly just. Those who keep her laws shall prosper, those who break them must suffer. We all recognize this to some extent in outward things, and shape our course accordingly. We know that the fire will burn us, that the deep waters will drown us, and we call him a madman who acts as if it were not so, and suffers for his neglect. But the laws of our moral nature are not less stern. We may dream, if we will, that we can play for a while with the burning fire of lust or anger, and come away unscathed, but it is not so; before we know it, our souls are seared and branded with scars that nothing earthly can ever efface. Let us never fancy that we can sin a sin and be done with it. When you are tempted to sin, think what you are doing not to yourself only, nor your neighbours, but to others, whom maybe you will never know.

In this world there is no forgiveness of sins. Yet we believe that God will pardon us and heal us, if we turn to Him rightly; it was for this that Jesus Christ died upon the cross; that we might be cleansed and restored, and live with Him for ever.

II. There is no Forgiveness at all without Repentance.—Real repentance means doing as well as feeling; and the first thing to do is to read carefully through that sad chapter of the past which we would so gladly close for ever, in order that we may truly know what we have been doing; and laying our sin before God in all its meanness, stripped of every excuse, implore His pardon. It may be, of course, if we have been grievously sinning against others, that our conscience will bid us make open confession and reparation; but in every case there must be absolute plainness with ourselves, absolute submission to God. You see it is not a pleasant nor an easy thing to repent; think of this too when you are going to sin.

III. Consider the especial sin and its punishment which are denounced in our text; the sin of spiritual barrenness, what I may call ineffectualness, the failure to help our fellow-creatures, and its punishment, the loss of power to help.

Day by day, and hour by hour, the choice of good and evil is offered to you, and every time you choose the better part you are bearing fruit acceptable to God; every time you yield, and choose the worst, you are losing power; and remember this, that if you go on refusing God's service, and doing what seems easiest, a time will come when it will be too late, when the will is utterly paralysed, and repentance is only despair. To such an one the judgment is come in his lifetime; on him already the terrible doom is pronounced, 'Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever'. Is it not the experience of all of you, that already your own shortcomings have prevented you from boldly rebuking vice, or stretching out a hand of help, when you would gladly have done it, if you had dared.

Let us learn of Jesus Christ how the poor wasted lives, which we manage so ill for ourselves, may become rich and useful—these are His words: 'I am the Vine, ye are the branches. He that abideth in Me and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit, for without Me ye can do nothing.'—J. H. F. FELLE, Ecclesia Discens, p. 97.

FRUITLESSNESS

'And when He saw a fig tree in the way, He came to it, and found nothing thereon, but leaves only, and said unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever. And presently the fig tree withered away.'—MATTHEW XXI. 19.

The whole thing is symbolical—only so is it intelligible.

I. Christ Seeking Fruit.—He comes to give, but also to require. He has a right to you. He is the Creator of you, as of the tree, and He is the Redeemer. He desires fruit from you. He not only demands, but desires, longs for and delights in it. The fruit He desires is yourself.

II. The Barrenness which is a Crime.—What a lively image of human nature this is—plenty of leaves, that is professions, talk, etc., but no fruit! Now observe that naturally we ought to bring forth fruit. Human nature is made for God, to blossom in goodness just as does the tree. He comes requiring, for the demands of God's law cannot drop down to our impotence. What we ought to be remains always the same, however much we may vary.

III. The Close of the Time of Seeking.—This points to the great law of the limitation of the period of probation. The whole analogy of God's dealings seems to teach that the time of probation is limited. Christ comes seeking fruit for the last time, then there is:—

IV. The Punishment of Fruitlessness by Perpetual Fruitlessness.—Sin punished by continual sinfulness. A natural process which God allows to take effect. And this is the most awful idea of hell, that the bottomless pit is an endless descent; that the fire which shall never be quenched is the fire of burning passions; that the chains of darkness are 'the cords of his sins'. Every sin tends thitherwards.—A. MACLAREN.

THE BARREN FIG-TREE

'And when He saw a fig tree in the way, He came to it, and found nothing thereon, but leaves only, and said unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever. And presently the fig tree withered away.'—MATTHEW XXI. 19.

This tree was a symbol of that which, in man, is a worse sin than a merely fruitless life. It had leaves, you will observe, though it had no fruit. That was the distinction of this particular tree among its fellows ranged along the road, with their bare, leafless, unpromising branches. They held out hopes of nothing beyond what met the eye. This tree, with its abundant leaves, gave promise of fruit that might be well-nigh ripe, and thus it was a symbol of moral or of religious pretentiousness.

I. And thus the fig-tree represented immediately, we cannot doubt, in our Lord's intention, the actual state of the Jewish people. The heathen nations, judged from a Divine point of view, were barren enough. Israel was barren also, but then Israel was also pretentious and false. Israel was the fig-tree of the spoken parable which our Lord had pronounced just a year before. No Jew with his eye on the language of the Prophets, particularly of Ezekiel, could have doubted that in this parable our Lord referred to the Jewish people; but what He then taught by words He now would teach, in its completeness, by action, for now the year for which the dresser of the vineyard had pleaded had just run out. During that year of patient appeal our Lord had stretched out His hands, in entreaty, all day long, to a disobedient and guinsaying people. The tree by the roadside was a visible symbol of the moral condition of Israel as it presented itself to the eye of Jesus Christ, and there was no longer any reason for suspending the judgment which had been foretold in the Saviour's parable. 'No man eat fruit of thee, hereafter, for ever.' If humanity needed light, strength, peace, consolations, Israel could no longer give them. Israel was hereafter to be a blasted and withered tree on the wayside of history.

II. But the parable applies with equal force to nations or to Churches in Christendom, which make great pretensions and do little or nothing of real value to mankind. For a time the tree waves its leaves in the wind. It lives on, sustained by the traditional habits and reverence of ages. But, at His own time, Christ passes along the highway—passes to inquire and to judge some unforeseen calamity, some public anxiety, some shock to general confidence, lifts the leaves of that tree, and discovers its real fruitlessness.

III. To every individual Christian this parable is full of warning. The religious activity of the human soul may be divided, roughly, into leaves and fruit—into showy forms of religious activity and interest, on the one side, and the direct produce of religious conviction on the other. It is much easier, we all know, to grow leaves than to grow fruit, and many a man's life veils the absence of fruit by the abundance of leaves. It is always easier, for instance, to take interest in and to discuss religious questions, than to submit the will entirely to religious principle. An anxious question for all of us is whether the foliage, so to call it, of our Christian life is the covering of fruit beneath that which is ripening for heaven, or whether it is only a thing of precocious and unnatural growth which has drained away the tree's best sap before its time, and made good fruit almost impossible. To take an interest in religious questions, in religious society, in religious observances, is most right and important; but it is not necessarily the same thing as being the servant of Christ our Lord in whose soul His wonder-working grace is bringing forth the fruit of the Spirit—'love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance'. We know that what He demands is fruit, not merely leaves.—H. P. LIDDON, Penny Pulpit, vol. xiv. No. 830, p. 317.

REFERENCES.—XXI. 19.—R. W. Church, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 71. H. P. Liddon, Sermons on Some Words of Christ, p. 100; see also Expository Sermons on the New Testament, p. 45. J. Parker, Hidden Springs, p. 98. XXI. 21.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (1st Series), p. 536. XXI. 22.—F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 131. XXI. 23.—J. A. Bain, Questions Answered by Christ, p. 65. A. F. Winnington Ingram, Lenten Mission, 1905, p. 35. XXI. 23-27.—A. B. Davidson, Waiting Upon God, p. 183. F. D. Maurice, Lincoln's Inn Sermons, vol. iv. p. 84; see also Sermons, p. 95. XXI. 23-46.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2756. XXI. 25.—H. J. Martyn, For Christ and the Truth, p. 158.

WORKING FOR THE MASTER

'A certain man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said, Son, go work to-day in my vineyard. He answered and said, I will not: but afterward he repented, and went. And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I go, sir: and went not.'—MATTHEW XXI. 28-30.

I. LET us consider how this parable applies to the classes our Lord was especially addressing at that time. You will find on looking at the context that our Lord was addressing the elders and chief priests in the Temple. The chief priests and elders and Pharisees whose outward deportment seemed to make them correspond with the one who said, 'I go, sir, but went not,' rejected our Lord's teaching, disparaged His miracles, refused His invitations and scorned His threatenings, and, on the other hand, the history shows us that His preaching of the truth came home with power and effect to the hearts of the publicans and the harlots who pressed into the kingdom of God. Such is the application of the parable to those whom our Lord primarily addressed.

You will see how it applies with equal force to the Jew and the Gentile.

II. Let us bring this home to ourselves. Does not this parable find, in almost every congregation, two classes very aptly represented on the one hand by the first son who refused but afterwards went, and on the other by the second son who seemed to assent but nevertheless went not. In almost every congregation you will find a number of persons who may be very easily wrought upon and impressed by peculiar circumstances. There will be many who will listen with eager, breathless attention as the message comes: 'Go work to-day in My vineyard'. The attitude they assume, their eager, riveted interest, might well fill a minister's heart with hope and confidence. Yet often those who say, 'I will not,' will doubtless be found amongst the best workers in the vineyard of Christ.

How often have some of you known it in your own experience how the promise made on a sick bed is altogether forgotten when the season of health returns, and he who under sickness and trial responded readily to all the minister had to say about eternity shows how evanescent have been the resolutions he made, and the man who said 'I go' afterwards went not.

III. The message comes to every one of us, 'Son, go work to-day in My vineyard'. Prodigals as many of us may be, all our wanderings do not destroy the fact that we are still, in some sense, God's children, and He addresses us as our father: 'Son, go work to-day in My vineyard'.

But though salvation is freely provided and offered to us and becomes ours by faith in Him who wrought it out, yet there is a work for every one of us to do. There is no room for sloth, we are summoned to work for God, for ourselves and for others, and to work to-day. To-day is the only time that we can call our own.

REFERENCES.—XXI. 28.—C. G. Lang, Church Times, vol. lv. 9 Feb. 1906, p. 183. F. W. Farrar, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 353. W. L. Watkinson, ibid. vol. liv. 1898, p. 184; see also vol. lxvi. 1904, p. 122. H. W. Burrows, Oxford Lent Sermons, 1868, p. 45. A. F. Winnington Ingram, The Call of the Father, p. 114. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiii. No. 1338.

PROMISING WITHOUT DOING

'A certain man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said, Son, go work to-day in my vineyard. He answered and said, I will not: but afterward he repented, and went. And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I go, sir; and went not.'—MATTHEW XXI. 28-30.

So very difficult is obedience, so hardly won is every step in our Christian course, so sluggish and inert our corrupt nature, that I would have a man disbelieve he can do one jot or tittle beyond what he has already done; refrain from borrowing aught on the hope of the future, however good a security for it he seems to be able to show; and never take his good feelings and wishes in pledge for one single untied deed. Nothing but past acts are the vouchers for future. Past sacrifices, past labours, past victories over yourselves—these, my brethren, are the tokens of the like in store, and doubtless of greater in store; for the path of the just is as the shining, growing light. But trust nothing short of these. 'Deeds, not words and wishes,' this must be the watchword of your warfare and the ground of your assurance. But if you have done nothing firm and manly hitherto, if you are as yet the coward slave of Satan, and the poor creature of your lusts and passions, never suppose you will one day rouse yourselves from your indolence.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—XXI. 28-30.—J. H. Newman, Parochial and Plain Sermons, vol. i. p. 165. H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1895, p. 145. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2747. XXI. 28-31.—Stopford A. Brooke, Short Sermons, p. 287. T. Sadler, Sermons for Children, p. 30. C. J. Vaughan, Last Words in the Parish Church of Doncaster, p. 293. XXI. 28-32.—B. W. Maturin, Practical Studies on the Parables of Our Lord, p. 110. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiii. No. 742. Treuch, Parables, p. 191. Calderwood, ibid. p. 163. Marcus Dods, ibid. p. 171. XXI. 28-32; 33-43.—R. Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven, p. 129.

'Afterward he repented himself and went.'—MATTHEW XXI. 29.

THAT doing of the right thing, after a term of paralysis, cowardice—any evil name—is one of the mighty reliefs, equal to happiness, of longer duration.—GEORGE MEREDITH, One of Our Conquerors, chap. xxv.

REFERENCES.—XXI. 30.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (1st Series), p. 414. XXI. 31.—C. H. Parkhurst, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xvi. 1894, p. 388.

'Ye repented not afterward, that ye might believe him.'—MATTHEW XXI. 32.

I HAVE often observed how incongruous and irrational the common temper of mankind is, especially of youth, in that they are not ashamed to sin, and yet are ashamed to repent; not ashamed of the action for which they ought justly to be esteemed fools, but are ashamed of the returning, which only can make them be esteemed wise men.—DEFOE, Robinson Crusoe, chap. i.

REFERENCES.—XXI. 33-46.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 107. XXI. 37.—R. D. B. Rawnsley, Village Sermons (3rd Series), p. 12. XXI. 39.—H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 296. XXI. 40, 41.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 153. XXI. 44.—J. Smith, The Integrity of Scripture, p. 109. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 116; see also Sermons Preached in Manchester, p. 1; Order and Conduct, p. 348. XXII.—G. Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 103. XXII. 1.—B. Wilberforce, Sanctification by the Truth, p. 40. XXII. 1-4.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 126. XXII. 1-14.—B. W. Maturin, Practical Studies on the Parables of Our Lord, p. 124. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2809. XXII. 2.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 193. XXII. 2-4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 976. XXII. 3.—F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 108.

THE FRIVOLOUS SPIRIT

'But they made light of it.'—MATTHEW XXII. 5.

I. THERE are of course some things that every wise man will make light of. There are petty grievances in every lot. 'Think, sir,' said Dr. Johnson to a worrying friend, 'think, sir, how infinitely little that will seem a twelve-month hence.' It is an untold blessing to have a little vision and a little humour, and see things in their true sizes and proportions. There is a gentle art of making light.

But it is the corruption of the best that is the worst: and it is the overstraining of our instincts that degrades: and it is the making light of everything that is our ruin.

II. These men of our text were essentially frivolous. And I want to guard you now against a common mistake. I want you to remember that there is a whole world of difference between frivolity and a truly buoyant spirit. It is one thing to be a light weight. It is quite another thing to be light-hearted. Many a solemn face is but a mask for an utterly frivolous and petty soul. And many a heart that is tremendously in earnest about life, has the most infectious laugh in the whole company. The Pharisees were most supremely solemn; but, on the testimony of Jesus, most supremely flippant.

III. There is a double condemnation of frivolity.

1. It is utterly insufficient for life's journey. There are worse bankruptcies than ever come before the courts. There are men who go bankrupt in hope, in aspiration, in ideal, long before the end. And life is far too grim, and sometimes far too sad, to be carried through with a frivolous heart.

And is not that one task of sorrow in the world? It sobers, sanctifies: brings men and women to themselves again, and bringing them to themselves leads them to God.

2. But for us who are Christians there is another condemnation of frivolity. It is the fact that Jesus our teacher and our Lord has mightily increased the seriousness of life. I could understand an old pagan being frivolous, for for him there was nothing infinite in man. But Jesus has come, and God has tabernacled and tabernacles still in man; and life has been lifted into heavenly meanings, and swung out through death into eternal ages; and when my life means fellowship, kinship with God, eternity, then to be frivolous is antichrist.—G. H. MORRISON, Flood-Tide, p. 34.

MAKING LIGHT OF THE GOSPEL

'But they made light of it.'—MATTHEW XXII. 5.

'But they made light of it.' They made nothing of the grand chance. How could they make anything of it? Their characters are here described. If their characters or occupation or engagement had not been referred to we might have invented reasons for this frivolity; but the reason of the frivolity is given in the parable itself. These were prosperous men; they had married wives and bought oxen and entered into merchandise and possessed themselves of large farms. These people had never needed a Gospel; that is to say, they had never been sensible of their need of it. A prosperous man, as the world counts prosperous, does not want the Gospel. He could not understand it if he heard it, it would be an alien tongue; only the broken-hearted can listen to the Gospel; only the bereaved catch the word resurrection as if it were a revelation; only those who have been desolated and orphaned and smitten in two can detect a possible hope in such sweet words as the Gospel gives. The fat beast needs no organ or trumpet or banner or promise or sacramental love; he lives beneath the Gospel, away from the great offer made in blood.

I. Let us beware of frivolity. Frivolity always means ruin; frivolity, being translated, means loss.

Is this frivolity, destruction, or ruin only in Gospel things? No; frivolity is ruin everywhere. That is the great plea of the Christian Gospel; it says, Fools, hear me; you are not only wasting me, you are wasting life. The frivolous man is not only wasting his chance of heaven, he is wasting his own business; that is how the Gospel has such a determining and beneficent hold over men.

II. What is this age suffering from? Want of discipline. I hear a great deal about making life cheerier, brighter, this and that, and something else: all of which may within given limits be right; but the character that made England, the only England that cannot be shaken, was a character of hard work, labour—a misunderstood and degraded term. Until we get back to discipline we shall not get back to hardihood, to true soldierliness, to the pith that means victory in any contest. It is the disciplinarian who wins, only he may have long to wait for his victory; yet when it comes no man can pluck it from him.

III. Now there are many persons who make light of opportunity. They squander away their chances; they are always here at the wrong time, and they are always there at the wrong place, and they were always just going to do it, but suddenly the night fell, the night in which no man can work. Be on the outlook for opportunities, be on the outlook for the best chances; make every occasion great; make every call a call to a feast, the best feast you can provide; and if you are going to provide a good feast in your pulpit it will not be you that fail, if failure there is, it will be God, and God cannot ultimately fail.

Until you get back to your principles of faith, the innermost meanings of the Divine purpose, you may get up as many twentieth-century funds as you please, and they all amount to nothing. Have no faith in gigantic financial manipulation, have no faith even in a self-constructed patronage, have no place to which you must go cap in hand to ask for another dole; so live your principles as to leave God to supply your necessities, and He will do it. You have never tried Him. Call upon Me, saith He, prove Me now, let faith prove the God of redemption, and there will be a great marriage feast, and all things will be ready. Do not begin at the wrong end of things. Do not begin at the money end; begin at the prayer end, the faith end, the self-examination end.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. I. p. 218.

REFERENCES.—XXII. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. II. No. 98. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. II. p. 167. XXII. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. XXXIV. No. 2022. XXII. 10-14.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. XLVIII. 1895, p. 177.

THE INTRUDER AT THE FEAST

'When the king came in to see the guests, he saw there a man which had not on a wedding garment.'—MATTHEW XXII. 11.

A FEAST is an old picture of Gospel blessings (Prov. ix. 1-5; Is. xxv. 6), but it remained for Christ to show them, as a wedding feast, an occasion of greatest joy. The first manifestation of His glory was His providing for a wedding feast (John II. 11). What will the last triumphant manifestation be? (Rev. xix. 7, 17, 18).

The guests who were first invited were the Jews. God first sent to them His Prophets (v. 3); but they would not hear (Acts vii. 51, 52). When the sacrifice was offered, and all was ready, He sent again His Apostles (v. 4), but they refused to hear (Acts xiii. 46; xxviii. 17-29); so wrath came upon them to the uttermost (1 Thess. II. 14-16).

The guests who are now being gathered in to the wedding feast are all who will come—Jew or Gentile (Rom. I. 16). It matters not who, provided they are in Christ (Col. II. 11).

But now mark—at wedding feasts in ancient times there was a certain garment peculiar to the occasion, and those who came without it were considered intruders. Here we find a man who entered without a wedding garment. See—

I. How he was Discovered (v. 11).—The king came in to see the guests—God notes all (Rev. II. 1, 2; Cant. vii. 12). The man was not discovered till the king himself saw him (Jer. xxiii. 24; 1 Sam. xvi. 7). But when once the king was come, then he was detected (Prov. xv. 3, 11; Amos ix. 2-4). What a discovery shall take place when Christ shall come!

II. How he was Tried (v. 12).—The king takes him on his profession of friendship (Ps. I. 21). He asks him only, 'How camest thou in hither, not having on a wedding garment?' this is the one regulation (John x. 1). How do you come otherwise (Ps. I. 16, 17). What does he say? Nothing. 'He was speechless' (Rom. III. 19; Job v. 16).

III. How he was Sentenced (v. 13).—He was bound (Matt. xiii. 30-41). He was taken away (Matt. xxv. 41-46). He was cast into outer darkness (John xii. 35, 36; viii. 12). Such is the end when God visits an unprepared soul (Job xxvii. 8-10; Matt. xxiv. 50, 51; John xv. 2-6).

REFERENCES.—XXII. 11, 12.—H. Montagu Butler, Narrow School Sermons, p. 387. XXII. 11-13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2024. XXII. 11-14.—Ibid. vol. xvii. No. 976. R. H. McKim, The Gospel in the Christian Year, p. 137.

THE SELF-DECEIVER DETECTED

'And he was speechless.'—MATTHEW XXII. 12.

THERE is a spirit by nature, in all of us, which refuses to accept salvation as a gift of free grace. The feeling is, that we can accomplish our salvation by our own efforts and deservings.

I. When the man who has refused to clothe himself with the wedding garment is confronted with the king, he is absolutely speechless. Why is this? First, because he sees his offence in the right light. To us, in the present twilight state of existence, the sin of a practical rejection of Jesus Christ seems a very trifling matter. But in the estimation of God the matter assumes a very different aspect. In God's sight the sin of all sins is the rejection of the Son of His love. It comprises all other sins. Perhaps it is not easy for us to see this now. But we shall see it hereafter. And a terrible thing it will be if we see it too late; for when the great final disclosure comes, what will befall the man who carelessly, thoughtlessly, has put away from him the proffered righteousness of Jesus Christ; and gone, in reliance upon his own merits and his own strength, into the awful presence of the heart-searching God? He will be speechless.

II. 'But,' you may say, 'why does he not cry for mercy?' Because it is too late, and he knows that it is too late. The time in which he might have taken the wedding garment is passed by.

III. 'But,' it may be said again, 'is it possible that unconverted, unspiritual men, should go out of this world in perfect ignorance of their condition before God, and wake up, only when the light of eternity falls upon them, to see things as they really are?' I believe it to be perfectly possible. I should believe it, even if I had not the teaching of this parable to guide me. Men can deceive themselves as to their standing before God, and wake up to the consciousness of the truth, when it is too late to alter what has been done.

'Search us, O God, and know our hearts; try us, and know our thoughts! And see if there be any wicked way in us, and lead us all in the way everlasting.'—GORDON CALTHROP, Penny Pulpit, vol. xii. No. 680, p. 106.

REFERENCES.—XXII. 12.—A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 130. W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 216. XXII. 15-22.—H. Hensley Henson, Christ and the Nation, p. 86; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 216. XXII. 17.—J. A. Bain, Questions Answered by Christ, p. 74.

HUMAN COINS

'Whose is this image and superscription?'—MATTHEW XXII. 20.

THE question, 'Whose is this image and superscription?' was an example of one of our Lord's suggestions for a thought-excursion into the transcendent truth of the inseparability of God and man.

There is a threefold lesson for us, arising out of the suggested thought-excursion, in our Lord's question—theological, personal, practical.

I. The Theological Lesson, from the human coin stamped with the Divine image, is one of the utmost importance as a stimulus to optimism. It is the transcendent twin-truth of the Eternal humanity in God, and the Eternal Divinity in man; that inasmuch as all that is must have pre-existed, as a first principle, in the mind of the Infinite Originator, and as the highest of all that is, so far as we at present know, is man, the archetypal original of man must be in the Deity; and therefore man, however buried and stifled now in the corruptible body, is, in his inmost ego, indestructible, and inseparably linked to the Father of Spirits. Moreover, that for the purpose of Divine self-manifestation, man is as necessary to God as God is to man. As God's power is revealed in the wheeling planet, God's nature is revealed in the thinking man. Inasmuch as humanity is the chosen vehicle of the self-unfolding of the absolute, humanity will, through much initial imperfection, and through many changes, struggle upwards and onwards in development, until, at last, it shall be found complete in Him, and the pre-ordained purpose of the Absolute be completely fulfilled.

II. The Personal Lesson.—'With God,' said Tocqueville, 'each one counts for one.' Each one of us is a responsible, moral being, perfected, purified, tested and found faithful, is not machine-made, he must be grown; he is the product of evolution; and, for the purposes of evolution, he must emerge triumphant from resistance, as the blade of wheat emerges triumphant from clay and stones. That this educative operation of the will of the Father-Spirit may be effected, man is, by the determinate foreknowledge of God, a composite being. He possesses an inferior animal nature, a lower region of appetite, perception, imagination, tendency, and so on; in other words, to carry on the analogy used by our Lord, there is a reverse side to the coin. Obviously, if we concentrate all our attention on the reverse side of the coin, we are apt to forget that the king's image is on the other side. We can only see one side at a time; and while we gaze at the reverse side, and the other side is hidden, doubt, depression, pessimism, are the inevitable result. What is the moral of the analogy? It is this: the inevitable inaccuracy of human judgments; the need for caution in our verdicts.

1. As to ourselves. Remember, you cannot see both sides of the coin at once.

2. In our judgments of others. Here again, remember, we cannot see both sides of the coin at once, and therefore our judgments are literally one-sided.

III. The Practical Lesson.—'Whose is this image and superscription?' asks the Head of humanity of the human items that make up the race. A recognition of the truth underlying the question would prove to be the golden key which would unlock all the great social problems of the age. I believe that all the prominent evils which degrade humanity would pass away before it, and the kingdoms of the world would become the kingdoms of our Lord.—ARCHDEACON WILBERFORCE, Speaking Good of His Name, p. 75.

Illustration.—Did you ever examine closely the reverse side of a sovereign? Close to the date you will see the minute capital letters 'B. P.' Not one person in a thousand has ever seen these initials; they have not looked for them. They are the initials of Benedetto Pistrucci, the talented chief engraver to the Mint, in the reign of George III., the designer of the coin which Ruskin said was the most beautiful coin in Europe—the English sovereign.—BASIL WILBERFORCE, Speaking Good of His Name, p. 83.

THE IMAGE OF GOD

'Whose is this image and superscription?'—MATTHEW XXII. 20.

WITH His finger upon the coin, our Lord enunciated a great truth. He showed that the authority of God and of man are not to be opposed to each other. 'Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; and unto God the things that are God's.'

Now consider:—

I. What ought we to render to Cæsar, the representative of human authority? As Christians we are taught to render to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honour to whom honour. The principle of government is from God, and the governor who rules the nation has a right to levy taxes from his subjects for the good of the nation. Moreover, as the principle of government is from God, the governor is primâ facie entitled to fear and honour as the representative of Divine authority.

The governor is to be obeyed because 'there is no power but of God; and the powers that be are ordained of God'.

Our duty to the State requires us both to obey the laws of the State and to uphold our rulers by the active force of earnest and constant intercession.

II. A penny piece is a token of the law of our duty to Cæsar, but we bear upon ourselves a higher image and superscription, which reminds us of our duty to God, from Whose mint we have come.

What then are the things that are God's, the things which duty requires us to render to Him?

The Church Catechism gives us our answer. It teaches us to render to God faith, fear, love, worship, thanksgiving, trust, prayer, honour, and a life-long service, with all the powers of our heart, and mind, and soul, and strength. The understanding is to be opened to know what the will of the Lord is. The affections are given to us in order that they may be set on things above, and not on things on the earth. The speech is to be with grace, seasoned with the salt of sound wisdom. The eyes, the ears, and all the members of the body are to be rendered to God as a living sacrifice. We owe to God public worship, private devotion, all such good works as are prepared for us to walk in, prayer, fasting, almsgiving, and life-long earnest labour in our Heavenly Father's vineyard.

III. What then is left for ourselves? Nothing. The Lord Himself is the portion of mine inheritance. Man is not created for himself and his own glory, but for God and His glory.

Christ loved the Church and gave Himself for it. He asks the members of the Church to love Him and to give themselves wholly to Him. Not until we give to God the things that are God's, ourselves, our souls and bodies, do we find rest, or peace, or joy, or a life worth living.—CANON BODINGTON, The Twelve Gates of the Holy City, p. 175.

THE CATHOLICITY OF CHRISTIANITY

'Whose is this image and superscription?'—MATTHEW XXII. 20.

CHRISTIANITY comes to us all, in all points, in all interests, and in all undertakings, with this one great question: you are living your life; every act you do bears the stamp of some image or superscription, whose image and superscription is it? Unless it bears the image and superscription of the Christ, it is not the image and superscription which God has a right to expect.

I. Christianity and the Business.—Work is a law of life. When a man goes forth to work, if he undertakes an honest occupation and trade, it bears the impress of God, for it is God's work given to men. But there always comes in the higher law of the moral and spiritual life. The Master asks us—and it is a practical question—in the pursuit of your profession, in the pursuit of your trade, in the pursuit of your business, what is the moral and spiritual influence which is at work? What is influencing you? Whose image and superscription does that calling bear?

II. Christianity and Home Life.—Or look at the home life, which is the source and the very centre of the national existence. Does the father or the mother say, this is my prayer, this is my desire, this is my passion and longing for my child, that he should be great in the eyes of the Lord? Whose image and superscription, says the Master, is being written upon the home life?

III. The Right Use of Money.—When the Master spoke these words and asked this question, He held a Roman coin in His hand. Every coin bears some image or some superscription. The value in the markets of the world comes from the image and superscription. But there is another mint in the world besides the mint which coins gold and silver. There is the mint in the man himself—the purposes and the uses to which he puts that money. As he pays his money out he impresses a new image upon it; and the Master says to each one of us as we spend our coin, Whose image and superscription does it bear?

IV. Life In Relationship.—We do not live for ourselves. We live in relationship. The paradox of life is, He that loses himself shall save himself. You never know the greatness of your own soul, nor the greatness of your fellow-men, nor the magnificence of life till you lift your eyes above and beyond the little hedge which surrounds your own body. Nay, no man lives to himself, nor dies to himself; and unless we catch the spirit of Christ, which is the spirit of sacrifice and unselfishness, we have not yet got His image and superscription stamped upon us.—A. B. BOYD CARPENTER, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII. 1907, p. 84.

REFERENCES.—XXII. 20.—G. H. C. MacGregor, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 134. XXII. 20, 21.—J. Stalker, ibid. vol. lvii. 1900, p. 372.—XXII. 21.—B. Wilberforce, Feeling After Him, p. 223. R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 241. R. Flint, Sermons and Addresses, p. 254. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 192. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. ii. p. 194. J. Baldwin Brown, Miscellaneous Passages of Scripture, p. 14. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 147. J. Parker, Studies in Texts, vol. i. p. 152. H. Wace, Religion in Common Life, p. 90. H. Scott Holland, Church Times, vol. xlv. 1901, p. 340; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lx. 1901, p. 193.

CHRIST AND THE HERODIANS

'When they had heard these words, they marvelled, and left Him, and went their way.'—MATTHEW XXII. 22.

THIS passage invites us to 'consider Him who endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself'. There are three kinds of people the Christian finds constantly opposed to him in the world—the self-righteous man, the unbelieving man, and the worldly man. Here we see our blessed Lord dealing with each. The Pharisees (vv. 34, 35); the Sadducees (v. 23); and the Herodians (v. 16). It is with the last of these that we are specially employed to-day, and we shall dwell upon the two leading points of the narrative:—

I. The Question put by the Herodians.—You know that they were a political party amongst the Jews who favoured the rule of the Herod family. There were no religious pretensions about them; they were essentially worldly. They ask, 'Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, or not?' Mark, if He said 'Yes,' there was the anger of the people to be apprehended; if He said 'No,' there was the appearance of revolution. So their object was to entangle Him (v. 15), and thus worldly people are constantly asking, 'Do you think it right to do this or that?' not because they wish to know, but because they desire to make you trip. Let this remind us of the character of such. They plot against God's people (Ps. xxxviii. 12; cf. Neh. iv. 8), they are always enticing to evil (Prov. i. 10-14; 2 Tim. iii. 6), they delight in the iniquity of others (Prov. ii. 4; Rom. i. 32). Such are worldly people.

II. The Answer given by Our Lord.—He calls for a penny, and making them acknowledge that it belonged to Cæsar, He says, 'Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's' (vv. 19-21). It is only by following this example that the child of God can meet the world. Realize the difference between those who rule in the world. There are two kingdoms (Col. i.

13), two rulers (Eph. ii. 2; Acts iii. 15), two laws (Rom. vii. 22, 23; vi. 16). There are but the two, and the mistake is attempting a neutral position (Matt. vi. 24; Luke xi. 23). If we are children of God we are stamped with the image of the King (Rom. viii. 29), we know what our duty is (1 Cor. vi. 19, 20).

REFERENCES.—XXII. 22.—E. Fowle, Plain Preaching to Poor People (2nd Series), p. 117. E. C. Wickham, The Glory of Service, Sermons, 1895-99. XXII. 29.—T. L. Lynch, Three Months' Ministry, p. 193. J. Bell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 186.

'In the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven.'—MATTHEW XXII. 30.

'ALL I can say about the text is that it has nought to do with me and my wife,' Charles Kingsley wrote once to a friend. 'I know that, if immortality is to include in my case identity of person, I shall feel to her for ever what I feel now. That feeling may be developed in ways which I do not expect; it may have provided for it forms of expression very different from any which are among the holiest sacraments of life: of that I take no care. The union I believe to be as eternal as my own soul. I have no rule to say in what other pair of lovers it may or may not be eternal. I leave all in the hands of a good God.' Elsewhere, in his correspondence, Kingsley returns to this subject, avowing that this text 'has been to me always a comfort. I am so well and really married on earth, that I should be exceeding sorry to be married again in heaven. All I can say is, if I do not love my wife, body and soul, as well there as I do here, then there is neither resurrection of my body nor of my soul, but of some other, and I shall not be I.'

REFERENCES.—XXII. 30.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 842. Henry Ward Beecher, Sermons (4th Series), p. 551. XXII. 31, 32.—H. L. Mansel, Oxford Street Sermons, 1868, p. 29.

THE HOPE OF IMMORTALITY

'God is not the God of the dead, but of the living.'—MATTHEW XXII. 32.

I. THE Hebrews never believed that death means absolute extinction. The common belief was that at death a man descends into Sheol, 'the land of darkness and the shadow of death,' a place of silence and forgetfulness. Enoch and Elijah were supposed to have escaped this dreary fate, but only by not dying.

I. Had the Israelites, then, no hopes that were not bounded by the grave? Yes, they had. But it was the glorious future of their nation, to which they looked forward, and on this earth. The feeling of solidarity was much stronger with them than it is with us, and especially, like all Orientals, they hoped to live again in their children and grandchildren, so that childlessness was to them a greater calamity than death itself.

Such was the common Jewish faith. The Jew loved life and feared death, but he was almost content with the thought that his descendants would inhabit a more glorious Jerusalem, while he was lying in Sheol, an unsubstantial ghost.

II. It is the prophets who first preach individual retribution. Jeremiah and Ezekiel both protest against the 'sour grapes' proverb, and say that 'Every one shall die for his own iniquity'. This necessarily leads to belief in a personal future life.

In the interval between the latest books of the Old Testament and the Gospels, the belief in the resurrection of individuals grew steadily, till in our Lord's time it was only rejected by the Sadducees.

III. Our Lord Himself gives us very little definite teaching about the next world. He was understood by His disciples to have promised an early return in glory to inaugurate a kingdom at Jerusalem; and it was believed that the dead Christians would be resuscitated to share in it. In this they were mistaken; but it is plain that our Lord spoke of the resurrection mainly in connexion with His kingdom, and that the penalty of His enemies would be exclusion from the kingdom, and banishment into outer darkness. All through the Bible, in the New Testament as well as in the Old, where immortality is referred to, it is corporate immortality which is mainly thought of. By corporate immortality I do not mean a sham immortality—a life in the memory of others. In its purer form, the desire for corporate immortality almost forgets the individual, as we have seen was the case with the Jews and early Christians. The triumph of the nation, of the Church, of the principles of righteousness, seems a much greater thing than our private survival, and it is easier to feel a strong faith in the eternal victory of a great cause than of a small individual, because the great cause enlists the highest capabilities, the most devoted efforts and sacrifices of one generation after another.

These considerations do not in any way affect the belief in personal immortality. That remains where it was. But I suggest that one chief reason why our faith in immortality is often so dim is that we are too self-centred in our thoughts about it. We think of our own resurrection, and that of our friends; but we do not, like the Biblical writers, think of the future and more glorious life of our nation, and of our Church, as part of our religious hope.—W. R. INGE, All Saints' Sermons, 1905-1907, p. 103.

REFERENCES.—XXII. 32.—R. J. Campbell, A Faith for To-day, p. 331; see also, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 68. XXII. 32, 33.—F. E. Clark, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 111. XXII. 34-40 (R.V.).—R. E. Bartlett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1894, p. 340. XXII. 34-46.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 135. XXII. 35-40.—H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 276. S. Cox, Expositions, p. 88. XXII. 36-38.—W. Boyd Carpenter, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 111. XXII. 36-40.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (4th Series), p. 205.

RELIGION FOR THE ENTIRE MAN

'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.'—MATTHEW XXII. 37.

The religion of Christ is a religion for all men. It is universal in its adaptation to the needs of humanity.

But it is more than this. It is a religion for the whole of man. There is not a power, or faculty, or energy given to us which lies outside its influence. It claims as its own all our being. This surely is the meaning of the never-to-be-forgotten definition in which our Lord sums up man's duty to God.

Now, as we look into this definition, full as it is of valuable teaching, there are two truths which stand out very distinctly and prominently.

I. The Revelation of God as a God to be Loved.

—The first truth is one of special importance to the Jewish disciples. What is it? It is the grand revelation of God as a God to be loved. Till now they had not realized this. God a God to be revered, held in awe, served, feared—this they knew; only now and then faint glimpses of something better seem to have been given to them, and so He Who came to fulfil all things teaches them that love is to religion what atmosphere is to a landscape, what tone is to a picture, what life is to a body. 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God.'

II. Religion is worthy of Man's Highest Powers.

—But side by side with this there stands out another truth of a very special importance to us Christians to-day. It is this. Religion, the religion of Christ, is worthy of a man's highest intellectual powers. How much this is overlooked in our day! 'With all thy heart'—that is, with all the emotional powers of a man; 'with all thy soul'—that is, with all the spiritual instincts of a man. Yes, this may be true of religion; but, 'with all thy mind,' with all the intellectual faculties of the man—nay, is not this going too far? Religion, a sentiment, a thing of the emotions, of the feelings, yes; but religion a science, a thing to be known as well as felt, to be studied as well as believed in; this, in these days of intellectual pride, is forgotten, if not openly denied.

III. The Intellect in Religion.—What could better employ the powers of man's intellect than this? We consider a man's life well lived who has studied the heavens, and has tracked the worlds along their shining orbits, even though he discovers no new world; or who has tried to unravel the tangled threads of history, and has gathered up a single thread of the birth, or rise, or decline, or death of only one nation; or who has for a few short years held the helm of the State, and steered the vessel safely through the shoals and quicksands of diplomacy. Shall we then regard his time wasted, his talents thrown away, who has sought to know the God Who made each shining world, Who holds in His hand the fate of dynasties, Who is the King of kings reigning over all the kingdoms of the world? Nay, if this be Religion, Religion is not only a science, but it is the queen of sciences.

IV. The Union of Knowledge and Love.—But we must not stop there. Religion is a science, but it is more than a science. What is lacking? Jesus tells us. Mark, He links together knowledge and love. He tells us that this knowledge of God will not be held within the limits of the intellect, but must overflow into the heart. He teaches us that he who knows God will love God; aye, that the more a man knows God the more he must love Him. Knowledge and love, what a close connexion there is between them! The love of husband and wife deepens as years pass on. Or think again: we know something of the meaning of a mother's love. There is no love like a mother's; life, with its sorrows, and trials, and disappointments, only helps to make us know it better, and greater knowledge brings greater love. Shall not the earthly faintly outline for us the heavenly? The knowledge of God, what is it to the Christian? To know God is to know His love; and to know His love is to love Him in return. If our religion is unsatisfying, it is because we know God so little; and for this lack of knowledge we have only ourselves to blame.

CHRISTIAN FAITH AND MODERN THOUGHT

'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy mind.'—
MATTHEW XXII. 37.

I. THE members of the Church must become thinkers. By thinkers we do not mean men gifted with special learning, or intellectual power. Christian thinkers are men and women who really try to put their intelligence into the service of their religion; men and women who are anxious to learn about the Bible, the Creed, the Sacraments, the Church out of the best books that they can get; who try to think out quietly just where and why the great Christian Faith has found their own life and experience, and then seek to express the reason for the faith that is in them in words which are real to themselves, and which their own neighbours and friends can understand. Every Christian man who thus uses his mind in religion is a link between Christ and his own day and generation. And, remember, that the strength of the chain is the strength of the individual links that compose it.

II. Want of thinking gives advantage to doubt. In most cases it is through defect rather than excess of thinking that doubt comes in to disturb. The air we breathe is full of the germs of doubt. None of us can be protected from it. Now and then a germ may reach you, and if it find your mind swept and garnished, or furnished only with your old child-like notions of religious things, it will enter and do its work. There are many people who surrender the truths of Christianity before they have taken the trouble to understand them. The man who uses the best mind that God has given him, the best books he can reach and the best teachers he can find, to know really what his faith means, and to be able to express it intelligently to himself and his friends—that man is fortified against doubt.

III. Want of thought creates division. The party spirit, alas! we know is the greatest hindrance to the spirit of truth. We have a pleasant word in which we describe our divisions; we call them 'Schools of thought'. There is an unconscious irony in the phrase, for it is want of thought that is mainly responsible for the cleavage between these schools. Men become victims of catchwords—catchwords which are substitutes for thought, or else the victims of a shallow logic which moves with deceptive simplicity along a narrow groove. But the more we read and think, the more we see that the truth cannot be contained in these phrases, or tied in this narrow logic. Real thought always makes for synthesis; that is to say, for some point of view in which differences are not ignored or even lost, but merged in a deeper unity. And if only our ordinary Christians in England would begin to read and think a little more there would be more prospects of the spirit of Christian brotherhood.

IV. Let us put this plea for using our minds in religion on its truest and highest ground. It is a form of service. It is that love of God with all the mind which our Lord lays down as part of the first and the greatest duty of man. To give God the thoughts of our mind is part of our fundamental religious duty. We owe it to Him. He has given us these minds that they may be enriched and find their highest exercise in the study of His truth.—ARCHBISHOP LANG, Church Times, 23 Oct., 1908, p. 539.

LOVE TO GOD—SERVICE TO MAN

'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.'—MATTHEW XXII. 37.

THERE is discoverable in this text ^{text} ^{has} a command, consolation, a prophecy.

I. A command; a parental order that no loyal son may disobey. You say love is the one emotion that will not come at command. True, but it is possible for a man willingly to place his whole being in such an attitude towards the Eternal Father, that love shall be unfolded from the heart as flower and fruit from a plant in its right attitude to the sun; for this command is a claim upon the WHOLE of MAN for God; heart, soul, and mind; emotions, will, and intellect. As the whole of each tree by the seaside is bent in the direction of the prevailing wind, so the whole of each life must be bent by the prevailing influence of God. In the feeblest love of what is true God is loved by the mind. In the simplest longing after what is good, by the heart. And in every honest effort, mental and physical, after the attainment of our ideal, He is loved by the soul and the strength.

II. But there is also consolation as well as command, and it is here; it is the death-blow of pessimism; an overwhelming proof of the all-embracing love of God for man. God says, 'He that planted the ear, shall He not hear?' And any child of God to-day may say, 'He that commanded me to love HIM with all my heart and mind and soul, shall He not love ME with all His heart, and mind, and soul? And that He may remove any doubts as to whether His ideal of whole-hearted love is different from ours, He has brought into action His moral attributes in the Incarnation.

And Fatherhood says, 'What think ye of the Christ?' Does that character satisfy you? Here is one loving you unto the death, with all His sacred heart, and mind, and soul, and He, with all the authority of the incomprehensible God, declares, 'He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father'.

III. The consolation leads us to the prophecy. Thou shalt love, in the perfected future, not now; the capacity is wanting in the natural state. God says shall; all God's shalls are ultimately irresistible. Every shall in the Bible is a promise as well as a command.

Every soul here is enfolded in the shall of God; God-begotten, God-enclosed; God-loved, is every man. To know it is salvation, for the redeemed are all men, the saved those that know it.—ARCHDEACON WILBERFORCE, Feeling After Him, p. 121.

Illustration.—Faraday learnt this Divine lesson in boyhood by a childish experience. As a little lad, humbly earning his bread by selling newspapers in the street, he was waiting outside the office of the Edinburgh Courant for the morning issue of the paper, and thrust his head and arms through the railings of the iron gate. He was a born metaphysician, and began to speculate on which side of the railings he was. 'My head and hands are on one side,' he said to himself, 'and my heart and body are on the other.' The gate was opened hastily before he could disengage himself, and the wrench he received taught him, as he said in after life, that all true work required head and heart and hands to be on the same side.—BASIL WILBERFORCE, Feeling After Him, p. 127.

REFERENCES.—XXII. 37.—W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 257. S. A. Barnett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 358. XXII. 37, 38.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 161. XXII. 37-39.—R. T. Davidson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 257. XXII. 37-40.—(R.V.) R. A. Armstrong, ibid., vol. xli. 1892, p. 298.

SELF-LOVE—NEW VERSION

'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.'—MATTHEW XXII. 39.

PERHAPS this is the most familiar text or verse in the Bible. Shall I startle you if I say that the words imply, or even enjoin, love for self? Yet surely they do. For if we are to try to love other people greatly and also to love them as ourselves, clearly, there must be self-love of some sort implied or enjoined. But all depends on what you mean by self-love. If we mean self-indulgence, self-gratification, self-spoiling, so to speak, if we are thinking of the commonplace, vulgar, stupid aim of doing simply what we like best, what is easiest, what is most comfortable, then certainly it is a degrading, a humiliating, a pitiful thing to have that sort of self-love. But why explain it thus? Is that what love means? Can you think of it thus as applied to wife, or child, or friend? Surely not. We think then of something quite different.

I. There is a form of Self-Love, or, as we like better to call it, Self-respect, which is strengthening, ennobling, stimulating and uplifting, which is approved of God, which is useful to man. Each of us in the common experience of life finds out that he has two different levels, or two different compartments, as it would sometimes seem, to his own life. There is in us a better self and a worse self. When the Prodigal had gone to the lowest degradations he could find, better thoughts came. He 'came to himself,' and began to find out that he was worth something better.

II. Now what we have got to do is to Encourage that Higher Self and make it assert itself oftener than it does. For ourselves separately, each one ought to try sometimes to think, 'What do I suppose was God's purpose for me?' If we are each one to be helpful to others, keeping straight and pure and strong and high-minded, we must see to it first that, so far as God enables us, we are fit men ourselves.

III. How are we to set about it?

(a) By going back to the very fountain of our faith, that which lies at the centre and the root, the Lord Jesus Christ.

(b) The inspiration is not by example only. You might find it impossible to follow that, but for the knowledge on His part and on ours that He is with you and me to-day. He Who set that example, Who gave us that pattern, will hear, day by day, from you and me, in the dusty, busy, working, interrupted harassed life, the prayer that we uplift from the heart, 'Keep me pure, keep me brave. Take my life and let it be Consecrated, Lord, to Thee.'

'The second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.'—MATTHEW XXII. 39.

WHOEVER walks a furlong without sympathy walks to his own funeral drest in his shroud.—WALT WHITMAN.

THE greatest of all arts is the art of life, and the best of all music the harmony of spirits. There are many little rules to be learnt for giving harmony and melody to our life, but the thorough bass must be—love.—MAX-MÜLLER.

'As thyself.'—MATTHEW XXII. 39.

HE who carries self-regard far enough to keep himself in good health and high spirits, in the first place thereby becomes an immediate source of happiness to those around, and in the second place maintains the ability to increase their happiness by altruistic actions. But one whose bodily vigour and mental health are undermined by self-sacrifice carried too far, in the first place becomes to those around a cause of depression, and in the second place renders himself incapable, or less capable, of actively furthering their welfare.—HERBERT SPENCER.

REFERENCES.—XXII. 39.—J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 149. H. Hensley Henson, Christ and the Nation, p. 162. G. Macdonald, Unspoken Sermons, p. 189. XXII. 39, 40.—J. H. Jellott, The Elder Son, p. 214. XXII. 40.—D. M. Ross, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 404. A. Boyd Carpenter, ibid. vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 71. S. D. McConnel, A Year's Sermons, p. 261.

'On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets.'—MATTHEW XXII. 40.

WHEN a man is told that the whole of religion and morality is summed up in the two commandments, to love God and to love our neighbour, he is ready to cry, like Charoba in Gebir, at the first sight of the sea, Is this the mighty ocean? is this all? Yes, all: but how small a part of it do your eyes survey! only trust yourself to it; launch out upon it; sail abroad over it: you will find it has no end: it will carry you around the world.—JULIUS HARE.

REFERENCES.—XXII. 41, 42.—J. Marshall Lang, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 168. H. H. Snell, ibid. vol. xlii. 1893, p. 24. J. G. Greenhough, ibid. vol. lxi. 1902, p. 161. XXII. 41-46.—J. Morgan Gibbon, ibid. vol. lxii. 1902, p. 38.

WHAT THINK YE OF CHRIST?

'What think ye of Christ? whose son is he? They say unto him, The Son of David.'—MATTHEW XXII. 42.

I. You cannot make it a matter of indifference whether you think rightly of Christ or not; the question is very short, very simple, but the answer to it involves life or death.

1. Let us then inquire what it is to think rightly of Christ. First with respect to His Person, we must think that He is perfect God, equal with the Father, and together with Him and the Holy Ghost, making up the ever-blessed Trinity.

2. We must think of Him as perfect man, of like nature with ourselves in everything, sin only excepted.

3. We must think of Him as the great Redeemer and Saviour, who by the voluntary sacrifice and death of Himself made atonement for the sins of the whole world, provided a means of reconciliation between His Father and mankind, and brought in an everlasting righteousness which is unto all and upon all them that believe.

4. We must think of Him as a King: He is the great head of a spiritual dominion over the heart of all whom He chooses and calls out of the world.

5. We must think of Him as the great High Priest, who, like the Jewish high priest of old, has gone alone before us into the Holy of Holies, that is Heaven, to make satisfaction for the sin of His people with blood, even the blood of Himself, Who ever stands at the right hand of God to make intercession for them; and can always feel for and pity them, because as man He was tempted like as they are.

6. We must think of Him as the Prophet that should come, foretold by Moses shortly before his death, who has shown to mankind the way of salvation, who has clearly explained how God's mercy and God's justice can be reconciled when sinners are accounted righteous, who has taught us how God would have men to live, and has placed duties and morality upon their right foundation, and these are the inward motives and the heart.

7. We must think of Him as the great Example, who has left men a pattern that they should walk in His steps, who has given them, in His own person and behaviour, a model of conduct in nearly every department of life which they cannot strive too much to imitate.

II. But this is not all. There are two ways of thinking about Christ; both indeed are necessary to salvation, but one is very often found to exist without the other. It is one thing to think of Him with the head, and another to think of Him with the heart; it is one to think about His offices as a matter of opinion, it is another to rejoice in them as infinitely important to your own soul; it is one to know these things correctly, it is another to live as if you felt them; it is one to acknowledge that Christ is a mighty gift to ruined man, it is quite another to apply this healing medicine to your own case.—J. C. RYLE, The Christian Race, p. 168.

REFERENCES.—XXII. 42.—R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 172. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 184. B. Wilberforce, Following on to Know the Lord, p. 3. J. S. Swan, Short Sermons, p. 136. C. S. Robinson, Sermons on Neglected Texts, p. 206. G. A. Chadwick, Christ Bearing Witness to Himself, p. 159. B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 178. W. Alexander, The Great Question, p. 3. Bishop Simpson, Sermons, p. 295. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 113. Marcus Dods, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 281; see also vol. lxii. 1902, p. 116; vol. lxix. 1906, p. 149. Henry Varley, ibid. vol. xli. 1892, p. 228. R. A. Armstrong, ibid. vol. xli. 1892, p. 298. T. T. Munger, ibid. vol. xliii. 1893, p. 406. A Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, ibid. vol. lxi. 1902, p. 101. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1093. P. McAdam Muir, Modern Substitutes for Christianity, p. 173.

'GREAT DAVID'S GREATER SON'

'What think ye of Christ? Whose son is He? They say unto Him, the Son of David. He saith unto them, How then doth David in spirit call Him Lord, saying, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on My right hand, till I make Thine enemies Thy footstool? If David then call Him Lord, how is He his son?'—MATTHEW XXII. 42-45.

THAT Christ was lineally descended from David, and that as such, he had the body and the mind and the heart of a man, is an historical fact. In the same body and the same manhood, altered, but accurately the same, He walked this earth for forty days after His Resurrection. Before it was a natural body; after He rose, it was a spiritual body. Nevertheless all the while He was and He is God. The mystery of the union is utterly unfathomable; far above the reach of all knowledge and all conception. But it was prophesied of Him before He came. He asserted it of Himself; His Apostles bore witness to it even to the death, and He allowed Himself—mark this—He allowed Himself to be killed for it. For the high priest sentenced Him to die for blasphemy, and this was the blasphemy—that He said He was God. And any honest man who was not God would have said, 'You misunderstand. I do not mean that I am God.' He would not have allowed Himself to be put to death on the wrong misunderstanding of His own words. But Christ offered no qualifying word. He was crucified on that charge, and the alternative is inevitable—either Christ was a dishonest man or He was God.

Such, then, is Christ at this very moment in Heaven—God and Man. Both perfectly equal, perfect God and perfect Man. So He is now at God's right hand, set before us in the Revelation; so He will return to this earth. For a little while He was pleased for our sake to divest Himself of His glory, and to come amongst us 'in the form of a man,' but the attributes and the prerogatives of the Godhead were still perfect in Him. He still assumed them. And now he is at once the Man, the wounded, crucified Man, a Man that has been slain, and yet as fully and as truly He is 'King of kings and Lord of lords,' with 'a Name which is above every name'; the object and adoration of saints and angels; the Judge of all men; the Creator of the universe—God, God!

I. Christ in Heaven.—'The Son of David'—a Man!—what is the result of that?

(a) Whatever He came to this earth to do, whatever it was, is finished and accepted, else He would not be resting there. Accepted of God, exalted to the highest.

(b) His presence there in manhood shows what manhood is capable of, what human nature may become. You look on a man as you see him here, as you see yourself, or any fellow-creature. You look on that very Man in Heaven and you see the capabilities of a man; read his destiny. Behold yourself in your Saviour.

(c) There—in that Man Christ, David's son—there we have a brother. His human form shows Him a brother. It shows His sympathy.

(d) That Son of David, that Man at God's right hand, He is a representative Man. He was a substitute on the Cross, not a representative. Now He is not a substitute but a representative Man.

(e) And that Son of David, that Man in Heaven, is pledged as the forerunner of us all, 'the firstborn among many brethren,' the gathered sheaf which ensures all the harvest, the seed of the warrant of our eternal happiness.

II. David's Son and David's Lord.—So on earth and in Heaven He is David's Son and David's Lord. If Christ be a Man in Heaven, no less He is God. The thought of this union of God and manhood is utterly unfathomable. But the truth is clear and the comfort exceeding great. 'My Saviour is my God.' And all that this Man died to purchase—that same He now lives as God to give. He carries out in omnipotence what he wrought in the infinity of the love of His manhood. This Man who is my Brother, rules the world.

HOW TO READ THE BIBLE

'How then doth David in spirit?'—MATTHEW XXII. 43.

MANY of the prophets spake in the spirit, and in the spirit they must be interpreted. It is not for any one man to say where the whole meaning runs itself out, it is for us to wait until we can say, 'This is the man.'

and many a time we have said this o'er the cradle of the child; we have said, 'This is He of whom Moses and the prophets did write'. There has been a wonderful unrest in our soul because we knew that the prophecy had not yet been quite fulfilled, but when Jesus came he said, 'This is the light; they that sat in darkness have seen a great light'. Jesus Christ takes up all that the prophets did say, and shows what the prophets themselves did mean, though they, the prophets, did not know their meaning at the time of their ecstasy and their madness.

I. How beautifully is the whole thing shown to us in that walk to Emmaus! 'And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself.' I think we should not be ashamed of finding Jesus where Jesus found Himself; we should study Jesus Christ's way of reading the Old Testament, and He always found Himself on every page: there a flower, and He said 'I am the Rose of Sharon'; there a trickle of blood—oh, so red, so hot—and He said, 'I redeem with a great price'. He heard Himself in many an echoed song, and He said, 'This is the singing of the ages, and the music is fulfilled in Me'. Jesus Christ must set the example of how to read the Bible. He began at Moses—He could not begin earlier—and the Psalms, and the prophets, and, lest that should not be enough or be misunderstood, it is said, 'in all the Scriptures': they are full of Him, they burn with Him as the bush burned with God. The Lord hath yet more light and truth to break forth from His holy Word. We have not yet begun to understand either the miracles or the parables. We have approached them from our own point of view, and have found fault with them, we have made them a field of criticism. We should approach them from Christ's point of view, and find them to be music that can give rest to the soul, light that can satisfy the vision, and ministry that can appease the hunger of the heart.

II. Christ is the contemporary of all ages. He lives to-day; He is the dying Christ, the living Christ, the constant and never-departing Christ. If He has gone out of sight, it is only that from a higher level He may move the progress of the universe.

Every century has its own revelation. Why was not the whole thing revealed at once? It would be impossible, and it would be absurd. There can be no 'at once' in the movement of eternity. But could not the men of the first century have understood what the men of the twentieth century understand? No, they could not. The men of the twentieth century have a new responsibility, they have their own vision of God, and they are responsible to God for the use they make of it.

III. It has not been given to any man to see all things, and we are not to be harsh with those who do not see what we see. The Lord's school hath many scholars. If that is the truth—some remote and shiny point—then every man with his face towards it is orthodox, though he come from east west, north, south, climbing the mountain that he may grasp the stars. That is orthodoxy, not your little notion and mine, but the great love-truth and the great truth-loving. He is orthodox who wants to know what is true.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. vi. p. 183.

REFERENCES.—XXII. 46.—A. N. Obbard, Plain Sermons, p. 172. XXIII. 1-10.—T. A. Gurney, The Living Lord and the Opened Grave, p. 198. XXIII. 3.—Hugh Black, University Sermons, p. 246.

'They make broad their phylacteries, and enlarge the borders of their garments.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 5.

OLD Samuel Johnson, the greatest soul in England in his day, was not ambitious. 'Corsica Boswell' flaunted at public shows with printed ribbons round his hat: but the great old Samuel stayed at home. The world-wide soul wrapt up in its thoughts, in its sorrows—what could parading, and ribbons in the hat, do for it?—CARLYLE.

REFERENCE.—XXIII. 5.—C. Jordan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 291.

'One is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 8.

THE passage before us presents us with the true foundation on which all Christian teaching in God's Church rests, and with the consequent guard against the most dangerous of the perversions to which it may be exposed.

I. Christ the Sole Teacher in His Church.—They shall all be taught of God, was the Old Testament promise which described in the highest way the glory of the New Testament times. The universal prerogative of all Christian men is the possession of direct teaching from Christ Himself.

Then we have to consider the characteristics of this teaching of Christ's, and we shall best do so by keeping in view the tacit contrast between the limitations of ours, and the perfections of His.

II. Christ's Teaching is Inward.—We can only appeal to men by words which may move their hearts or clear their understandings. We can only present motives which may have power or not. Conviction by the force of truth, persuasion by the weight of motives—that is all we can do at the best for one another. We stand outside. But Christ can put His Hand into the secrets of the heart and touch the will. He uses His instruments, He blesses the word, He uses the discipline of life; but over and above all these, there is a teaching deeper than them all, when the soul in direct communication with Christ learns of Him.

III. Christ's Teaching is Original.—It is the impartation of Himself, and He is the Truth.—A. MACLAREN.

REFERENCES.—XXIII. 8.—D. M. Ross, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 364. A. H. Bradford, ibid. vol. xlv. 1893, p. 193. Lyman Abbott, ibid. vol. xlix. 1896, p. 264. H. Hensley Henson, ibid. vol. lxi. 1904, p. 68. G. Philip, Home in the World Beyond, p. 114. J. J. Taylor, Christian Aspects of Faith and Duty, p. 150.

CHRIST OUR MASTER

'But be not ye called Rabbi: for one is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren. And call no man your father upon the earth: for one is your Father, which is in heaven. Neither be ye called masters: for one is your Master even Christ.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 8-10.

I. CHRIST claims to be the supreme, and ultimately the sole, Teacher and Master of all Christian men. His first work was teaching: His followers were His disciples or scholars.

This is an aspect of Christ's work which is apt to be obscured. We think of Christ more in relation to faith than in relation to conduct; as the Redeemer of men rather than as their Teacher. And even when we do think of Him in relation to conduct, it is perhaps His example rather than His words that we think of. But Christ claims to be a teacher, with a definite body of teaching as to what we should believe and what we should do.

II. Christ claims to be our only Master and Teacher. What are the forces that prompt and guide and limit our activity? In many cases we shall confess the influence of maxims gathered from our own experience, or learned from the masters of worldly policy. How much, when we look into it, comes from other sources than Christ?

III. Let us begin to seek out and to apply His precepts to our whole life; to test by them all influences that govern us.

1. We shall find much that conforms to Christ's law, in so far as our civilization is Christian. Let us verify all this as from Christ, and follow it now as part of our obedience to Him.

2. We shall find precepts in Christ's teaching which, in what at least seems to be their plain meaning, we have not acted on. Such cases, where we seem to disregard, or diverge from, the precepts of the Master, call for careful examination. No doubt wisdom is needed for their interpretation.

3. We shall find in our application of Christ's precepts that there are still with us actions and feelings at variance with our Master's teaching.

4. We may find that our whole scale of moral values differs from Christ's: the scale of honour in which we range the virtues, the order of detestation in which we place the vices.

IV. Let it be said, too, that the disciple must carry his Master's teaching into all spheres, not only into his private life, but also into his business and his politics. It is in our own lives that we have the nearest and freest field for acting as disciples of Christ. Those only rightly obey Christ who believe on Him, who acknowledge Him as Master because they trust Him as Saviour.—P. J. MACLAGAN, The Gospel View of Things, p. 40.

'Be not ye called Rabbi . . . for one is your Master, even Christ.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 8-10.

To be throned apart, like a Divine being surrounded by the bought homage of one's fellows, and possessed of more power than a man can decently use, was a condition which excited in Delafield the same kind of contemptuous revolt that it would have excited in St. Francis. 'Be ye not called master ;'—a Christian even of his transcendental and heterodox sort, if he were a Christian, must surely hold these words in awe—at least so far as concerned any mastery of the external or secular kind. To masteries of another order, the saint has never been disinclined.—MRS. HUMPHRY WARD in Lady Rose's Daughter chap. XXIII.

REFERENCE.—XXIII. 8-10.—T. G. Selby, The Strenuous Gospel, p. 314. J. Clifford, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 280 ; see also vol. xli. 1894, p. 216. G. Campbell Morgan, ibid. vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 99. XXIII. 13-15.—T. G. Selby, The Lesson of a Dilemma, p. 319. XXIII. 15.—H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lx. 1901, p. 337.

'Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 15.

THE proselytizing agency of the Roman Church in this country I take to be one of the worst of the religious influences of the age. I do not mean as to its motives, for these I do not presume to touch, nor feel in any way called upon to question. But I speak of its effects, and they are most deplorable. . . . With this pernicious agency I for my own part wish to have nothing whatever to do ; although I am one who thinks lightly, in comparison with most men, of the absolute differences in our belief from the formal documents of Rome.—GLADSTONE in 1863.

MORE than thirty years later, in the Nineteenth Century, Mr. Gladstone remarked that he 'would define the spirit of proselytism as a morbid appetite for effecting conversions, founded too often upon an overweening self-confidence and self-love'.

THE VISIBLE TEMPLE

'Whether is greater, the gold, or the temple that sanctifieth the gold?'—MATTHEW XXIII. 17.

A TEMPLE there has been upon earth, a spiritual Temple, made up of living stones, a Temple, as I may say, composed of souls ; a Temple with God for its Light, and Christ for the High Priest, with wings of angels for its arches, with saints and teachers for its pillars, and with worshippers for its pavement ; such a Temple has been on earth ever since the Gospel was first preached. This unseen, secret, mysterious, spiritual Temple exists everywhere, throughout the kingdom of Christ, in all places, as perfect in one place as if it were not in another. Wherever there is faith and love, this Temple is ; faith and love, with the name of Christ, are as heavenly charms and spells, to make present to us this Divine Temple, in every part of Christ's kingdom. This Temple is invisible, but it is perfect and real because it is invisible, and gains nothing in perfection by possessing visible tokens. There needs no outward building to meet the eye in order to make it more of a Temple than it already is in itself. God, and Christ, and angels, and souls, are not these a heavenly court, all perfect, to which this world can add nothing? Though faithful Christians worship without splendour, without show, in a homely and rude way, still their worship is as acceptable to God, as excellent, as holy, as though they worshipped in the public view of men, and with all the glory and riches of the world. . . .

King's palaces are poor, whether in architecture or in decoration, compared with the shrines which have been reared to Him. The invisible Temple has become visible. As on a misty day the gloom gradually melts, and the sun brightens, so have the glories of the spiritual world lit up this world below. The dull and cold earth is penetrated by the rays. All around we see glimpses or reflections of those heavenly things which the elect of God shall one day see face to face. The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ ; 'the Temple has sanctified the gold,' and the prophecies made to the Church have been fulfilled to the letter.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCE.—XXIII. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 831.

THE DETAILS OF LIFE

'These ye ought to have done, and not to have left the other undone.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 23 (R.V.).

I. THE efficiency of some great men has been seriously impaired by their neglect of the uninteresting parts of life and duty. Disraeli confessed of himself, 'I want energy in those little affairs of which life greatly consists'. This hatred of the trivial, even in cases where detail was of the essence of statesmanship, was acknowledged by his friends to be a cause of his weakness as a minister. On the other side, the greatest men who brought their work to splendid perfection, and whose lives were veritable triumphs, considered no detail of their task too trivial, no uninteresting portions of it too insipid, the truth being, the modest and monotonous details were so scrupulously wrought out that glorious success seemed to flower magically.

II. Life cannot be all interesting ; much that it involves is necessarily stale and flat. In this contempt of triviality we suffer loss. We miss the essential discipline of the trivial, and missing that are not prepared for the greater situations and seasons ; ignoring the grandeur of the minute, we defraud ourselves of one of the chief delights of existence ; and having neglected insignificant particulars, we have certainly more or less marred the whole result in character and destiny, which is made up of insignificant particulars.

III. Detail is of the essence of life, and he is great and shall be great who knows it. There is teaching, discipline, and blessing of the highest order in faithfulness in monotonous days and things. 'And the hand of the Lord was there upon me ; and He said unto me, Arise, go forth into the plain, and I will there talk with thee. Then I arose, and went forth into the plain : and, behold, the glory of the Lord stood there' (Ezek. iii. 22, 23). On the flat, dull, monotonous stretches of life does God speak with men and show them His glory.—W. L. WATKINSON, Themes for Hours of Meditation, p. 185.

THE DOCTRINE OF PROPORTION

'The weightier matters.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 23.

THIS is the doctrine of proportion, perspective, relativity, in things spiritual, religious, pious, and practically good. One matter is of so much consequence, and the other matter is of so much less consequence; they are both important, but one is lighter than the other—and ye have omitted the weightier matters.

I. Here are men who are deeply concerned about a creed. Are they concerned about the right thing? Only a man of superficial mind would speak disrespectfully of forms of faith. They are useful, helpful, sometimes they approach the very point of essential necessity. What is greater than creed? Faith, faith is larger in all its inclusiveness and suggestiveness than any creed can ever be. Many men cannot put faith within the limits of credal form. Are we then to make infidels of them? Shall we not recognize that they are attending to the weightier matters of the law, and approach them, and recognize what measure of sincerity and earnestness may be obvious in all their spirit and action.

II. This line of reasoning might be fitly applied to the Bible itself. No man is going to be so fatuous and impious as to deny the great importance of many aspects of the controversy raging around the Bible; let us, however, be careful that we do not diminish the authority of the Bible by misunderstanding the purpose of the Bible itself. How did Jesus Christ Himself use the Bible? By the Bible, of course, I mean the Old Testament. His will be the right way. What did He go to the Old Testament for? For Himself, this is the whole necessity: to find the Son of God should be the object of every Biblical student and reader.

III. Apply the matter to the question of the Sabbath. Here are men who believe that the Sabbath begins at twilight of one day and goes on to evening twilight of another day. They keep Sabbath by the clock: up to five minutes within the time they can be buying and selling and getting gain, but now it is Sabbath Day, because a bell has been struck. Another man says, 'I go the length of admitting that one in seven should be a day of rest'. That is the weightier matter; he is a Sabbatarian, in the truest, widest, noblest sense of the term.

IV. Apply this also to service. Some men can render one kind of service and some another; let every man be distinctive in his mission, and be most himself because he attends to the weightier matters which he is peculiarly constituted to carry out to completeness of fruition.—JOSEPH PARKER, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 28.

Illustration.—I go to the Great Northern Railway to go to Scotland. The man who is in charge of the place insists on being fundamental; he is a man of culture. When I approach him, he says, 'Let us begin at the beginning,' my reply is, 'I want to go to Edinburgh'. 'By no means begin at that end of the business,' he will reply; 'let us be at once elementary, fundamental, and complete.' I look at the man with a feeling of vacuity, for either he is out of his head or I am. He says, 'This is the Great Northern Railway'. I reply, 'I never doubted that'. 'But do you understand it?' 'I think so.' 'Let me explain it to you,' he continues. 'Consider the importance of the word "the," a little word, an article, and a definite one; in all languages the article plays a most important part. "Great," a word you might apply to kings, to empires, to the heavens themselves. "Northern," not North-Eastern—mark that; and not North-Western, be on your guard; this is an age of sophistry; not the North-Western. Not the Southern, but the Northern. Stand in front of a map, where is the North? At the top—mark that.' I thank him for his lecture, and feel that it must have cost him a great many hours of anxiety to prepare it, and I say now to a porter, 'Where is the train to Edinburgh?' He says, 'It is gone, sir!' Gone! Will this man who has been lecturing to me on the Great Northern bring it back? Never; he has befooled me. So it will be with many at the last. Whilst you have been talking about matters of absolutely insignificant importance, or of merely relative importance, the train will have gone.—JOSEPH PARKER, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 41.

'These ye ought to have done, and not to have left the other undone.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 23.

WRITING in 1826 upon the prospects of reform within the Church of England, Dr. Arnold, of Rugby, observes: 'The difficulty will always be practically, who is to reform it? For the clergy have a horror of the House of Commons, and Parliament and the country will never trust the matter to the clergy. If we had our general assembly, there might be some chance; but, as it is, I know no more hopeless prospect, and every year I live, this is to me more painful. If half the energy and resources which have been turned to Bible societies and missions, had steadily been applied to the reform of our own institutions, and the enforcing the principles of the Gospel among ourselves, I cannot think but that we should have been fulfilling a higher duty, and with the blessing of God might have produced more satisfactory fruit. 'These things ye ought to have done, and not to have left the other undone.'

REFERENCES.—XXIII. 23.—W. J. Butler, What is Our Present Danger, Sermons, 1870-93. J. Parker, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 32. F. B. Cowl, Straight Tracks, p. 13. XXIII. 23, 24.—H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lx. 1901, p. 360. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 181.

MISTAKEN MAGNITUDES

'Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 24.

It was one great complaint of our Lord against the Pharisees, that they had lost the relative magnitude of things.

I. One of the great arts of worthy living is to see things in their relative importance. It is a great thing to know a trifle when you meet it. It is equally great, when the decisive moment comes, to seize it and use it with every power of manhood. It is such swift distinguishing between the great and little, such vision of the relative magnitude of things, that is one secret of a quiet and conquering life.

1. The failure to see things in their true proportions is often seen in relation to our grievances. When a man has a grievance he is almost certain to have distorted vision. You can block out the sun by the smallest coin if you hold the coin near enough to the eye. And we have a way of dwelling on our grievances, till we lose sight of the blue heaven above us.

2. Of course, I am aware that the failure to see things in their true proportions has sometimes got physical and not moral roots. We are so apt to be jaundiced and think bitter things, when all that we want is a little rest and sunshine.

Of all the secondary ministries of God for helping us to see things as they are, there is none quite so wonderful as sleep. We go to rest troubled, perplexed, despondent. We cannot see how we shall get through at all. But when we waken, how different things are! Jesus loved to speak of death as sleep. Our 'death,' for Christ, was sleep, and sleep is the passage to a glad awaking. There will be no mistaken magnitudes in heaven. There will be no errors in proportion there. We shall no longer be blind to the relative importance of things that confused us when we fell asleep.

II. What are the Gospel powers that help a man to see things as they are?

1. Remember that the Gospel which we preach puts love at the very centre of our life. When anything else than love is at the centre, the gnats and camels are certain to get mixed. For love alone sees purely, clearly, deeply. Take away God, and things are chaos to me. And without love, I never can know God. You understand, then, the wisdom of Jesus Christ in putting love at the centre of our life. It focuses everything. It links the little and the great with the Creator, and brings things to their relative importance.

2. And then the Gospel takes our threescore years and ten and lays them against the background of eternity. It is because Christ has brought immortality to light that the Christian sees things in their true proportions. The efforts and strivings of our threescore years are not adjusted to the scale of seventy, they are adjusted to the scale of immortality.

3. And then the Gospel brings us into fellowship with Christ, and that is our last great lesson in proportion. The heart that takes its measurements from Jesus is likely to be pretty near the truth.—G. H. MORRISON, Sun-Rise, p. 32.

Illustration.—Mr. Froude, in his Spanish Story of the Armada, makes a significant remark about the Spanish king. He is showing the incompetence of Philip II, and he says: 'The smallest thing and the largest seemed to occupy him equally'. That was one mark of Philip the Second's incompetence. That gave the worst of all possible starts to the Armada. And for the equipping of nobler vessels than these galleons, and the fighting of sterner battles than they fought, that spirit spells incompetency still.—G. H. MORRISON, Sun-Rise, p. 33.

FORMALISM

'Woe unto you, scribes!'—MATTHEW XXIII. 25.

I. WHAT is the explanation of this unwonted severity of our Blessed Lord? Why was the whole tone of His ordinary addresses so entirely altered? The answer is given in the words of the text. In that solemn sentence the verdict of God Almighty is recorded upon the whole race of Pharisees, 'Ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter'. The heart of these professors was not right with God. They responded to the calls of public charity, but no true love for God and man reigned in their souls.

From this hypocrisy our Lord revolted with the united strength of His human and Divine nature. He made one last effort to save them from themselves, to reveal the truth to their blinded hearts, to snatch them back from the abyss which was already opening to receive them.

II. How was it that these Pharisees could descend to such depths of iniquity?

There was, no doubt, a time in the lives of these Pharisees when they were conscious of heavenly aspirations—a blessed spring-tide of the soul when refreshing showers descended from on high to quicken the good seed which had been sown in their hearts. They shrank, however, from the sacrifices by which real holiness could be attained. They held back from the free surrender of their heart to God. They were afraid of the answer which might be returned if they inquired of their Father in heaven, 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?' So Satan took advantage of their indecision, and suggested an easier method by which the favour of heaven could be attained. Under the guidance of this master-teacher of deceit they renounced the rugged pathway of inward self-denial, and turned into the smoother road of external obedience.

III. The temptation of compounding for inward sin by correctness of outward conduct will press most heavily upon those who, without any real change of heart, have come to be considered religious. They have great doubts whether they are really religious, whether they are ready to die and appear before the judgment seat of Christ. Yet they shrink from so humbling themselves as to acknowledge the false foundation on which their spiritual fabric has been raised. Their character for godliness is too precious a possession to be lightly abandoned. So, instead of falling down on their knees and praying God Almighty to create in them a clean heart and renew a right spirit within them, they direct all their efforts to preserving the appearance of goodness, are mere miserable counterfeits, so the process goes on very easily and very surely under the crafty guidance of the master-spirit of deceit. Conscience is soothed, the still small voice is silenced, and unless the Spirit of God arrest their downward course they become at last like whited sepulchres—all is well on the outside;

they are fair and spotless in the eye of man. But within there is no love for God, no warmth of self-sacrifice, no sorrow for sin, no enthusiasm for their Lord, no growing religious life—only the cold chill of death, the second death—the death of the soul!—BISHOP G. H. WILKINSON, The Invisible Glory, p. 62.

Illustration.—Just as in some foreign capital the crown and the sword of a giant king are preserved, though for centuries no head has been found large enough to wear the crown, no hand of strength sufficient to wield the sword, so was it with those poor Pharisees. In the thronged street, the crown of righteousness was borne before them, and men cried 'Rabbi, Rabbi'—but theirs were not the heads on which its jewels were first intended to sparkle, they were not the Godlike heroes for whom its massive robes had been moulded.

On their foreheads and on the folds of each gorgeous robe might be observed the texts of Scripture ostentatiously displayed, but their puny hands were powerless to wield that sword of the spirit, their feeble wills were impotent to wage a Godlike warfare against man's triple foe—the world, the flesh, the devil. In this alone had they succeeded—that they had made clean the outside of the cup and of the platter.—BISHOP G. H. WILKINSON, The Invisible Glory, p. 66.

'Thou blind Pharisee! cleanse first the inside of the cup, that the outside may be clean also.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 26.

'THIS,' says Matthew Arnold, 'was the very ground-principle in Jesus Christ's teaching. Instead of attending so much to your outward acts, attend, He said, first of all to your inward thoughts, to the state of your heart and feelings. This doctrine has perhaps been overstrained and misapplied by certain people since; but it was the lesson which at that time was above all needed. It is a great progress beyond even that advanced maxim of pious Jews: "To do justice and judgment is more acceptable than sacrifice". For to do justice and judgment is still, as we have remarked, something external, and may leave the feelings untouched, uncleared, dead. What was wanted was to plough up, clear, and quicken the feelings themselves. And this is what Jesus did.'

RESPECTABLE SIN

'Ye are like unto whited sepulchres.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 27.

THE imagery of this denunciation would appeal powerfully to a Jewish audience. These whited sepulchres, gleaming in the sun, were a familiar feature in the landscape. You are not to think of them as separate buildings, like the mausoleums of the Romans. They were just caverns cut in the limestone rock, with a great stone set up to close the opening. And once a year these stones were whitewashed, not for the purpose of making them look beautiful, but to warn people that a grave was there, lest they should touch it, and touching, be defiled. Many a time our Lord had wondered at them, when He rambled among the hills at Nazareth. You know how the darkness and the dead men's bones would stir the imagination of a boy. And now in the glow of His anger at the Pharisees, He sees again that haunting of His youth, 'Ye are like unto these whited sepulchres, beautiful outwardly, but full of all uncleanness'.

Now we cannot have a moment's doubt as to the spiritual meaning of that figure. That figure is enshrined in common speech as perfectly expressive of the hypocrite. The man who is one thing inwardly, another outwardly—who is not really what he seems to be—of such hypocrisy in its most general aspect, I might textually speak to-night. But I want to get nearer to the text even than that; to seize upon its characteristic feature; to show how it stands apart amid the many figures of the hypocrite. Now this, I think, is the emphatic thing here—that the Pharisee never shocked nor startled people. He never outraged the feelings of society; never broke through its unwritten laws. Whatever he might be in the sight of God, in the sight of men there was no fault to find. The Pharisee was eminently guilty: he was also respectable. I want then to speak upon the subject of respectable sin.

I. Respectable sin is not just secret sin. I do not mean by respectable sin that sin of which others have got no suspicion. It is true that so long as a man's sin is secret, he may still keep the respect of the community. If he is cunning enough to hide his shame, he may still pass as a reputable citizen. But the point to note is that that respectability depends upon the keeping of the secret. The moment the sin is trumpeted abroad, the man becomes an alien and an outcast. It is not such sin that is respectable. It is sin that, when known, carries no social stigma. It is sin that a man may openly commit, and yet not forfeit his place in the community. It is sin that is tolerated in general opinion; that is not visited with social ostracism; that does not shut the door in a man's face of the society in which he loves to move.

II. Now when we study the earthly life of Jesus, there is one thing that we soon come to see. It is with what terrible and dread severity He judged those sins we call respectable. There is often an element of unexpectedness in the moral judgments of our Saviour. He is sometimes severe where we should have been lenient; He is often lenient where we should be severe. And nowhere is this more remarkable than in His attitude towards actual sins, as He saw them in the streets of Galilee, and in the homes and in the market-place. All sin was hateful to Jesus Christ, because all sin was rebellion against God. He never condoned sin in any form; never thought of it as the other side of goodness. And yet undoubtedly the sins that stirred Him most were not the sins of passion or of weakness. They were the cold and calculating sins which masqueraded as respectable. Think for example of the Temple traders. Did anyone think the less of them for trading so? Was not that traffic a general convenience, acquiesced in by society without protest? Yet never in all his life was Christ so angry—so filled with a passion of tumultuous scorn—as when He knit His scourge, and drove them forth, and hurled the charge of robber in their teeth. It was not in that way that He spoke to Peter. It was not thus that He had addressed the Magdalene. Towards them, in the whole conduct of the Saviour, there is the throb of unutterable tenderness. But towards the Pharisees and towards the traders I look for any such tenderness in vain. Christ hurled His bitterest and sternest judgments upon the sins of respectability.

III. Sin that is respectable has an unequalled power of deadening the conscience. In the mirror of the society he moves in, a man sees nothing to alarm or terrify.

Is this not true of respectable sin, that of all sin it is most pernicious in its influence? I think that Jesus Christ condemned it so, because He was the lover of mankind. He saw its untold power to allure. He saw how mightily it would appeal to natures that would turn in loathing from coarse vice. And therefore did He terribly denounce it, out of His great love for foolish men, who are so ready to think that anything is right when they can do it without social censure.—G. H. MORRISON, The Return of the Angels, p. 77.

'Ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 27.

COMPARE the sentences inserted by Charlotte Brontë in her preface to the second edition of Jane Eyre: 'Conventionality is not morality. Self-righteousness is not religion. To attack the first is not to assail the second. To pluck the mask from the face of the Pharisee, is not to lift an impious hand to the Crown of Thorns. . . . The world may not like to see these ideas dissevered, for it has been accustomed to blend them; finding it convenient to make external show pass for sterling worth—to let whitewashed walls vouch for clean shrines. It may hate him who dares to scrutinize and expose—to rase the gilding and show base metal underneath it, to penetrate the sepulchre and reveal charnel relics; but hate as it will, it is indebted to him.'

How much among us might be likened to a whited sepulchre; outwardly, all pomp and strength; but inwardly full of horror and despair and dead men's bones! Iron highways, with their wains fire-winged, are uniting all ends of the firm Land; quays and moles, with their innumerable stately fleets, tame the ocean into our pliant bearer of burdens; Labour's thousand arms, of sinew and of metal, all-conquering everywhere, from the tops of the mountain down to the depths of the mine and the caverns of the sea, ply unweariedly for the service of man: yet man remains unserved. . . . Countries are rich, prosperous, in all manner of increase, beyond example; but the Men of those countries are poor, needier than ever of all sustenance outward and inward; of Belief, of Knowledge, of Money, of Food.—CARLYLE.

REFERENCES.—XXIII. 27, 28.—D. FRASER, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 191. XXIII. 27-39.—A. MACLAREN, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 139.

'Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous, and say, if we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 29, 30.

I SAW the state of those, both priests and people, who, in reading the Scriptures, cry out much against Cain, Esau, and Judas, and other wicked men of former times, mentioned in the Holy Scriptures; but do not see the nature of Cain, of Esau, of Judas, and those others in themselves. These said, it was they, they, they, that were the bad people; putting it all from themselves; but when some of them came, with the light and spirit of truth, to see into themselves, then they came to say I, I, I, it is I myself, that have been the Ishmael, and the Esau, etc.—GEORGE FOX.

'It is trite,' says Professor Seeley, 'that an original man is persecuted in his lifetime and idolized after his death, but it is a less familiar truth that the posthumous idolaters are the legitimate successors and representatives of the contemporary persecutors. . . . The second half of the original man's destiny is really worse than the first, and his failure is written more legibly in the blind veneration of succeeding ages than in the blind hostility of his own. He broke the chains by which men were bound; he threw open to them the doors leading into the boundless freedom of nature and truth. But in the next generation he is idolized, and nature and truth are as much forgotten as ever; if he could return to earth, he would find that the crowbars and files with which he made his way out of the prison-house have been forged into the bolts and chains of a new prison called by his own name. And who are those who idolize his memory? Who are found building his sepulchre? Precisely the same party which resisted his reform; those who are born for routine and can accommodate themselves to everything but freedom; those who in clinging to the wisdom of the past suppose they love wisdom, but in fact love only the past, and love the past only because they hate the living present.'

SPEAKING of adherents of theological creeds, the late Mr. R. H. Hutton once observed that 'the greater the glow of trust with which they formerly held possession of their past, the more sullenly do they fortify the empty sepulchres. . . . It was a saying of Luther's that the very people who, in his lifetime, would not touch the kernel of his teaching, would be greedy after the husks of it when he was once dead.'

THE only valuable criticism is that which turns what is latent in the thought of a great writer against what is explicit, and thereby makes his works a stepping-stone to results which he did not himself attain. It was those who stoned the Prophets that built their sepulchres. Those who really revered them, showed it by following the spirit derived from them to new issues.—E. CAIRD, preface to Philosophy of Kant.

AND, while we fools
Are making courtesies and brave compliments
To our rare century, and courtierly
Swaddling our strength in trammels of soft silk,
The rotten depths grow rottener.

—AUGUSTA WEBSTER.

REFERENCES.—XXIII. 29-32. A. Orrock Johnston, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 420. XXIII. 29-30.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xl. No. 2381. XXIII. 33.—J. Baldwin Brown, The Divine Treatment of Sin, p. 155.

'I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city.'—MATTHEW XXIII. 34.

GENERATION after generation of insurgent Poles, or Italians, or what-not, may bleed and die, and seem to leave nothing to show for it all. But who are we that we should presume to judge how much expenditure of blood the keeping alive of an idea is worth?—Memoirs of Henry Holbeach.

REFERENCES.—XXIII. 34.—H. C. G. Moule, Christ's Witness to the Life to Come, p. 120. XXIII. 34, 35.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 320. XXIII. 37.—A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part iv. p. 203. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. viii. p. 151. John Watson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 56. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. ii. p. 243. C. Stamford, Symbols of Christ, p. 263. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 209. C. Jordan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 360. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xl. No. 2381; vol. xlv. No. 2630. XXIII. 37, 38.—E. E. Smith, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 228. XXIII. 38.—C. Jordan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 110. XXIII. 41.—H. P. Liddon, Some Elements of Religion, p. 201. XXIV. 1-21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2381. XXIV. 1-35.—R. W. Dale, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, pp. 60, 104. XXIV. 3.—D. Heagle, That Blessed Hope, p. 62. S. H. Kellogg, The Past a Prophecy of the Future, pp. 321, 339. XXIV. 6.—J. Addison Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 275. XXIV. 6, 14.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lx. 1901, p. 216. XXIV. 7.—F. E. Paget, The Redemption of War, p. 1. J. B. Mozley, Sermons Preached Before the University of Oxford, p. 97. H. J. Coleridge, The Return of the King, p. 116. XXIV. 11.—G. St. Clair, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 339.

THE INTRUSION OF THE WORLD

'Because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold.'—MATTHEW XXIV. 12.

No doubt this referred originally to the great crash of the fall of Jerusalem. But one cannot help seeing that the whole prophecy describes rather the constantly recurring features of all epochs of great change affecting the kingdom of heaven than the details of special circumstances attaching to some one event.

I. Observe that it is more inside the Church that iniquity is said to abound. There may be a fair amount of morality and obedience in the Church. But it is the outside world, the mass of the people who are not Christians in any real sense, in whom a low tone of morality abounds. And the Church of course ought to be the antagonist of this, to curb it and overcome it. If it has failed to be so, then the world is leavening the Church. The two powers are always in existence and in operation; perhaps there is always action and reaction, but there are periods when the forces of the Church are evidently the stronger, and others when the world evidently is.

II. I want to urge that as a truth not only about communities, but about individuals. Either you are salting the world or the world is putrefying you. There cannot be a severance of relations. You must either be actively giving out or passively receiving.

In what are the bulk of professing Christians different from the world? They are like them in their views of things, in their amusements, in their pursuits, in their ambitions, in their loves and fears. That no doubt partly comes from the more obvious parts of Christian morality having permeated to a considerable extent the classes of society to which most of us belong. But that will not explain it all. There should be a distinct difference of tone, a higher standard of self-sacrifice. It all comes to this, are we trying to be the salt, or are we letting the evil around us conquer unchecked?

III. The Cure. Honestly bring your hearts under the influence of the love that will kindle them. Our love as Christians is eminently reasonable. It rests upon a believed fact. It is the echo of Christ's love to us. It is not then to be produced by willing only or by effort, but mainly by laying our hearts in sunshine that makes them warm. Then let the practical discipline of life go to cultivate that love, and to suppress what wars against it. Make an effort to keep Christ's love in mind, and practice the fruits of love, and guard against the intrusion of the world.—A. MACLAREN.

REFERENCE.—XXIV. 12.—H. J. Coleridge, The Return of the King, p. 89.

'He that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved.'—MATTHEW XXIV. 13.

THIS is one of those great notes which sound through Scripture, the necessity of continuance, of not stopping before the end. Love is tried by continuance, by going on with what we have begun.—MOZLEY.

REFERENCES.—XXIV. 13.—Stopford A. Brooke, Short Sermons, p. 41. J. Lewis Paton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 406. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. i. p. 318. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 148. H. P. Liddon, Sermons on Some Words of Christ, p. 113. XXIV. 14.—D. Heagle, That Blessed Hope, p. 90. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. i. p. 1. T. F. Lockyer, The Inspirations of the Christian Life, p. 99. G. F. Maclear, The Evidential Value of the Continuity of Missionary Enterprise, p. 1. XXIV. 15.—H. J. Coleridge, The Return of the King, p. 142. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. i. p. 37.

'If any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there; believe it not.'—MATTHEW XXIV. 23.

NOTHING doth so much keepe Men out of the Church, and drive Men out of the Church, as Breach of Unity: and therefore, whensoever it cometh to that passe, that one saith, Ecce in deserto; Another saith, Ecce in penetralibus; That is, when some Men seeke Christ, in the conventicles of Heretikes, and others in an outward face of a church, that voice had need continually to sound in Men's eares, Nolite exire, Goe not out.—BACON.

REFERENCES.—XXIV. 24.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 824. J. B. Wilkinson, Plain Preaching for a Year, p. 191. XXIV. 24-26.—Alfred Rowland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 71. XXIV. 25.—S. H. Kellogg, The Past & Prophecy of the Future, p. 308.

LIGHTNING

'For as the lightning cometh forth from the east, and is seen even unto the west; so shall the presence of the Son of Man be.'—MATTHEW XXIV. 27 (R.V. margin).

THE presence of the Divine Humanity is likened to a flash of lightning; not, I imagine, to the destructive zig-zag forked lightning of the thunderstorm—that metaphor was appropriated by our Lord Himself to evil personified when He said: 'Behold, I saw Satan, like lightning, fall from heaven'—but rather to that harmless beautiful illumination which we call summer lightning, or sheet lightning.

I. What, then, is this sheet lightning, and in what sense can it be an analogy of the presence of the Divine Humanity, the light of the world? Sheet lightning is the flashing into manifestation of an atmospheric power, always present everywhere but not always manifested. No man can define electricity, and yet it has been scientifically demonstrated to be the combining agent of matter, and without it the million million atoms of the material world would be disintegrated.

The Incarnation is God manifest, as the lightning-flash is electricity manifest. His presence on earth is the coming into visibility of a Divine, world-creating, world-sustaining presence, always everywhere diffused and operative; always everywhere the life, the spirit; but impersonal and unknowable to the finite minds of men, except as revealed under some limitation that man's eye can see and man's intelligence apprehend.

II. These eyes of the soul are greatly in our own power. The faculty of spiritual discernment, though it may be withered from non-use, is the hereditary possession of every human being. Eyes must be blind indeed that cannot see a lightning-flash. The Christ is the lightning-flash that reveals the nature of the Father Who loves us. Act as though it were true. Let the solemn mystery of that presence challenge you and subdue you.

III. Obviously, in a very special and influential manner, is that same presence shrouded in every guaranteed act of the Church. At the supreme moment of earnest, faithful communion, the veil between the two worlds is very thin; the spirits of the departed are very near; the soul is strengthened by a bath of heaven's sunshine from the presence of the glorified Redeemer—God's lightning-flash illuminating the darkness of the world.—BASIL WILBERFORCE, Speaking Good of His Name, p. 17.

'As the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be.'—MATTHEW XXIV. 27.

In her Life of Edward Irving, Mrs. Oliphant quotes a reminiscence of his preaching at Perth by a Scottish minister. 'His text was taken from the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, regarding the coming of the Son of Man. I remember nothing of the sermon, save its general subject; but one thing I can never forget. While he was engaged in unfolding his subject, from out of a dark cloud, which obscured the Church, there came forth a bright blaze of lightning and a crash of thunder. There was deep stillness in the audience. The preacher paused; and from the stillness and the gloom, his powerful voice, clothed with increased solemnity, pronounced these words: For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall the coming of the Son of Man be. You can imagine the effect.'

REFERENCES.—XXIV. 27.—Sir G. R. Fetherston, Bart., A Garden Eastward, p. 26. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 221.

THE CARRION AND THE VULTURES

'Whosoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together.'—MATTHEW XXIV. 28.

THIS grim parable has, of course, a strong Eastern colouring. It is best appreciated by dwellers in those lands. They tell us that no sooner is some sickly animal dead, or some piece of carrion thrown out by the way, than the vultures—for the eagle does not prey upon carrion—appear. And so, says Christ, wherever there is a rotting, dead society, a carcass hopelessly corrupt and evil, down upon it, as if drawn by some unerring attraction, will come the angel, the vulture of the Divine judgment.

I. The first thing in these most true and solemn words is this, that they are to us a revelation of a law which operates with unerring certainty through all the force of the world's history.

We cannot tell, but God can, when evil has become incurable; or when, in the language of my text, the man or the community has become a carcass. There may be flickerings of life, all unseen by our eyes, or there may be death, all unsuspected by our shallow vision. So long as there is a possibility of amendment, 'sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily'; and God dams back, as it were, the flow of His retributive judgment; 'not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to the knowledge of the truth'. But when He sees that all is vain, that no longer is restoration or recovery possible, then He lets loose the flood; or, in the language of my text, when the thing has become a carcass, then the vultures, God's scavengers, come and clear it away from off the face of the earth.

Let us see to it that we do our little part to be the salt of the earth which shall keep it from rotting, and so drive away the vultures of judgment.

II. We have here a law which shall have a far more tremendous accomplishment in the future.

Jesus Christ is to come in bodily form as He went away. All men are to be judged by Him. That judgment is to be the destruction of opposing forces, the sweeping away of the carrion of moral evil.

III. 'This is a law which need never touch you, nor you know anything about but by the hearing of the ear. 'There is no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus.' If we trust in that great Saviour we shall be quickened from the death of sin and so shall not be food for the vultures of judgment. The hand Whose touch healed the leper will heal us, and our flesh will come again as the flesh of a little child. Christ has bared His breast to the Divine judgments against sin, and if by faith we shelter ourselves in Him, we shall never know the terrors of that awful day.—A. MACLAREN, Christ in the Heart, p. 105.

REFERENCES.—XXIV. 28.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 157; see also British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 417. H. J. Coleridge, The Return of the King, p. 214. W. H. Simcox, The Cessation of Prophecy, p. 188. C. Jordan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 104. W. Alexander, The Great Question, p. 257. H. D. Rawnsley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 180. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 232. J. Service, Sermons, p. 48. XXIV. 29, 30.—Bishop E. C. S. Gibson, The Old Testament in the New, p. 79.

THE CROSS BLAZONED ON THE SKIES

'And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven.'
—MATTHEW XXIV. 30.

THE Saviour declared that at the end of the present age, and on the verge of His Second Coming, a strange, mystic sign would appear upon the firmament.

What is that tremendous sign to be? I believe, with Dean Alford, that 'no sign completely answers the conditions but the Cross.

I. Consider: Him to Whom the Sign Appertains.—He calls Himself 'the Son of Man'. He adopts a phrase of Daniel the Prophet and gives it a definite and rich signification. Who is this Son of Man? Evidently He stands in close relationship to humanity. He is human in His nature and experience and sympathy.

But does not the very term suggest that He was more than man? So unique a relation to humanity must imply Divinity. It is noteworthy that in this solemn discourse from which our text is taken, whilst He calls Himself the Son of Man He unequivocally calls Himself by names which none but a Divine Being dare apply to Himself.

II. Mark: The Wonderfulness of the Sign.—The emblazoned Cross is the sign of human sin. Never will the tribes of the earth realize fully the horror of sin till 'shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven'.

The Cross burning on the forehead of the heavens is the sign of the guilt of sin.

The Cross ardent on those resplendent heights is the sign of full and complete atonement. Can we be surprised that the Cross has, therefore, always been the supreme symbol of the Christian religion?

The Cross kindled on the skies is the sign of character. The ideal of Christian excellence is in the Cross, which also supplies the motive for striving after the ideal and the power to achieve the ideal.

The Cross blazing in the skies is also the sign of the reward of the believer. Such as have trusted the Redeeming Cross will know assuredly then that they have not believed in vain.

III. Let us seek to appreciate the Momentousness of the Appearance of this Sign.

Note carefully the time-point of my text, 'And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven'. The appearance of the flaming Cross is to synchronize with astounding phenomena.

In the Cross of Christ I glory
Towering o'er the wrecks of time.

That is the proclamation of a literal circumstance, the Cross shall survive all things, even as (in God's gracious purpose) it did antedate all things. One wonders if the Cross will be a gospel to a world of sinners in that awful hour.

The Cross when it appears in heaven will give universal compunction. The Lord saith that 'then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn'.

When the Cross appears Jesus will speedily return as Lord. The 'sign' will, as Matthew Henry puts it, 'dash infidelity quite out of countenance'.

When the Cross appears the full salvation of believers shall be declared.

Finally: the Cross when it appears will reveal what shall be the glory of saints for ever.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Travels of the Heart, p. 19.

REFERENCES.—XXIV. 30.—Bishop E. C. S. Gibson, The Old Testament in the New, p. 95. J. B. Wilkinson, Plain Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 276. XXIV. 30, 31.—F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. i. p. 128. W. B. Trevelyan, Sermons for the People (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 120. XXIV. 31.—Bishop E. C. S. Gibson, The Old Testament in the New, p. 109.

THE PROPHET MAY

'When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh.'—MATTHEW XXIV. 32.

TRANSPOSING the words of an American preacher, we may say that what Isaiah is among the books of the Bible, that May is among the months of the year. When we come out on it from a cruel and lingering winter to behold the glory of the forest and the grace of flowers—to mark the delicate beauty of Primroses and daises bright,

And everything that loves the light—hope touches our hearts once more. If a hand lies fast in ours that threatened to slip, if we still find ourselves together on the narrow road that leads by the great precipice, it is with a graver and deeper joy that we turn over the Divine pages of the Book of the Prophet May.

I. May is very fitly the season in which Christian workers meet to review their labours. Some of them come to tell of reaping as well as sowing. They are happy because they have seen the promise of the kingdom, because they have felt the flush and warmth of the approaching summer. For those to whom they carried the message the accepted day has risen. The Divine Spirit, almost before their very eyes, has renewed the souls of men. Their hearts are open to the teaching of the companies of prophets on the hill-sides and in the fields. But others receive it unreadily. They have sown in a gusty day. The clouds have been low in the sky. Nothing is apparent, nothing can be put into speech or print which does not speak of going back. It seems to them as if all were to end in misery, vanity, and enfeeblement. God rebukes them by His May. There are long winters in grace, but the renewal never fails.

II. For the rest St. Paul urges them to be steadfast, to be always abounding in the work of the Lord, by turning their thoughts to the field of death. That above all others is in the charge of Christ. Yet of visible proof that it is so there is next to none. No missionary, however despondent, sees such irresponsiveness. But when the Hope of all the harvest fell into the ground and died, He knew what would come of it. He rose again, and thereby 'made the dying deathless'. St. Paul argues it out very calmly. What sense sees is to faith the seed changing. It is a redeemed thing as much as the soul that waits it in the cloister of the Church expectant.

Therefore, looking at the iron rigour that holds and has held so long the field which the Lord has blessed! be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, and trusting in His prophecy.

III. What is true on the great scale is equally true for the individual. Life in Christ is not history—it is prophecy. If it were history it would be nothing, for what could the dim, vexed beginning of eternity count for when time was no more? But eternity is nothing but the unfolding and explaining of time. All that is not of Christ will pass; we go loosed from it as from our sins in the Blood of the Lamb. But how much remains! The companionship that made life a holy and happy thing was cut short just at the opening. The plans with which the eager heart teemed all came to nothing. What forces of thought and love we have seemed to spend in vain! Are there wounds that cannot be healed, losses that cannot be made good, griefs that cannot be forgotten? The answer is in the prophecy of May—of everlasting spring and unwithering flowers.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, Ten Minute Sermons, p. 59.

REFERENCES.—XXIV. 32.—C. Silvester Horne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1906, p. 198. XXIV. 32, 33.—D. Heagle, That Blessed Hope, p. 44. XXIV. 34-36.—Bishop E. C. S. Gibson, The Old Testament in the New, p. 63. XXIV. 35.—S. H. Kellogg, The Past a Prophecy of the Future, p. 237. H. P. Liddon, Sermons on Some Words of Christ, p. 1. C. Jerdan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 77. J. Orr, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. p. 81. XXIV. 36.—D. Heagle, That Blessed Hope, p. 44.

'As it was in the days of Noe.'—MATTHEW XXIV. 37.

In his biography of William Morris, Mr. J. W. Mackail points out (ii. pp. 144 f.) the poet's firm belief in a catastrophe impending over modern civilization, a sort of twilight of the gods, a dying before regeneration, a sudden and complete avalanche of barbarism leading to some re-birth of man. 'I have more faith,' said Morris once, 'than a grain of mustard seed in the future history of "civilization," which I know now is doomed to destruction, and probably before very long; what a joy it is to think of! and how often it consoles me to think of barbarism once more flooding the world, and real feelings and passions, however rudimentary, taking the place of our wretched hypocrisies. With this thought in my mind all the history of the past is lighted up and lives again to me. I used really to despair once because I thought what the idiots of our day call progress would go on perfecting itself; happily I know now that all that will have a sudden check—sudden in appearance, I mean—"as it was in the days of Noe".'

REFERENCES.—XXIV. 37.—A. N. Obbard, Plain Sermons, p. 53. XXIV. 39.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 823.

'Then shall two men be in the field; one is taken and one is left.'—MATTHEW XXIV. 40.

We are told that there shall be two in the field, that the one shall be taken and the other left. But we have yet to learn why, in our limited vision, the choice seems invariably to be mistaken. We have yet to learn why he who is doing good work is taken from the field, leaving there the man whose tastes are urban.—H. SETON MERRIMAN.

I HAVE read of a remarkable Welshman, of whom it was said, when the grave closed over him, that he could frame a harp and play it; build a ship and sail it; compose an ode and set it to music. A brave fellow, that son of Wales—but I had once a brother who could do more and better than this, but the grave has closed over him, as over the gallant Welshman of yore; there are now but two that remember him—the one who bore him, and the being who was nurtured at the same breast. He was taken, and I was left!—Truly the ways of Providence are inscrutable.—BORROW in Lavengro.

REFERENCES.—XXIV. 40-42.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. lii. p. 49.

'Watch therefore.'—MATTHEW XXIV. 42.

THE art of life resembles the art of the wrestler rather than of the dancer, inasmuch as man must stand ready and steady to meet sudden and unlooked-for attacks.—MARCUS AURELIUS.

REFERENCES.—XXIV. 42.—E. Aldom French, God's Message Through Modern Doubt, p. 225. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. vii. p. 277. XXIV. 42-44.—T. B. Dover, Some Quiet Lenten Thoughts, p. 87. XXIV. 42-51.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 166. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 244. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2642. XXIV. 44.—R. D. B. Rawnsley, Village Sermons (3rd Series), p. 1. W. Hay M. H. Altken, Mission Sermons (2nd Series), p. 247. XXV.—R. Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven, p. 148.

THE SUBSTANCE OF THE KINGDOM—THE DIVINE NATURE

'The kingdom of heaven.'—MATTHEW XXV. 1.

THE way by which a human soul born in sin becomes a kingdom of heaven, is the way of the New Birth, wherein God takes away our sin by the cleansing of the Precious Blood of Christ, and makes us by the power of His Holy Spirit partakers of the Divine nature.

I. God being the germ of every true human character, if we want to know that true human nature is, we must know first what is the character of God, Who is its ideal, and the root out of which it grows. That character is summed up by St. John in the phrase 'God is love,' and that love is the mutual love of the Three Blessed Persons of the Undivided Trinity.

God being what in the life of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in all His works, we recognize Him to be, is the image in which you were formed, the type you are intended to grow up to. Nothing mean, sad, discouraging in all your experience, is what He made you for; as Christ was not made for the tortures of the Cross, but for the sacrifice, the love, the victory of the Cross.

We are not necessarily wrong in having joy of any created good. The wrongness begins only when we begin to be satisfied with any created good, and stop in that which is the mere sketch and faintest outline of good, instead of going on through it to God Who is the substance of all good.

II. And then God Himself, the Archetype, comes to you in the Word and Sacraments. And now the aspiration after holiness is no longer a vain longing; but your soul draws nigh to God, and is possessed by Him, and as you persevere in this prayer you learn how the dedicated soul may be conformed to God, and become God's kingdom.

III. But who ever practically reaches this glory? Is not the essence and abiding characteristic of human life vanity—misery? No, it has never been so absolutely. Every man bears within himself a reflection of the Divine goodness in his desire of good.

And consider that you feed upon God in the Sacraments, not in order to possess Him for yourself alone. You are to interpret, to reflect God to all who live round you.

This is the secret of the influence upon the human race of such a character as St. Francis of Assisi. In that homely, poor, and gentle lover we recognize the Eternal Love, and are kindled and inexpressibly cheered and enlightened.

Our salvation is not in knowing all the finest moral distinctions, but in God Himself, Who comes in all the radiance of His holiness to live, and build His Kingdom in us.—G. CONGREVE, The Parable of the Ten Virgins, p. 11.

THE EXPECTANCY OF FAITH

(Advent Season)

Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom.'—MATTHEW XXV. 1.

THE typical company in the parable represents the vaster company of the kingdom of God, the number 'ten' being of no spiritual significance, but yet frequently used as denoting a typical company; the kingdom of God in the language of the Gospels meaning the visible Church of Christ. We understand therefore that these ten virgins are a representative company waiting for the coming of the heavenly Bridegroom, and looking forward to final beatitude in the home which our Lord has formed for His chosen ones.

There are two points to consider: expectancy, as a distinguishing mark of the life of the Church on earth; secondly, the going forth to meet the Messiah, as the chosen state of life of the individual members of His Church.

I. As to expectancy, our state should be a continual looking out for the dawn of the manifestation of Christ. The Christian mind is bent on the hope that we shall see the land that is far off, and follow in the triumphal march of the Bridegroom, and carry our standard safely in the midst of the glory and beauty of the mystical company.

II. These virgins were going forth to meet the Bridegroom. Under this idea is contained the whole life of the individual members of the Mystical Body. It is a 'going forth' to meet Him as He comes; true life is a going onward and upward, an animating quickening of the soul which has such expectancy. Our souls are gifted in various degrees, all lawful callings are part of a Divine purpose to be carried on in His kingdom. Our Lord would have them carried out with energy and skill and varied powers. For this purpose our gifts are infinitely various; but in one respect all are alike. The virgins all had one purpose: all were waiting for the coming of the Bridegroom; all were longing to see Him; and the image of the Bridegroom ever dwelt in their minds. And all who are faithful bear that image in their soul as a perpetual power, an ever-prompting influence. We are so made as to form visions in our minds, and these have great influence over us.

And such visions ever have practical teachings, telling us of duties to others; that each is but one of a company, with ever-constant calls of helpfulness, of relative duties, each demanding of us some effort for the forwarding of God's purpose, all and each acting together, even as He himself lived and lives for others, carrying on in heaven the work of love manifested on earth.—T. T. CARTER, The Spirit of Watchfulness, p. 8.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 1.—Henry Alford, Advent Sermons, p. 99. H. Scott Holland, Logic and Life, p. 305. E. Fowle, Plain Preaching to Poor People (2nd Series), p. 129. W. Lee, University Sermons, p. 124. XXV. 1-12.—T. De Witt Talmage, Sermons, p. 24. Rayner Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven, p. 25. XXV. 1-13.—T. Guthrie, Parables of Our Lord, p. 166. Cosmo Gordon Lang, Thoughts on Some of the Parables of Jesus, p. 83. R. Stewart, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 392. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 175. B. W. Maturin, Practical Studies on the Parables of Our Lord, p. 138. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2618, vol. xlv. No. 2642.

THE TEN VIRGINS

(Advent)

Five of them were wise, and five were foolish.—MATTHEW XXV. 2.

I. OUR Lord seems to be drawing attention to the combination of outward resemblances and inward differences in the lives of men: the similarity of circumstances which so often conceals dissimilarity of characters.

1. It is, for instance, an obvious fact that respectability often, indeed usually, tends to resemble goodness—all the virgins had their lamps burning. You cannot at first tell, or perhaps even at last tell, which are the really good men, and which are the merely respectable ones. Yet in spite of resemblances between them, there is really a distinction as vital as we can conceive. For respectability is simply a regard for appearances—a regard for man; goodness is a regard for realities—a regard for God.

2. In apparent weaknesses there is also very frequently a resemblance—‘They all slumbered and slept’. So calm is apt to look very much like indifference. But these superficial judgments count for very little. Absence of noise may mean absence of water, the dry and parched channel; or it may mean the stillness, the silence of a tide which ‘moving seems asleep, too full for sound or foam’.

But the teaching of our Lord is that ‘whatsoever is covered shall be revealed’; that the secret distinctions of character, unobserved now, shall be made visible. In the parable of the Ten Virgins we see the truth illustrated.

II. It is not in quiet and untroubled times, when the lamp of life seems to burn gaily without any effort of our own, while in peace and security men ‘slumber and sleep’—it is not in the ‘seasons of calm weather’ that the true man, the character of the man, is made manifest, but in the sudden awakening call—the midnight cries—the crises of life, that what has been ‘hidden’ is ‘revealed’. These comings of the Bridegroom, these solemn crises, these revealing moments, are, according to our Lord, but the foreshadowing and premonition of one other greater than all; and the last judgment is to be the final revelation of character.

III. Take two practical thoughts suggested by the subject:—

1. The thought of the supreme value of character, and therefore the supreme value of the individual soul. One of our commonest dangers is that of always trying to judge men and women by groups or classes, i.e. by circumstances instead of character.

2. Though none may see the depths of our souls, yet there is One who even now is never deceived by appearances—One who knows the true drift and tendency of our lives, who beholds us not only as we are, but as we are becoming—as we are to be. He knows the Virgins who, even when they sleep, are ready.—H. R. GAMBLE, The Ten Virgins, p. 3.

GOODNESS NOT GOOD ENOUGH

‘. . . And five were foolish.’—MATTHEW XXV. 2.

THESE five foolish virgins were in some sense friends of the Bridegroom. And they stand here not exactly as representative of the base, but of the good, although there was something seriously the matter with their goodness—that is the point.

The goodness that is not good enough! What is that? Let us say you have here five foolish virgins, and they shall stand for five distinct types of defective goodness.

I. Ecclesiasticism Without Righteousness.—There is one great type of a goodness that is not good enough—formalism without character.

II. Morality Without Godliness.—It is always an advantage for a man to be moral; but, beyond all, it is an infinite advantage for his morality to be founded upon the deep rock.

In South Africa they sometimes come across yellow diamonds. They are really diamonds, but no king would ever put one of them into his crown. And there is many a man to-day who is a yellow diamond. His is the morality of the surface, the morality of society, the morality of etiquette, but he has not been transformed in mind and spirit, and he does not walk in the fear of God, and, therefore, God will never know him in the day when He makes up His jewels.

III. Sentiment Without Sacrifice.—Take care of your poetry, but mind it is the poetry of life. For, if at the last our religion has been imagination, romance, poetry, æstheticism, it is the goodness that is not good enough, it is the light that fails.

IV. Knowledge Without Obedience.—A man never knows enough until he has cried ‘God be merciful to me a sinner’. A man never knows enough until he knows that he is a new creature in Christ Jesus. A man is not saved by what he knows, but by what he brings to bear on his daily life and action. Thank God for your knowledge. It is a golden lamp. But mind there is in it the oil of grace, the light of truth, and that your life is a life of obedience and sacrifice.

V. Enthusiasm Without Perseverance.—Goodness is a conviction, a passion, a habit. And the light that you want is the light that does not fail; the light that will burn steadily on through the years, and brightest at the last.—W. L. WATKINSON, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXVII. 1905, p. 36.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 2.—C. Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LVIII. 1900, p. 385. C. Silvester Horne, ibid. vol. LXVIII. 1905, p. 187.

THE SPIRIT OF PREPARATION

(Advent Season)

‘And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them. But the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps.’—MATTHEW XXV. 2-4.

Two great lines of thought are here brought before us:—

I. The Individuality of the Elect.

II. The Interior life of the Elect.

I. The Individuality; the contrast between the company and the several virgin members of whom it is composed. The company has a life of its own, and moves on irrespective of its numbers, and is received into the open doors, following the Bridegroom, while yet certain members of that chosen company may have lost their place, not keeping true to the standard of the sacred fellowship.

Here we have the representation, first of the Mystical Body, as a whole; secondly, of the members of that Body. The greatest wonder that we can believe is the continual existence of the Church, advancing on, as the Ark upon the waters, unassailable, sustained by higher powers.

While this progress of the body continues ever, the individual, taken up into it may fail, as each is tried—each shaping his own destiny, each standing or falling as the higher life prevails or dies. This truth is shown in the parable, certain of the virgins failing to hold their place in the mystic company. And here is one of the greatest difficulties of faith, how to realize the separateness of each separate soul.

II. And all depends on the interior condition of the soul. All forms of external activity spring from the life growing within—each showing its principles in deeds and words, the centre of each life ever giving out the powers of the individual soul.

This truth appears in the parable as symbolized by the oil, which gives its power to the kindled lamp, for the oil is the inner source that feeds it. And this our Lord would bring out when He represents the foolish virgins as saying to the wise, 'Give us of your oil,' and the reply, 'Go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves'. For the interior life cannot be given by one individual to another.

Of the oil, some have thought that it means one, some another, virtue; some have interpreted it as the Holy Spirit Himself. We may rather suppose that it represents both the Giver and the Gift. We cannot separate them. The Spirit goes forth in His Gift, and the Gift can live only as it abides in the Giver. The true spirit in us is kindled by the Holy Spirit according to the calling of God, through His indwelling, and each soul has an individual destiny, a special history. And this individuality depends on the foundations of the life within; the issues of life and death depending on what passes for good or evil within each soul.—T. T. CARTER, The Spirit of Watchfulness.

REFERENCE.—XXV. 2-4.—Henry Alford, Advent Sermons, p. 121.

'The wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps.'—MATTHEW XXV. 4.

HERE lies the sole difference between the wise and the foolish: the wise had private additional store of oil hid away in their own little vessels, so that the lamp lighted for them may be trimmed and refilled by their own peculiar oil. The common inheritance of grace brought down to us by a catholic church—this is the beginning of salvation. But this cannot carry us through, unless deep in our own secret heart of hearts we have stored up the hidden oil of expectant love . . . the thoughtful, anxious, careful love, that does not rest in its own vague impulses and shallow fancies, but makes itself ready with given grace of God.—CANON SCOTT HOLLAND.

THE PATIENT WAITING

(Advent Season)

'While the bridegroom tarried they all slumbered and slept.'
—MATTHEW XXV. 5.

THERE have been different interpretations of this verse. One ancient Father has spoken of it as 'the rest or repose of faith'.

Let us consider what we may thus learn as to the cause of the failure of the foolish virgins.

I. The repose of faith implies an imagery corresponding with one of the beautiful antiphons of the Advent season, where St. Paul refers to our mortal life as the night, 'The night is far spent, the day is at hand,' the night meaning this period of our mortal life.

Another passage in the Canticles explains more tersely the cause of the failure of the unready virgins. The Bride says, 'I sleep, but my heart waketh'. Within the slumber and the depth of sleep there may yet be the awakened heart, the earnest preparation for anticipatory joy. The heart may be thus far awake in sleep, the throbbing fullness of the light glowing within the soul implying the repose of faith. The absence of oil in the foolish virgins showed the loss of this tendency of the soul.

II. There are, speaking generally, two causes of failure even among the faithful—the want of a true foundation, the want of forethought.

1. It is needful to look closely at the foundations of one's life to see how far one's will is moved in conformity with the Divine call; how far the stability of one's inward resolves rests on faith unfailing and love unquenched.

2. There is the difficulty of waiting—the need of patience. In a long illness, the first prostration seems not difficult to bear; let it continue, and the trial grows. It is the bearing of such continuous strain which is the test of patience. It is the same in all the trials of life, its burdens, its responsibilities—with the questions of doubt and hopelessness. The real character is shown by the way in which one endures a lengthened period of such trial. And for such endurance we need forethought.

III. We are told in this time of waiting to prepare to meet our God, to be patient, and to hope on, not to let the heart shrink back from what it has resolved. We are fed with the food of immortality washed in the cleansing Blood. Our faithful prayer is never counted vain. We are surrounded with companions in the race, and each year sets before us examples with a halo of truest witness. But all will depend on the waking heart. We are all together, seemingly one, till the end comes, and then the distinction of one from another will be seen in that awful light.—

T. T. CARTER, The Spirit of Watchfulness, p. 23.

OF DISCIPLINE.

'While the bridegroom tarried.'—MATTHEW XXV. 5.

OUR Lord coming into the world taught us that the value of the human nature which He assumed is not the value of the bodily power, or of the bare intelligence, but primarily of the spirit, which loves and chooses the highest, which rules all the other powers, and presents them to God. So when the Divine Word took our nature, His first movement in it was the giving of its whole value to God by the offering of His will—the faculty of loving and choosing the highest.

I. Christ gives to each of His members, by the Sacraments, the virtue of His Sacrifice, of His free self-giving to the Father in love. By the Eternal Spirit He offered Himself, and He gives us the same power and means of offering ourselves; and this is the reason for the tarrying of the Bridegroom; He is giving us time to learn the one business of life—discipline to train the human heart and will in the exercise of the grace of Christ, in the virtue of Sacrifice, in the self-giving to God. Naturally every fallen soul lives in itself, for itself. God saves it by giving to it a new nature. Christ Incarnate comes to be in it a new principle, a new life. But the will of each Christian has to assimilate that principle—to give itself up to that new life; and that requires time—time to learn to exercise its new movements, methods, mysteries, powers.

II. God sows in us the seed of the life of His dear Son, and gives us opportunities of exerting it, so that it may grow in us. This heavenly life sets us on our feet looking up to heaven, giving us a new upward impulse, to start us on our way to heaven. And at our first movement in that way we find at once something that opposes—difficulties within and without. Sometimes it is perplexing to a Christian to conceive why his way to God should be made so thorny, so dry and bare of sympathies and encouragements; at last he learns that those difficulties are not obstacles at all, but the very way and the only way for him to God; for it is those difficulties that teach him to look to God Himself as his end—and to God, not to any created means, as his only power of attaining God.

III. Our relation to God in Christ is the basis of Christian discipline. Acts of common courtesy need never be left to unreality; when they are done for Christ's sake they become discipline, they purify us from the selfishness of fallen nature, and nourish in us the nature of Christ on the throne of God.

The testing of love by delay and disappointment is the supreme test. Every experience of weariness will awaken a loyal will to look up, expect, and prepare for the coming of the Bridegroom.—G. CONGREVE, The Parable of the Ten Virgins, p. 88.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 5.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in a Religious House, vol. ii. p. 608. XXV. 5-8.—C. G. Lang, Church Times, vol. liii. 1905, p. 183. XXV. 5-9.—Henry Alford, Advent Sermons, p. 143. XXV. 6.—Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. ii. p. 93. Stopford A. Brooke, Short Sermons, p. 308. W. J. Knox-Little, Manchester Sermons, p. 105.

THE CRY OF THE AWAKENED SOUL

'Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out.'—MATTHEW XXV. 8.

THAT is the cry of the awakened soul as it rises to understand at a time of great need that all the resources that God has given it are wasted and spent. And the pathos of the cry is this, that many of these men in times of need call to their fellow-men, as the virgins in the parable did, thinking that out of the abundance of their lives their own wasted resources can be repaired.

I. The Cry.—In many ways that cry reaches our ears to-day. The man looks up at his friend and he says, 'You with your certainty of hope, you with your simplicity, you with your assurance, give me of that assurance, of that simplicity'. Or another says, 'I think of my own life harassed with its anxieties, oppressed with all its perplexities, and I ask you to give me of your calmness, of your peace'. Or we think again of some man who holds the faith of Jesus Christ in a narrow, in a hard, in an unloving spirit, and he comes to us and says, 'Give me of that power, and of that zeal; my faith has no power, my ideal no driving force. For the oil of the Spirit is being spent'.

II. The Refusal.—The pathos of it all is this, that this cry of our fellow-men must meet with a simple and blank refusal. For the cry is not from the men who do not believe, who have not been taught. They look up to the enthusiasm of Christ's Church, and they say, 'This we once had; can you not give it us back?' And our Lord says, and the experience of all life goes to show, that this cannot be done. 'Go and buy for yourselves.' The faith of Jesus Christ is not a thing which a man can believe on the word of a friend. The peace of Jesus Christ can never be gained by the mere infection of another's peace. Only as we buy these things for ourselves shall we find the peace of God 'which passeth all understanding,' the oil of the Spirit which never faileth.

III. What must the Church do?—And so in the face of this cry which reaches us from many quarters let us ask ourselves what the Church has got to do. We of the Church have got to make the light that God has given us glow with such clear and distinct force that men shall realize that what is possible for us is possible also for them. Our human nature is meant to be a lamp through which the light of the Spirit shall gleam upon the darkness of the earth—not the lurid light of passion or the chill disturbed flicker of selfishness, but the steady clear flame of the Holy Spirit. What was it that stirred men as they watched the life of Jesus Christ on earth? It was a possibility which they had never suspected before—the possibility of a pure and untainted humanity through which, as from a lamp, streamed out the light of God. And I, too, must make my lamp so transcendently pure that the man whose faith is dying will say, 'That which you have, tell me where I can get it, so that I may get it for myself'.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 8.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 181. J. Henderson, Sermons, p. 311. A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, vol. iv. p. 214.

'But the wise answered, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you.'—MATTHEW XXV. 9.

ALL experienced wrestlers with fate and fortune know well that success has often, at the critical time, depended upon some very trifling advantage which the slightest diminution of power would have lost to them. No one knows the full immensity of the difference between having power enough to make a little headway against obstacles, and just falling short of the power which is necessary at the time. In every great intellectual career there are situations like that of a steamer with a storm-wind directly against her and an iron-bound coast behind. If the engines are strong enough to gain an inch an hour she is safe, but if they lose there is no hope.—P. G. HAMERTON, The Intellectual Life, p. 22.

'And the door was shut.'—MATTHEW XXV. 10.

COMPARE Tennyson's well-known song, 'Late, late so late,' in 'Guinevere'.

It is a matter of frequent remark, that bad systems are destroyed, not when they are at their worst, but when they are in the process of an attempted reform. Witness the French monarchy at the Revolution, compared with its state under Louis XV. The reason of this seems to be that the reform is forced on by a change in public opinion which goes forward at an accelerated rate, faster than the reform can be effected. If the improvement could be made freely from within, it might still be in time. There is the same difference in the individual between a forced restitution which has no merit in it, and a genuine, spontaneous, repentance. Some have concluded that it is better not to reform, since Providence and history seem against it; but the true lesson is, Reform in time; Providence and history have their 'Too late.'—DA. KER, Thoughts for Heart and Life, p. 41.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 10.—H. P. Liddon, Advent in St. Paul's, p. 460. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 189. XXV. 10-13.—Henry Alford, Advent Sermons, p. 166. XXV. 11.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 288. XXV. 11-13.—Gordon Calthrop, Penny Pulpit, vol. xii. No. 686, p. 161. XXV. 13.—Stopford A. Brooke, Short Sermons, p. 299. Phillips Brooks, The Law of Growth, p. 30. F. Y. Leggatt, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 280.

THE USE OF TALENTS

'The kingdom of heaven is as a man travelling into a far country, who called his own servants, and delivered unto them his goods. And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability; and straightway took his journey.'—MATTHEW XXV. 14, 15.

HERE is a parable of our blessed Lord's which has practically added a word to human language, and furnished a living protest against human self-sufficiency. A talented man is not so much the man who is largely equipped for self-display, as one to whom much is given, and of whom much will be required.

I. Notice that this parable, although tending to the same end, is different to the parable of the Virgins, wherewith it is closely associated. There, we are allowed to see certain difficulties which beset those who wait for their Lord; here, we have to consider the responsibilities of those who work for Him.

What a real lesson we should have learned if we could realize that life is a vocation, not a scramble for prizes, that we are called to God, not merely to work, that so much health, so much time, so much resource, so much wisdom, so much money, yes, so much ill-health, so much want of money, so to speak, so much distress, are all put into our hands by God for the development of His work. Then we should be able to understand that feeling which prompted Archbishop Benson to say to a friend, who was knocking off with his stick the luxuriant brambles which were running over the top of the green hedge in the country lane, 'Don't do that, it is breaking the third commandment'. For all the green things of the earth belong to God.

And we do well to notice that the talents as they came from God were unequally distributed; once more the good things of this life are not a rich prize in which all ought to have an equal share, but one work has to be done by many agents, each equipped for the particular department which falls to his lot. True it is that each man receives his endowment according to his capacity. Some of these inequalities of capacity came from God Himself, some are brought about by human neglect, for some the man is himself responsible.

II. We gather further from this parable that the talents which God distributes are not like precious curiosities to be kept in a museum and presented to Him again intact, but there is a mention of trading and bankers and interest, which all point to a continual and profitable investment of Divine endowments.

There are many bankers ready to trade with the five talents and the two, and to develop them and even to double them, but not in the currency of heaven, or in schemes which the Lord when He comes will recognize. It will be a sad thing, if we find that the intellect which was given us that we might develop the world for God, and prepare the way for Christ, has been spent in rearing up the love of self in self-advancement. It is so hard to remember God, and to balance this sense of proprietorship which belongs to 'My own,' with the sense of responsibility which belongs to 'His goods'. Hence we see the practical value of religion, to warn us and remind us of an absent Master.

III. But the main interest of the teaching of the parable centres after all on the man who had received one talent, and miserably failed in his duty of trading with it.

We all know the careless possessor of one talent, who absolutely does no good in the world, who eats and drinks and does his monotonous drudgery without life or interest, who comes into the world unknown, who passes through it unnoticed, and dies undesired, angry with God, grumbling at circumstances, dissatisfied with himself. What little work he has done has ended in this, in sullenness, in gloom, in selfishness, in sensuality, in despair: he has been engaged all his life in burying his one talent. And when his Lord comes he stands empty and barehanded before Him.

And yet what a gift it is, this one talent, which he so thanklessly misuses. What a privilege it is even to live at all, what a privilege to be a Christian, what a privilege to have opportunities of being useful to one single being in God's universe.—W. C. E. NEWBOLT, Words of Exhortation, p. 181.

Illustration.—In building a great cathedral there is some master-mind, and then are employed variously endowed craftsmen, down to the day-labourer, all equally necessary to the completion of the design. We do not need artists to dig foundations, nor masons to do the work of carvers. Some have five talents, some have two, and some have one, but all work at one design.—W. C. E. NEWBOLT, Words of Exhortation, p. 186.

USEFUL MEDIOCRITY (The Parable of the Talents)

MATTHEW XXV. 14-30.

TAKING a man's talents to represent the sum of his abilities, opportunities, and privileges, let us see what we can learn from a consideration of the character and work of the man who had two talents. The servants who had one and five talents bestowed upon them could doubtless teach us much; each is a typical and representative character. But it will suffice now if we limit our meditation to the servant who was entrusted with two talents. He is the man who stands between the highest and the lowest. He was not so liberally dealt with as the man above him with five talents; but on the other hand, he has twice as much granted to him as the man below him with only one talent. This servant with the two talents stands as the representative of the mediocre man, the man whose abilities and opportunities are neither so many as some others enjoy, nor so few as multitudes have to be contented with. Such a man's character and work are worthy of study.

Consider:—

I. The Numerousness of men with two talents. They constitute the majority of mankind. This is true as regards the possession of intellectual gifts. Men of distinct genius are few. Five talents in this respect have been granted but now and then, here and there. Shakespeare in literature, Raphael in art, Chrysostom in the pulpit, Newton in science, Edison in invention—such as these are five-talented men, and how rarely such brilliant stars appear in the crowded firmament of life!

For few may wield the power
Whose spells uplift or thrill;
The barrier, fixed yet fine,
We may not cross at will.

And on the other hand, among normal men and women, the one-talented are comparatively few.

So again in regard to opportunities. Take, for example, opportunities of influencing others. A few people have wide scope and weighty chances. The popular preacher who attracts a congregation numbered by thousands; the statesman who, when he speaks, addresses a listening empire; the successful writer whose books march out of publishers' establishments in battalions—such as these are men of five talents, so far as influence is concerned; and they are not a multitude. Contrasting with them are the people whose circle of associates is limited. The lonely settler in a new colony who scarce sees a neighbour's face once in a month; the sailor who can meet only the same dozen shipmates each day during a long voyage; the invalid imprisoned in the sickroom—all such have but one talent in the way of influence. But the mass of mankind come under none of these categories. They are ordinary human beings, meeting with and influencing an average number of people; in this respect they have two talents.

Take again the matter of advantages. We think naturally of the advantage of wealth, and the same truth holds good. Millionaires—men of five talents in regard to wealth—are rare. To most men Agur's desire has been granted; they have neither poverty nor riches. The great middle class, people of two talents in the matter of wealth, are the strength of the nation and of the Church. So in regard to the advantage of education. A small number are privileged to go through a university career, and not many nowadays are absolutely illiterate. Most people have just two talents, so far as educational advantages are concerned. And in every department and sphere of life the same truth can be demonstrated; two-talented men constitute by far the largest section of humanity.

Consider:—

II. The Temptations of the two-talented man. Now, to test and try his servants was the evident purpose of the 'lord' who distributed the talents; and the testing for the man with two talents would come both from the servant above him, with five talents, and the servant below him with one. The two-talented servant would be tempted to be envious of the man with five talents. And it is this temptation to envy and covetousness to which the mediocre man is always exposed. He is tempted to murmur as he looks around him: 'If only I had A's intellectual gifts, what would I not do! If only I had B's opportunities! If only I had C's wealth! In a word, if only I had five talents instead of these contemptible two—what a furore I would make in the world!' Now, all such cankerous envy must be resolutely evicted from the mind of the two-talented man. The last commandment of the decalogue has an application for all who are thus moderately endowed. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's—talents.

III. The Value of the man with two talents. Such verily are the backbone of the Church and society.

Let the army of the two-talented, therefore, do their duty and exercise their gifts, even if they are conscious that theirs are only mediocre powers; for it would be disastrous, indeed, if such withdrew from service and hid their Lord's money. 'Occupy till I come,' is the Master's word.—HERBERT WINDROSS, The Life Victorious, p. 97.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 14, 15.—Lyman Abbott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 99. Eugene Bersier, Sermons, p. 1. B. W. Randolph, Church Times, vol. liv. 1905, p. 188. XXV. 14, 30.—C. Gordon Lang, Thoughts on Some of the Parables of Jesus, p. 103. B. W. Maturin, Practical Studies on the Parables of Our Lord, p. 156. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 195. G. Philip, Home in the World Beyond, p. 19. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2643. XXV. 16-18.—Eugene Bersier, Sermons, p. 11.

'He that had received one went and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money.'—MATTHEW XXV. 18.

WHEN Sir Philip Sidney was frittering away his powers in vain dreams and court life, his noble old friend, Languet, strove to recall him to the responsibilities of statesmanship for which he was so singularly fitted. 'Think not that God endowed you with parts so excellent to the end that you should let them rot in leisure. Rather hold firmly that He requires more from you than from those to whom He has been less liberal of talents. . . . Nature has adorned you with the richest gifts of mind and body; fortune with noble blood and wealth and splendid family connexions; and you from your first boyhood have cultivated your intellect by those studies which are most helpful to men in their struggle after virtue. Will you then refuse your energies to your country, when it demands them? Will you bury that distinguished talent God has given you?'

'After a long time the lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them.'—MATTHEW XXV. 19.

THE more we advance in knowledge, the more we shall come to judge men in the spirit of the parable of the talents; that is by the net result of their lives, by their essential unselfishness, by the degree in which they employ and the objects to which they direct their capacities and opportunities.—W. E. H. LECKY.

WITH all sublunary entities, this is the question of questions. What talent is born to you? How do you employ that?—CARLYLE.

REFERENCE.—XXV. 19.—C. Gore, Church Times, vol. xlii. 1899, p. 693; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 371.

'He that had received five talents came and brought other five talents.'—MATTHEW XXV. 20.

COMPARE the fifth chapter of Law's Serious Call.

THE FACT OF FAITHFULNESS

'Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things. I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'—MATTHEW XXV. 21.

ACCORDING to the measurements of Jesus, we are face to face here with a test of character. It is in faithfulness that men are great; it is in unfaithfulness that they are weak.

One of the latest critics of Shakespeare, Professor Bradley, insists upon the faithfulness of Shakespeare. It is the fidelity of Shakespeare, in a mind of extraordinary power, he says, that has really made Shakespeare what he is.

I. Our Lord Recognizes that Faithfulness Calls for Courage.—It is significant that the man who hid his talent said to his lord, 'I was afraid'. In trading there was a certain risk, as in all commerce, I suppose there is a certain risk, and the man with the one talent was unfaithful because he had not the courage for that venture.

II. Our Lord Makes Faithfulness the Road to Power.—'Because thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee a ruler over many things.' God's rewards grow out of the struggle that we wage, as the fruit of the autumn grows from the flower of spring. 'Because thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things.' It is because one is the outflow of the other, as is the burn of the spring among the heather. It is because, as flower from the bud, influence blossoms from fidelity.

III. Christ Associates Faithfulness With Joy.—To the faithful servant came this benediction: 'Enter thou into the joy of Thy Lord'. It is not success and joy, it is not fame and joy; it is not these that are joined in our Lord's teaching, but faithfulness and joy. These are the bride and bridegroom and the marriage mystical of our Lord.

Then look at the doom of the unfaithful servant; it is outer darkness and wailing and gnashing of teeth. A man who is unfaithful is always moving nightwards. He has been false to the light God gave him for his journey; and the man who has been unfaithful, when the day is done, what can he look for but remorse and tears?—G. H. MORRISON, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXIV. p. 373.

THE GIFT OF RULE

'I will make thee ruler.'—MATTHEW XXV. 21.

THIS is the word of Christ to the good and faithful servants who at last behold His face in righteousness. He does not say, 'I will give thee many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord'. The promise is, 'I will make thee ruler,' and the joy of our Lord is not in possessing, but in governing.

I. It must be premised that the New Jerusalem—that is, perfect blessedness—lies beyond death. With many social reformers all that is needed would seem to be a steady, universal bien-être, always to be dependent and relied upon. But this could only become happiness if the affections were deadened. Christianity quickens them for the very purpose of revealing man's true nature—of delivering him from a base serfdom to the actual and the material. Were it otherwise, his dignity would be ignobly misprized, for the measure of a man is the measure of an angel.

Over against mere possession Christ sets the great idea of rulership. Take leisure, for example. We are in the thick of a righteous movement for shorter hours. But suppose the day is reduced to half an hour, what profit is there if the man is not ruler over his leisure? Multitudes possess leisure; very few of them rule it. The idler wakens to wonder how his day is to be got through, and the answer often comes from beneath. The general dullness and listlessness of men with no occupation has passed into a proverb. Even generous natures often become selfish under this trial. It will be an evil day if working men learn to despise labour. The great safeguard for nearly all of us is to be found in almost unrelaxed industry. It is pernicious also to despise certain forms of labour. Utopia itself will need scavengers. But 'I will make thee ruler over leisure' is a great promise to be perfectly fulfilled on high, where endless service means endless rest.

II. What is to be sought is not possession but rulership, and that can be gained only by faithfulness over a few things.

'Faithful over a few things.' In a sense this describes truly the life which began in the manger and ended on the cross. It is still the schooling, and the only schooling, by which men learn to rule their own spirits and all kingdoms whose thrones they climb.

The fulfilment of the promise takes various forms. We are familiar with it in this life. We see men go on from strength to strength, receiving more and more, and remaining unmastered by their possession. But before Christ all earthly life, even the most victorious, is but a passage from a 'few things' to a 'few things'. The distinctions we make here may but pain Him; but 'if that life is life, this is but a breath'.

Inasmuch as no misdoing robs us of all, a man may begin faithfulness at the lowest point of poverty and shame, and be made ruler at last. Our God is the God of Resurrection, and He can revive men and nations of men from seemingly utter death.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, Ten Minute Sermons, p. 267.

WHAT IS THE JOY OF OUR LORD?

'Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'—MATTHEW XXV. 21.

WE know what His sorrow was. 'How often would I have gathered thy children . . . and ye would not.' What was His joy? When in the end He welcomes those who have been faithful to their trust, He says, 'Well done . . . enter thou into the joy of thy Lord'. His praise has been generously bestowed through the failures of this life, and even in the humblest judgment the redeemed soul ever passed on itself, it has not been without a trembling consciousness of His broader love. Nor have His people—even when they saw Him not—been left without joy, joy unspeakable and full of glory. But He speaks of a joy after death to which they had hitherto been strangers, a joy into which they would enter as into a home, and which would fold itself around them. It was to be His own joy. Anything He did not share would be nothing to them. How poor the promise would be, 'He that overcometh shall inherit all things,' if it ended there. The possession of many things leaves the heart empty; how should the possession of all things enrich it? But when it goes on, 'And I will be his God, and he shall be My son,' the words fall upon the soul like a shower of strength.

What then is that joy which is the last guerdon of the ransomed? He explains it Himself. 'I will make thee ruler over many things.' It is the joy of ruling. 'To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me on My throne.' In these and in many words like them, He answers a deep instinct and craving by imparting the sweet and wonderful secret of His purpose.

I. It was His own joy in the world. When He leant back upon God and communed with His own heart, He said, 'The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into His hand'. Power is the special gift of love, and He had received it. 'Thou sayest that I am a king.' For a certain misnamed kingship He did not seek. He would have none of it. When they sought to make Him a king by force, He departed into a mountain Himself alone. Rank and rule in this world He rejected; He would suffer neither men, nor even His twelve legions of angels, to crown Him on an earthly throne. The only kingdom He cared to rule over was a kingdom of kings, and He gives His subjects the promise of a throne.

II. This joy of our Lord is reserved in its fullness for the other life. Here His people fight the battle within themselves. With the great simplicity of revelation, St. James tells us the source of all disquiet, from the meanest brawl to world-shaking war. 'From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of the lusts that war in your members?' The soul is peaceless till the will rules every other power, and till that will is Christ within. The true kings unto God have known this so well that they have hardly asked for any other dominion. And so they have often for the time been obscure, and apparently without influence. They have been thwarted and enclosed. As McLeod Campbell said of his friend A. J. Scott, 'How mysteriously God seemed to be at the same time increasing his light and withholding from placing it on a candlestick'. But our Lord said, 'Your time is always ready; My time is not yet come.'

III. The saints marvel when the kingdom comes to them. 'When saw we Thee an hungred, and gave Thee meat?' Yet in this way—the old and perfect way which Christ has taught His own—they arrive at their dominion. The meek shall inherit the earth. It must be so. Meekness wears everything else out, and is as meek at last in its triumph as when stripped and dispossessed. There is a magic in gentleness of which even the heathen dreamt when they imagined Osiris going forth to conquer the world, not with chariots and horses, but with music. Love which has not vaunted herself, has not sought her own; love which has borne all things, believed all things, hoped all things, must in the end inherit all things.

The saints shall reign with Christ and be partakers of His kingly joy. Little as they may dwell on it, the thought passes often through their hearts like a song in the night. For the promise means that one day their light will be all clear; that it will be set on high till its last ray travels to its period; that there will be nothing to limit or obscure its force.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, Ten Minute Sermons, p. 145.

'I will make thee ruler over many things.'—MATTHEW XXV. 21. 'My idea of heaven,' said Tennyson, 'is the perpetual ministry of one soul to another.'

IN his Christmas paper for 1711 (Spectator, No. 257), Addison closes a discussion on praise and fame with the reminder that God alone can fitly reward our virtues. Then he adds: 'Let the ambitious man therefore turn all his desire of fame this way; and, that he may prepare to himself a fame worthy of his ambition, let him consider that if he employs his abilities to the best advantage, the time will come when the Supreme Governor of the world, the great Judge of mankind, who sees every degree of perfection in others, and possesses all possible perfection in Himself, shall proclaim his work before men and angels, and pronounce to him in the presence of the whole creation that best and most significant of applauses: Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into thy Master's joy.'

MACAULAY describes a conversation he once had with Lady Holland, in which the word talents was mentioned. 'I said that it had first appeared in theological writing, that it was a metaphor taken from the parable in the New Testament, that it had gradually passed from the vocabulary of Divinity into common use. I challenged her to find it in any classical writer on general subjects before the Restoration, or even before the year 1700. I believe that I might safely have gone down later. She seemed surprised by this theory, never having, so far as I could judge, heard of the parable of the Talents. I did not tell her, though I might have done so, that a person who professes to be a critic in the delicacies of the English language ought to have the Bible at his fingers' ends.'

REFERENCES.—XXV. 21.—H. C. G. Moule, The Secret of the Presence, p. 194. J. H. Jowett, Meditations for Quiet Moments, p. 98. S. Martin, Comfort in Trouble, p. 215. J. Guinness Rogers, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 65. G. G. Bradley, ibid. vol. lix. 1901, p. 68. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 301. T. Sadler, Sunday Thoughts, p. 165. Ch. New, The Baptism of the Spirit, p. 289. M. R. Vincent, God and Bread, p. 117. XXV. 22, 23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 175.

THE DIVINE ACCEPTANCE

'Well done, good and faithful servant; . . . enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'—MATTHEW XXV. 23.

I. IN every period or crisis of life the imperative claims of God, of righteousness, of truth, are forced upon us. God calls us in a way that can only be answered in self-dedication and earnest work. Obedience is shown as the salvation of life. In self-surrender we find God and live.

If our souls are awake, faithful, and loving, 'all that we experience is a communication' of God's will, which is His love for us, ever reaching out to draw us to Himself, to guide, to control us.

Life under the cheering control of this love of God is full of powers for work, for sacrifice, for learning; it is full of a deeply contenting encouragement at every turn, in every development of life; for God's approval becomes at once the reason and the reward of what we try to do, a fact that sustains courage, a felt benediction that will keep us calm and steadfast in days of conflict.

'Apart from Me ye can do nothing.' All that we do is a part of the mighty working of the Incarnate life of Jesus.

II. The call of God, obedience in self-dedication and in work, the sacrifice of self—we cannot understand these or be ready for them, they will seem but a mistake, an illusion, a folly, unless the reality of the Divine acceptance be, as it were, their interpretation, their sanction, their inspiration. In other words, the love of God must satisfy the soul that it claims, must inspire the obedience that it commands, it must prepare and accept the sacrifice that it requires, it must fill the life that is emptied for its sake. And it does all this. For love is constituted the beginning and the end, the law and the interpretation, the principle and the fulfilment of life in relation to God.

III. The great reality of love, to be felt and understood in all thought and work, through every act of faith and will, is the life of Jesus in us.

If thus you live, realizing manifoldly the life of the Christ in you, all you do will bear healthfully on the lives of others; from you they will learn their needed lessons of truth; through your influence will be ministered grace which they have scarcely learned to desire or to ask. Therefore act towards them in the consciousness of the love of God, reflect the light in which you live, by letting the peace and the love of God rule in your hearts always. Without this consciousness of relation to Him life must be a failure. With it, life is glad, fruitful and blessed.—G. BRETT, Fellowship With God, p. 44.

'Well done, good and faithful servant.'—MATTHEW XXV. 23. THE noblest thing a man can do is first humbly to receive, and then to go amongst others and give. I've not been able to give much. It's because I have received so little. And if there is anything in which I would be inclined to contradict Him, it would be if I heard Him say, 'Well done, good and faithful servant'.—DR. JOHN DUNCAN.

'YOUTH,' says Mr. Stevenson in his essay on Old Mortality, 'cannot bear to have come for so little, and to go again so wholly. He cannot bear, above all, in that brief scene, to be still idle, and by way of cure, neglects the little that he has to do.' The parable of the talents is the brief epitome of youth. 'To believe in immortality is one thing, but it is first needful to believe in life.'

REFERENCES.—XXV. 23.—H. E. Ryle, On Holy Scriptures and Criticism, p. 139. Eugene Bernier, Sermons, p. 285.

WHY THE TALENT WAS BURIED

'Then he which had received the one talent came and said, Lord, I knew Thee that Thou art an hard man, reaping where Thou hast not sown, and gathering where I have not strawed: and I was afraid, and went and hid Thy talent in the earth.'—MATTHEW XXV. 24, 25.

I. CONSIDER the slander here and the truth that contradicts it.

'I knew Thee that Thou art an hard man,' says he, 'reaping where Thou hast not sown' (and he was standing with the unused talent in his hand all the while), 'and gathering where Thou hast not strawed.' That is to say, deep down in many a heart, that has never said as much to itself, there lies this black drop of gall—a conception of the Divine character rather as demanding than as giving, a thought of Him as exacting.

It is not difficult to understand why such a thought of God should rise in a heart which has no delight in Him nor in His service. There is a side to the truth as to God's relations to man which gives a colour of plausibility to the slander. Grave and stringent requirements are made by the Divine law upon each of us; and our consciences tell us that they have not been kept. Therefore, we seek to persuade ourselves that they are too severe.

What is the truth that smites this slander to death? That God is perfect, pure, unmingled, infinite love. And what is love? The infinite desire to impart itself. The Cross of Christ is the answer to the slander, and the revelation of the giving God.

II. Mark here the fear that dogs such a thought, and the love that casts out the fear.

'I was afraid!' If a man is not a fool, his emotions follow his thoughts, and his thoughts ought to shape his emotions. And wherever there is the twilight of uncertainty upon the great lesson that the Cross of Jesus Christ has taught us, there there will be, however masked and however modified by other thoughts, deep in the human heart a perhaps unspoken but not, therefore, ineffectual dread of God. Some of you remember the awful words in one of Shakespeare's plays: 'Now I, to comfort him, bid him he should not think of God. I hoped there was no need to trouble himself with any such thoughts yet.' What does that teach us? 'I knew Thee that Thou art an hard man; and I was afraid.'

The only way to get perfect love that casts out fear is to be quite sure of the Father-love in heaven that begets it. And the only way to be sure of the Infinite love in the heavens that kindles some little spark of love in our hearts here is to go to Christ and learn the lesson that He reveals to us at His Cross.

III. Mark the torpor of fear and the activity of love. 'I was afraid, and I went and hid Thy talent in the earth.'

Fear paralyses service, cuts the nerves of activity, makes a man refuse obedience to God. Love moves to action, fear paralyses into indolence.—A. MACLAREN, The Unchanging Christ, p. 72.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 24.—J. T. Parr, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 185. XXV. 24, 25.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII., p. 205. T. G. Selby, The Holy Spirit and Christian Privilege, p. 251. Stopford A. Brooke, Short Sermons, p. 182. XXV. 24, 25, 26.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. I. 1896, p. 168. XXV. 24-27.—C. G. Lang, Church Times, vol. liii. 1905, p. 286.

'I was afraid.'—MATTHEW XXV. 25.

You see I am dying, but I am not despondent; the Lord will set down that to my credit. I have bothered Him, the Most Gracious One, with jests only, never with moans and complaints! . . . Know this, not he is holy who hides himself from sin and lies calm. With cowardice you cannot defend yourself against sin; thus also says the parable of the Talents.—MAXIM GORKY, The Man who was Afraid, chap. xiii.

BETTER to try all things and find all empty, than to try nothing and leave your life a blank. To do this is to commit the sin of him who buried his talent in a napkin—despicable sluggard.—CHARLOTTE BRONTË, Shirley, chap. xxiii.

ONE of Dr. Johnson's own prayers in early life, as he began the second volume of his Dictionary, was: 'O God, who hast hitherto supported me, enable me to proceed in this labour, and in the whole task of my present state; that when I shall render up at the last day an account of the talent committed to me, I may receive pardon, for the sake of Jesus Christ.'

UNLESS the unsophisticated instincts of mankind are very far astray, our deepest gratitude is due not to the pure and sinless, but to the greatly daring and the strongly-doing—not to the monk in his convent or the ascetic on his pillar, but to the warrior in a good cause, to the adventurer in a grand enterprise, to the labourer in a noble work. 'I cannot' (says Milton) 'praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue that never sallies out and sees its adversary, but slinks out of the race where the immortal garland is to be run for—not without dust and heat.' A greater than Milton has comforted us by the assurance that much is forgiven to those who love much; that the active service of men (which is charity) covers a multitude of sins, and is more and loftier than creeds; and that the talent laid up in a white napkin and so scrupulously kept out of harm's way, reaps no praise and bears no fruit; while the talent that is made to fructify in commerce, in administration, or otherwise, earns wealth first and recompense and honour afterwards.—W. RATHBONE GREG.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 25.—J. H. Jowett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 120. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ii. p. 181.

'Thou knowest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strawed.'—MATTHEW XXV. 26.

THE meaning of the parable, heard with ears unbesotted, is this: 'You, among hard and unjust men, yet suffer their claim to the return of what they never gave; you suffer them to reap, where they have not strawed. But to me the Just Lord of your life—whose is the breath in your nostrils, whose the fire in your blood, who gave you light and thought, and the fruit of earth and the dew of heaven—to me, of all this gift, will you return no fruit but only the dust of your bodies, and the wreck of your souls?’—RUSKIN, Fors Clavigera, LIII.

IN R. L. Stevenson's address to the Samoan chiefs, on the occasion of the opening of the road they had made, out of gratitude to him, he referred to this parable of the Talents, asking them what they had done with their island, and reminding them that 'God has both sown and strawed for you here in Samoa; He has given you a rich soil, a splendid sun, copious rain; all is ready to your hand, half done, and I repeat to you that thing which is sure; if you do not occupy and use your country, others will. It will not continue to be yours and your children's if you occupy it for nothing. You and your children will in that case be cast out into outer darkness, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth; for that is the law of God, which passeth not away. I who speak to you have seen these things. I have seen them with my eyes, these judgments of God.' After referring to Ireland and Hawaii, the speaker went on to urge the use of their opportunities. 'Now is the time for the true champions of Samoa to stand forth. And who is the true champion of Samoa? It is not the man who blackens his face, and cuts down trees, and kills pigs and wounded men. It is the man who makes roads, who plants good trees, who gathers harvests, and is a profitable servant before the Lord, using and improving that great talent that has been given him in trust.'

REFERENCES.—XXV. 27.—M. R. Vincent, Christian World Pulpit, vol. II. 1897, p. 236. XXV. 28, 29.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. I. 1896, p. 184.

THE LAW OF THE LIFE OF GRACE

'Unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath.'—MATTHEW XXV. 29.

'Unto him that hath, to him shall be given,' faith to the faithful, strength to the strong.

I. When the parable of the Sower had been spoken, it seemed that the listening multitude had not quite understood it. Their spiritual faculties were not developed as they might have been, had they been duly exercised on the revelation that had already been given. And so, although the kingdom of God was among them, they saw it not. Nor were they forced to see it. For God reveals Himself to men by degrees only as they are able to respond to His grace. The higher gift is only given to those by whom the lower gift has been used.

Slowly must the secret be learnt, but it can be learnt still. 'To him that hath, to him is given.' Those who survive and profit by discipline are those by whom the discipline is gladly embraced. It is not only in the kingdom of nature, not only in the course of human society, that the adaptation of self to surroundings, the quick seizing of opportunity, the tenacious grasp of each new faculty as it is gained, are necessary conditions of growth, progress, survival; this is also true of the kingdom of grace.

If we find within ourselves no response to the higher truths of the Christian creeds, it may well be because we have not appropriated or lived by the plain words of Jesus Christ.

II. 'From strength to strength.' That is in our text too. For the Lord applied the words of the text, not only to the reception of spiritual truth, but to the use of opportunity in all the details of life. They concern practice as well as theory. The words follow the parable of the Sower; they also sum up the lesson of the parable of the Talents. There is such a thing as over-confidence in the spiritual life. But diffidence, too, may be a sin, if it be the source of neglect of duty. It was a saying of Archbishop Whately that the two things often go together. Most men are inclined to over-estimate their own natural gifts, their talents, but at the same time to under-estimate their opportunities, their influence for good or for evil.

Use of opportunity brings increased power; its neglect ends in loss of power. That is the law of the spiritual as of the physical world; and the parable of the Talents seems to warn us that the consequences of such use or neglect are not confined to this side of the grave.—J. H. BERNARD, Via Domini, p. 251.

THE TENURE OF TRUTH

'Unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath.'—MATTHEW XXV. 29.

I. THE first half of the verse asserts that unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance, or in other words that in the case of every man who has, his property shall not remain stationary, but certainly grow. As this is not a result that follows as a matter of course from the mere fact of possession, it is evident the solution of the saying depends on the sort of possession described by the word 'hath'. Everything is held by a tenure corresponding to itself.

It is evident we cannot be said to have made a truth our own till we have made it part of ourselves. Otherwise it remains separate from us, and our connexion with it is uncertain and precarious. A man whose sincerity is assumed or put on, and not an integral portion of himself, may very probably put it off, and act deceitfully under the pressure of some passing temptation.

In order to bring about such an assimilation or fusion of one thing with another, there must be at least a potential likeness or congeniality of character between them. Religion is invested with a new character, because it is pervaded by a new purpose—its purpose being to bring us into sympathy with Christ, and to make that sympathy so powerful and complete that it shall bring our whole lives into unison with His.

The second characteristic of spiritual possession is that whatsoever a man has in this way he uses. This is plainly set forth in the parable to which my text is appended. The man who has the truth is the man who has made it one with himself, and gives evidence of this by acting it out or using it in his daily life. Anyone else has only the semblance of possession.

II. Consider the consequences that follow from this 'having' and 'not having' respectively.

It is a law of nature as well as of grace that whoever makes a thing work—that is, uses it according to its nature—will get out of it an ample compensation and reward for his pains. So then, if you have the truth it will multiply itself in your hands. Do not be disappointed that you cannot always measure your progress, nor see the store you have in hand growing visibly under your eyes. Disappointments are but the rough places in the road that leads on to fulfilment.

In the last words of the verse our Lord refers to a process which is exactly the reverse of that which I have been describing. It is the experience of the man who 'hath not,' or as St. Luke puts it, only 'seemeth to have,' and eventually loses his possession. This refers to those who have never received or used the truth, however familiar they may be with its terms. If you persist in refusing obedience to Christ now, you are surely rendering yourself less and less capable of ever yielding it at any time. The whole array of motions that act upon the will must gradually lose their intensity. Finally, you will become stiffened into a fixed posture of unbelief. Not that you will have openly dismissed the thought of redemption from your mind, or withdrawn your recognition of the Divinity of Christ, but you will have made yourself morally incapable of accepting Him and the vast revolution which that would imply over the whole region of inveterate habit.—C. MOINET, The Great Alternative, p. 85.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 29.—M. G. Glazebrook, Prospect, p. 11. A. MacRae, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 69. XXV. 31, 32.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ix. p. 157. B. F. Westcott, The Historic Faith, p. 87. XXV. 31, 33.—George Salmon, Gnosticism and Agnosticism, p. 311. H. J. Coleridge, The Return of the King, p. 302. XXV. 31-36.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 671. XXV. 31-40.—R. W. Dale, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 132. R. Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven, p. 181. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 213.

'And He shall separate the nations one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats.'—MATTHEW XXV. 32.

'I've got a religion of my own,' says an American Methodist woman in Mr. Harold Frederic's Illumination, 'and it's got just one plank in it, and that is, that the time to separate the sheep from the goats is on Judgment Day, and that it can't be done a minute before.'

'That is a passage,' says Zachariah Coleman in The Revolution in Tanner's Lane, 'that I never could quite understand. I never, hardly, see a pure-breed, either of goat or sheep. I never see anybody who deserves to go straight to heaven or who deserves to go straight to hell. When the Judgment Day comes, it will be a difficult task.'

REFERENCE.—XXV. 32.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1234.

'He shall set the sheep on His right hand, but the goats on the left.'—MATTHEW XXV. 33.

JOHNSON: A man may have such a degree of hope as to keep him quiet. You see I am not quiet, from the vehemence with which I talk; but I do not despair. Mrs. ADAMS: You seem, sir, to forget the merits of our Redeemer. JOHNSON: Madam, I do not forget the merits of our Redeemer; but my Redeemer has said that He will set some on His right hand and some on His left.—BOSWELL's Life of Johnson.

'Come, ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you.'—MATTHEW XXV. 34.

EVERY word full of life and joy. 'Come':—this is the holding forth of the golden sceptre to warrant our approach unto this glory. Come, now, as near as you will. This is not such a 'come' as we were wont to hear, 'Come, take up your cross, and follow Me'. Though that was sweet, yet this much more.—RICHARD BAXTER.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 34.—J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 81. F. E. Paget, The Living and the Dead, p. 325. XXV. 35.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1757. XXV. 37.—John Watson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 273.

'Lord, when saw we Thee an hungred, and fed Thee? . . . Lord, when saw we Thee an hungred, and did not minister unto Thee?'—MATTHEW XXV. 37, 44.

THE elect will be ignorant of their virtues, and the reprobate of the greatness of their crimes.—PASCAL.

It is noticeable how Christian morals differ from the morals of Christ, that we continually hear, as if of a specially meritorious thing, of 'seeing Christ' in the poor. But Christ Himself represents the blessed as being extremely surprised when He identifies Himself with the poor. Clearly these 'blessed of the Father' had helped the poor for the poor's sake, not for any others' sake.—F. P. COBBE.

IN Miriam's Schooling, Mr. Hale White describes how the heroine's brother fell ill in London lodgings, and required incessant nursing. 'To her surprise, her landlady instantly offered to share the duty with her. A rude, stout, hard person she was, who stood in the shop all day long, winter and summer, amidst the potatoes and firewood, with a woollen shawl round her neck and over her shoulders. A rude, stout, hard person, we say, was Mrs. Joll, fond of her beer, rather grimy, given to quarrel a little with her husband, could use strong language at times, had the defects which might be supposed to arise from constant traffic with the inhabitants of the Borough, and was utterly unintelligent so far as book learning went. Nevertheless, she was well read in departments more important perhaps than books in the conduct of human life, and in her there was the one thing needful—the one thing which, if ever there is to be a Judgment Day, will put her on the right hand; when all sorts of scientific people, religious people, students of poetry, people with exquisite emotions, will go on the left and be damned everlastingly.'

COMPARE also Dr. Guthrie's account of how 'John Pounds, a cobbler in Portsmouth, taking pity on the multitude of poor ragged children left by ministers and magistrates, and ladies and gentlemen, to go to ruin on the streets—how, like a good shepherd, he gathered in these wretched outcasts—how he had trained them to God and to the world; and how, while earning his daily bread by the sweat of his brow, he had rescued from misery and saved to society not less than five hundred of these children. . . . When the day comes when honour will be done to whom honour is due, I can fancy the crowd of those whose fame poets have sung, and to whose memory monuments have been raised, dividing like the wave, and, passing the great and the noble and the mighty of the land, this poor, obscure old man stepping forward and receiving the especial notice of Him who said, "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, ye did it also to Me".'

THE SOLIDARITY OF MAN AND GOD

'Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me.'—MATTHEW XXV. 40.

It is frequently pointed out that the sense of sin is decreasing, and for this charge there is considerable evidence. Confession to God has not the former accent of self-abasement and of personal guilt. Side by side, however, with this decay in the consciousness of personal offence against God, there is a sense of obligation towards our neighbour which is distinctly in advance of anything known to our fathers.

I. Are we not apt to isolate these two moral facts—the decay of the sense of sin against God, and the increase of the sense of sin against man? At least, we forget to correlate them; we assume that there is no unity in the religious life. Ought we not to believe that God is within this creation so that one cannot separate any part of it from Him in whom every part lives and moves and has its being. Is not the hem of His garment within reach of us all? Can we injure a little child and not injure Him? Can we help a man in the straits of life and not help Him?

Ought we to hesitate which idea of God to accept as our working principle in life? Is not the distant God a mechanical conception, and an obsolete deism? Is not the indwelling God a convincing idea and the religion of Jesus? Within the sphere of Christian thought there is only one life, one love, one faith, one sin. We speak of the solidarity of man: since the Incarnation we should speak of the solidarity of man and God.

All service, as well as all injury, ends in God, and is done to God.

II. This truth should bring liberty to two opposite people, and the first is a believer, with a scrupulous conscience. There are Christians who are afraid of letting their heart go, and pouring forth their affection upon those they love, lest they should be giving to the creature what ought to be reserved for God. God is no watchful rival, demanding the lion's share of our heart. He is content if we love, for all the love we give to those whom we see we are giving to God whom we cannot see. And every stream of love finds its way at last into the eternal ocean of His heart from which first it rose.

This truth should also be liberty to the unbeliever with an honest mind. There are many persons in the land to-day, and within the Church, who hesitate to call themselves Christians because, as they confess, they have not what they judge to be a right mind towards God. And yet this non-religious man, who has made no profession of faith, and counts himself unworthy to approach the Sacrament, may be the most loyal of husbands and the most self-sacrificing of fathers, as well as a charitable citizen and a reliable friend. But God—in this matter, if you please, a jealous and grasping Master—claims every act as done to Him. He has not known God, so my friend says, which is a serious loss of comfort. But there is something more important and decisive—God has known him, God is loving him, and in a day to come God is going to reward him.—J. WATSON (IAN MACLAREN), The Inspiration of Our Faith, p. 286.

Illustration.—The truth that if you sin against man you sin against God is impressively stated in the most intense hymn of penitence ever written, the fifty-first Psalm. Whoever the writer was he had committed some great sin—a sin red with blood and black with lust. He was ashamed of himself and was broken-hearted. Some fellow-creature had suffered cruelly at his hands, but when he went to the root of the matter he realized that his sin had touched God Himself, and that no creature could be insulted without wounding its Creator. 'Against Thee,' he said, 'against Thee only have I sinned.' If this be true, then it follows on the other side that if any one helps a human being in body or in soul, that person has helped God. If only the Psalmist had dealt righteously by that man or that woman, he had been able to say, 'Thee only have I served'.—J. WATSON (IAN MACLAREN), The Inspiration of Our Faith, p. 292.

ONE OF THE LEAST

'One of the least of these.'—MATTHEW XXV. 40.

CHRIST never despised little folks, little things, little occasions, little duties; Jesus never turned away from the small and the lame, the halt and the blind. Why was this? It was because He was Jesus. No man a mere man could have afforded to attend to us little creatures, persons of no consequence; it required God to stoop low enough to come down to us. The Deity is in the stoop, not in the grammar. He who holds a grammatical God has no God to hold. The Deity of the Lord Jesus Christ is in His pity, care, tears, mercy, His coming out after us in the dark times, in the stormy nights, sure that if we are to be found at all we must be found in the wilderness. That is His Deity; not some variable preposition or difficult word to construe with some other verbal difficulty.

I. When the Lord looks upon the services which people render, He often stops beside a cup of cold water, lifts it up, and smiles it into wine that makes glad the heart of God and man. That was all that the giver could give; being all that the giver could give, it became valuable, precious, priceless. Jesus Christ will not have it that any man can give Him anything except from the Cross, His own Cross, and the man's cross cut out of it; that is giving; the last bronze from the till—that is giving.

This alters our whole conception of Jesus Christ's thought, as we have misunderstood it. We thought He would be very careful about legions of stars, and He seems to be more careful of the poor man's one tallow candle that is set in the window on wintry nights to show the prodigal the way home. He will not allow that candle to sway in the storm; He guards it and keeps it steadily towards the window if mayhap the strayed girl or the prodigal boy may want to come home some night cold, and that candle is there, an evangel, a gospel, a luminous welcome.

II. All through the Bible there is a wonderful care of little things; God noticing them, God caring for them, and God bringing them to perfectness of meaning. Said Jesus Christ on one occasion the most remarkable thing out of the beatitudes, and it is the beatitude that crowns the rest, 'The very hairs of your head are all numbered'. That is greatness. 'He putteth my tears in His bottle;' that is condescension. 'None of his steps shall slide,' as if He numbered step by step all the going of His people. These are God's condescensions: sweeping the house diligently until He find the piece that was lost; leaving the ninety-nine in the wilderness, and going out after that which had strayed, and not returning until He had found it. This Shepherd undertakes no vain errands; He brings back the wanderer and completes the flock.

III. We must not make any mistake about this littleness. If we do little when we could do much, then the little goes for nothing. That is where your sixpence went! It was absolutely lost in ungrateful oblivion. Perhaps it was not wholly your blame, because you had the two coins in the same pocket, the half-sovereign and the half-shilling, and it was just by an accident that you took out the white one.

It may be so—may it, may it be so? If the little is all I can do, my Lord takes a few grass-blades as if I had brought Him a whole paradise. But if I could have brought Him rich flowers, and only plucked a weed out of the hedgerow, He will not take my gift. He who can stoop low will not stoop to be insulted when I offer Him a hedgerow weed when I might have given Him a garden of orchids.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. II. p. 22.

'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me.'—MATTHEW XXV. 40.

No works shall find acceptance in that day

When all disguises shall be rent away

That square not truly with the Scripture plan,

Nor spring from love to God or love to man.

—COWPER.

'If one looks at the way of the world,' said William Law, 'one would hardly think that Christians had ever read this part of Scripture (i.e. Matt. xxv. 31-46).

REFERENCES.—XXV. 40.—A. F. Winnington Ingram, The Men Who Crucify Christ, p. 11. G. E. Ford, Religion in Common Life, p. 72. J. Service, Sermons, p. 216. E. Aldom French, God's Message Through Modern Doubt, p. 75. J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. II. p. 22. J. Oswald Dykes, Christian, World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 388. H. R. Heywood, Sermons and Addresses, p. 214.

'Depart from Me, ye cursed.'—MATTHEW XXV. 41.

PREF. PARKER writes on the words, 'Discedite a me, maledicti': 'Can this be the same Jesus who passed through the villages of Palestine, inviting the multitudes, by His miracles, by His doctrines, by His welcome which charmed men by its gentleness and touched them by its delicacy? Is this He who said, "Come unto Me and I will refresh you"? Is it He who said in presence of the hungry crowd, "I have pity on this multitude"? Yes, it is He. The hour of mercy is past; the earth and the heavens are silent, angels adore Him, millions of human beings are bent before His word, trembling with love or terror, like the tall ears of wheat which tremble in the wind of the plain, awaiting the reaper's scythe. "Depart," He says. How often did I invite you, how often did My word call you; in public, in the secret place of the heart, by the voice of My angels, by the voice of My priests, by the counsels, the exhortations, the examples, of your family, of your friends. I called you to the observance of the commandments, to the practice of prayer, to the festival of My sacraments—and you would not. You said no to conscience, you said no to your Christian friends, you said no to the Church. . . . Now, depart, discedite, go away? . . . At the court of Philip II nobles who were favoured with the attention of the prince had to suffer through it. One of them, who was driven from the king's presence because he held loosely to the Church, died the same evening. But here. Maledicti! They are cursed by Justice and repelled by her, for they have broken her laws. Maledicti! They are cursed by Mercy, for they have despised her calls and her grace.'—Psychologie des Mystiques Chrétiens, pp. 77-79 (1909).

REFERENCES.—XXV. 41.—R. Winterbotham, Sermons and Expositions, p. 155. XXV. 44.—H. Harris, Short Sermons, p. 225. XXV. 46.—G. F. Holden, Church Times, vol. lvi. 1900, p. 815. R. Winterbotham, Sermons and Expositions, p. 164. R. J. Campbell, Sermons Addressed to Individuals, p. 129. W. Leighton Graue, Hard Sayings of Jesus Christ, p. 179.

XXVI. 1-16.—J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 161.
XXVI. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2522.

NAME AND SURNAME

'Simon the Leper.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 6.

WHY these surnames? We do not want them, we do not like them; but there they are. Why not say 'Simon,' and let his identification be established by other means than by recalling the loathsomeness of the disease? Why these expansions of names, why these fringes and attachments? Why not identify men by something better than leprosy, or evil deed, or red shame of any kind?

We fall here upon a very profitable scene of investigation and instruction. There seems to be some policy in this way of naming men; this is no bare accident.

I. Let us take instances. 'Matthew the publican.' Why remind a man that he was a publican or tax-gatherer? Why remind a man of days that he wants to forget? Is a man always to be reminded that he was once a blasphemer? He ought to remind himself of that; there may be some greatness and wealthy fortune in the very reminiscences that we would gladly get rid of. Remember the hole, recall the mire, set up an image of the pit in your gayest parlour, to remind you that you did not come down from heaven, though by the grace of God you may be going up into it. You were once Simon the leper; remember it, and be kind to all lepers; 'such were some of you'. You were once Matthew the publican, the hard-natured, close-fisted tax-gatherer, felt to be an oppressor in the neighbourhood; remember, and be gentle.

The Lord was always talking thus to the people whom He made dear to His heart. He was saying to them every day almost, Remember thou also wast a stranger; bethink thee of the bondage days of old Egypt; recall the time when thou wouldst have been thankful for a mouthful of bread and a night's hospitable lodging; remember. There are men round thee to whom thou mayest show kindness for David's sake, for Jonathan's sake, for thy father's sake, for thy mother's sake, for auld lang syne's sake. The past will follow thee with name, and the intention of such pursuit is thy chastening, humbling; not a contemptuous humbling, but a stimulating and comforting humbling, so that thou mayest get rid of the old rags and put on the garments of duty. There must be a policy in this.

II. Take another instance, 'Rahab the harlot'. Why torment the woman by such memories? Was it not enough to call her 'Rahab who received the spies'? Why is her sin to be even blackened and deepened and thrust in her face as a present-day memory and almost a present-day fact, so hot the breath, so damning the recollection? But this is the way; there must be a purpose in it. We cannot be satisfied until we find out the way into the heart of that purpose: always reminding a man that he was born blind, always refreshing his memory with the fact that once he had to beg his bread even at the beautiful gate of the temple; always reminding the soul that it was just as bad once as any other soul ever could be. Why these painful, shocking, heart-cutting reminiscences and reminders? She was saved by faith, yet she was Rahab the harlot. Again and again it is forced upon us that there must be some meaning in all this, that a certain process has not yet been completed. Regeneration has been completed, blessed be God, but resurrection has yet to begin; regeneration is completed, consummated; crowned by resurrection, the old foul body left with the worms, and the new body, that is to say, the heavenly and the spiritual, has assumed the wedding garment, made fit for the wedding feast.

III. We must take the case in both its aspects. Simon the leper, Paul the Apostle, this is the woman out of whom the seven devils were cast. Oh, do not talk always about the seven devils, they are gone; she is the temple of the Holy Ghost. Do not torment yourselves by too morbid a reference to and brooding on the melancholy past.

If we turn over a few pages of the New Testament we shall find that God gives His people a new name. He gives some of them a name which no man can read but the bearer thereof. Sometimes He will give us a name that will have no evil associations attaching to it. The name 'sinner' will be forgotten, and no man will say to another in the city celestial, Is not this he that sat and begged? No; in that great home city there shall be no such reminder, for the former things are passed away. Neither shall there be any limiting names. We take no leprous garment into heaven, our evil deeds we leave far behind us—behind the back of God. Said the gracious Lord to His sinning but penitent Israel, 'I will cast thy transgressions behind Me,' and no line has been found that can measure the distance indicated by that word 'behind'. Then let us hope for liberation or redemption, full, complete.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. iv. p. 223.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 6, 7.—A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part ii. p. 318. XXVI. 6-13.—F. D. Maurice, Christmas Day and Other Sermons, p. 184. W. Landels, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 72. XXVI. 6-16.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 221. XXVI. 6-30.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xl. No. 2350.

'There came unto Him a woman having an alabaster box of very precious ointment, and poured it on His head, as He sat at meat.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 7.

THE best part of a woman's love is worship; but it is hard to her to be sent away with her precious spikenard rejected, and her long tresses, too, that were let fall ready to soothe the wearied feet.—GEORGE ELIOT.

WHEN Mary anointed our Lord's feet, the act was a transient one; it was done for His burial: the holy feet which she anointed ceased soon after to walk on earth. Yet He declared that wheresoever His gospel was preached in the whole world, that act should also be told as a memorial of her. So has it ever been with what has been given to God, even though it were blindly and erringly. While all other things have perished, this has endured.—JULIUS HARE.

'To what purpose is this waste?'—MATTHEW XXVI. 8.

THERE are more ways of doing good than almsgiving. All heavenly charity is not to be bound up in bags of flour. . . . And the form which God has given to the world we live in is in harmony with this judgment. The earth is not constructed merely on the principle of producing so much food for man's bodily wants. It has its cornfields, but it has also its wild-flowers on hill and moorland to give us the sense of a touching and simple beauty; it has its precipices, and wastes, and seas, to inspire us with a feeling of the sublime and infinite. The utilitarian looking on this side of things may say, and has said, 'To what purpose is this waste?' It might have been given to the poor.' But the world was made by One who had in view not merely the physical wants of man but his intellectual and spiritual nature, and Who has constructed His dwelling-place so as to train that nature above the animal and earthly. The golden glory of the furze that brought tears to the eyes of Linnæus is as true a gift of God as the joy of the harvest, and it is a most Christian endeavour to make the poor partakers of both. There is a 'life which is more than meat,' and herein lies part of the significance of this incident in the house of Bethany.—DR. JOHN KER, Thoughts for Heart and Life.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 8. G. H. Morrison, Flood-Tide, p. 92.—F. R. M. Hitchcock, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 324. J. A. Bain, Questions Answered by Christ, p. 81. T. Teignmouth Shore, The Life of the World to Come, p. 83. A. N. Obbard, Plain Sermons, p. 34. XXVI. 8, 9, 10.—H. P. Liddon, Passion-Tide Sermons, p. 227.

'His disciples had indignation. . . . Why trouble ye the woman?'—MATTHEW XXVI. 8, 10.

WE men are always so ready and anxious to keep women right, like the wretched creature Laertes in 'Hamlet,' who reads his sister such a lesson on her maidenly duties, but declines almost with contempt to listen to a word from her as to any co-relative obligations on his side!—GEORGE MACDONALD.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 10.—A. W. Potts, School Sermons, p. 102. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvi. No. 2126.

'The poor ye have always with you.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 11.

Who is the beggar? The beggar is a man forced by fate to remind us of Christ: he is a brother of Christ; he is the bell of the Lord, and he rings in life to rouse our conscience, to arouse the satiety of the flesh of man. He stands by the window and sings out: 'For the sake of Christ!' and by his singing he reminds us of Christ, of this holy commandment to help the neighbour.—MAXIM GORKY, The Man who was Afraid, chap. iv.

He is rich who hath enough to be charitable; and it is hard to be so poor that a noble mind may not find a way to this price of goodness. 'He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord;' there is more rhetoric in that one sentence than in a library of sermons. Upon this motive only I cannot behold a beggar without relieving his necessities with my purse, or his soul with my prayers. These scenical and accidental differences between us cannot make me forget that common and untouched part of us both; there is under these centres and miserable outsides, those mutilate and semi bodies, a soul of the same alloy with our own, whose genealogy is God as well as ours, and in as fair a way to salvation as ourselves. Statists that labour to contrive a commonwealth without poverty take away the object of our charity; not understanding only the commonwealth of a Christian but forgetting the prophecy of Christ.—SIR THOMAS BROWNE ('The prophecy of Christ' being, of course, the above-quoted words, the poor ye shall have always with you).

In Dreams Mr. Alexander Smith observes that at Christmas 'there is more charity than at any other time. The heart warms as the frost increases. Poverty, scant clothing, and fireless grates come home at this season to the bosoms of the rich, and they give of their abundance. The Master's words, "The poor ye have always with you," wear at this season a deep significance.'

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 12.—James Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 301. XXVI. 12, 13.—W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 100. XXVI. 13.—W. E. Blomfield, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxviii. 1905, p. 24. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 286. XXVI. 14, 15.—J. Wright, The Guarded Gate, p. 147. XXVI. 14-15.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. liii. No. 3033.

THE BETRAYAL

'What will ye give me, and I will deliver Him unto you?'—MATTHEW XXVI. 15.

I. THREE times, in the Gospel narrative, is Judas said to have been, in some special sense, the devil's instrument. And the first occasion was a year before the actual betrayal. 'Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?' What did it mean? Already, to the eye of Christ, there was seen the line of moral cleavage between the one and the eleven. Even in despondency, and almost despair, they are ready to fling away the cherished hope of ambition, of personal gain, and cling to Him they loved. And yet not all. One has in secret made a different choice. He is still in external union with them. But he had fought for his own hand, when he joined what he thought the winning side, and he will fight for his own hand now that he foresees its failure—not openly, but secretly; in outward friendship and companionship, but with secret alienation of heart. He was amongst the disciples, but, though perhaps they did not know it, he is no longer one of them.

So the old sin of Paradise is repeated. The act, which at heart all sin is, the self-love which separates man from God and makes him try to live and stand alone.

II. Twice, we are told, 'Satan entered into Judas,' and, in each case, the occasion was of some gracious act of love and condescension for the Lord he professed to serve. (1) Once when, as Mary's loving hand poured precious ointment on the sacred feet, and He to Whom she ministered, accepted and interpreted her gift ('she did it for My burial'), and checked the words of him whose petty covetousness found fault with the 'waste'. Then, first, the treachery, which was hidden in the heart of Judas, took shape, and he bargained for his price: 'What will ye give me?' (2) Then, at the Last Supper, once more Satan entered into the traitor, and claimed him as his own. The Master had washed the traitor's feet. Judas had heard his treachery foretold, 'One of you shall betray Me,' as if in that last hour the appeal of love must be made; and he answered with the hypocritical 'Is it I?' Then came those awful words, which left the sinner to his sin, 'That thou doest, do quickly'. And he went out into the darkness. Then, in quick succession, we recall the garden meeting, the traitorous kiss, the remorseful 'I have sinned, for I have betrayed!' and the scornful 'See thou to that!' And Judas the traitor stood alone. And in his ears those words keep ringing, 'What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world?' What shall it profit? And forth he rushes into the darkness, to hide himself from himself, away across the Valley of Hinnom, to the Field of Blood. And that weird solitude witnessed the last act of him whom after-times look back upon as the hypocrite, the thief, the traitor, the suicide!

III. And it almost seems as if, in our day, Christ was leading His Church through the same description of disappointment through which He led His disciples. We are told from outside that Christianity has failed. And, if we accept and apply the world's test of what failure is, we must admit that it is true. Christianity has not introduced a golden age. Have we, any of us, who are signed with the Cross, and have received the seal of the Lord, nay, who have been brought into closest, truest union with Him in the Sacrament of His love, been sometimes disquieted, sometimes despondent, at the failure of Christianity? If so, what then? For it is here that we come to the dividing of the ways, the line which separates the followers of the Crucified from those who would be Christians without the Cross.

Christ has many open enemies; but it is amongst the baptized that the traitors are found, and the darkest treachery is that of those who have been brought very near their Lord. Therefore 'let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall'. Let us therefore fear. The beginning of treachery is that which we know so well, and fear so little—unreality in religion; and the beginning of unreality is the separation of faith from life, or faith from thought. A faith which no longer shows itself in a holy life, a faith which we keep hidden away apart from all that appeals to our rational nature, is a faith to which we are already false—which, when the occasion offers, we shall be ready to betray.—AUBREY L. MOORE, Some Aspects of Sin, p. 105.

Illustration.—'Nowhere,' says St. Bernard, 'are pilgrims in perfect safety. Not in heaven, for Lucifer fell from thence; not in Paradise, for Adam was driven from thence; much less in the world, since Judas perished in the school of Christ.'—AUBREY L. MOORE, Some Aspects of Sin, p. 115.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 15-17.—E. B. Pusey, Parochial Sermons, vol. ii. p. 283. XXVI. 17-30.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 225. XXVI. 17-30.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2595; vol. xlv. No. 2699; vol. i. No. 2865.

SELF-EXAMINATION

'Now when the even was come, He sat down with the twelve.'
—MATTHEW XXVI. 20.

IMAGINE the situation. The hour which they had so eagerly expected had come. The peace of evening had fallen round them. The joyful recollection of the annual festival had no doubt taken possession of the little party. They were alone with their Master, Who had reassured them of His love with the most touching signs, and although there hung over them the sense of an impending danger, yet at any rate to-night there was nothing to disturb them. There all were friends, and all were dear to Him, and He was with them.

As they were eating, He said, 'Verily I say unto you, That one of you shall betray Me'. One of them! The disciples looked upon one another, doubting of whom He spoke. And they began to say unto Him, every one, 'Is it I, Lord? is it, surely it cannot be, I'.

I. Was it Hard that such a Subject should be Mentioned at such a Time?—'One of you shall betray Me.' They would know the truth soon enough. Might they not be spared the intrusion of such a thought in that peaceful hour? Is that what we think as we hear the story once again? But surely this is all of a piece with our Lord's compassion for human souls. This is the last appeal to the man who was most conscious of guilt, to pause and consider before it became too late. Surely this is the kindness of the surgeon who cuts deep that he may save. It was not too late for Judas to repent.

II. The Sweep of that Word Reached Further than the Conscience of Judas.—They began to say unto Him, every one, 'Is it I, Lord?' It was a word which forced every one of them to search his conscience. A flood of light, as it were, is poured into the most secret recesses of their heart, and there they saw all the things which men are only too anxious to forget. There was that in them which did not make it so impossible, but that each of them might prove a traitor to his Lord. Do we not know those searching words of our Lord which every now and then spring up from the pages of the Gospel and tear through all the coverings that we wrap round our secret life and disposition, till they have laid bare those roots of evil which will ruin the whole nature if they are not exposed? Yes, the words flash out again and again, and haunt us.

III. The Word of the Lord Forced the Disciples to Look Closely Within, and should not we ask ourselves serious questions? The first stage in our progress is to know ourselves. Judas the traitor refused to allow the light to penetrate his soul, and the darkness flooded it instead, and one has seen lives break up into bits because men and women would not deal faithfully with themselves, would not look at their faults or look for them. Do not let us put this aside as though it were a tedious task, or just a matter of obligation. It is a matter of life and death to us, that we should be always searching to see what there is within us, for the evil weeds grow quickly in the garden of our souls. It does not seem to me to matter much what method of self-examination we pursue, so long as it is done, so long as it is honest, real, and painstaking. Let every one do what is best and most natural to them, but let no one stop until they get to the root of all that may be wrong with them, for remember that all the time our lives are open to the Lord Jesus.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 20-30.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lii. No. 2982. XXVI. 22.—C. Stanford, The Evening of the Lord's Ministry, p. 36. XXVI. 22, 25.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 232.

'He that dippeth his hand with Me in the dish, the same shall betray Me.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 23.

THERE can be no treason, where is not some trust.—BISHOP HALL.

'The Son of Man goeth as it is written of him: but woe unto that man by whom the Son of Man is betrayed!'—MATTHEW XXVI. 24.

At the close of his essay on The Civil Disabilities of the Jews, Macaulay protests against 'the practice of confounding prophecy with precept, of setting up predictions which are often obscure against a morality which is always clear. If actions are to be considered as just and good merely because they have been predicted, what action was ever more laudable than that crime which our bigots are now, at the end of eighteen centuries, urging us to avenge on the Jews, that crime which made the earth shake and blotted out the sun from heaven? The same reasoning which is now employed to vindicate the disabilities imposed on our Hebrew countrymen will equally vindicate the kiss of Judas and the judgment of Pilate. "The Son of Man goeth as it is written of him: but woe to that man by whom the Son of Man is betrayed." And woe to those who, in any age or in any country, disobey His benevolent commands under pretence of accomplishing His predictions.'

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 24.—Hugh Black, University Sermons, p. 4. S. A. Tipple, The Admiring Guest, p. 182. W. H. Simcox, The Cessation of Prophecy, p. 269. H. P. Liddon, Passion-Tide Sermons, p. 210. Archer Butler, Sermons (1st Series), p. 75. Spurgeon, Sermon Notes on New Testament, p. 33. J. H. Thom, Laws of Life After the Mind of Christ (1st Series), p. 251. A. K. H. B., Graver Thoughts of a Country Parson, p. 268. New Outlines on New Testament, p. 47. Parker, Hidden Springs, p. 61; Inner Life of Christ, vol. iii. p. 11. In Christian World Pulpit, vol. i. p. 61 (Berg); vol. ii. p. 177 (Parker); vol. ii. p. 331 (Beecher); vol. v. p. 102

(Barfield); vol. viii. p. 37 (Hubbard); vol. viii. p. 305 (David Thomas, also in Pulpit Memorials, p. 417); vol. ii. p. 311 (Bantain); vol. xii. p. 394 (Beecher); vol. xv. p. 316 (Higgins); vol. xviii. p. 151 (Hird); vol. xx. p. 202 (Beecher); vol. xxvi. p. 102 (Tuck); vol. xxix. p. 90 (Beecher). Selections from Pusey, p. 326. Winterbotham, Sermons, p. 360. Aitken's Mission Sermons (2nd Series), p. 121.

THE REAL PRESENCE OF CHRIST JESUS IN THE HOLY EUCHARIST

'This is My Body.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 26.

THERE are two classes of difficulties which keep men from the Sacrament of the Altar. One class is intellectual and the other moral. The first is met by faith and the second by repentance. The one comes from want of appreciation of Divine mysteries and from the consequent absence of experimental self-surrender to those mysteries. The other comes from sin which, through self-indulgence, is unrepented of.

I. Let us be sure that there is something mysterious about our Eucharist whatever that mystery may be. Christ's words, which are repeated at every celebration, 'This is My Body'—'This is My Blood,' are undoubtedly mysterious, but yet quite patent of a literal sense, and as Hooker says, 'I hold it for a most infallible rule in expositions of Sacred Scripture that where a literal construction will stand, the farthest from the letter is commonly the worst'. The Primitive Church, again, witnesses to the Real Presence of Christ in the Holy Eucharist. St. Augustine says: 'It seemed good to the Holy Ghost that the Lord's Body should be the first food to enter the Christian's mouth, in order that due honour should be shown to so great a Sacrament, and this custom is observed throughout the world'. Again, the Church of England not only explicitly receives the testimony of the early Church as an authoritative interpretation of Scripture, but she also unmistakably declares her own belief in the Real Presence of her Lord. She speaks of Christ's Body being 'given, taken, and received,' of Its being 'verily and indeed taken and received,' where 'verily and indeed' point not to a logical certainty, but to a real presence and real communion: she speaks of 'holy mysteries,' of our 'eating the flesh of Christ and drinking His blood,' of Christ being 'veiled under the forms of bread and wine'.

II. Some considerations drawn from allied truths may help us to accept more unreservedly, and to use more thankfully, the great gift associated with the altar.

1. In the first place, Sacraments are not isolated phenomena in the dispensation of the Spirit. Christianity is itself Sacramental. The Son of God took to Himself the whole of man's nature, and joined it to His own nature in indissoluble union. The two natures found their unity in the one Person of the Eternal Word. This is the Sacrament of the Incarnation, the mystery which reveals the most ancient of all mysteries, that of the Blessed Trinity. Throughout the earthly life of the Son of God the Godhead which was concealed within was ever manifesting forth its glory by words and deeds of power. But yet to most men the inward part of the Sacrament of the Incarnation was hidden. The Son of Man was known of every passer-by as one having no form nor comeliness; the Son of God was recognized by few. Others, however, found that virtue went out of Him at the touch of faith. Then, as now in the Sacrament of the Altar, to touch His outermost robe was to find His manhood beneath, and to realize that that manhood was the channel through which there flowed the power of the Godhead.

Again, is not the mystical body of Christ, the Church, a great Sacrament? Its outward part is formed of all who are baptized into the name of the Blessed Trinity. Some are good and some are evil, and the evil is at all times so prevalent that the face of the Bride of Christ, like that of her Spouse, is so marred that, when men see it, there is no beauty in it that they should desire it. Yet is she holy because of the indwelling of the Spirit of holiness who is her life and soul. This is her 'inward part,' that with which she is anointed; but it is hidden, except for those whose eyes are open to spiritual realities.

2. A second truth which bears closely on the Sacrament of the Altar is that of the nature of our Lord's Resurrection Body. It is that spiritual Body, a Body 'invisible, indivisible,' and not subject to the laws of physics, which is now sacramentally present at our altars. The mode of its existence is beyond our ken, the laws according to which it works are not revealed to us in consciousness. It is a spiritual Body, and Christ's presence is, therefore, a spiritual presence. It is this spiritual nature of Christ's Body which enables it to be sacramentally present with us.

3. A third fact may be brought forward to help us to realize better the mysterious Presence of Christ. He took our human nature, when He was made man, in its entirety. Man, St. Paul says, consists of body, soul, and spirit. The Word of God, therefore, assumed each of these three. The spirit of man is that highest part of his being, of which the most that can be said is that it exists; beyond this we are in almost utter ignorance about it. The soul is that spiritual part of man in which the spirit manifests itself intellectually and morally. The body is in its essence, that is, when stripped of all accidents, the name given to a force, or collection of forces, which act as the power within our constitution, which lays hold of and moulds to its purposes the outside world of matter. There is a great difference between the organism of a living man and a corpse.

4. A fourth fact may be finally brought forward. All creatures live by external support. The angels have their nourishment directly through contemplation of the Word of God. Man is spoken of, it appears, as the food of the evil one, so far as he becomes like his tempter. To the one was said, 'Earth thou art,' and to the other, 'Earth shalt thou eat'. The bodily life of man, again, is supported from without by food taken within. But nothing that has not lived will serve as food for him. Either vegetable or animal life must be sacrificed for his needs. In other words, it is only a substance of kindred nature that will sustain man's bodily frame. Similarly, the food that is the support of man's soul is of kindred nature to it. 'The bread that I will give is My flesh, which I will give for the life of the world.' That is, it is the human nature of Christ Jesus which is given us in the Blessed Sacrament. That nature is consubstantial with us and fitted, therefore, for the support of our souls. But that nature is united to the Divine, and hence in Holy Communion man approaches more nearly than anywhere else on earth to the Being of God Himself, and we realize in it something of St. Peter's assertion that we are made partakers of the Divine Nature.

III. Such are one or two truths which throw side-lights on the mysterious Presence. But after all we can go but a short way towards comprehending it. A mystery it will still remain, and as a mystery faith will receive it. The true knowledge of Christ's presence comes from that experiment which faith makes in a sure trust in God's mercy. To have been with Jesus, to be conscious of the sweetness of His presence, to find Him as a guest within, to hold silent colloquy with Him, this is evidence that cannot be gainsaid. Even if He so manifested Himself but once, and then withdrew for years, it would be testimony sufficient, the heart would stand up and answer 'I have felt; "My Beloved is mine and I am His; He feedeth among the lilies".' Such experience will not care to inquire too curiously into the mystery. It is dark with excess of light; the more earnestly we gaze the more are we dazzled.—W. F. CORB, Church Times, vol. xxviii. p. 304, 31 March, 1890.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 26.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xl. No. 2350. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Blessed Sacrament, p. 179. XXVI. 26-28.—W. C. Wheeler, Sermons and Addresses, p. 138. G. Salmon, Non-Miraculous Christianity, p. 174. XXVI. 26-30.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2268. XXVI. 27, 28.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 243. XXVI. 28.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiii. No. 1971; see also Twelve Sermons on the Atonement, p. 373. E. B. Pusey, The Holy Eucharist a Comfort to the Penitent, p. 1. XXVI. 29.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 252. XXVI. 30.—J. Guinness Rogers, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 280. B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 145. C. J. Ridgeway, Plain Instructive Sermons on Holy Communion, p. 20. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lii. No. 2082. XXVI. 31-35.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2771. XXVI. 32.—R. Winterbotham, Sermons Preached in Holy Trinity Church, Edinburgh, p. 241.

'Peter said unto Him, Though all men shall be offended because of Thee, yet will I never be offended. . . . Peter said unto Him, Though I should die with Thee, yet will I not deny Thee.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 33 f.

'Tis not the many oaths that make the truth,
But the plain single vow, that is vowed true.

—SHAKESPEARE.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 33.—C. Wordsworth, Primory Witness to the Truth of the Gospel, p. 138. XXVI. 35.—S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 67. XXVI. 35, 40.—E. Griffith Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1900, p. 133. XXVI. 36.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 693. J. Halsey, The Spirit of Truth, p. 133. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 199. A. Whyte, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 375. C. Stanford, The Evening of the Lord's Ministry, p. 171. XXVI. 36-46.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 2376. T. Binney, Sermons Preached in the King's Weigh-House Chapel, p. 150. J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 177. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 261. XXVI. 38.—E. Fowle, Plain Preaching to Poor People (1st Series), p. 15. V. R. Lennard, Passion-Tide and Easter, p. 73. T. T. Carter, Lent Lectures, 1860-66, p. 115. W. P. Balfern, Glimpses of Jesus, p. 237. XXVI. 38-46.—Selected Sermons of Schleiermacher, p. 38.

CHRIST SHRINKING FROM THE CROSS

'Let this cup pass from Me.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 39.

WHY did Jesus so shrink from His cross? The answer cannot be given in a single confident word or two. Only as we realize what Christ was, and is, and shall be; only as we understand what He came to be and to do; and only as we see the part which the Cross filled in His life, and has filled in the life of the race, shall we realize the elements of bitterness in the cup from which Jesus shrank.

I. The first element in the cup was His Mortal Pain.—Christ passed through His dying hours in complete self-control. He made His cross a place of counsel, of blessing, and prayer. But there was a peculiar horror at the death of the cross. It had for men of finely strung nature, and of sensitive organization, an almost unbearable agony. The scourging before the crucifixion, the driving in of the nails, the uplifting of the beam, the long, slow, fiery agony of the wounds, the horror of the thirst—all of these were vividly realized by Jesus and bore in on His mind. 'He became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross,' said the Apostle, recalling its mortal pain.

II. The Loneliness of its Shame.—The very thought of the cross brought a loneliness into Christ's spirit. He never made a movement towards it without finding Himself going forward alone. He saw that what men would desert Him for was its shame.

There are three kinds of loneliness. There is the loneliness of solitude—tonic, calming, strengthening. There is the loneliness of character. A man may find himself in a community, or in a society, or even in a home very greatly alone. Jesus knew both these lonelinesses. He sought the solitude of the seashore and of the mountain-top and of the olive garden. He accepted the loneliness of His character, saying even among His disciples, 'I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now'. But this third loneliness of shame He shrank from, as all men shrink from it. 'I was sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not,' said Jesus in His parable, declaring the loneliness of shame. 'I have trodden the winepress alone; and of the people there was none with Me.' An element in the cup was the loneliness of its shame.

III. Its Mental Anguish.—The Cross of Christ

shall never cease to be a tragedy. But we can see it now, in the light of centuries of Christian experience, Christian history and Christian thought, to be a splendid triumph. But was it all clear to Christ? He had, no doubt, an anticipation of such an issue throughout His whole ministry. But now, as He stands at the foot of the cross, and as He faces the actual deed, there is given Him a keen mental anguish. Was this the hour? Was this the way? Could this be the will of God?

When we think that Christ always found it easy to know God's will we do greatly err. With us the greater difficulty is the doing of the will of God. With Christ the problem was to know that will. As soon as God's will became clear to Him He went forward to it with animation of spirit. Here in Gethsemane He suffered mental anguish both as to the knowledge of God's will and obedience to it. When the light fell clearly on the path, and He saw the cross as the inevitable duty, the mental anguish is over. You can hear the calm of His spirit in His words, 'Rise up, let us be going'.

IV. His Desolation of Soul.—What causes desolation of soul? What gives us the sense that God is no longer near, no longer mindful, no longer loving? Why are all children natural believers and all older hearts prone to doubt? What gives desolation of soul is, in a single word—sin. It may be, it commonly is, our own sin. But in a pure heart desolation of soul may be caused not only by one's own sin but by the sin of others. In this way the sin of man desolated the soul of Christ. He was willing to be sundered from God, to have His name blotted out, to be accursed from God, to go out into the desolation of a forsaken soul, if He could redeem man from the desolation which is eternal. That was the agony of the garden. Out of it He passed in tranquillity to go to His cross.

'Let this cup pass from Me,' prayed Jesus. Yet He drank it.—W. M. Clow, The Cross in Christian Experience, p. 65.

GETHSEMANE

'O My Father! if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me: nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 39.

I. To Christian hearts no name is so sacred as Gethsemane. In Gethsemane Jesus was in anguish. The heart is awed at the sight of the Son of God on His knees in the garden.

This was the temptation of the life of Jesus. The cup of human guilt was held out to Him. He trembled to stretch out His hand to take the cup. He longed to avoid the ordeal.

Having the redemptive love, Jesus saw that the cup was inevitable. To save, He must die. To find, He must lose. In His distress He prayed, and His prayer was a cry. 'O My Father! if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me: nevertheless: not as I will, but as Thou wilt.' A second time He prayed, and in the interval He had seen more clearly that the cup was unavoidable. 'O My Father! if this cup may not pass from Me, except I drink it, Thy will be done.' A third time He prayed, using the same words.

That prayer stamps Jesus as the world's religious leader. It is religion epitomized. It is spirituality in a word.

II. There are Gethsemanes in human life. Life for the most part is on the path of the commonplace, but, ever and anon, we pass into the garden of gloom.

Death is the common gate into Gethsemane. Gethsemane may be a home where sickness lingers. Gethsemane may be a lonely life. Gethsemane may be a wilderness of impoverishment. Sometimes Gethsemane is long foreseen. Jesus had the prescience of His Gethsemane for years, and it is the sign of His high courage that He stepped forward to meet it. But sometimes we plunge into it unexpectedly. The soul is always alone in Gethsemane. Jesus was alone. All that the soul can do in Gethsemane is to pray. Jesus prayed. Prayers in Gethsemane are always broken. But those who have prayed in Gethsemane never doubt the blessedness of prayer.

III. The most precious truth in Gethsemane is that of the Divine Fatherhood. 'O My Father!' was the cry of Jesus. The soul can only pray when God is known as Father. When we think of God as our Father, then we assume our true relationship. It is the filial He seeks in us.

We can exercise every freedom in our speech with our Father. Jesus did. He showed His fear to His Father. 'If it be possible, let this cup pass from Me.' The intenser our assurance of His Fatherliness, the freer our confessions will be.

True religion is the reverent acceptance of the Father's will. The deep religion of the soul of Jesus is shown in this. He was prepared to abide His Father's will.—J. G. BOWMAN, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII. 1907, p. 347.

REFERENCE.—XXVI. 39.—G. Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 261. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 260. E. L. Hull, Sermons Preached at King's Lynn (3rd Series), p. 58. W. Baker, Penny Pulpit, vol. xii. No. 707. p. 325. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xl. No. 2376; vol. xlvii. No. 2715. XXVI. 39-42.—C. J. Vaughan, Last Words in the Parish Church of Doncaster, p. 165. XXVI. 40, 41.—Maudell Creighton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 219. XXVI. 41.—F. W. Farrar, Everyday Christian Life, p. 159. E. Meyrick Goulburn, Three Counsels of the Divine Master, vol. i. p. 133. XXVI. 43.—A. F. W. Ingram, Addresses in Holy Week, 1902, p. 41. XXVI. 45.—R. Rainy, Sojourning With God, p. 95. XXVI. 45, 46.—J. Percival, Some Helps for School Life, p. 146. XXVI. 46.—J. Halsey, The Spirit of Truth, p. 65. XXVI. 47.—J. G. Stevenson, The Judges of Jesus, p. 11. James Moffatt, The Second Things of Life, p. 70.

JUDAS ISCARIOT

'And forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, Hail, Master; and kissed Him.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 49.

WE have all of us one human heart. The blackest criminal is a man of like passions with ourselves. His crime comes from the yielding to tendencies which are in us all, and his nature grows to be capable of it by slow degrees. We never need to remember this more than in thinking of that man who is gibbeted for ever as 'Judas Iscariot, who also betrayed Him'.

I. Consider First His Gradual Downward Progress, and note:—

1. How it illustrates the power of one sinful tendency to overgrow and destroy the whole soul. His fault was one the love of money. It grew and increased in his soul till it swallowed up everything.

2. The conflict of Divine love and human sinful will. Christ chose him for an Apostle not for his badness, but for what he might have been. He gave him all His teaching. At the last He tried to win him back, giving him the sop in loving familiarity, making a last appeal to his heart. Striking hard on conscience, by letting him see he was known, 'That thou doest,' and by urging him as a last request to do it 'at once'. Then the tenderness, the firmness, the absence of all rebuke, 'Friend, wherefore art thou come?'

And so with us all. It is the awful mystery of human will that it can and does turn itself against all Divine appeals, and annihilates and thwarts the loving purposes and mercy of Jesus Christ.

II. The Actual Crime.—Remember that his knowledge of Christ's higher nature was dim and vague. He did not fully know what he was doing.

This illustrates, (1) the essential character of all sin, as blinding a man to the true nature of what he is doing. (2) The real nature of all sin is preferring self to Christ. (3) The real aggravation of sin, ingratitude. The form may differ but the substance is the same.

III. The End.—Immediate remorse. 'I have sinned.' Judas goes to the priests, and flings down the money—then his suicide.

This brings out, (1) The unprofitableness of sin. Judas gets his reward, and with it a bitter conscience. (2) The remorse which leads to desperation. His crime was not unpardonable. Suppose he had gone to the cross, and cried there, 'I have sinned,' would He Who forgave them all, not have forgiven him? His condemnation was not his betrayal of Christ, but his own non-acceptance of pardon for his betrayal. So the last lesson is that the only thing which binds sin upon a man and leads to death is unbelief. And we who have betrayed, denied, crucified Christ, may have all pardoned.—A. MACLAREN.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 50.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 270. XXVI. 51-56.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 426.

'They that take the sword shall perish with the sword.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 52.

THE grace of God shall never want champions, for by her own almighty power she makes them for herself. She requires hearts pure and disengaged; and she herself purifies and disengages them from worldly interests incompatible with the truths of the Gospel.—PASCAL.

REFERENCE.—XXVI. 52.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, The Sheathed Sword, p. 14.

HOLY ANGELS

(Feast of St. Michael and All Angels)

'Thinkst thou that I cannot now pray to My Father, and He shall presently give Me more than twelve legions of angels?'
—MATTHEW XXVI. 53.

THE unprayed prayer of the Lord Jesus, in the Garden of Gethsemane, is not only a standing marvel of self-sacrificing love, and an example of the voluntary endurance of educative pain, it is also a revelation that the earthly lives of God's children are enfolded by intelligences invisible, who, under the command of God, act as ministers and protectors. And this is true of all, because, 'as He is, so are we in this world'.

I. Do not ask me to define an angel; I have never seen one. But every painstaking thinker knows that those forces in the universe, that never have been seen and never can be seen, are the mightiest. Christian history, apart from Christian legend, is as much a history of the angels as it is a history of God and man. The works of Christian writers teem with allusions to the angels. The monuments of Christian cities testify to the ever-existing realization of the office of the angels. The written Word from first to last is full of the holy angels. It begins with angels, and it ends with angels.

II. This gaze into the spirit sphere on St. Michael's Day should help us to realize the true dignity of humanity, and stimulate us to lift our lives to the standard of our privileges. The inference is not the dignity of angels, but the dignity of men. These ethereal intelligences are our ministering attendants. Our fellowship is not with them, but with their Master; they are our ministers and His. It gives the real man—the man who honours himself because he knows his essential nature is God's essential nature—no pleasure to be highly praised by men; rather will self-knowledge turn such praise into gall for him. But he will honour himself, 'because of the angels'. And he will remember also that some of these heavenly beings are described as not having kept their first estate, and, therefore, that the common, coarse temptations of the flesh are not necessarily the most dangerous; and he will strive to guard himself against spiritual sins—angels' sins—self-love, self-will, love of praise, abuse of intellectual superiority, substitution of self for God. Moreover, he will shape his service according to the pattern of these ministering spirits, and when he prays, 'Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven,' he will see that his work for God possesses the characteristics of the angels' service, which are, (1) intellectual submission, together with intellectual aspiration—'they desire' to learn the mysteries. (2) Obedience. Amen! Alleluia! obedience before praise. (3) It is work consciously in the Divine presence, and, therefore, full of noble Godlike purpose, for they 'do always behold the face of My Father, which is in heaven'.

III. The unprayed prayer in Gethsemane teaches us that our communion with angels is not to be direct, but by prayer to the Father. 'I can pray to My Father, and He shall give.'

It provides the authority for the beautiful Collect for St. Michael's Day. We need the ministry of angels in life; we shall doubly need it in death.—BASIL WILBERFORCE, Following on to Know the Lord, p. 157.

Illustration.—I have stood, as have countless thousands, on the bridge which spans the Tiber by Hadrian's tomb in the City of Rome, and there the eye is at once arrested by a colossal statue of St. Michael, the Prince of the Angels, surmounting the armed battlements of the Castle of St. Angelo. It is an impressive scene, calculated to promote that condition of mind in which holy sentiment comes to deepen faith. More than a thousand years ago, upon that memorable spot, there knelt in prayer and fasting one of Christendom's greatest bishops, pleading with God for the removal of the pestilence which was desolating the city that he loved, and there seemed to pass before his eyes, dim with fasting, weary with prayer and watching, a vision of the mighty Prince of the Angels, alighting on the summit of the tomb of Hadrian, and sheathing a blood-stained sword, and from that moment the pestilence was stayed.—BASIL WILBERFORCE, Following on to Know the Lord, p. 160.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 53.—W. L. Watkinson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 136. S. Cox, Expositions, p. 362. XXVI. 53, 54.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiii. No. 1955.

THE DESERTION

'Then all the disciples forsook Him, and fled.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 56.

I. SURELY that appeal must be heard—'My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death. Tarry ye here, and watch with Me!' But the disciples' eyes were heavy, and their hearts were sad, and hope had gone, and dull, helpless resignation had settled down upon their souls. And when the Master returned He found them sleeping. Yet there is no word of censure, only something of sadness—may we not say, of disappointment? 'What, could ye not watch with Me one hour?' Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation.' Again, and a third time, He comes and finds them sleeping still. They have been tried, and failed. They could not watch. 'Sleep on now, and take your rest.' It sounds almost like the echo of those words to Judas, 'What thou doest do quickly'. The moment of trial is past. It is all over. The only one of the twelve who was wakeful on that night was Judas the betrayer, who watched, but didn't love. The betrayer is near; and the disciples, who loved, but could not watch, saw their Master taken; and they who, in the strength of enthusiastic hope, once 'forsook all, and followed Him,' now, all in panic fear, 'forsook Him, and fled'. It was but for a little while. There was no thought of treachery or disloyalty in their hearts, only the cowardice and faint-heartedness which comes of despondency and sloth.

II. Can we not see here a true picture of ourselves? What of the cowardly, despondent, faint-hearted Christians? Are they few amongst ourselves? What of the slothful ones who cannot 'watch,' cannot 'endure hardness,' who have committed themselves to Christianity as if it were a sort of 'forlorn hope' for the world, but have not the heart to fight for it and believe in it as a conquering power?

In our day there are few arguments more common in the mouth of the enemies of this faith than the reproach that Christianity is a failure. And has not it sometimes, even while we resented it and put it away from us, reacted on our belief, and made us sad and half-hearted and hopeless?

III. And, on the other hand, faith and effort react on one another, as do despondency and sloth. Is not it so in the service of man? When we hear of all the misery and wretchedness and vice of some great city, it seems so hopeless, we are ready to fold our hands and let things go; but if, in some little corner of the great field of work, we bestir ourselves to do what little we may, is not it wonderful how, with that effort, faith and hope and love grow strong and strengthen one another?

Surely sloth and unwillingness to make the effort, intellectual and moral, which is necessary for a real hold of truth, is largely to blame for what is vaguely called unbelief, in these days of ours.

Can we better gather up our thoughts on this desertion of Christ than in those words of His to them in the garden, 'Watch and pray'? If the moral struggle is what it ever was for those who would live the Christlike life, the intellectual struggle was never keener than it is for us now. And we are quite wrong to suppose that the battle can be fought out for us. Every thinking man and woman must take his part or hers, must fight for Christ, or, like the slothful sleepers in the garden, look on while the traitor betrays, and the enemies assail the Master they claim to love.—AUBREY L. MOORE, Some Aspects of Sin, p. 117.

FORSAKING CHRIST

'Then all the disciples forsook Him, and fled.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 56.

In a great piece of music a composer strikes the note in his prelude which is to be recurring and dominant—the keynote of his message. This grave and saddening line is the keynote of the story of the day of the cross. It was a sign, as Jesus had foretold, that His hour had come. It was His first step down into the waters of His baptism of sorrow. It was His first draught of the cup. To be forsaken by all turned His pre-vision of the cross into an experience.

With the story of the garden before us, let us look into this forsaking of Christ. Let us see the reasons why men are disloyal to Him, and mark how we may be safeguarded against the sin.

I. Men Forsake Christ Through Fear.—We understand at a glance the fear of these men. They were Galilean fishermen and strangers in a large city. They were surprised at night in the depths of an olive garden. The sudden Roman faces, with Judas at their head, the flashing lamps and gleaming spears, the rough and insolent soldiery, Christ captive, submissive, seemingly helpless in the soldiers' hands, death menacing themselves in the rude gestures of their assailants, shook their nerve and blanched their courage, and they forsook Him, and fled.

II. Men Forsake Christ Through Weariness.—These disciples were disloyal not only through fear, but their temptation assailed them in an hour of extreme weariness. They had walked as Passover pilgrims from Capernaum to Jerusalem. They were guests in strange homes, and that is always a straining experience. They had spent a week of unusual and exhausting excitement. Since they had entered Jerusalem with Jesus to the shouting of Hosanna they had lived out a full round of six long and eventful days. They had been stinted of rest and robbed of sleep. Even while they were witnesses of Christ's agony in the garden and listeners to His prayers they fell asleep in sheer weariness. It was when worn, spent, drained of energy both of mind and of body that they forsook Him, and fled.

We all understand these sad experiences. It was when we were weary, at the close of a long day, in our hour of failure, in the month when some great hope had been finally quenched, in the mood of discouragement and of despair, when the unexpected misfortune had overwhelmed us, as it overwhelmed the disciples in the garden, that we took that step, and did that deed, in which we forsook Christ, and fled.

III. Men Forsake Christ Through Spiritual Reaction.—Behind their fear and their weariness there lay a deeper cause of failure. That was spiritual reaction. We sometimes forget how intense had been the life which these men had lived, and how dazzling had been the light in which they had rejoiced. Transforming and illumining as had been their years of fellowship with Jesus, these last days in Jerusalem had brought them into a religious wonderland. They had companied with the Lord Jesus, and beheld His glory. They had heard the great parables spoken in the Temple. They had sat at Martha's feast in Bethany and looked on Lazarus risen from the dead. On the last day of the feast they had passed into the Holy of Holies. They had spent the early hours of the evening in the Upper Room, and at the supper table which Christian men and women consider their holiest memorial. They had listened to Jesus when He had unlocked His heart in counsel and in prophecy. All religious experiences are costly and exhausting. Every excitement exacts its toll of energy. The human spirit cannot sustain any rapture without times of relief. But the most exhausting of all emotion is an elating spiritual experience. It always has its after hours of dull and jaded mood. To have lived with Christ through this holy week must have set the spiritual fervour of these men of religious genius on fire. Then came the reaction of the night and the darkness, and the sudden peril of the garden, and then they forsook Him, and fled.

IV. There are two counsels which may safeguard us against our forsaking Christ.

1. The first of these is to be found in that word with which Christ sought to safeguard His disciples against their hour of trial—the word ‘Watch’.

2. The second counsel we shall take from one who was loyal to Christ in a day when many were tempted to forsake Him. It is the counsel given as his message after the recital of the deeds of the cloud of witnesses who seldom faltered in their loyalty to God. That counsel is—‘Looking unto Jesus’.—W. M. CLOW, The Day of the Cross, p. 57.

DESERTION

‘Then all the disciples forsook Him, and fled.’—MATTHEW XXVI. 56.

I. Whom? Not an enemy; nor a faithless leader; but their best friend.

Sometimes we are justified in forsaking people; the fuller our acquaintance with them, the less desirable it appears. But the more Christ was known, the better He was loved.

II. When?

1. At a time of peculiar peril and sorrow.
2. After many proofs of His Messiahship.
3. After receiving many favours.
4. After strong professions of attachment.
5. After expressing indignation at the treachery of another.

III. Why?—Because they were:—

1. Timid.
2. Selfish.
3. Impulsive.
4. Unbelieving.

See how one man influences another; all forsook Him.

Let us take heed to our company.

Let us take heed to ourselves.—F. J. AUSTIN, Seeds and Saplings, p. 41.

CAIAPHAS

‘And they that had laid hold on Jesus led Him away to Caiaphas the high priest.’—MATTHEW XXVI. 57.

THE leader of the Sadducees was Caiaphas. He was the High Priest that same—that fateful year. The high priesthood had been the petty gift of all the foreign rulers of Judæa, bestowing it as their pleasure or their passion prompted. Caiaphas held the office for the long period of eighteen years, from the year A.D. 18 to the year A.D. 36. It was this High Priest and leader of the Sadducees who was the chief agent in the Crucifixion of Christ.

Caiaphas stands out so clearly upon the page of Scripture that we cannot mistake his character. His unflinching and implacable enmity imprinted itself indelibly on the minds of the Apostles. In scene after scene he is distinctively drawn. We see him in the Council with the note of scorn in his speech, his easy mastery of the moods and fears of men, his bold, definite counsel. We see him in the interview with Jesus, rending his robes with histrionic fervour, in a finely simulated horror at the blasphemy of Christ.

We see him playing his game with Pilate, and using that able Roman as his tool. We see him when Judas, torn with relentless remorse, bursts into the Council Chamber, turning away from the conscience-stricken man, dismissing the poor fool from his presence with a phrase. We see him, unchanged, when Peter and John stand before him, and he charges them to hold their peace. Who is this resolute, defiant, merciless man? He is the High Priest of God—the holder of the holiest office in Judaism. What is he? An astute and unscrupulous diplomatist; a wily manager of men; a master of assemblies with a fitting gift of speech; a conceiver of bold and daring policies in the hour when others waver, and a man of unflinching will in carrying them out. How shall we describe this man of the holy office, and the crafty speech, and the diplomatic skill, in a single word? In one word, he is an ecclesiastic—the type of all that long succession of men who have laid heavy burdens on every Church, and often thwarted the purpose of God. Let us look at Caiaphas, the ecclesiastic, in the clear light that beats upon him from the Word of God, so that we may not enter into his secret or come into his condemnation.

I take three points of view—

I. The Ecclesiastic in his View of the Church.—Caiaphas, the High Priest, was the virtual leader of the Jewish Church.

What was the Church to Caiaphas? It was an institution on whose history he could have descanted with eloquence. It was an institution he must preserve in its present form at all hazard. It was an institution with certain offices and ceremonies, and buildings, and privileges, and powers. And it was an institution in which he and his fellows held certain station and authority, and power and emolument. Whatever endangered its supremacy, whatever threatened to lower its prestige, whatever assailed its security, must be ruthlessly destroyed. A new revelation might be dawning among men; a new learning might be disclosing more of the power and wisdom of God; new methods of science might be stirring men's minds; a new and holier spirit of compassion might be surging in men's hearts; and all these might have been craving for recognition and sympathy within the Church. It mattered nothing to Caiaphas, the ecclesiastic. The new wine would endanger the old bottle, and the old bottle was his precious thing. It gave him his place and his power, and it must be preserved. It needed only the cry in his ears: ‘The Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation,’ to rouse him to the strong, unflinching, merciless policy of the ecclesiastic.

Now, what is the source of the ecclesiastic's view of the Church? It is simply the spirit of worldliness—the spirit which prevails when faith in the unseen has died within the soul.

II. The Ecclesiastic in his Attitude towards Doctrine.—This man Caiaphas, although drawn with such almost unrelieved condemnation in the Word of God, must not be thought of as inhuman, or as a self-consciously evil or diabolic man. Louis XI, with all his cruel craft, had a conscience. Machiavelli, the prince of liars, had always his self-defence in readiness. Lord Chesterfield's letters seem to us so much polite villainy, and yet they were written in tender regard for the well-being of his son. And Caiaphas had men to respect him, perhaps to love him. Children climbed upon his knee, and he put his hand gently on their heads. There were some frailties to which he was not liable; there were many vices impossible to him. And you can believe that in all he did he was well persuaded in his own mind. The state of mind behind his policy, the reason that dictated his action, was his attitude towards doctrine. Towards doctrine, and towards any possible change in doctrine, Caiaphas did not keep an open, testing, discerning mind. He was as fixed as the ice of an Arctic winter, as unresponsive as the dead.

III. The Ecclesiastic in his Conduct to Christ.—This cool, cunning, crafty man saw in a flash that the watchful Roman governor would be only too glad to see in this popular clamour around Christ an outbreak of insurrection, and sweep away the Temple and its priesthood because unable to keep the peace. And with the passing of the Temple would pass Caiaphas and his pride. He stands up in the midst of the sacred and bewildered men, who already hear, in anticipation, the shouts of the populace proclaiming Christ as king, and with keen scorn he says—'Ye know nothing at all'; and then calmly proposes to take Jesus and to put Him to death.

That is the decisive test of the ecclesiastic. The Church needs leaders. She needs men of wise counsel and prompt energy and determining speech. She needs men who will patiently and untiringly serve her tables. But the office they fill is full of giddy and dazing temptations. No class of men need more the continual reconsecration of aim and the fresh baptism of the Spirit. But these are gained only as men keep themselves in the faith and love of Jesus. The man to whom Christ is a name, or only an instrument of service, is a danger to the Church. But the man to whom He is Lord, in whose heart a deep devotion maintains its unquenched fire, may make mistakes, may seem to endanger sacred interests, but his blundering will be wiser than the cold prudence of the ecclesiastic.—W. M. Clow, The Day of the Cross, p. 13.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 57.—C. Stanford, The Evening of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 237. J. G. Stevenson, The Judges of Jesus, p. 83. XXVI. 57-62.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2473. XXVI. 57-68.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 286. XXVI. 59, 60.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ix. p. 315.

'At the last came two false witnesses.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 60.

In the fourth chapter of his History, Macaulay, after narrating the fearful punishment inflicted on Titus Oates, the detected informer, adds: 'Horrible as were the sufferings of Oates, they did not equal his crimes. The old law of England, which had been suffered to remain obsolete, treated the false witness, who had caused death by means of perjury, as a murderer. This was wise and righteous; for such a witness is, in truth, the worst of murderers. To the guilt of shedding innocent blood he has added the guilt of violating the most solemn engagements into which man can enter with his fellow-men, and of making institutions, to which it is desirable that the public should look with respect and confidence, instruments of frightful wrong and objects of general distrust. The pain produced by ordinary murder bears no proportion to the pain produced by the murder of which courts of justice are made the agents.'

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 64.—G. A. Chadwick, The Intellect and the Heart, p. 116. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiii. No. 1364.

JESUS CHARGED WITH BLASPHEMY

'Then the high priest rent his clothes, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy; what further need have we of witnesses?'—MATTHEW XXVI. 65.

THESE horror-stricken judges, rending their garments in simulated grief and zeal, and that silent Prisoner, knowing that His life was the forfeit of His claims, yet saying no word of softening or explanation of them, may teach us much. They are witnesses to some of the central facts of the revelation of God in Christ.

I. They witness to Christ's claims.

The question that was proposed to Jesus, 'Art Thou the Christ, the Son of the living God?' was suggested by the facts of His ministry, and not by anything that had come out in the course of this investigation. It was the summing up of the impression made on the ecclesiastical authorities of Judaism by His whole attitude and demeanour. He did claim a Divine prerogative; and either the claim must be admitted or the charge of blasphemy urged.

He died because He declared that He was the Son of God.

II. Note how we have here the witness that Jesus Christ assented always to the loftiest meaning that men attached to His claims.

I want to know whether that characteristic, which runs through all His life, and is inseparable from it, can be vindicated on any ground except the ground that He was God manifest in the flesh.

III. We have here witness to the only alternative to the acceptance of His claims.

He hath spoken 'blasphemy'. Not that He had derogated from the dignity of Divinity, but that He had presumed to participate in it. And it seems to me, with all deference, that this rough alternative is the only legitimate one. When all is said and done, we come to one of three things about Jesus Christ. Either 'He blasphemeth' if He said these things, and they were not true, or, 'He is beside Himself' if He said these things and believed them, or

Thou art the King of Glory, O Christ;
Thou art the everlasting Son of the Father.

If these claims are true, what should our attitude be but that of infinite trust, love, submission, obedience, and the shaping of our lives after the pattern of His life?—A. MACLAREN, Christ's Musts, p. 44.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 65.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 290. XXVI. 65, 66.—Father Bernard Vaughan, Society Sin and the Saviour, p. 61. XXVI. 67.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2473. XXVI. 69, 70.—W. C. E. Newbolt, Church Times, vol. xlv. 1901, p. 368.

'And again he denied with an oath, I do not know the man.'
—MATTHEW XXVI. 72.

'LET us look to it,' pleads Ruskin, 'whether that strong reluctance to utter a definite religious profession, which so many of us feel, and which, not very carefully examining into its dim nature, we conclude to be modesty, or fear of hypocrisy or other such form of amiableness, be not, in very deed, neither less nor more than Infidelity; whether Peter's "I know not the man" be not the sum and substance of all these misgivings and hesitations; and whether the shamefacedness which we attribute to sincerity and reverence, be not such shamefacedness as may at last put us among those of whom the Son of Man shall be ashamed.'

'And again he denied.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 72.

'ONCE launched upon such a course,' says De Quincey of Pope, 'he became pledged and committed to all the difficulties which it might impose. Desperate necessities would arise, from which nothing but desperate lying and hard swearing could extricate him.'

THE DENIAL

'I know not the man.'—MATTHEW XXVI. 74.

IT is a remarkable thing that, in the Gospel narrative, two of the disciples, and two only, are spoken of as having been in some special way exposed to the assaults of Satan. The one was Judas the traitor; the other that disciple who, on any view we may take of the words, was singled out for special honour by the Lord—St. Peter. It seems as if St. Peter stood side by side with Judas in danger.

And here it is worth while to pause and remind ourselves that temptation always comes to us through that which is most natural to us, and our danger lies very near to that which, rightly used, is our strength.

It was directly after St. Peter's great confession, and the Lord's words, 'Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona,' that there came that stern rebuke, 'Get thee behind me, Satan!' The love which could see in Jesus, the Messiah, the Christ of God, could not see him in the Man of Sorrows, the Persecuted, the Betrayed, the Forsaken.

It was this instinctively self-trusting nature, the nature which had not learned to know itself, its own strength and weakness, that Satan sought to claim as his own. 'Simon, Simon,' said Christ after the Last Supper, 'Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat. But I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not.' Did Christ pray for Judas too? Surely it must have been so.

St. Peter had to learn a deeper lesson of disappointment—the disappointment with self. All his self-confidence had to be destroyed before he could give his real self to Christ. Even Peter could not watch; and when the traitor drew near, he gave way to the momentary impulse of resistance, and then forsook his Lord, and fled.

II. In that hour of sadness and desolation, we can trace again the likeness and the difference between Judas and St. Peter. When the Messiah is condemned, and Judas and St. Peter alike realize their moral failure, the one 'repented himself,' the other 'wept bitterly.' What a difference is implied in those words! The one knew but remorse; the other entered on the toilsome road of penitence. Judas flung back the hated silver to the priests, and went and hanged himself; St. Peter, in that sad look of Christ, saw, even in the reproach, the hope of restoration, and he went out, and wept bitterly.

III. How shall we test our love? 'Lord, help us to know ourselves!' We cannot trust our feelings; we must go to facts. How shall we be sure that our love is real?

1. Love must be love for a person, not a system. It must be love for Christ, not for Christianity; devotion to One 'Who first loves us'. It is the distinguishing mark of religion that it implies a moral and personal relationship between God and man.

2. It will prove its reality by its moral strength.

3. And then it will distrust itself, and be trustful only of its Lord; content to be unknown, the least among the servants of God, to fill a little place in God's world, to be thought worthy just to give a cup of cold water to one of God's poor. Covetousness, ambition, self-assertion, all are gone, only when we have learned to say, 'Not I, but Christ in me'. It is the Christian reading of the teaching of the Muslim mystic:—

'One knocked at the door of the beloved, and a voice from within said, "Who is there?" The lover answered, "It is I". The voice replied, "This house will not hold me and thee". So the door remained shut. The lover went into the wilderness and spent a year in solitude and fasting and prayer. Then again he returned and knocked at the door. And the voice of the beloved said, "Who is there?" The lover answered, "It is Thyself". Then the door was opened.'—AUBREY L. MOORE, Some Aspects of Sin, p. 129.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 74.—D. L. Ritchie, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1903, p. 218. B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 66. A. F. Winnington Ingram, Addresses in Holy Week, p. 19. XXVI. 75.—W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 77. T. B. Dover, Some Quiet Lenten Thoughts, p. 62.—XXVII. 1-27.—J. Burns, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 214.

PILATE

'And when they had bound Him, they led Him away, and delivered him to Pontius Pilate the governor.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 2.

THE councils and kings, the orators and law-givers of Rome, tower out in the backward look of history, when men nearer us in time are lost in the haze. But there is one Roman who shall outlive them all. He held only a petty post in an obscure corner of the Empire, but he sat as judge on Him who shall one day judge the world, and he delivered unto death the Prince of Life. The name of Pontius Pilate, the governor, shall be remembered when every other Roman name may be forgotten.

Pilate, like all men of culture and thought, had ceased to believe in the cruel and licentious gods of Paganism. And with that disbelief had come the usual disheartening conviction that nothing in all the spiritual world could in certainty be known. For in the moment when a man's spiritual world has vanished like a dream or a mirage of the desert, when the credulities of a young and ardent youth have been proved to be false, when he sees the men around him living only for things seen, what is there left for him but a sad and melancholy mental despair? 'What is truth?' asked Pilate in the climax of his interview with Jesus, and Bacon tells us he jests. If he did jest, it was a bitter jest. It was the partly impatient, partly contemptuous, partly despairing word of a man who flings out a question to which he conceives there is no answer at all. And when we look at this well-read, widely thought, bewildered, and gloomy-minded man, we find in him the type of men common enough among us. For there is no word to describe Pilate but one, and that is 'agnostic'. It is Pilate, the agnostic, who stands face to face with Christ.

I. Now let us look at the agnostic in the light of Christ. We see Pilate in three scenes. Mark them well, for they are the steps in an agnostic's progress away from God. We see him in the grey dawn roused from his rest to hear the denunciation of those scrupulous Jewish hypocrites, who will not enter his house lest they should be defiled. We see him with his Roman feeling for justice, refusing to do an act of summary wrong. And then we see him face to face with Jesus alone, and we cannot help a sigh that he did not know his Lord. For Christ's desire here, as always, is to lift all religious inquiry out of the heating and misleading arena of discussion and debate into the region of personal conduct and conviction. It is the attempt to lead the agnostic from his dialectic, to rouse the interest of his apathetic soul, and to make him face the realities of his own life. But it failed. Pilate is stung by the personal appeal, and the quick retort comes back, with contemptuous scorn, 'Am I a Jew?' But Jesus is love that will not let him go, and this clear voice, whose spell never men failed to feel, rang through Pilate's hall in words Church leaders have not yet fathomed, which spoke of that kingdom not of this world—that kingdom not of the sword—but of the truth. He offered to enrol Pilate as a governor in it. Mark, He does not proclaim Himself as the Son of God. That would have been too high for Pilate, and this Teacher ever stooped to the little ones. He offers Himself as one who came into the world that He might bear witness of the truth. He touched Pilate in his tenderest memories and holiest thoughts and took him back to the days of his youth, when he had dreamed his dreams, and seen his visions of unswerving justice, untainted honour, and ennobling purity. But the agnostic's habit has become too strong for him. It holds him as in a vice, and with the deep, unalterable conviction that Jesus is innocent, he puts his agnostic question, 'What is truth?' breaks off the interview, and passes out from the presence of Christ. When he went out it was the hour of dawn, but the night had begun to fall upon his soul.

II. In the second scene we see Pilate, who has refused to make the question of his religious belief a personal one, become the man of shifts and devices. He goes out to propose Christ's release under a time-honoured custom of the Feast. But the shout for Barabbas teaches him that he has misunderstood the deep hatred felt for Jesus. A second device suggests itself to him. He will scourge Him—aye, mark you! with that scourge of thongs tipped with lead, every one of which bit like a scorpion—and mock Him, for surely, even their pity will be roused, and they will relent at the sight of the thorn-crowned Man, and their rage will be glutted at the sight. But he might as well have fought the blinding spray of a winter storm, as have opposed himself to these hoarse cries of 'Crucify Him! Crucify Him!' He hurries in to Jesus, anew impressed that He who could so rouse the passions of men, must be more than He seemed, and 'Whence art Thou?' he asks Him, as one might inquire at a spirit. But Pilate's question comes too late. Jesus will not answer. Truth which a man will not accept when it is offered to him, truth which a man will outrage by scourging and mocking, truth which a man will set at naught, that he may escape from a dilemma and avoid a duty, is always silent to such a question as Pilate's.

III. The third scene is the dramatic moment of it all. It is Pilate—poor, fear-driven, unmanned Pilate—on the judgment seat, washing his hands in water, to declare his innocence, and so chloroform his soul. Ah, perhaps you think that no man could so deceive himself, that Pilate knew that he could have saved Christ if he only had bravely dared. No, that washing of the hands was no conscious mockery to Pilate. He doubtless went down to his house feeling himself justified, for he had reached the most abandoned state of the human soul. He was sinning against the Holy Ghost.

The sweet mysteries of Christ were dark to him, and he was not asked to accept them. But because he would not be true, because he would not live out the truth he knew, because he allowed truth and innocence to pass to shame and to death, he also passed out of Christ's light, and bears an eternal shame. What hindered him? It was in one word, his interests. That, in many forms—some as coarse and sordid as assailed Pilate, some as subtle and refined as seduce the man of wavering and bewildered mind among ourselves—is the temptation of the agnostic.—W. M. CLOW, The Day of the Cross, p. 27.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 2.—J. G. Stevenson, The Judges of Jesus, p. 163. XXVII. 3, 4.—John Ker, Sermons, p. 282. XXVII. 3-5.—E. M. Goulburn, Occasional Sermons, p. 139. E. B. Pusey, Parochial Sermons, vol. ii. p. 197. XXVII. 3-10.—B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 112.

JUDAS'S 'I HAVE SINNED'

'I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 4.

THE state and history of Judas have, as we humbly trust, through the infinite mercy of God, no exact parallel amongst ourselves.

Judas, we must fear, had already passed into a reprobate state, when he said, 'I have sinned'. For years he had allowed, and systematically pursued, with a show of charity and piety, that sin which God calls the worst, and places the last, in the whole scale of wickedness. He had, probably, some secret hope that Christ might assert His power, and His sovereignty; and that he himself, after all, might have a high place in that temporal kingdom, which they all expected.

I. The Cry of Despair.—Disappointed everywhere—remorse and horror, as they are wont, taking the place of passion—the evil spirit that had lured him on now became, first tormentor, and then instigator to despair. Driven by his evil conscience, Judas sought refuge everywhere, and found it nowhere. Not in his money—what could that do? 'He cast down the thirty pieces of silver,' with perfect indifference, 'on the floor of the Temple;' and the cold-blooded priests, to whom he looked in his misery, said, 'What is that to us? See thou to that.' Not, assuredly, in his own breast. Not in God: he had not sought it there, and though it was not too late to find it, he saw it was too late to seek. And Judas, 'departed, and went and hanged himself,' that he might go to his own place!

II. A Heartless Acknowledgment.—What was the worth of his 'I have sinned' at such a time? The Greek word for 'sinned' is 'missing the mark'. It conveys a great deal of important and affecting teaching. But Judas meant probably only the literal, without the spiritual, signification of the word. 'I have made a mistake; I have missed the mark.' 'I have sinned, in that I have betrayed innocent blood.'

III. No Touch of Spiritual Truth.—His 'I have sinned' was only the acknowledgment of a worldly error. It stands for no repentance. It never touched one spiritual truth.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 113. XXVII. 4, 24.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 299. Cox, 'The Son of Loss,' Expositions, vol. i. p. 348. French, 'Pontius Pilate,' Sermons New and Old, p. 134. 'Conscience,' Homiletic Quarterly, vol. iv. p. 554. John Ker, 'Judas and the Priests; the end of evil association,' Sermons (1st Series), p. 232. Parker, Ark of God, p. 54, and Inner Life of Christ, vol. iii. p. 238. Cox, 'A Day in Pilate's Life,' Expositor (2nd Series), vol. viii. p. 107. Jacox, Traits of Character, etc., p. 350. Kitto, Daily Bible Illustrations, vol. vii. p. 426. W. M. Taylor in Three Hundred Outlines on New Testament, p. 32; and see his Contrary Winds, p. 37. A. B. Evans, Sermons, p. 377. C. J. Vaughan, Sermons (1853), p. 81. Pusey, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 276. Simeon, Works, vol. xi. pp. 575, 583. Bishop Hackett, Sermons, p. 483. Bishop Fleetwood, Sermons, p. 444.

'And he went and hanged himself.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 5.

WHEN an opponent at Gainsborough falsely accused George Fox of claiming to be the Messiah, the Quaker declares, 'I called the accuser Judas, and was moved to tell him that Judas's end would be his; and that that was the word of the Lord and of Christ, through me, to him. So the Lord's power came over all, and quieted the minds of the people, and they departed in peace. But this Judas went away, and shortly afterwards hanged himself, and a stake was driven into his grave.'

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 5.—C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 287. XXVII. 7.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 78. XXVII. 11.—R. H. Heywood, Sermons and Addresses, p. 37. R. C. Trench, Sermons New and Old, p. 134. H. A. Smith, A Book of Lay Sermons, p. 3. XXVII. 11-23.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 310.

THE TWO WILLS

'When He was accused by the chief priests and elders, He answered nothing. Then saith Pilate unto Him, Hearst Thou not how many things they witness against Thee? And He gave him no answer, not even to one word; inasmuch that the governor marvelled greatly. . . . Now the chief priests and the elders persuaded the multitude that they should ask for Barabbas, and destroy Jesus. But the governor answered and said unto them, Whether of the twain will ye that I release unto you? And they said, Barabbas. Pilate saith unto them, What then shall I do unto Jesus which is called Christ? They all say, Let Him be crucified. And he said, Why, what evil hath He done? But they cried out exceedingly, saying, 'Let Him be crucified!'—MATTHEW XXVII. 12-14, 20-23.

NEVER was tragedy so awful or so swift as that which St. Matthew recounts in the chapter from which these verses are taken. And this is because the two elements of all tragedy, the Will of God and the Will of Man, are there combined and running to the same end.

We have all been puzzled by the difficulty of reconciling these two: first, that God willed Christ's death, and, second, that man was guilty of that death.

I. Nothing is clearer from the Gospel than this: that it was Christ's own will to die. He had long set His face steadfastly to Jerusalem. While others still deemed it impossible, His soul lay already under the shadow of the Cross.

Some men make up their mind to die when they feel the stress of circumstance bearing in that direction. But Jesus felt no outward circumstance compelling Him to death. Because it was His Father's will He set His face to the Cross.

He also declared why He must suffer. This was not for martyrdom alone. He had come to bear witness to the truth among a people who, as He pointed out, had with tragic consistency slain their prophets. Yet the burden of truth He brought from heaven was not the only burden He carried. He found another awaiting Him on earth in the sins of men; and this, though sinless Himself, He stooped to bear in all its weight. . . . That is why He was so silent before the Jewish Council and with Pilate. It was not for Barabbas only He was silent. On that day Christ Jesus laid down His life for men.

We do not know what happened to Barabbas. But if he changed, if he led a new life, and as an old legend has it, became a servant of God, it was because he understood the meaning of that silence in which Christ assented to His own death and so let him go free.

We must feel what our pardon cost the love of God, and how much that love in Christ endured for us. Then shall there be born in us a penitence, a faith, a gratitude which will bind us to God, which will give us a hatred for sin, which will beget in us a power of holiness—as nothing else can.

II. The way in which human guilt is brought out in this chapter is very tragic. First there is Judas, the only one who accepted his guilt, and it overwhelmed him. The rest shirked their responsibility, and sought to pass it over to one another. But they could not, for the lesson of the chapter is that, where Christ is in question, every man must make decision for himself.

It is significant that our Lord was slain by no mere drift of circumstance, but by the deliberate and confessed choice of men's wills, and that He was doomed to the cross not by the supreme Roman authority, but, before it could pass sentence, by the voice of the people.

They stood outside the court, because on that day it was not lawful for them to enter Gentile precincts. But even so they did not escape, for the governor brought Christ out to them, and in the end every man of them became His judge.

God will have every common man who has known Christ to come to a decision about Him. This was what Christ came into the world for. And we, to whom He has been presented all our lives, can, least of all, hope to escape.

Nor let us fail to notice the hour in which the men of Jerusalem were called to give their decision. The supreme moment in the history of Christ with themselves was not when He came to them as the King in His beauty, but when He stood an equal alternative with Barabbas.

It is not our attitude to our Lord in the easy hours of worship, which determines our true relation to Him. Our real heart for Him is shown, our true relation to Him is determined, far rather in those other, darker hours, when temptation is strong upon us; and we have to choose between Himself and our sin.—G. A. SMITH, The Forgiveness of Sins, p. 105.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 14.—Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1804, p. 42. W. P. Balfern, Lessons from Jesus, p. 73.

BARABBAS

'And they had then a notable prisoner, called Barabbas.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 16.

I. We need not go beyond the New Testament for the history and character of Barabbas.

1. His name is the first significant thing about him. He is Bar-abbas, 'the son of the father,' or master. His father was a teacher of the Jewish law, and an expounder of its precepts. He belonged to the religious aristocracy of the Jews. He had been trained in the traditions of Hebrew history, and had been taught that to be a member of the commonwealth of Israel was the proudest privilege a man could enjoy. His childhood and youth had been spent amid the influences of a home whose chief interests were the things of God, whose dominating ambition was the steadfast advancement of His kingdom. He was as nearly as possible in the position of a son of the manse.

2. The second significant thing which we are told about him is, that he had 'made insurrection,' or, as Luke more precisely puts it, 'was cast into prison for a certain sedition made in the city'. At the time of the entrance of Barabbas on his manhood, Jerusalem was seething with discontent. The whole nation was palpitating with hope, and lifting up its long shadowed face with expectation that the time of the Deliverer was at hand. 'Art Thou He that should come, or do we look for another?' was John's message to Jesus; and when Jesus was found to be able to sway the multitudes with His words, and feed the hungry with bread, thousands flocked round Him, assured that the long-looked-for King had come. Hope deferred had made the heart sick, but the spirit of the unconquerable Hebrew could not be broken, and in the Holy City itself, and especially under the walls of the Temple, insurrection was continually being plotted, and sedition hatched. There was a fierce and defiant Home Rule party in Judæa, whose unresting aim was to drive the Roman garrison from the Holy Land. Their chosen name was that of Zealots, because of their unquenchable zeal for the restoration of the Jewish Dominion. Out of their ranks came one of Christ's disciples, Simon Zelotes, whom Jesus taught a wider truth and a better way than his fiery heart had at first conceived. These Zealots were the Invincibles in the Jewish struggle, and it was they who, at the siege of Jerusalem, fought with so desperate a fury that they appalled the veteran and disciplined soldiers of Rome. In their stubborn courage they fell in heaps, defending the breaches in the walls. It was this band of Zealots which was ever fostering sedition and making insurrection in the city. Among their number was found young Barabbas, the son of the Master in Israel, eager to roll away the reproach of his people, hating the Roman rule with an implacable hatred, willing to do and dare anything, if only a Jewish king shall reign again in Jerusalem. Many looked with hope on the eager young face of Barabbas Zelotes.

3. The third significant thing we are told of him is, that he was a robber, and had committed murder in the insurrection. To the last he was no common thief or cut-purse, but a man who had chosen to intrigue and plot, and to take the sword against the Government of Rome. But from the first he had hated Rome more than he had feared God; he had more of the proud ambition of the partizan than the lowly spirit of holy waiting for God, and, at length, his defiant and regardless deeds made him a mark for a keen-eyed and long-armed Government. He was cast into prison, whence he expected to come only to die the traitor's death on the cross.

4. The fourth and only other thing we are told, is that, both by the priests and the people, he was preferred to Jesus.

II. Now, as the Evangelists tell us the story of Barabbas, they focus our attention on one moment of his life. It is that dramatic moment in which Jesus and Barabbas pass out of Pilate's presence together, which is to them so full of pathetic suggestions.

1. The first thought in their minds, as in the mind of every one who knows the story, is the startling and amazing contrast of their fate. A man of genius and skill, in our generation, George Tinworth, has worked out, in terra-cotta, the scene at this dramatic climax, with a discerning spiritual insight. From one door, passing before Pilate's judgment-seat, there issues Barabbas, smiling in exultation. The soldiers grasp him by the hand in rude congratulations. His friends seize him in transports of joy. The mob hails him with acclamation. By the other door, held by the hard grip of the callous soldiers, seeing no kindly face looking towards him, confronted by the relentless hate of the infuriated multitude, there issues Jesus. In all the crowd there is only one discerning, pitying heart. The artist has placed, not very far from Christ's door, a woman with a little child in her arms, and she turns on Jesus as He passes her wondering and compassionate eyes. The woman with the child, alone of all the throng, sees whose is the victory and the unfading glory. That is a master touch. To this day men walk our streets, and sit in our high places, with the triumphant pride of Barabbas, and neither they themselves nor others know how completely they have failed.

2. The second thought which attracts us is—how much Barabbas missed. We cannot help thinking of what might have been in the case of Barabbas. As we recall his radiant youth, his eager patriotism, his daring courage, his chivalrous devotion to Israel, we feel the soul of goodness that throbbed behind this man's life, his ardent abandonment to what he conceived to be the kingdom of God. This man, we see, might have been, and ought to have been, a disciple of Jesus. The very thing he so dimly and darkly saw, the thing he so fondly desired—the revival of the ancient glory of Israel—was being fulfilled by Jesus.

3. One other thought is plainly in the minds of the Evangelists. It is the madness and folly of the choice of the multitude. We can detect a note of pity for this befooled and blinded multitude, who chose a robber and murderer in preference to Jesus. We share this mingled amazement and sorrow. These Evangelists have caught something of the prayerful compassion of Jesus for those who did not know the time of their visitation. This multitude did not know whom they were rejecting, and did not know that they were closing the book of their history, fixing their eternal destiny, and quenching with their own breath their one hope of temporal peace and spiritual greatness, when they cried: 'Not this Man, but Barabbas!' But the crowd of condemning faces on which Jesus looks is larger than that which pronounced His doom in Jerusalem.—W. M. Clow, The Day of the Cross, p. 85.

REFERENCE.—XXVII. 16.—Josse Brett, The Soul's Escape, p. 28.

ENVY'S EVIL WORK

'For He knew that for envy they had delivered Him.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 18.

THE quiet, simple sentence in this condensed report of Christ's appearance before Pilate always arrests the mind. It is the statement by the evangelist of the inner judgment of Pilate. He had discerned the motives which lurked behind the air of justice on the part of the chief priests and elders. He knew the men with whom he had to deal. The sight of Christ, and the short interviews he had with Him, convinced him, not only of Christ's innocence, but of His spiritual majesty. But he was a man caught in the trap of his own past. Had his past been unstained, his action might have been different. He discerned the character of Christ. He was awed and touched by His greatness. 'He knew that for envy they had delivered Him.'

I. Let us first inquire what envy is. Envy must be distinguished from other passions which are sometimes confounded with it. There is a wise and commendable emulation which is far from envy.

Envy must also be distinguished from jealousy, although the one word in common speech is often interchanged for the other. Jealousy is the child of love—love that believes itself wronged, injured, robbed of its due.

Envy is the child of hate. Envy does not long to run in the race and claim fellowship with those who excel. Envy does not seek the love and the well-being of the person envied. Envy is a gnawing hate, an inward grief, a wasting impatience of spirit, the souring of the heart, the distemper of the soul, 'a rottenness of the bones'.

There is in the Chapel of the Arena, at Padua, a significant fresco, by Giotto, of 'Envy'. Giotto's representation is that of a man of mean, misshapen figure, with crouching shoulder, and craning neck. He stands in profile in the picture with lean cheek, sunken, averted eyes, one hand clutching a wallet of gold, the other stretched out with fingers shaped into claws. The ears are large, unshapely, distended. Out of the mouth there plays a serpent, whose fangs are striking Envy himself on the brow. Around the feet there leap up flames of fire. A master conception this of this passion of envy! Take one or two of the features. These large, distended ears are meant to signify that envy is on the alert for every babble of slander. The serpent in the mouth points to the poisonous insinuations, the fabricated stories which the tongue of envy is eager to tell. The hands, clawed like a vulture's, set forth the tearing motion and the clutching greed of the envious spirit; and the flames of fire round the feet mark the torture and despair in which envy lives—a torture and despair which are of hell. When we look at Giotto's picture, and read the story of the trial before Pilate, we no longer wonder at the quiet sentence, 'He knew that for envy they had delivered Him'. We understand that envy is no excusable resentment, no trifling meanness of the spirit, no transient passion, but a deep-seated, over-mastering, indwelling spirit of evil, which reaches its final expression when it hales its victim to his cross.

II. Let us now, in the second place, watch the consequences of envy.

1. Its simplest effect is to blind the mind; that is part of its confusion and evil work.

2. It also poisons the heart. As a poison strikes through the body and fevers the blood, so envy galls and fevers the heart.

3. The climax of evil consequence is reached when envy crucifies Christ.

III. But let us consider the remedy for envy. Envy may often visit the heart without reaching the climax of its consequence. There is no one who has not had a touch of envy at times. The man of saintly character and assured faith has found the subtle passion slipping into his heart, in some unwatchful moment, and troubling his peace. In one of the most thoughtful and uplifting of the Psalms this experience is detailed, and the sin and its remedy are disclosed. 'My feet were almost gone, my steps had well-nigh slipped. For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked.' And the Psalmist tells us the doubts that troubled his mind, and the darkness that fell upon his spirit. But he recovered. 'When I went into the sanctuary of God, then understood I their end.' Standing in the sanctuary he was illumined, the vision of God was given him again; the baseness of the things he had envied was borne in upon him; the manner of his envious desire stood clearly forth, and in God's light he saw light clearly. —W. M. CLOW, The Day of the Cross, p. 71.

'He knew that for envy they had delivered Him.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 18.

ANOTHER of Badman's sins, 'among the foulest villainies . . . rotting the very bones of him in whom it dwells,' was envy. Bunyan quotes Matthew xxvii. 18 to show what he means: 'For he knew that for envy they had delivered Him'. It is a certain malignant hatred of good, the lowest conceivable depth of wickedness. Its root is ignorance. For this we are usually held not to be accountable, but to Bunyan, whether we are accountable or not, was not worth debate. It was 'ignorance' which preferred Barabbas to Jesus.—MARK RUTHKRFORD, John Bunyan, pp. 183, 184.

REFERENCE.—XXVII. 18.—J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 156.

PILATE'S WIFE—MORAL INFLUENCE OF WOMEN

'And while Pilate was sitting on the judgment seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with that righteous man, for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 19.

OF Pilate's wife nothing is known but the bare fact, recorded by St. Matthew alone, that she interceded with her husband in favour of a prisoner who, for some reason unknown to us, had aroused her sympathetic interest.

Tradition says that her name was Claudia Procula, and that she was a Jewish proselyte. The Greek Church has canonized her, and she ranks among its saints.

The fact that this Roman lady felt so deeply about Jesus that she risked offending her husband by interposing in a matter which lay beyond her proper sphere is of many-sided interest.

I. It serves to illustrate in an undesigned way the profound impression made by our Lord upon women in every case where they came under the spell of His influence.

II. The incident may be used in illustration of the common remark that womanly instinct sometimes hits the mark while masculine calculation goes astray. So far as we know, the sole protest against the counsel and deed of those who forced on the tragedy of Calvary was the protest of a woman.—J. W. SHEPARD, Light and Life, p. 72.

PILATE'S WIFE

'When he was set down in the judgment seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with that just man: for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of Him.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 19.

EVERY religion may be tested, ethically and practically, by its appeal to womanhood. That faith which out-classes every other in its power to meet the needs of woman, and uplift her to moral beauty, will stand every other test of the truth of God. When Christ came with His meekness and lowliness, His searching and uncompromising hostility to sin, His compassion for weakness, and His great cross of love and atonement, womanhood fell down at His feet in a surpassing loyalty, and Christ placed a crown on her head. It was a man of Macedonia whom Paul saw in his vision, but it was a woman who listened by the river-side, and first made response to Christ. And to this day the voice of Christ finds its clear echo in women's hearts, and both gentle and simple are found reaching their noblest and highest when sitting at His feet.

It is then precisely what would have been expected, that amid the sad scenes of the tragedy of Christ's last day on earth, there should be told us this idyll of Pilate's wife. The story shines on the page like a strong gleam of sunshine on a winter day. It is a word of radiant prophecy in the record of a history laden with sorrow.

I. The first thing I remark about Pilate's wife was the sorrow and shame of her life. There is no doubt but that a tender love subsisted between Pilate and his wife. This cruel and worldly man had this redeeming virtue left him, as such men sometimes have. The altar flame of love had not gone out. The proof of this mutual love lies in the fact that she accompanied him to Jerusalem. A Roman governor was forbidden by law to take his wife with him to his province, very much for the same reason as a ship captain is forbidden to take his wife to sea. That law could be broken only by a strong personal appeal. But in that imperial age, hastening with swift strides to an unspeakable corruption, husbands were only too willing to be freed from a wife's watchful eyes, and wives were as willing to be left to live their butterfly lives amid the gaieties of a profligate Roman world. But Pilate's wife was more than eager to face the loneliness of a life among an alien people. Love broke even a stern Roman law. But how far apart had these two drifted—although their love still persisted. The young Pilate whom the woman had idealized, whose face had flitted through the dreams of her youth, whose career she had so hopefully anticipated, had deteriorated into this sordid, cruel, vengeful, murderous man. The women of Jerusalem who saw Pilate's wife looking out from her lattice, and caught the flash of the gems on her white hands, and marked the pride of her patrician face, and envied her ease and state, never guessed how wistfully she looked upon them, and how constant was this cloud of sorrow and of shame, because she knew herself to be the wife of a dishonourable man.

II. The second thing I remark about Pilate's wife is her service to her husband. 'When he was set down on the judgment seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with that just man.' It was a deed of singular daring. It was the last resource of a loving heart making one more appeal. To send a message with the attempt to sway the mind of the judge while he sat upon the seat of judgment was a punishable offence, and only the awfulness of the deed she saw about to be done could have moved her to it. Pilate may have smiled at her dream, but her words stung his conscience, and had there been any way of escape for this hardly pressed man, had he had courage to brave his fate, gladly would he have set Christ at liberty, and gone home to look with the eyes of a man, redeemed from his evil fate, in the face of her whose love had almost saved him.

That is the highest service a wife can do for her husband—to stand in the shadow while he faces public light; to be ever his counsellor, his helper, his gentle and yet unflinching preacher of righteousness—aye, to be his saviour—is her noblest office.

III. The third thing I remark about Pilate's wife is her intercession for Christ.

And so to this day P at 's wife walks at the head of all that long procession of nobly-born, and nobly-placed, and nobly-gifted women who do service for Christ. She leads the noble army of saintly martyrs and confessors. There follow in her train queens like Helena and St. Elizabeth of Hungary, women of generous hand like Lady Huntingdon, and of saintly wisdom like Lady Glenorchy; and those even greater and more devoted women, enshrined in the Book of Martyrs and the Scots' Worthies, true Ladies of the Covenant, who, when Christ, in His persecuted saints, walked again the way of weeping, cast aside their pride, placed no value on their rank, reckoned light the suffering, and stepped into the way with Him. Surely we shall not say too much when we believe that the name of Pilate's wife, though not written on this page, is written first on the roll of those women who laboured much in His Gospel, 'whose names are in the Book of Life'.—W. M. CLOW, The Day of the Cross, p. 99.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 19.—G. Lorimer, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 243. J. G. Stevenson, The Judges of Jesus, p. 129. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1647.

CHRIST, A PERPLEXITY

'What shall I do then with Jesus which is called Christ?'—MATTHEW XXVII. 22.

I. We may crucify the Saviour in many ways when we do not seem to be crucifying Him. That is the very subtlety of the devil's temptation. There would not seem to be any wickedness in not forgiving a man who had injured you very much and who had prayed for your pardon. If any soul has ever asked you to forgive him, that soul supplied you with the greatest opportunity of being a Christian that ever was supplied during your whole experience. To plead for mercy and not to receive it, the case being between two human hearts, that would stab the Saviour with a sixth wound.

There is another thing you can do with Christ: you can admire Him. Many persons admire Him, and get their livelihood out of Him: paint His portrait, surround His head with haloes, give His mother a nimbus, and give Himself as a Babe an aureole; all that you can do, but that is nothing. I have great fear of those who have not passed beyond the point of admiration. Jesus Christ came not to be admired, but to be believed, received, served. He is all, or nothing, and less than nothing.

There is a third thing you can do: you can adore Jesus. Now you are coming to higher ground. You can fall down before Him, you can offer Him your gold and frankincense and myrrh, not of mere gold and material, but of real reverence and love and faith, so that He shall be fairest among ten thousand and altogether lovely; not in form, but in the poetry of His meaning, in the ideality of His desire.

There is a fourth thing you can do: you can serve Him. What is 'to serve Him?' It is to suffer for Him. Do we serve Him? is His service a delight? if our lives were deprived of His service would they go down in music, in quality, in hope, in force? If you can say, Yes, then you are in very deed serving the Christ.

II. There are three things you cannot do with Christ.

1. You cannot get rid of Him. Some men may think they have dismissed Him, but they have not. It is Christ's habit, as it always has been from resurrection time, to appear unto some in 'another form'.

2. You cannot mistake Him for some one else. That is curious. The uniqueness of Christ is one of the greatest arguments in Christian apologetics. There is none to compare with Him.

3. You cannot change the terms of discipleship. They are severe terms. He never admits anybody easily into His kingdom. What is the way into the kingdom? The Cross is the only way. What is the object of discipleship? The Cross is the object of discipleship. Can I not have some ornamental cross, some ivory crucifix, and place it on my breast and say, Behold my tribe and my Master? No, this must be a heart-born Christ, this must be a cross that throws its shadow, yet its light, over the whole life. 'If any man would be My disciple, let him take up his cross daily and follow Me.'—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 184.

'They all say unto Him, Let Him be crucified.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 22.

LAST year about this time our Lord was, as it were, upon the Mount of Olives. He rode, as it were, triumphantly at the head of a small party to the market-cross of Rutherglen, and many cried 'Hosannah to the Son of David,' for a few days after. But since the 22nd of June, 1679, how many have cried out, 'Crucify Him, crucify Him, away with Him: we will have no more to do with Him. Christ is too dear a Lord for us. These field-meetings of His are too costly for us. We wish there had never been any of these field-meetings in Scotland!'—From a Sermon by RICHARD CAMERON.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 22.—S. H. Kellogg, The Past a Prophecy of the Future, p. 144. W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 102. V. R. Lennard, Passion-Tide and Easter, p. 45. T. Teignmouth Shore, The Life of the World to Come, p. 125. R. Baldwin Brindley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. p. 136. David Purves, ibid. vol. lxx. 1906, p. 70. T. Waugh, The Cross and the Dice-Box, p. 201. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 164. A. Goodrich, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 189. C. Stanford, The Evening of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 256. XXVII. 22-50.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2333.

PILATE WASHING HIS HANDS

'Pilate . . . took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 24.

I. The first point to notice is the vain plea for wrongdoing.

Pilate excused himself to himself on the ground that policy and self-defence forced him to his act. He could say 'I am innocent' because he said, 'I am obliged to connive at this crime'. Though in his case the plea is for a gigantic sin, and in our case it may be for a comparatively small one, the same sort of thing is being said by us continually.

There is nothing necessary for a man which he can only get or keep by tampering with conscience. There are two things needful for us: God and righteousness; and there is no third.

And in another way, the pleading of compulsion from without, as an excuse for evil, is evidently vain; because no man and no thing can force us to do wrong. We know, in each specific case, that, however strong the temptation may have been, we could have resisted it if we would, and that therefore the yielding to it was our act and ours only.

II. Notice here the possibility of entire self-deception.

This man had managed to persuade himself, on a very rotten plea, that he was entirely free from guilt in his act. And the fact that the man who did the most awful of crimes—though perhaps he was not the most guilty—could do it with the profession, to some extent sincere, of innocence, may teach us very solemn lessons.

You can persuade yourself that almost any wrong thing is right, if only you desire to do so. Inclination can silence conscience. The rush of passion can silence conscience. The very stress of daily life tends to weaken the power of pronouncing moral judgment on the things that we are doing. We all have sins altogether unsuspected by ourselves. There are plenty of us that do just as Pilate—who condemned himself in saying, 'I am innocent of the blood'.

III. Notice how here we get an illustration of the impossibility of wriggling out of responsibility.

It is very interesting to observe how the parties concerned—the conspirators, if I may say so—in this great tragedy try to shuffle the blame off their own shoulders and to place it on others. If there is anything a man's own, of which he cannot get rid, it is the burden of responsibility for his acts, and the inheritance of their consequences.

IV. Note the contrast between present and future estimates of our acts.

Pilate probably went back to Caesarea after the feast, thinking that he had got well out of what threatened to be an awkward business; and in all likelihood he never thought any more, either about that strange Prisoner, or about that stormy session in the Hall of Judgment. We have not to measure his guilt. It depends upon his knowledge, and his knowledge was very slight. But, for all that, one cannot help thinking of the shock of surprise which struck him when he passed beyond life, and ceased to be a governor and a judge, and stood at the bar of the Man whom he had condemned.

The same reversal of present and future estimates will come about with many of us. 'That fierce light which' flashes from the 'throne' will show the seaminess of many a life which looks fairly well by the candle-light of this present.—A. MACLAREN, The Wearied Christ, p. 222.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 24.—A. F. Winnington Ingram, The Men Who Crucify Christ, p. 20. XXVII. 24, 25.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1648. G. F. Browne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 184. H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (1st Series), p. 92. XXVII. 24-31.—C. Stanford, The Evening of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 289. XXVII. 25.—R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. 1. p. 189. Father Bernard Vaughan, Society, Sin, and the Saviour, p. 155. Hugh Black, University Sermons, p. 212. XXVII. 26.—W. P. Ballforn, Lessons from Jesus, p. 210. XXVII. 27.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2333. XXVII. 27-54.—Ibid. vol. xlviii. No. 2803; vol. 1. No. 2887. XXVII. 28.—W. P. Ballforn, Lessons from Jesus, p. 213.

*And they put a reed in His right hand: and they bowed the knee before Him, and mocked Him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews!—MATTHEW XXVII. 29.

It is so easy to be orthodox in creed and statement; so safe to rest in a merely traditionary belief, that many a decorous Christian fails to perceive the sure though invisible connexion between the life-confession and self-denial of a merely outward profession, and the broader form of denial by which all such profession is derided. Yet between Christ mocked and Christ rejected there is but a step; who shall say how easily it is taken, or how quickly we pass from the hollow homage, the 'Hail, Master!' which mocks our Lord, to the smiting and buffeting of open outrage? When Christ is invested with but the show of sovereignty, the reed placed in His hands will be quickly taken, as by the soldiers, to smite His head. This reed is nominal Christianity, a strange slip of a degenerate vine, beneath whose blighting shadow a poison-growth of unbelief never fails to root itself.—DORA GREENWELL

THE whole history of Christianity shows that she is in far greater danger of being corrupted by the alliance of power than of being crushed by its opposition. Those who thrust temporal sovereignty upon her treat her as their prototypes treated her Author. They bow the knee, and spit upon her; they cry 'Hail,' and smite her on the cheek; they put a sceptre in her hand, but it is a fragile reed; they crown her, but it is with thorns; they cover with purple the wounds which their own hands have inflicted on her; and inscribe magnificent titles over the cross on which they have fixed her to perish in ignominy and pain.—MACAULAY on Southey's Colloquies.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 29.—G. H. Morrison, The Return of the Angels, p. 34. W. H. Brookfield, Sermons, p. 216. C. Jerdan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 304. B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 25. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xx. No. 1168; vol. xlix. No. 2824.

'They led Him away to crucify Him.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 31.

A MONTH before his death, on 'Sabbath, 21st September,' says Dr. M'Crie, 'Knox began to preach in the Tolbooth Church, which was now fitted up for him. He chose for the subject of his discourses the account of our Saviour's crucifixion, as recorded in the twenty-seventh chapter of the Gospel according to Matthew, a theme upon which he often expressed a wish to close his ministry.'

REFERENCE.—XXVII. 32.—F. D. Huntington, Christian Believing and Living, p. 338.

'They came unto a place called Golgotha.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 33.

THAT spiritual beauty and spiritual truth are in their nature communicable, and that they should be communicated, is a principle which lies at the root of every conceivable religion. Christ was crucified upon a hill, and not in a cavern, and the word Gospel itself involves the same idea as the ordinary name of a daily paper.—G. K. CHESTERTON.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 33, 34.—G. Body, The School of Calvary, p. 26. XXVII. 33-44.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. II. No. 2942. XXVII. 33-50.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 317.

THE UNCONSCIOUS SERVICE OF CHRIST

'They gave Him vinegar to drink mingled with gall.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 34.

THE drink offered to Jesus was a narcotic. It was offered in mercy and it was offered by those opposed to His doctrines. It was given by the Roman soldiers with a view to mitigate His pain.

I. The act is deeply suggestive. It is an act of friendship performed by antagonists. We are in the habit of dividing the world into Christians and non-Christians. To which of the two classes did these Roman soldiers belong? They were certainly not followers of Jesus; but neither were they against Him. I am told that at the Day of Judgment those will be on the right hand who gave Him drink, and those on the left hand who did not. But here on earth, He has received drink from those apparently on the left hand. Roman soldiers have sought to assuage His sufferings!

II. Is it not the same still? We are so fond of sharp divisions that we forget the intermediate shades; but God does not. There are men among us who at this hour are helping Jesus, and who yet profess to yield no allegiance but to Cæsar. They are numbered among the legions, not among the saints. Yet, wherever the Son of Man is crucified, they are there.

III. Wherever humanity is heavy-laden, wherever souls are sad, wherever bodies are burdened, wherever days are darkened, wherever man is mastered by the physical, you will find them there. In the den of poverty, by the couch of pain, at the bed of languishing on the track of fallenness, you will find them there. Where Noah combats the waters, where Abraham journeys homeless, where Jacob lies on a stair, where Joseph weeps in a dungeon, where Moses mopes in a desert, where Elijah hides in a cave, where Job pines in an infirmary, where the Son of Man fasts in a wilderness, you will find them there. They see not the vintage and the gold; but they bear the vinegar and the gall.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 249.

THE ENDURANCE OF PAIN

'They gave Him vinegar to drink mingled with gall : and when He had tasted thereof, He would not drink.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 34.

In the reports of the Passion preserved for us in the Gospels, we are told that at three different times on that first Good Friday was a draught offered to our Lord ; and if we read the narratives with care, we shall observe that these draughts were not only offered Him under entirely distinct circumstances, but that His attitude with reference to them was distinct in each case.

I. Let us take first what St. John tells us. All things being now accomplished, we read that Jesus cried out in His agony that He was athirst ; and some of the soldiers in tardy mercy took pity upon the patient Sufferer, and offered Him a draught of the sour wine provided for their own use. And Jesus received it, and crying out, 'It is finished,' bowed His head, and breathed out His spirit.

'All things were accomplished.' He had done that for which He had come. And so He no longer keeps back the cry, 'I thirst'. The lesson is this, that pain, as pain, is of no moral value at all. To suffer a useless pain—that had no place in the economy of redemption ; and it has no place in the life of redeemed humanity. When all things were accomplished, Jesus accepted the bracing draught.

II. But yet pain of a sort, of a bitter sort, comes to us all. How are we to meet it ? Let us carry our thoughts back to another and earlier scene at Calvary. 'And the soldiers,' says St. Luke, 'also mocked Him, coming to Him, and offering Him vinegar, and saying, If Thou be the King of the Jews, save Thyself'. The wine-cup was offered in mockery to the King Who was in truth in their midst, though they knew it not. But He endured it all in patience and sadness. All things were not accomplished yet. It does not need that tragic story to teach us that there are some pains of life which are not in our power to evade. We had best endure them in silence. The cup of insult may be offered to us ; it does not rest with us to say whether we shall accept or reject it.

III. But the commonest pains of life are those which we at once ought to endure and which we could evade if we chose. As St. Mark has it, 'They gave Him to drink wine mingled with myrrh : but He received it not'. 'When He had tasted thereof, He would not drink,' says St. Matthew. Why not ? The Cross was to be endured with full consciousness. The cup which His Father had given Him He would drain to the dregs. All things were not yet accomplished.

Philosophers have taught us that there are different kinds of fortitude. There is the fortitude which will endure without murmuring the pain that we cannot escape ; but to endure pain that we may escape, if we will—that is the true courage. This was the fortitude of the Divine King on the cross. And perhaps, without too curious prying into the purpose and manner of the Atonement, we may see in one direction at least that the conquest that has been achieved by the Gospel of Christ would not have been inspired by a Victim—even a Divine Victim—unconscious at the last.

What is our lesson from this last act of self-denial of Jesus Christ ? Is it not this, that to suffer pain which we may evade if we will, to endure unto the end, is often the most imperative of duties ?

In the ordinary affairs of business we often see a man lose all profit of his toil because he will not take the small additional pains which are needed to bring his machinery or his organization to perfection. The same is true in science, it is true in art, it is true in every department of human activity. A French proverb tells us that it is the first step which costs ; but in truth the last step is as often the one which is critical.—J. H. BERNARD, Via Domini, p. 154.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 35.—F. Case, Short Practical Sermons, p. 104. T. G. Selby, The Cross and the Dice-Box, p. 3. W. J. Dawson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 349.

THE WORDS FROM THE CROSS

(Good Friday)

'And sitting down they watched Him there.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 36.

JESUS CHRIST's death on the cross was not only a sacrifice for our sins, but was also part of His great example. He there taught us how to suffer. Let us listen to the few words which came from those patient and holy lips, that we may learn something of the spirit in which, when our hour of suffering comes, we ought to take it.

I. We may very possibly have to suffer through the fault of others ; or, when we are suffering, it is possible that others may be hard or unkind to us. When those trials and temptations come, let us stop and think of Him Who was nailed to the cross. What were His first words when the nails had pierced His hands and feet, when the cross was set up, when the malice of His enemies had at length compassed what it sought, when the cup of agony was full ? Father, forgive them ; for they know not what they do. Jesus forgave the murderers who crucified Him. Jesus made an excuse for their cruel malice.

II. When we suffer, we generally think only of ourselves. We think that we have enough to bear without troubling ourselves about the wishes or sorrows of others. But watch Jesus Christ on the cross. Watch Him after that long morning of racking agony to nerve and to spirit. Wearied, worn, exhausted, dying, He sees His mother, and the disciple whom He loved. In His own bitter suffering, He sees how they are suffering ; He thinks of them ; He thinks of what would be a comfort and support to them. Woman, behold thy Son ! . . . Behold thy mother !

III. Nor did He think only of those who belonged to Him—His mother and His disciples. There was a poor wretched criminal, a murderer and a robber, the outcast and the offscouring of society, hanging at His side, hung there to do Him greater dishonour—to show Him to the world as worthy to die with the vilest malefactors. Yet, in the midst of His own torments, amid the jeers and brutal mockery of this miserable man's companion, He was willing to receive and be favourable to this poor creature's petition. How should we like, in moments of pain, in the hour of death, to be asked to consider the wants, and to minister to the comfort of an outcast, friendless soul, all its lifetime abandoned to hardened sin? We dare not answer for ourselves. We dare not think what we should do. But we know what the Redeemer did. We know that He did not grudge him words that the greatest saints would have hailed with rapture—To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise.

IV. To most of us, pain and sickness seem to bring a release from ordinary duties. We feel ourselves free from the obligations which lie on us in health. We think we need not be so strict. It is one of the great trials of suffering, that it makes us indifferent to what becomes of us, careless of our duties, and of other people who depend upon us. But in those times, think of Jesus Christ on the cross. He thought of fulfilling to the uttermost all that was appointed Him. It had been said of Him that He was to drink the vinegar, so He asked for it. He said, I thirst. He did not put it from Him as a needless, useless interruption in the midst of racking pain and faintness. He would not go till He could say, It is finished.

V. There is one strange and awful sentence of those which He spoke on the cross which we must sometimes have wondered at. My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me? Surely those are not the words of despair and distrust. What they fully mean, it would be dangerous to ask, for they are the words of the Incarnate Son of God in man's nature. But no more comforting words than they to our poor, weak, fainting nature, were spoken on the cross. On the cross Jesus Christ utters the same cry as His weak and fainting creatures. He takes David's words in the twenty-second Psalm and makes them His own; not to teach us to cry out against God; not to teach us to distrust God; not to encourage us to give way to hard thoughts of our Father in heaven; but to give us comfort, that if we have such feelings rushing into our minds sometimes, they need not be wrong ones, unless we make them so by our impatience and repining and want of faith.

VI. Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit, and having said this, He gave up the ghost. There He has taught us how to die. Say what we will, death is an awful parting. We love life, and it is hard to take leave of it, hard to lay it down. But here is our lesson. Let these words of Jesus Christ ever be in our hearts while we are in health, that they may be ready to come to our lips when we are dying. We must learn to say them from our hearts, in the hours of pain and sickness, that we may learn to say them as Christ said them when the spirit is almost gone. 'Father, into Thy hands I commend

My spirit.'—R. W. CHURCH, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 133.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 36.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 325. Coase Gordon Lang, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 209. J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. vii. p. 280. XXVII. 39, 40.—W. C. Magee, Christ the Light of all Scripture, p. 165. XXVII. 40.—H. Arnold Thomas, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 247. R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. iii. p. 136. XXVII. 41-43.—R. Dalby, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 221. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 332.

THE ALTERNATIVES

'He saved others; He cannot save Himself.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 42.

THESE are true words, but they were spoken by men who did not know how true they were. They describe the situation with exactness.

I. Looking back over the life of Jesus, as it is set forth for us in the Gospels, we see that, at every stage of His life, at every new departure in His work, these two alternatives were somehow set before Him—If He is to save Himself, He cannot do His work; if He is to do His work, He cannot save Himself.

From the tempter at the outset of His ministry, from His mother and His brethren during the course of it, from His disciples and Peter as it drew near its close, from the chief priests, elders, and scribes while He hung on the cross, and from the thief, who desired Him to use His Messiahship for His own benefit and theirs, from friend and foe alike, came the suggestion that there was an easy, a less costly way of accomplishing His work. From first to last, from whosoever the suggestion came, Jesus resolutely and steadfastly set it aside. Nor was it merely from those who thus presented the alternative to Him that the thought came. In the agony of the garden He asked if it were possible for the cup to pass? 'Father, if Thou be willing, remove this cup from Me.' With strong crying and tears He asked if it were possible to find a less costly way of doing His work.

II. We should miss the strength and comfort which should come to us from the devout study of our Lord's life, if we did not realize that all these suggestions which we have enumerated called Him to a real decision, and led Him to a greater victory. It was a real situation which always met Him, and at each step there was a possible parting of the ways, and He always had to make a real choice; and He chose the upward, thorny path which led to the agony of the garden and the death on the cross.

III. In our way and in our measure, we are also ever called on to make a similar choice. To each of us a mission has been given, a task has been assigned, and a work has been given to do. Each of us has only one life to live, one place to fill, one work to do. It can only be accomplished if we have a clear vision, a pure heart, a good conscience, and a resolute will.—J. IVERACH, The Other Side of Greatness, p. 18.

'He saved others; Himself He cannot save.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 42.

SAUVE QUI PEUT, Bonaparte is said to have exclaimed at Waterloo, along with his routed army. At all events this was the rule by which he regulated his actions, in prosperity as well as in adversity. For what is Vole qui peut! but the counterpart of Sauve qui peut! . . . What an awful and blessed contrast to this cry presents itself, when we think of Him of whom His enemies said, He saved others; Himself He cannot save! They knew not how true the first words were, or how indissolubly they were connected with the latter, how it is only by losing our life that we can either save others or ourselves.—JULIUS HARE.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 42.—J. W. Brown, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 390. W. Scott Page, ibid. vol. lxii. 1902, p. 418. J. Baines, Twenty Sermons, p. 139. W. Hay M. H. Aitken, Mission Sermons (2nd Series), p. 169. C. W. Furze, Sermons Preached at Richmond, p. 32. XXVII. 43.—C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 135. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2029. XXVII. 45.—H. E. Manning, Sin and Its Consequences, p. 201. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1896. XXVII. 45, 46.—Frederic Watson, The Seven Words from the Cross, p. 64.

THE CRY OF DERELICTION

'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?'—MATTHEW XXVII. 46.

WHAT do these words mean?

I. We cannot explain that cry as a momentary failing of human courage or human conviction. Every line of the Gospel forbids us to do so.

Think of His Name and why He bore it. 'He shall be called Jesus, for He shall save His people from their sins.' He Who was 'in the form of God' could not be happy in heaven while the cry of the world which He had created was beating upon His ears. He had spoken often and not in vain, through Prophets and Psalmists and holy men, and now the time had come for the last supreme appeal, the sovereign proof that what He bade His people be He was Himself. And therefore He went forth and took upon Him the form of a servant and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. He went forth and He went down. He could save; but only by going down, with His Divine Nature upon Him, into the very depths of the world; by getting under all the evil, and lifting it up with the strength of His own shoulders, and the suffering of His own body, soul, and spirit.

II. Now how far did He go down? He had suffered whatever man can suffer, betrayal by a friend and disciple, denial by the chief of His Apostles, degrading insults and bodily anguish, such as we shrink from putting into words. And now at the last came those jeering priests. And He must have asked Himself, What are these men? and where are they? And beyond the indifference of the ignorant and careless, beyond the cowardice of timid friends, beyond the animal cruelty of rough soldiers, beyond and below all this, He must have seen and entered a lower depth still—the mind of those who knew or ought to know, who had read their Bibles, who thought themselves the chosen people of God, and yet could crucify their Christ, and then could mock and jibe with the vilest of the vile at the foot of the cross—the mind of those who are in the outer darkness, hating the light. For one black moment He became as they, that He might be able to save even them.

Then came that loud cry—was it 'Father, into Thy hands I commit My Spirit'? was it 'It is finished'?—a loud triumphant cry. God is the Father again, the horrible vision has passed, and the end has come.

III. It is horrible; and yet it is the condition of power and success. For what is the horror? It is the sense of God's absence, the feeling of abandonment in the outer darkness. And who can feel that except those who know what God's presence means? Only those who have tasted of love, joy, and peace can understand what evil is. Others may see the outward symptoms of evil, the squalor, the vice, the hopelessness; they alone know the root of the disease, and therefore the way to cure it. Doctors tell us that you cannot cure symptoms. You can alleviate them, and it is a duty to do that, if you can do no more. But to cure you must get down to the cause, and is not that the absence of God? and can you make men understand that unless you know all that it means?

Let this mind be in you, says St. Paul in the Epistle, which was in Jesus Christ. Go down like Him and suffer and learn, in His name and in His strength.—CHARLES BIGG, The Spirit of Christ in Common Life, p. 274.

THE FOURTH WORD FROM THE CROSS

'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?'—MATTHEW XXVII. 46.

I. We are told in the Bible that there was a great darkness over all the land, from the sixth hour till the ninth. And in the midst of this outward darkness it would seem that our Lord remained quite silent till at last He uttered these words, 'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?' Why was this darkness? Was it to point out our Saviour as the Light of the world? When He was born at Bethlehem a bright star appears; when He dies the sun veils His face. Let us catch from it this certain truth, He was the true Light. Jesus is come to be a new light to man, a new revelation, a new force, a new light for men to walk by to God.

II. But these words of our Lord, though perhaps the most difficult, have been as fruitful as any in comfort to the simple-hearted. They have been a comfort in helping good people when tempted to despondency. Here they have looked up and have seen, as it were, our Lord, not in bright cheerfulness but in darkness, and they have heard His voice crying, 'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?' as though He were depressed in soul. As we have seen Him suffering outwardly in the body, so this was some inward agony of the soul, the crucifixion, so to speak, of His heart. And He cried,

'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?' It was an extreme agony as though He were being shut out from the presence of God. Not that there was any sense of being actually lost; not that there was any sense of God's wrath upon Himself; because it is still, 'My God, My God'.

III. We need to be more careful, perhaps than we are, about desponding thoughts. They may be very much checked by being watchful over our imaginations. Be careful of indulging your imaginations, either way, towards success, which may lead you to vanity; towards failure which may lead you to despondency, to despair, to unworthy distrust of God. Do your best to keep in check this power of the imagination, and if you—like many saints before you, yea like our Divine Master—have sometimes to pass through a cloud in the journey of life, do not be afraid, if you sometimes have to feel that you are left, deserted; look up to Him, and listen to His word, which He has uttered for our consolation, our hope, 'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?'—BISHOP KING, Meditations on the Last Seven Words of Our Lord Jesus Christ, p. 37.

ACCORDING TO THE SCRIPTURES

'Jesus cried with a loud voice, My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?'—MATTHEW XXVII. 46.

THEY are the words of the greatest Commentator on the Old Testament that the world has ever known. When Christ presents the Passion Music of the twenty-second Psalm, the experience with which from that moment the ancient words become redolent as they ascend to Him Who is throned above the praises of Israel, makes their citation on Calvary the supreme instance of 'The Psalms in Human Life'. Enriched as they have been with fresh associations of joy and sorrow in every age, it is the crowning triumph of this wonderful book that it was able to express Golgotha.

I. The Realism of Christ.—One thing at least which becomes at once apparent as Jesus uplifts this deep-throated chant upon the evening air is the intense realism of His nature. There is no dreamy idealism or sentimental mysticism in Him Who reigns from the Tree. He has all the living interest in sensation, in the actualities of experience, which marks the largest personalities. We see why it was that He refused the draught of medicated wine, which would have mitigated suffering and deadened pain. There awaited Him a fuller and more satisfying experience than the most crowded hour of glorious life, to see of the travail of His Soul, and to taste death. It is a mark of true nobility, befitting a Richard Grenville or a Robert Browning, to be ready to bear the brunt of the last conflict with unbandaged eyes. But what shall we say of a Spirit like that to which these great words bear witness, as He surveys the scene of His Crucifixion and the agony of His inward experience, nor fails to interpret either to the ear of succeeding generations? Jesus Christ is never more miraculously real than in the hour of death.

He reigns because He lives. Every moment as it passes is real to Him. This is a necessary element in the highest type of influence. It is not only to the men of business, heaping up riches and therefore walking in a vain show, that the self-absorption, the other-worldliness, the unpractical quietism of the saints is an offence and a barrier. Natural instinct puts us on the side of Lippo Lippi. We feel that, if the world is to be redeemed, it must be first loved, realized, and, above all, seen. The taste of wine, the scent of roses, the bustle at the street corner, the play of facial expression, the children crying in the market-place—you, who would fain bear aid to the human race, will accomplish little if you do not appreciate these things. Fact must be a very sacred thing to you—something axiomatic, a postulate which must be conceded as the condition of your taking life seriously. Docetism leads nowhere. A phantom Christ cannot redeem. That, it may be said in passing, is the appropriate criticism of a theology which sits loosely to the empty tomb or the Virgin Birth.

View it how we will, there can be no doubt that it is not the thought but the Passion of Jesus that has moved the world. This wonderful capacity for experience, not the sweep of His intelligence, is the true warrant of His power to redeem. With Him there are no aristocratic exemptions. He belongs to the painful people. What He tholes is the measure of what He works. Christ with His touches of things common belongs entirely to the realm of reality. His reach extends to the whole gamut of human experience. He sees, He hears, He feels. So perfectly does He bear that, far from forgetting His sufferings, He can make them equally with the impressions of sight and sound the object of a contemplation unspoiled by self-pity. 'They pierced My hands and My feet; I may tell all My bones.' Is not this the plain inference from the words that rise to His lips when at last the time for utterance has come? He muses upon the Psalm, He cons it over, He fits its passages to the blood-red experience of the Tree; His thoughts are hot within Him till His meditations find a voice, and at the last He speaks with His tongue.

II. The Transcendence of Calvary.—It requires no doctrine of inspiration, no theory of the relation of prophecy to fulfilment, to see that when with loud voice Jesus cried, 'My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?' He proclaimed from the Cross, as from a universal pulpit, that Calvary is God's transcendent act, whereby He has taken to Himself the shame and sorrow of a guilty race, and out of failure has perfected praise. Never, while the world lasts, will the imagination of Christendom cease to dwell on the weird correspondence between the incidents of this marvellous Psalm and the successive episodes of the Passion. Never will the Christian believer cease to recognize the power and presence of that purposeful Spirit which reaches from one end to the other, guiding towards its appointed consummation the progressive destiny of mankind. But it is the mind and will of Christ Himself that have given to the language of this ancient poet their true significance and undying power. From the day when the Crucified took these words upon His sacred lips they have become Christ's own commentary on the Cross. 'We behold Him, Who hath been made a little lower than the angels, even Jesus, because of the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour.'—J. G. SIMPSON, The Guardian, 25 February, 1910.

THE SAVIOUR'S QUESTION ON THE CROSS

(For Good Friday)

'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken me.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 46.

WE remember how our Blessed Saviour was withdrawn into a deep silence for some considerable time before He spoke these words. There is very much to be learned from the silence of Jesus Christ. It teaches us how we may most fittingly bear the chastisements of God.

Two things we notice about this mysterious cry of the stricken Saviour. First of all, that it is a question, the only question, which, so far as we are told, was ever uttered to the Father by His lips: 'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?' And the Blessed Son of God seems to put Himself, as it were, with those holy men of old who at different times and stages of Israel's history pleaded with God concerning His judgments.

And yet, in the second place, how strange it is that to that question there is no reply, as if to teach us of the mystery of God's dealing with men. What an unspeakable mystery is the Atonement of Christ! We see enough to satisfy our reason to some extent; we see enough to reassure our aching heart, but we cannot fathom the mystery of what Jesus did upon the cross. Religion does not profess to give us cut and dried answers to every futile or unreasonable question that we may ask. All we know is, and that is quite enough for us, that he that followeth the Lord Jesus Christ shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life. And so I suppose in this utterance Jesus shows Himself the helper of the perplexed. Let us be sure that God's judgments are a great deep, that there is much which in this life at least we must be content not to know, and that our Blessed Lord passed victorious through the pain of perplexity and went forth into the light once more.

And one more thought is this—the thought of the faithfulness of our Creator. He does not say, 'My Father, My Father,' but 'My God, My God'. He appeals to God as a Creator. He commits His soul as to a faithful Creator, and He knows that He is safe. Though a man does not see what is the exact meaning, what is the end of the discipline through which he passes, he may commit himself to God with the faithful assurance that he will not be forsaken. For man is not alone in his search for truth. The truth is seeking him.

And so for our comfort in perplexity let us remember that the Blessed Saviour Himself has got a heart that can sympathize with the perplexed, and that He for Whom we seek here, and for Whom we wait, and for Whom we long, will manifest Himself, if not here, then beyond the veil, and in due season we who seek after Him shall find Him, and we shall reap if we faint not.

THE WORD OF AGONY

(For Good Friday)

'Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? . . . My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?'—MATTHEW XXVII. 46.

THIS I would term the Word of Agony. The word of Tender Care and the word of Agony come close together, but it is significant.

In the cry 'Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?' our Lord goes back to the Syriac, His old vernacular. You have heard people who are in a great agony going back to their old language: it often happens. So our Lord goes back to His old vernacular, and cries 'Eli, Eli, . . .' which being interpreted is, 'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?'—the most mysterious of all the words. First of all, fancy His saying 'My God, My God!' Hitherto it has been 'My Father'. It is the cry which comes from His perfect human nature. It shows us that we must not confound our Lord's human nature with His Deity. We cannot understand these things: we cannot understand how He could 'increase in wisdom and stature' when He was the Eternal Son of God; but He did. We do not know why He cried 'My God, My God'; but He did; it was perfect human nature. It is the cry of agony. He was born with a perfect human nature that He might die a perfect human death. He was the Man Christ Jesus 'Who tasted death for every man'. But He was also God.

I. What made Him cry, then? Was it weakness? No. It could not be weakness, because afterwards He cried with a loud voice: He was not exhausted. Was it, do you think, that He had made a mistake and thought that God had forsaken Him? No. He could not make a mistake. He never made a mistake in His life, and not in His death. But had God forsaken Him? How could God forsake God? The only explanation that I can possibly give you is that He willed to feel forsaken that you and I might never be forsaken.

But, to be forsaken of God! We cannot get out of it, because it is so personal. 'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?' If God forsook a sinner we could understand. But the Saviour! It was to teach us the lesson that 'the Lord hath laid upon Him the iniquity of us all'. As representing Sin, He had to go through the Passion of seeming forsaken. 'He became Sin' (hear the words of Scripture; I do not understand these things, but I believe and worship) 'Who knew no sin.' And why did He become Sin? For me. 'He loved Me, and gave Himself for me.'

II. There are times when you and I have come very near to Atheism. When things have gone entirely wrong; when the nearest and dearest have been taken away from us; when all our hopes are shattered, we have said to ourselves, 'Well, I doubt really whether there be a God at all. At any rate, if there is one, He has forsaken me!' I do not say that you have passed, but I do say that you may pass, through this gloom. For during the Passion darkness came upon the land, and when you have your passion (it may be at midday or midnight, and though the sun be shining in the heaven yet it may be as dark around you as night) you may say, 'I am a God-forsaken man'. And He will be near you, I know, and forgive you and excuse you. And when, afterwards, the sun begins to shine upon your life again, and you are sorry you ever said or thought such a thing, you can say to Him, 'Thou, dear Saviour, didst say in thine Agony, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" I lie down under Thy cross, and hide myself in Thine Agony, and cover myself with Thy Blood of Redemption'.

'Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? that is to say, My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken Me?'—MATTHEW XXVII. 46.

SUCH words may not have been uttered, but such despair has been felt by preachers, reformers, and prophets of old time and of all time—by Job, David, and Isaiah; by John the Baptist, St. Francis, Savonarola, George Fox; by Tolstoy and Mazzini. Lama Sabachthani is often the last cry of men whose life seems to end in ignominious failure, but whose very groans have a vital force long after they are gone.—FREDERIC HARRISON.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 46.—George Macdonald, Unspoken Sermons, p. 163. A. G. Mortimer, Lenten Preaching, p. 200. C. J. Vaughan, Words from the Cross, p. 43. W. Newman, Meditations on the Seven Last Words, p. 51. W. Wade, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 123. C. Stovell, ibid. vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 197. A. F. Winnington Ingram, ibid. vol. lxxviii. 1908, p. 276; see also Addresses in Holy Week, 1902, p. 78; Lenten Addresses, p. 64. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 92. V. S. S. Coles, Good Friday Addresses at St. Paul's Cathedral, p. 25. W. Morison, Passio Christi, p. 20. C. J. Ridgeway, Thoughts for Good Friday, p. 33. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvi. No. 2133; vol. xlviii. No. 2803. F. E. Winslow, Plain Preaching to Poor People (10th Series), p. 37. J. E. Vernon, Meditations on the Seven Words from the Cross, Plain Preaching to Poor People (6th Series), p. 34. A. N. Obbard, Plain Sermons, p. 222. J. Pulsford, Our Deathless Hope, p. 92. S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 71. F. E. Paget, Plain Preaching to Poor People (9th Series), p. 109.

'Some of them when they heard that, said, This man calleth for Elias.'—MATTHEW XXVII. 47.

IN His work for man it is the constant fate of God to be misunderstood.—ROTHE.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 47-50.—W. Pulsford, Trinity Church Sermons, p. 119. Parker, Inner Life of Christ, vol. iii. p. 248. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1869. J. Keble, Sermons for Holy Week, p. 284. T. R. Stevenson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. v. p. 328. A. P. Stanley, ibid. vol. xvii. p. 193. G. Macdonald, Unspoken Sermons, p. 163. R. M. McCheyne, Additional Remains, p. 183. Preacher's Monthly, vol. i. p. 294. C. J. Vaughan, Lessons of the Cross and Passion, p. 150.

Clergyman's Magazine, vol. ii. p. 153; vol. iv. p. 89. Homiletic Quarterly, vol. i. p. 60. W. H. Aitken, Mission Sermons (2nd Series), p. 169. XXVII. 48, 49.—W. V. Mason, Short Addresses for Holy Week, p. 32. XXVII. 50, 51.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2015. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. i. p. 239. XXVII. 50-53.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2059. XXVII. 50-54.—Ibid. vol. xxxix. No. 2311. XXVII. 51.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 341. XXVII. 52, 53.—I. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 43. XXVII. 54.—R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. iii. p. 136. S. W. Skeffington, The Sinless Sufferer, p. 93. XXVII. 55.—H. R. Haweis, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 24. XXVII. 55, 56.—A. F. Winnington Ingram, Addresses in Holy Week, 1902, p. 30. XXVII. 56.—B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 78. XXVII. 57-60.—T. A. Gurney, The Living Lord and the Opened Grave, p. 1. XXVII. 60.—V. R. Lennard, Passion-Tide and Easter, p. 107. XXVII. 61.—T. A. Gurney, The Living Lord and the Opened Grave, p. 19. R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 12. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1404. XXVII. 63.—F. Fowle, Plain Preaching to Poor People (2nd Series), p. 39. XXVIII.—R. Steer, The Words of the Angels, p. 72. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2518.

'As it began to dawn toward the first day of the week.'—MATTHEW XXVIII. 1.

DID you ever read Isaac Taylor's Saturday Evening? In 1842 B. Gregory introduced it to me. What it was all about I have forgotten, but not the deep tranquil impression made by it—

Light
Which broods above the sunken sun,
And dwells in heaven half the night. . . .

Well, that was Isaac Taylor's Saturday evening, and this is mine; and for many years every Saturday evening I have felt just like that, 'In the beginning of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week'.

My dawning is begun, like the Jews' dawning, the evening before . . . for the sense of benignity and regard, outgoing and unrestrained, is always very strong upon me, being like deep waters—a tidal sway of affection—'of pure affection round earth's human shores'; and it is one of the most delicious feelings on earth. As Saturday evening is to the coming Sabbath, so is this feeling to the coming heaven.—JAMES SMETHAM.

REFERENCES.—XXVIII. 1.—R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 12. XXVIII. 1-10.—T. A. Gurney, The Living Lord and the Opened Grave, p. 196. XXVIII. 1-15.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 350. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2323. XXVIII. 2.—B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 7. A. G. Mortimer, Jesus and the Resurrection, p. 82. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 863. XXVIII. 2-5.—R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 33. XXVIII. 4-6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2773.

SEEKING JESUS

'I know that ye seek Jesus.'—MATTHEW XXVIII. 5.

How much more do the angels know? If they know anything, they may know something more; they may be better acquainted with us than we suppose. We must be of interest to them because we are of interest to their God. The angels are inquirers, students; they desire to look into the meaning of the blood.

It is an angel who speaks in this most tender and musical text. 'I know that ye seek Jesus.' This is in striking contrast to something that is also related in the context—to the great earthquake. Man is ever so helpless as in an earthquake. God keeps the earthquake for special occasions. The sturdiest man amongst us withers away when he feels the earth rocking. The angel answered and said unto the women, 'It is different with you, you have no need to fear'—'for I know that ye seek Jesus,' and they who seek Jesus need never tremble; earthquake, or no earthquake, their sanctuary is safe.

I. The difference between the people who fear spiritual presences and the people who do not fear them and rather welcome them, is this: the one people seek the sepulchre, the other seek the Christ. There are many people who have no objection to the sepulchre, there are travellers who go long distances in order to see the sepulchre who would not move an inch to see the Saviour. Such men are lovers of form, special places, extraordinary ceremonies. To see the sepulchre is what they come for; they would be afraid if they saw Him who had lain in it but some three days ago.

II. 'Fear not,' though you are seeking Christ at the wrong place, as these women were. We must have greater sympathy with people who are trying by some stumbling way to get at the right end. We have been too severe with the stumblers. They are just as good souls as we are, they may even be nearer heaven than those whose Christianity is a mere correctness. Christianity is not an exercise in conventional correctness. Some poor honest souls are going to the wrong place, but they are going for the right thing; they are orthodox. He who seeks truth with an honest soul and a clean heart is orthodox, though he does not believe a word that I believe, in its merely alphabetical or controversial sense.

III. Our Christianity needs widening and deepening; we have all the earth part of it, but we want the firmament. No man was ever saved by correct notions. Man is more than a coat, man is more than a body. Man has a body, but he is a spirit. All this may be perverted by those who would pervert bread and water. We cannot always guard ourselves against the perverting spirit, it is a most mischievous and uncontrollable spirit; we must not therefore give way to those who would shut us up to our own little nutshell notions and say that there is nothing beyond. God has still more light, and we must find it, because to seek it is to obey an impulse Divine.

IV. Some seek Christ as an ideal. Ideal is the favourite word of the ecclesiastical hour; in fact, it is the idol-word of the political hour as well. Some seek Christ as an ideal, a novelty in poetry, a variety in intellectual life. Jesus Christ is enrolled and honoured and invited to a very high place in the pantheon, and He is told that this seat, this throne of ivory, is His own. He is regarded as an ideal. What did the angel say? He spoke other language, he spoke in accordance with tragic facts; the air was still hot with the terrible tragedy, and the angel caught its spirit and expressed it in a word. He said, 'I know ye seek Jesus'—yes, but what Jesus? the ideal, poetic, transcendental Jesus? No—'I know that ye seek Jesus, which was crucified'. That is His title; do not abbreviate it, do not corrupt it by excision; it will bleed to death if you do not give the full style, title, and address of the Son of God. 'Jesus, which was crucified'—the man in whose palms the nails were driven and on whose brow the thorns were enwreathed; I know the Christ you are seeking; you know Him by blood-marks. That is the Christ we have too much forgotten. We are admirers, but not believers. Drop your admiration, and get back to living faith in Him who was crucified. Crucifixion meant redemption. On the one side the crucifixion was a Jew's murder; on the other, a Divine expiation, a new illumination, of the will of God, a grand interpretation of the purpose of the creation of human nature.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. vi. p. 194.

REFERENCES.—XXVIII. 5, 6.—F. W. Farrar, Expository Sermons on the New Testament, p. 38. XXVIII. 5-7.—J. Grierson, Scenes and Interviews with the Risen Saviour, p. 11. XXVIII. 5-8.—R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 63. XXVIII. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 18; vol. xviii. No. 1081. W. C. E. Newbolt, Church Times, vol. xlix. 1903, p. 512. I. Lloyd, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 246. R. W. Dale, ibid. vol. lxviii. 1895, p. 230. A. L. Kemp, ibid. vol. lxvii. 1905, p. 233. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 313; see also Sermons for the Aged (3rd Series), p. 53. R. J. Campbell, New Theology Sermons, p. 17. T. T. Munger, The Freedom of Faith, p. 295. A. G. Mortimer, Jesus and the Resurrection, p. 109. J. Keble, Sermons on Various Occasions, p. 523. D. Rose, Christian World Pulpit, vol. i. p. 321. G. W. McCree, ibid. vol. xxxix. p. 314. Preacher's Monthly, vol. ix. p. 214; vol. x. 117. Homiletic Quarterly, vol. ii. p. 562. Armitage, American Pulpit of the Day, vol. i. p. 251. XXVIII. 7.—T. T. Munger, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. p. 273. XXVIII. 8-10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2323.

TWO ENVIRONMENTS

(Preached on Easter Sunday Morning)

'Jesus met them.'—MATTHEW XXVIII. 9.

Jesus had a way of meeting people unexpectedly. He has never abandoned that significant and blessed way. Jesus waylays men; Jesus watches the travellers, counts their footfalls, observes the whole manifestation of their personality when they are in grief and wonder and tender communication one with another; and at the right moment, for Jesus keeps all the moments, He joins them, faces them, suddenly encounters them, and asks them delicate and feeling questions. The appearances of Jesus Christ would seem to be always sudden, though they have been expected for centuries; for they have been foretold by the most elaborate and dignified prophecy.

I. Shall we look at the environment of the Resurrection? What is that first object that you see? 'It is a garden; there is a tomb in it.' I do not speak of that, I reverse your sentence, retaining its history and enlarging its meaning. We could say moaningly and fretfully, almost, indeed, atheistically, There was a tomb in the garden. That is poor talk. How can you improve it? Easily, by almost inverting it: there was a garden round the tomb. That is better, the Gospel gleams in that nobler talk. In my lowest moods, in my saddest depression, I see only the tomb, and after some spirit has talked with me for a moment I lose sight of the tomb in the broader, lovelier view of the garden. Let the athiest say there was a tomb in the garden; I pray my God to help me to say there was a garden around the tomb.

Is there anything in the environment of the resurrection to match the garden beauty and the garden fragrance? Yes. What is it? Morning: 'As it began to dawn'. It always begins to dawn when we are conscious of the presence and the blessing of the dear Lord. His coming means light, morning, something that has to grow, an increasing light, a gleam of the heavenly lightning that makes and seeks the eternal that it means. So far, then, the environment is right, garden and morning, how they match one another! what a duet is that! let them sing their music to the accompaniment of the spheres. Garden and morning—what next? What we call spring, April, the time when the green blade is coming up or the little flower has fought its way through the frost and snow. When Christ rises all things rise; when Jesus comes up from the tomb there is no tomb, He has left it; now there is nothing but vernal beauty, vernal music thrills the responding air. A lovely environment, garden, morning, spring—what more? Angels. A beautiful picture it is to see the angel of the Lord coming and thrusting back the little pebble that was rolled to the door of the tomb, and—oh the subtle irony! oh the holy contempt!—rolling back the stone and sitting on it! Marmion waved the fragment of his blade in sign of victory, a sign in its way and at the time pardonable, but there stands out one utterance and expression of victory grander than Marmion's waving of his blade. The angel of the Lord flicked away the stone with its red Roman seal, and having set it a few inches away sat upon it. It is then a right beautiful environment, and full of holy suggestion, and wet with a very gracious pathos, wet as with sacred tears, such as might have dropped from heaven. Garden, morning, spring, angels; that is resurrection, resurging, coming back to flood and throne and final diadem.

II. We do not see all the beauty of that environment until we contrast it with the environment of the birth. What do we see at the nativity of Christ? A manger, and no garden; night—'and there were shepherds keeping their flocks by night'. This Child is going to be born in the darkness, He may bring the light with Him, He has always done so, He will not fail at Bethlehem. A child always brings light with it; the darkness has notice to quit the moment the child cries. Manger, night, and what we call winter. We keep the Saviour's birthday when the snow is on the ground; the keener the frost, the more highly piled the snow, we say, This is true Christmas weather. Not resurrection weather; something has happened between the winter and the spring, something has taken place between the fall of that snow, the growing of that ice, and the breathing of that balmy breeze over Jerusalem. 'This same Jesus,' Jesus of the garden and the morning, of the spring and of the angels, was once the Jesus of the manger and the night and the winter.

III. Look at the spiritual and ideal significance of these two environments, and especially the environment of the resurrection. What is the meaning of all this? The meaning is poetry, ideality, higher consciousness, a continually self-refining spirituality, a continually shedding off of the old and the poor and the mean that belongs to our own nature, and a constant rising into the true manhood. I belong to an ancestry, quoth one, who shot king after king on field after field. And I, quoth another, have no blood records in my family—

Higher far my proud pretensions rise,
A child of parents passed into the skies.

And if you have the gracious soul, the beautiful spirit, the very soul of charity and helpfulness to others, that is fame. All else may be but infamy.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. I. p. 142.

REFERENCES.—XXVIII. 9.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 360. J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. i. p. 142. XXVIII. 9, 10.—J. Grierson, Scenes and Interviews with the Risen Saviour, p. 60. H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (4th Series), p. 144. R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 103. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2628.

'Then saith Jesus, go tell My brethren that they depart into Galilee.'—MATTHEW XXVIII. 10.

IN Thomas Boston's Memoirs for 9 December, 1710, the following entry occurs: 'This night I was in bad case. I find it is not easy for me to carry right, either with or without the cross. While I was walking up and down my closet in heaviness, my little daughter Jane, whom I had laid in bed, suddenly raising up herself said, She would tell me a note; and thus delivered herself: Mary Magdalen went to the sepulchre. She went back again with them to the sepulchre; but they would not believe that Christ was risen, till Mary Magdalen met Him; and He said to her, "Tell My brethren, they are My brethren yet". This she pronounced with a certain air of sweetness. It took me by the heart: "His brethren yet" (thought I); and may I think that Christ will own me as one of His brethren? It was to me as life from the dead.'

O INFINITE mercy! How dost Thou raise their titles with Thyself! At first they were Thy servants, then disciples; a little before Thy death, they were Thy friends; now, after Thy resurrection, they were Thy brethren. O mercy without measure, why wilt Thou, how canst Thou, O Saviour, call them brethren, whom in their last parting, Thou foundest fugitives? Did they not run from Thee? And yet Thou sayest, 'Go, tell My brethren!'—BISHOP HALL.

REFERENCES.—XXVIII. 10.—F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. i. p. 187. XXVIII. 11-15.—C. S. Robinson, Sermons on Neglected Texts, p. 100. E. D. Solomon, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxi. p. 293. Parker, Inner Life of Christ, vol. iii. p. 276. A. Barry, Cheltenham College Sermons, p. 383. XXVIII. 11-20.—G. Jackson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 275. XXVIII. 16.—R. Linklater, ibid. vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 408. XXVIII. 16, 17.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Matthew XVIII.-XXVIII. p. 369; see also After the Resurrection, p. 102. G. Grierson, Scenes and Interviews with the Risen Saviour, p. 234. XXVIII. 16-20.—B. F. Westcott, The Revelation of the Risen Lord, p. 153. R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 596. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2330. A. G. Mortimer, Jesus and the Resurrection, p. 215. XXVIII. 17.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 167. A. M. Mackay, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 253. XXVIII. 18.—G. W. Kitchen, Christus Impeccator, p. 18. A. F. Winnington Ingram, Lenten Mission, 1905, p. 28. W. T. Barber, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 403. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2455. XXVIII. 18, 19.—E. P. Liddon, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 11. R. J. Campbell, ibid. vol. lv. 1899, p. 273. C. Brown, ibid. vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 309; see also God and Man, p. 147. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 383.

OPTIMISM

'Go ye therefore, and make Christians of all nations.'—MATTHEW XXVIII. 19.

I. AMONG the characteristics of Jesus' teaching which have passed into the higher consciousness of Christianity is an inextinguishable optimism. If He called apostles they were to disciple every creature, and if He died it was for a world. His generation might condemn Him, but they would see Him again on the clouds of heaven. He looks beyond His own land, and embraces a race in His plans.

1. This high spirit has passed into the soul of Christ's chief servants. The directors and pioneers, the martyrs and exemplars of our faith have no misgivings; the light of hope has ever been shining on their faces. They might be losing but their Commander was winning. The Cross might be surrounded with the smoke of battle, it was being carried forward to victory.

2. They were right in this conviction, but do not let us make any mistake about the nature of this triumph, else we shall be caught by delusions, and in the end be much discouraged. The kingdom of God will not come through organization but through inspiration. Its signs will not be the domination of a Church, but the regeneration of humanity.

II. Have there been no grounds for optimism? Has the splendid hope of Christ been falsified? One may complain that the centuries have gone slowly, and that the chariot of righteousness has dragged upon the road. But Christ has been coming and conquering. We are apt to be pessimists, not because the kingdom of God is halting, but because it has not raced, not because the Gospel has failed to build up native churches in the ends of the earth with their own forms, literature, martyrs, but because every man has not yet believed the joyful sound.

1. There are two grounds for the unbounded optimism of our faith, and the first is God. How did such ideas come into the human mind? Where did the imagination of the Prophets and Apostles catch fire, where is the spring of the prayers and aspirations of the saints? Whence do all light and love come? Surely from God.

2. The other ground for optimism is Jesus Christ. Does it seem that the perfect life for the individual and for the race is too sublime; that it is a distant and unattainable ideal? Christ lived as He taught. He bade men lose their lives and He lost His; He bade men trample the world under foot, and He trampled it; He commanded men to love, and He loved unto death. This He did as the forerunner of the race. Why not again with Christ as Captain?

Only one institution in human society carries the dew of its youth; and through the conflict of the centuries still chants its morning song. It is the religion of Jesus.—J. WATSON (IAN MACLAREN), The Inspiration of Our Faith, p. 37.

REFERENCES.—XXVIII. 18-20.—R. Rainy, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 300. C. Gore, ibid. vol. lv. 1899, p. 248; vol. lvii. 1900, p. 283; vol. lxii. 1902, p. 6; see also Three Aspects of the Bible, p. 1. H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxii. 1902, p. 193. J. Foster, ibid. vol. lxviii. 1905, p. 67. Bishop Simpson's Sermons, p. 175. J. Grierson, Scenes and Interviews with the Risen Saviour, p. 247. H. P. Liddon, Easter in St. Paul's vol. ii. p. 240. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii p. 153. W. J. Knox-Little, The Perfect Life, p. 280. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xx. No. 1200.

THE AUTHORITY OF THE KING

'Go ye therefore, and disciple the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I commanded you: and, lo, I am with you all the days, even unto the consummation of the age.'—MATTHEW XXVIII. 19, 20.

I. CONSIDER first, the deposit of the Church. The one truth emphasized in this phase of the Missionary Manifesto is that of the absolute authority of Christ; His supremacy and sovereignty; the fact that He shares the throne of empire with none. The word here translated 'authority' does not suggest power in the sense of energy or might. The first intention of the word is that of the power of choice—that is, the right to choose. Its second intention is that of the power of enforcement—that is, the right to insist upon obedience. The third intention is that of the power of government—that is, the right to utter the final verdict and to pass sentence.

Human choice must always be made in submission to a higher will, therefore it can never be said that man can have an absolute right and power of choice. Authority in the last analysis is the right to determine, enforce, and pass sentence.

In these words Jesus, standing on the resurrection side of His grave, in the simplest language made the sublimest claim, when He thus declared Himself to be King by Divine right, and therefore absolute in His Kingship. The word admits of no qualification. The claim admits of no limitation. In that moment

He claimed authority in the material, mental, and moral realms.

The application of His claim to this world does by no means exhaust it. He swept the compass with a reach far wider, more spacious, and stupendous. Not only on earth, but in heaven is authority given to Him. The one phrase, 'in heaven and on earth,' includes the whole creation of God. It is manifest that He is excluded Who created, and Who puts all things under the feet of His King. It is equally manifest that all is included which comes within the scope of that comprehensive word, the creation of God. We may interpret this final claim of Jesus by the prayer He taught His disciples: 'Our Father Who art in the heavens. Hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth.' His ministry of teaching having been completed, having accomplished His exodus and resurrection, at last He claimed authority in heaven and on earth, thus assuming the throne of empire over the whole creation of God, included in the terms of the prayer, and now defined in the words, 'in heaven and on earth'.

II. The debt? It is clearly indicated as to its widest scope in the words 'disciple the nations'. The Church's responsibility as indicated by these words is that of the proclamation of the Lordship of Christ, the insistence upon the supremacy of his ethic in every nation, among all peoples. His messengers are charged to proclaim the fact of His Lordship, to announce to men everywhere that He is king. They are to pass through all nations proclaiming Him King upon the basis of His resurrection, and all that it involves. This means therefore, that the Church is to proclaim and insist upon His ethical standards; that His ideal of intellectual greatness is the knowledge of God; that His ideal of emotional function is to love God and our neighbour; that His ideal of volitional fulfilment is to seek first the kingdom of God.

III. Finally, a brief word concerning the dynamic. If the Church is to fulfil this great responsibility, she must enter into the full meaning of the final words of the Lord: 'Lo, I am with you all the days, even unto the consummation of the age'. We must understand the meaning of the phrase 'end of the world'. Too often we think of it as some catastrophe or destruction of the earth. That is not the meaning of the words of which the Lord made use. The superior translation is undoubtedly 'consummation of the age'. The earth will continue long after the completion of this age. The promise is that of the abiding presence of the King through the present age. It is impossible to preach His Lordship prevailingly, save in living fellowship with Himself. We may discuss it and demonstrate it intellectually, but the demonstration will lack compelling power, save as the truth is proclaimed in living, personal comradeship with Him. In his phrase 'all the days,' is inferred mastery of circumstances, the inference vindicated, as we have seen, by His resurrection. The One Who through defeat proceeded to absolute victory accompanies His people, as in obedience to His command they go forth to proclaim His Kingship.

In the words already dealt with, 'the consummation of the age,' His ultimate victory is implied. There was no fear of failure in the heart of the King. The age initiated by His first advent will be consummated at His second; and through all the toil He abides with His people, leading them in perpetual triumph as they abide in fellowship with Him.—G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, The Missionary Manifesto, p. 27.

REFERENCES.—XXVIII. 19.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 225. W. A. Whitworth, Christian Thought on Present-Day Questions, p. 168. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ix. p. 221. H. J. Van Dyke, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 142. J. Guinness Rogers, ibid. vol. xl. 1891, p. 387. A. H. Bradford, ibid. vol. xli. 1892, p. 364. A. H. Rix, ibid. vol. xli. 1892, p. 376. John Clifford, ibid. vol. xliii. 1893, p. 264. James Culross, ibid. vol. xlvi. 1894, p. 19. H. Hensley Henson, ibid. vol. lx. 1901, p. 337. J. Agar Bert, ibid. vol. lxxvi. 1904, p. 91. C. Silvester Horne, ibid. vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 360. G. A. Johnston Ross, ibid. vol. lxxiii. 1903, p. 244. M. J. Stone-Wigg, ibid. vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 408. Henry Alford, Sermons on Christian Doctrine, p. 319. F. B. Woodward, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 276; see also Selected Sermons, p. 136. G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 95. A. G. Mortimer, Jesus and the Resurrection, p. 224. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 1. F. D. Huntington, Christian Believing and Living, p. 355. C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 172. A. W. Potts, School Sermons, p. 305.

'Go . . . and, lo, I am with you.'—MATTHEW XXVIII. 19, 20. This idea, that the sense of Christ's presence is vouchsafed to obedience and service, is illustrated by Mr. Hutton's well-known phrase about 'the sacramental power of common everyday duty'.

'No one who does not go away, leaving all and going alone,' said Gilmour of Mongolia as he sailed from England, 'can feel the force of this promise; and when I begin to feel my heart threatening to go down, I betake myself to this companionship, and, thank God, I have felt the blessedness of this promise rushing over me repeatedly when I knelt down and spoke to Jesus as a present companion from whom I am sure to find sympathy.'

REFERENCES.—XXVIII. 19, 20.—F. D. Maurice, Lincoln's Inn Sermons, vol. iv. p. 29; see also Sermons, p. 33.

THE ABIDING PRESENCE

'Lo, I am with you alway.'—MATTHEW XXVIII. 20.

I. SUCH is the promise of the Lord Christ. It is exactly like Himself. It is like Him, first, because of its sublime, unhesitating self-assertion. He speaks and acts always as with an absolute certainty that to the salvation of the world, and of the soul, to the whole depth and range of human need—its sin and its sorrow, its perplexity, its death—He is necessary and He is adequate. Listen to this imperial Prince and Leader, who is so absolutely sure of Himself, and then, with hearts open and unreserving, make sure for yourselves of Him. The human soul that has come to know itself, its sin, its wants, its hunger and thirst, its true ideal, and then comes to look with worshipping desire towards Christ, finds Christ, in self-evidencing justness, the key to fit its lock, and thus knows Him with a knowledge as unshakable as our certainty of ourselves. And to know Him, what is it in its issues? It is the life eternal. It is heaven poured out into the necessities of time.

II. Further, these words of our Lord are just like Him because what they promise is His personal presence with His followers. And this is just like the Lord Jesus Christ, because at every turn in the Gospel story you see Him as the leader who not only leads but also positively delights in the company of His followers. He haunts them through the Forty Days, week after week, in His new and wonderful life, till at last He ascends indeed out of their sight, but with a final positive promise to return in visible glory, and undertaking meanwhile to be with them all the days and all day long, in a mysterious unseen companionship, as intimate as possible, even to the end.

Such is the heart of our Lord Jesus Christ towards us. We are entirely unworthy of Him; we are ignorant, we are far more sinful than we know, we are indeed a contrast to His pure glory. Yet such is His heart. 'His delights are with the sons of men.' As Creator of our nature, as Redeemer of our souls, He takes pleasure in us. There is no surer index of a perfect affection than the desire and purpose of perpetual company. And He says, 'I am with you, all the days and all day long'.

III. The Christian life—what is it at its heart? It is to know that we belong to the Christ of God, and to live that condition out.

How shall it be lived? Who is sufficient for such a life? The answer, as I take it, is given us here, direct and clear: He is sufficient, be he man or boy, who uses his Lord as a living Presence all the days and all day long.—H. C. G. MOULE, Christ's Witness to the Life to Come, p. 135.

THE REAL PRESENCE

'I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.'—MATTHEW XXVIII. 20.

Jesus is here! If we could repeat these words with the reverent simplicity of little children, a new power of believing prayer would be kindled in the heart of the Church of England.

I. We modern Christians explain the promise of the abiding presence of Jesus as a theological influence. The first disciples accepted it as a concrete fact, verified from day to day in a rich and living experience.

II. Now it is just when we look at the life of the early Church that we see how simple was their belief in the real presence of their Lord. It was because they believed that Jesus was really with them still, that the brotherhood of which they were members became the home and temple of His Spirit, that the sacraments whereby it was welded into one were a ministration of the life and powers of the world to come. Jesus was there—not merely the Spirit manifested through Him, but the very Lord who showed them His hands and His side. Jesus was there in the midst of the Church, guiding, controlling, inspiring, choosing His ministers, comforting His saints, receiving His martyrs.

This was the secret of the grand and simple faith of the early Christians. To them Jesus was no sentimental idea, no romantic abstraction of the mind which a warm and ardent fancy clothed with the attributes of a tender personality.

III. What a majestic faith is here! It is the faith of children. But alas! our lot has fallen upon other days. We falter where they firmly trod. And yet no other faith is Christian. It is what the Church needs to-day, the sure and certain conviction that Jesus is Himself here, that Christ is with us always even to the end of the days.—J. G. SIMPSON, Christian Ideals, p. 309.

THE PRESENCE THAT NEVER FAILETH

(Whitsunday)

'And, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.'
—MATTHEW XXVIII. 20.

It was the last promise that He gave to His disciples. And now we read them as the Saviour's legacy to the Church. For these words are unlimited in their application. Lo, I am with you alway, even to the end of the ages, even to the final consummation, when His purpose will be completed and the work of the Church done.

I. This is substantially the truth which is brought before our minds to-day, the truth which Whitsuntide recalls and emphasizes. The one Divine fact which underlies all the rest is this: that Christ on that day began to fulfil and prove His last promise. All that they saw and felt on that day and every day afterwards were manifestations of His presence. He had come again; He was in their midst; His spirit was in contact with theirs; His power rested upon them; He swayed them, in fact, more mightily than ever He had done during His life. Aforetime He had been outside their lives, a face to behold, a voice to hear, a master to follow. Now He was even nearer, He was within them; they were the temple in which He dwelt; He had become a part of their very nature, and in all they said and did they felt the movements of His spirit, and laboured and suffered with a power greater and Diviner than their own.

II. This is the greatest of Christian facts. It is the truth which gives our faith all its substance and certainty and which inspires the believing heart with all its confidence and hopefulness. That which makes the Christian life is an undoubting belief in a present living mightily working Christ. His ministry was not for three years, but for all the ages.

III. His unseen presence and power make the perpetual miracle of Church history and Christian life. It is a strange thing that since He vanished from the view of the disciples He has never been seen again by mortal eye, never again, save by one man—Paul. But there is a far stranger thing than that. It is an infinitely more wonderful thing that He has done all His most wonderful works among men since His visible presence was taken away, and without showing Himself at all. Millions of men and women in every period of Christian history have been more moved and inspired by the unseen Christ than the most devoted of His disciples were moved and inspired by the sight of His bodily form. He is to the moral world what the vital forces are in the natural world. No one can see those vital forces or explain how they work. We can only see the results. They clothe the landscape with verdure, they cover the hedges with blossoms, they change ugliness into beauty, and waste places into gardens of delight. And thus the unseen Christ works in the moral world. Everywhere moral life springs into beauty where His visible hand has been.—J. G. GREENHOUGH, Christian Festivals and Anniversaries, p. 123.

THE ABIDING PRESENCE

(Ascension Day)

'And, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen.'—MATTHEW XXVIII. 20.

To none whom we have known was it ever given to say, 'I am with you alway'. And one intention of their going, and of our going presently, is to make us turn from all that is dying and changing, to Him to Whom alone it belongs to say, 'Lo, I am with you alway'.

The contrasts of this world are essential to the setting forth of the eternity of the Resurrection-life of Christ, and the value of His abiding presence.

I. He spake these words after He had Himself passed through death, after He had proved and tasted the bitterness of separation.

What joy to hear the voice of some lost dear one at our side once more, saying, 'I left you for a little while; it was needful that I should go; but now I am back again, to stay with you for ever!' Listen, then, to Him Whose love surpasseth every love: 'I am He that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore'. 'Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen.'

But some man will say, 'Oh! that that presence were but visible! I cannot realize, or enjoy, an invisible presence.'

Certainly. It does require strong exercise of faith; that other sense added to the natural faculties—a gift of God—to be prayed for and cherished. But that invisible presence once apprehended, it is more real, more precious, than a visible. For a visible must come and go, as Christ did in the flesh. We could not have it always; it is not in the compass of our present nature. But now, always and everywhere, we carry it along with us without the possibility of interruption, without the shadow of a change, because it is invisible: 'Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world'.

After our Lord's Resurrection He never once showed Himself, or uttered a single word, to unbelievers; all that He said and did was for believers only. To His own people alone Christ spake during those forty days, and His last and best words were, 'Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world'.

II. But observe the full meaning of the words more literally rendered. 'Lo, I am with you all the days, until the consummation of the age.'

What force and beauty there is in those words, 'all the days'. They convey, before the mind of the Speaker, that 'all the days' lay ranged in order, to the end of time. To Him they were altogether but so many 'days'; and yet each 'day' was distinct and separate, with its own proper history, in His sight. And all along that line of 'days,' and around the 'days' of our fathers' lifetime and our own, and our children, and children's children, on each and on all the 'days' He saw the Changeless Presence in the midst of the changeable and changing—that constant, lasting presence. 'Lo, I am with you all the days, unto the end of the world' (or, the consummation of the age). 'Amen.' We are always stepping out into an unknown future; but the foot cannot fall outside the presence of Jesus.

III. As to the method and nature of that presence, it were better to leave it, as if some dear dying friend had said, in his last moments, 'I shall never be far from you: though you see me not, I shall be about your path and about your bed; and not a single day or night shall pass but I shall be with you there'. So simply did my Saviour say it, and so simply would I take His words.

REFERENCES.—XXVIII. 20.—W. Branscombe, A Book of Lay Sermons, p. 235. T. L. Cuyler, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 167. A. Murray, ibid. vol. lxx. 1906, p. 62. E. L. Hull, Sermons Preached at King's Lynn (3rd Series), p. 168. H. C. G. Moule, Fordington Sermons, p. 46. G. A. Chadwick, Aids to Belief, p. 84. W. J. Knox-Little, The Perfect Life, p. 301. Henry Jellott, Sermons on Special and Festival Occasions, p. 123. George A. Gordon, Christian World Pulpit, lxxvii. p. 227.

ST. MARK

ST. MARK

'The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ.'—MARK I. 1.

A GREAT epoch was exhausted, and passing away to give place to another, the first utterances of which had already been heard in the north, and which awaited but the Initiator, to be revealed.

He came. The soul the most full of love, the most sacredly virtuous, the most deeply inspired by God and the future, that men have yet seen on earth—JESUS. He bent over the corpse of the dead world, and whispered a word of faith. Over the clay that had lost all of man but the movement and the form, He uttered words until then unknown: Love, Sacrifice, a heavenly origin. And the dead arose, a new life circulated through the clay, which philosophy had tried in vain to reanimate. From that corpse arose the Christian world, the world of liberty and equality. From that clay arose the true Man, the image of God, the precursor of humanity.

Christ expired. All He had asked of mankind was wherewith to save them—says Lamennais—was a cross whereon to die. But ere He died, He had announced the glad tidings to the people. To those who asked of Him from whence He had received it, He answered, from God the Father. From the height of His cross He had invoked Him twice. Therefore upon the cross did His victory begin, and still does it endure.—MAZZINI, Faith and the Future.

REFERENCES.—I. 1.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 1. Archbishop Alexander, The Leading Ideas of the Gospels, p. 36. J. Addison Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 7. G. Campbell Morgan, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 371. H. Scott Holland, ibid. vol. lxxvii. p. 17. I. 1-11.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 13. I. 1-13.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 1. I. 8.—R. Glover, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 139. I. 9.—T. Vincent Tymms, ibid. vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 149.

TEMPTATIONS OF THE SPIRIT

'And straightway coming up out of the water, He saw the heavens opened, and the Spirit like a dove descending upon Him. And there came a voice from heaven, saying, Thou art My beloved Son in whom I am well pleased. And immediately the Spirit driveth Him into the wilderness.'—MARK I. 10-12.

PEOPLE actually wonder how Jesus Christ, if He were what we believe Him to have been, could possibly be subject to temptation. They talk as if the Divine Sonship would make everything easy, and would render impossible the strain and anxiety which are the notes of our real humanity. The Sonship creates the conditions of temptation.

What have we to do, we may ask, with temptation such as His? We have to do with it just so far as we are religious and spiritual persons, and no farther.

I. We all, for instance, if we have made the slightest effort to be religious, know that swift, secret, sinister appearance of egotism inside our religion, which was the note of our Lord's first temptation. He was tempted to let His spiritual force be turned aside from His dedication to God in order to play round His own self-consciousness, and satisfy His wants, and increase His own self-importance. If He is Son of God, why not feed Himself? 'Self,' it is always self. Self whispering to us out of our prayers, in our sacraments, through our best intentions, in our very efforts, perhaps, of watching and praying and fasting.

We are so full of spiritual concerns, and yet, are we all the time doing anything else but turning stones into bread, feeding our own satisfactions?

II. And then, our vanity, our silliness. Religious people are so silly. Our unreality, our insincerity! We are always tossing ourselves off some pinnacle of the temple, in freaks of impulse, weak loss of control, in insolent desire to surprise, in stupid disregard of real, honest, working facts.

III. The terrible third temptation haunts the very best, with its readiness to make use of doubtful and dangerous means in order to secure a good end. The better the end, the sharper the temptation. And if the end be God's kingdom on earth, the temptation is at its strongest. For the end is so high that it seems to justify almost anything.

Do such faults as these seem small and unimportant infirmities to us? Yet, it was in this type of sin that our Lord detected the heart of evil.

When at any time you find yourself tempted to think these swerves of the will to be slight and unimportant, remember that lone Figure in the wilderness with the wild beasts, warring hard against the pressure of evil until He is faint and hungry.—H. SCOTT HOLLAND, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. p. 72.

REFERENCES.—I. 11, 12.—W. Morrison, Passio Christi, p. 40. I. 11-13.—J. Martineau, Hours of Thought, vol. ii. p. 33. I. 12.—G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 97.

CHRIST WITH THE WILD BEASTS

'And He was with the wild beasts.'—MARK I. 13.

THIS was the sudden perception of a soul in stress of conflict. Relaxing one moment from its tense agony, it saw gathered round the wild beasts of the desert. It remembered them in its after-thoughts on the deadly struggle with more terrible foes.

I. Can we recall experiences like this in our own life battle? At night, in a great suspense, when the soul is sick, blind, helpless, and the forces of being are warring with one another, there has come a momentary change of mood. The carving of some picture-frame, a face hung on the wall, the blazonry on some book, the chance phrase on an open page—trifles like these fasten themselves on our minds. We turn dully from them, but the impression is ineffaceable. Even when the memory of the trial grows dim, it is they that keep it living.

Or we have sought under a sudden blow to escape from 'the world's grey soul to the green world'. On the hill-side or the moor we have sat with bowed heads and downcast eyes. It seemed as if we had outlived all loves, buried all hopes. Yet through some chink the flower at our feet enters into the heart, mingles with our thought, and strangely belies our misery. The cup passes from us, and again, again we live. These hours change us, but their memory clings round that single thing: the flower which we never see without the whole sorrow and relief returning.

II. There must be more in the words than this. Was not the presence of the wild beasts an element in our Lord's temptation?

Did He not see in their eyes an appeal from their misery? Was He not quick to behold the earnest expectation of the creatures waiting for the manifestation of the Son of God? Did He not long for the day which Esaias saw in vision, when the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, when the lion shall eat straw like the ox, and the sucking-child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child put his hand on the basilisk's den, and they shall not hurt nor destroy in all God's holy mountain,—that day when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea? We cannot tell; but surely the wild beasts were to Him as they will be to all in the regeneration. Even yet some men exercise strange powers over them; and when He, the creating Word, the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, beheld them in His dumb agony, did they not cease one moment to groan and travail, as if they saw their hope in His grief?

III. For 'all creatures can be tamed'. The beasts share in our punishment, but not in our guilt. They can be won, but man resists. His heart is evil, restless, full of deadly poison. It was to win and purge that heart the Son of God descended, and the arch-temptation was to gain this victory by a shorter and swifter way than the dolorous path. 'All the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them,' if He had these (so the whisper ran), deliverance would come sooner. These mute appeals, these lowly claims of the wild beasts reinforced the Tempter. But He drove the temptation from Him. The kingdom of glory could not be hastened so. The good day would come in God's time and in God's way; the reign of evil would be undone. So, in compassion for all His traving creation, His soul went on to travail.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, Ten Minute Sermons, p. 65.

REFERENCES.—I. 13.—H. Ross Rae, Christian World Pulpit vol. xliii. 1893, p. 69. F. R. Brunskill, ibid. vol. lxix. 1903, p. 139. J. Farquhar, The Schools and Schoolmasters of Christ, p. 115. A. Morris Stewart, The Temptation of Jesus, p. 16. I. 14.—A. M. Fairbairn, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 305. L. D. Bevan, ibid. vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 348. R. W. Church, Advent Sermons, 1885, pp. 29, 58. I. 14, 15.—J. Foxley, People, Places, and Peoples in Relation to the Kingdom of Christ, p. 24. W. J. Knox-Little, The Light of Life, p. 65. I. 14; III. 9.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 11. I. 14-35.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lii. No. 2980. I. 15.—D. Brook, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lx. 1901, p. 121. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. viii. No. 480.

'And Jesus said unto them, Come ye after Me, and I will make you fishers of men.'—MARK I. 17 f.

WE will not stand motionless like veiled statues on the shore of the torrent which threatens the foundations of the temple, detaching the stones one by one, and hurling them confusedly among the ruins of things doomed to pass away—the hut of the peasant, the palace of the noble, and the throne of the king! Let all who have the things of eternity at heart arise with us! Let all who love God and man with all their heart and soul, and count all else as naught, join their voices and their hearts to ours. Why disturb ourselves if many refuse to unite in action with us? Shall we consume the energy of our hearts in idle tears for this? Faith demands action, not tears; it demands of us the power of sacrifice—sole origin of our salvation; it seeks Christians capable of looking down upon the world from on high, and facing its fatigues without fear; Christians capable of saying, We will die for this; above all, Christians capable of saying, We will live for this.—LAMENNAIS, Affaires de Rome.

REFERENCES.—I. 16-21.—J. H. Rigg, Scenes and Studies in the Ministry of Our Lord, p. 43.

FISHERS OF MEN

'Come ye after Me, and I will make you to become fishers of men.'—MARK I. 17.

It is service, not status, that distinguishes one disciple from another.

I. The Maker of the Workers.—The maker of the workers is the Lord. 'I will make you to become fishers of men'; a living Christianity is one that is dealing with a living Christ. It is in touch with an unseen personality, who is moulding natures, through whom the mind and heart of God bear upon us. We cannot make Christians, Christ does it; and we cannot make fishers of men, Christ does it; and we cannot make successful workers, Christ does it.

The one thing Christ prescribes is companionship with Himself: 'Come ye after Me'. 'He chose twelve that they might be with Him.' Is there any preparation different from the following of Christ here? Is not the following itself the preparation Christ points to? The conditions of successful service are inseparable from the work of preparation wrought by Christ upon us.

II. Following Christ.—Inquiry into the conditions of successful Christian work resolves itself in effect into asking what following Christ means.

It begins in contact. Salvation is effected now as it was in the days of Christ's flesh by the touching of two natures. As many as touch Him are made perfectly whole. Consciousness of His healing presence is the note of all effectual saving work still.

III. Christ's Work Through us.—He becomes to us the Way and Life. Enfranchized we can preach liberty; seeing Jesus we can point men to Him. Religion is not a devout retrospect. It is following the Christ of the Spirit. Our service becomes no longer a series of isolated activities. It is an outflow from a controlled personality.

Following Christ must mean as much as this: communion with His intensity of soul. It means the incoming upon the life of a Christian of a new passion for service. It means an overwhelming sense of the value of spiritual redemption. It means the life, because of this, set and kept loose to the things of time.

This following of Christ that is to qualify for gaining men for God will mean fellowship in the pain inseparable from the work of human saviourhood. For the task is very great and difficult—to change character. It is perfectly easy to understand what is meant by the demand for unselfishness which reforms require, and quite impossible without the regeneration of the Holy Ghost to fulfil it.—J. T. FORBES, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII. 1907, p. 251.

REFERENCES.—I. 17.—C. S. Robinson, Simon Peter, p. 161. I. 21-28.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1765. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 73. John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 146. I. 21-34.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 22.

'He taught . . . not as the scribes.'—MARK I. 22.

THE man on whom the soul descends, through whom the soul speaks, alone can teach. Courage, piety, love, wisdom can teach; every man can open his door to these angels, and they shall bring him the gift of tongues. But the man who aims to speak as books enable, as synods use, as the fashion guides, and as interest commands, babbles. Let him hush.—EMERSON.

SEE CLOUGH's lines on 'What went ye out for to see?'

REFERENCES.—I. 22.—S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 104. William Knight, The Dundee Pulpit, 1872, p. 145.

THE PLEA OF EVIL

'And there was in their synagogue a man with an unclean spirit; and he cried out, saying, Let us alone.'—MARK I. 23, 24.

I. WE consider, first, the plea of evil. 'Let us alone.' This is the standing plea of evil; it demands that it shall not be meddled with, that no effort shall be made to restrict or dispossess it.

1. It is the plea of personal evil. The poor demoniac treated his Saviour as if He had been his tormentor, and in all generations those who are possessed by the spirit of evil resent criticism and interference; they demand toleration and immunity.

And this is the attitude of evil when we come to deal with it in our own heart; confronted by good, it boldly claims right and privilege.

2. It is the plea of public evil. The moment reformers attempt to deal with any social wrong, any pernicious institution, or custom, or trade, or law, they are challenged after this fashion. It is so when idolatry is attacked.

And when evil dare not claim absolute immunity, it pleads for toleration and delay.

II. Note some characteristics of the plea of evil.

1. The plea is specious. The demoniac regarded Christ as an enemy; and so to-day, when Christ comes to save men from their sins, they commonly regard His intervention as an attack on their interests, pleasures, liberty, progress. 'Art Thou come to destroy us?' So blinded are the minds of them that believe not, that they regard an attack on the devil's kingdom as an invasion of their own rights, a confiscation of their own riches.

2. This plea is impudent. At the first glance it seems modest, almost pathetic. 'Let us alone.' Can anyone ask for less? Nevertheless, the claim is impudent. When men ask to be let alone in any place, in any course, it is presumed that they have some right to be where they are, to do what they seek to do. Observe these two things:—

First, this world is not the devil's world. It is God's world, and goodness, holiness, beauty, felicity, have no need to apologize for their presence in it.

Secondly, in the development of this world the devil plays no essential part. The Master acknowledged no sort of partnership with these spirits of the night. They claimed no partnership with Him. 'What have we to do with Thee, Thou Jesus of Nazareth?' They had nothing to do with Him. He had nothing to do with them. The disavowal of complicity was distinct and emphatic on both sides. Christ never recognized any necessity for evil in His own personal development.

3. The plea is cruel. Under all its speciousness sin is awfully cruel, and to let it alone involves men and nations in the deepest guilt and misery.

III. We contemplate Christ's rejection of the plea of evil. Christ always speaks of evil with severe revealing simplicity.

1. We learn that evil is to be cast out of humanity. Evil may cry out with a loud voice; it may rage and threaten and tear; but it must go when we cast ourselves at the Redeemer's feet. And in the same almighty grace it shall be expelled from society.

2. We learn that evil is to be wholly cast out. The simple, radical, decisive manner in which Christ rejects the plea of evil is full of instruction. Christ did not restrain the infernal power, the evil spirits were to go out; judgment was not deferred, they were to go out at once; the expulsion was total, they were all to go—not one left of all the legion, not a little one.

There is not the most distant suspicion of compromise in Christ's treatment of evil.

8. We learn that evil is cast out in Christ. Christ set Himself against the demoniac power, and proved Himself its master. However men may explain it, the only force in the world that is really wrestling with and casting out the fierce, deep, chronic wickedness of the human heart is the truth and love that are in Christ Jesus.—W. L. WATKINSON, The Transfigured Sackcloth, p. 90.

REFERENCES.—I. 23-25.—C. Brown, God and Man, p. 174; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxvii. 1905, p. 70. I. 23-26.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 191. I. 24.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 214. I. 27.—C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 43. I. 29-31.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 86. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 194. I. 29-33.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1236. I. 29-34.—J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 156.

'Now Simon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever; and straightway they tell Him of her.'—MARK I. 30, 31.

AMONG the four Gospels that of St. Mark became my favourite, from the sudden, direct manner in which it at once brings Christ into contact with a suffering world.—DORA GREENWELL, Colloquia Crucis, p. 23.

REFERENCES.—I. 30, 31.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII, p. 32. B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 49. I. 31.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lii. No. 2980. I. 32, 33.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 98.

'And He healed many that were sick.'—MARK I. 34.

IN his last sermon Henri Perreyve spoke thus of Christianity as a social power: 'Let us beware,' he cried, 'of being mere humanitarians, who, losing sight of the soul, aim at naught save material progress. The inefficiency of all such blind benefactors of mankind is too notorious to need demonstration. But, on the other hand, let us beware of that subtle refinement which affects to ignore all save that which is spiritual, and which disdains to care for the physical sufferings of our brethren. Such was not the mind of Christ. Whosoever Jesus met with human suffering, He paused to give it a heedful pity. . . . Do not aim at being more loosed from earthly ties, more spiritual than the son of God. In this day it seems to me that no intelligent, independent Christian man should suffer himself to be outstripped in the study and practical application of the social sciences. The Christian should not tolerate that the world be better able to deal than ourselves with those great questions which are so powerfully, so inevitably at work amongst us, questions which the Gospel alone has called forth; I mean such as pauperism, labour, family ties, refugees, and asylums, the labour of women and children.'

'He departed into a desert place, and there prayed.'—MARK I. 35.

Go, cherish your soul; expel companions; set your habits to a life of solitude; there will the faculties rise fair and full within, like forest trees and field flowers; you will have results which, when you meet your fellow-men, you can communicate, and they will gladly receive.—EMERSON.

He who has the fountain of prayer in him will not complain of hazards. Prayer is the recognition of laws; the soul's exercise and source of strength; its thread of conjunction with them.—GEORGE MEREDITH.

REFERENCES.—I. 35.—W. H. Murray, The Fruits of the Spirit, p. 408. Bishop Percival, Sermons at Rugby, p. 64. I. 35-39.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1769. I. 37.—W. L. Watkinson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 405. I. 39.—A. B. Bruce, ibid. vol. xlix. 1896, p. 172.

A PARABLE IN A MIRACLE

'And there came a leper to Him, beseeching Him, and kneeling down to Him, and saying unto Him, If Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean. And Jesus, moved with compassion, put forth His hand, and touched him, and saith unto him, I will; be thou clean. And as soon as He had spoken, immediately the leprosy departed from him, and he was cleansed.'—MARK I. 40-42.

THE parabolic aspect of the miracle is obvious in the case before us. It was taken as an emblem of sin.

I. Notice the Leper's Cry.—Mark's vivid narrative shows him to us flinging himself down before the Lord, and, without waiting for question or pause, interrupting whatever was going on with his piteous cry. Misery and wretchedness make short work of conventional politeness.

1. Note the keen sense of misery that impels to the passionate desire for relief. The parallel fails us there. The emblem is all-sufficient, for here is the very misery of our deepest misery, that we are unconscious of it, and sometimes even come to love it.

2. Note this man's confidence in Christ's power: 'Thou canst make me clean'.

Sin dominates men by two opposite lies. The lie that we are pure is the first; the lie that we are too black to be purified is the second. Christ's blood atones for all past sin, and has power to bring forgiveness to every one.

3. Note the leper's hesitation. 'If Thou wilt.' He had no right to presume on Christ's goodwill. But his hesitation is quite as much entreaty as hesitation. He, as it were, throws the responsibility for his health or disease upon Christ's shoulders, and thereby makes the strongest appeal to that loving heart.

We stand on another level. The leper's hesitation is our certainty. We know that if any men are not healed, it is not because Christ will not, but because they will not.

II. Notice the Lord's Answer.—'Jesus, moved with compassion'—a clause which occurs only in Mark's account—'put forth His hand and touched him, and said, I will; be thou clean.'

Note three things—the compassion, the touch, the word.

1. It is a true revelation of the heart of Jesus Christ. Simple pity is its very core. Nor let us forget that it is this swift shoot of pity which underlies all that follows—the touch, the word, and the cure. Christ does not wait to be moved by the prayers that come from those leprous lips, but He is moved by the leprous lips themselves.

2. The Lord's touch. With swift obedience to the impulse of His pity, Christ thrusts forth His hand and touches the leper. Our Lord thereby does one of two things—either He asserts His authority as overriding that of Moses and all his regulations, or He asserts His sacerdotal character. Either way there is a great claim in the act.

Further, we may take that touch of Christ's as being a parable of His whole work. His touch of the leper symbolizes His identifying of Himself with mankind, the foulest and the most degraded, and in this connexion there is a profound meaning in one of the ordinarily trivial legends of the Rabbis, who, founding upon a word of the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, tell us that when Messiah comes He will be found sitting amongst the lepers at the gate of the city.

3. Note the Lord's word, 'I will; be thou clean'. If His word can tell as a force on material things, what is the conclusion? He who 'speaks and it is done' is Almighty and Divine.

III. Note the Immediate Cure.—Mark tells, with his favourite word, 'straightway,' how as soon as Christ had spoken, the leprosy departed from him. And to turn from the symbol to the fact, the same sudden and complete cleansing is possible for us.—A. MACLAREN, The Unchanging Christ, p. 291.

REFERENCES.—I. 40-42.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 39. S. Cox, Expositions, p. 119. I. 40-45.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 110. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 175. I. 41.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 50. I. 43-45.—S. Cox, Expositions, p. 33. I. 45.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1298. II.—Ibid. vol. lii. No. 3016.

PERSONALITY

(For Christmas)

'And it was noised that He was in the house.'—MARK II. 1.

It was noised that He was in the house. This Christmas morning we may say, It was noised that He was in the world. Never forget that there was a great noise made about this birth. One angel began it, and suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly hosts, singing and shouting and praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest! and all heaven throbbed and quivered under that triumphant anthem. Jesus Christ, then, did not come noiselessly into the world; so far as He Himself was concerned, there was little or no noise, but the moment it was hinted that He was in the world-house, the earth, a visible manifestation of the invisible Deity, there was noise enough, musical noise, a great multitudinous acclaim. There are some times when people cannot be silent; indeed, there are some times when silence would be a species of blasphemy.

I. It was noised that He was in the world to bring you good tidings of great joy; for unto you is born this day in the house of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. And all heaven was not orchestra enough to announce the infinite blessing. Have we ever been caught in that passion? or are we only those cold-blooded folks who have to be carried in the ship as ballast?

II. It was noised, not only that He was in the world, but presently that He was the foremost Man in the world. In a sense the only Man, because without Him there could be no life. People began to say concerning Jesus, 'Never man spake like this Man'. He became the pronoun that stood for the only noun there is, the Deity.

III. It was noised that He was in the house and the world; that He was not only in the house-world or world-house, but that He stood alone in it and gradually drew away from all other men that He might ascend the throne which He created. But in a sweet domestic sense it is often noised that He is in the family circle, in the little house, in our house where the cradle is, and where the little school-books are scattered about, and where the aged folks are that are now wondering what there is just across the river.

IV. Is it noised that Jesus Christ is in our house? What do they say? They say, knowing our family life, that Jesus is in that house because of its order, its temper, its resignation, its whole method and economy of existence; they say that only the presence of Jesus Christ in that house could have made such a death. There never was a death-bed scene like it except under the same circumstances, the same deep consciousness of the same majestic and tender Personality.

V. One day it will be noised that He is on the throne. Tempest shall tell it to tempest, and ocean to ocean, and world to world, and planet to planet; and there shall go forth a great, grand, solemn cry, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our God and of His Christ. And they shall cry in every tongue, Hallelujah! and Bethlehem shall culminate in heaven.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. II. p. 272.

REFERENCES.—II. 1-12.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 122. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 168. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 61. John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 178. II. 3.—W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 83. F. Hastings, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 132. II. 3-5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lii. No. 3016.

VICARIOUS FAITH

'And Jesus seeing their faith saith unto the sick of the palsy, Son, thy sins are forgiven.'—MARK II. 5.

THE healing of the man sick of the palsy is an instance of vicarious faith. By 'vicarious' we mean something done for and instead of another. The vicarious sacrifice of Jesus Christ means that Christ suffered in our stead, and died for our sins. This palsied man received both the forgiveness of his sins and the healing of his body, through the faith of the men who brought him. Seeing their faith, He saith, not to them, but 'unto the sick of the palsy, Son, thy sins are forgiven'.

I. Instances of Vicarious Faith.

1. There came to Jesus in Capernaum 'a centurion beseeching Him and saying, Lord, my servant lieth in the house sick of the palsy, grievously tormented. And He saith unto him, I will come and heal him'.

2. On another occasion there came from Capernaum to Cana of Galilee a nobleman whose child was sick, and he besought Jesus 'that He would come down and heal his son; for he was at the point of death'.

3. There is another instance where a father's faith prevailed for an only child. In the incident at the foot of the Mount of Transfiguration Jesus threw back the healing of the demoniac boy upon the faith of the father.

4. Still more striking is the faith of the Greek woman in the district of Tyre and Sidon.

II. The Operations of Vicarious Faith.—Vicarious faith begins by making the needs of another its own. Fellowship of woe precedes vicariousness in faith. The affliction of the child is the continual grief of the parent. The sinless One carried away the world's sin by taking it unto Himself. He was made sin for us.

III. Vicarious Faith in the Work of Salvation.—When Jesus saw the faith of the men who brought their palsied friend, He did not begin by commanding the sick man to take up his bed and walk, but by announcing the forgiveness of his sins. 'Seeing their faith, He saith to the sick of the palsy, Son, thy sins are forgiven.' However startling it may seem, this man received the forgiveness of his sins through the faith of others. It is true no man can be saved by proxy, but it is also true we are saved vicariously. There is a human as well as a Divine element in the process of soul-birth, and every man's salvation begins in the faith of another.

Vicarious faith never despairs. It seeks desperate cases, and delights to bring the palsied and devil-possessed to the feet of Christ.

IV. Vicarious Faith is the Foundation of all Prevailing Intercession.—How often the Apostle Paul entreats the prayers of his spiritual children!

The power of such prayer may be gathered from the promise of Christ to His people. 'Again I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of My Father which is in heaven.'

Faith reaches the perfection of its power in vicarious exercise. It seems in its concern for others to attain a Divine quality and to command Divine power.

Doubtless some will say, surely there are limitations to this faith. If by limitations is meant conditions, then there are limitations. That for which faith is exercised must be in the will of God, and must be assured to the soul by the Spirit of God.—S. CHADWICK, Humanity and God, p. 290.

REFERENCES.—II. 5.—R. J. Campbell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 36. II. 5-7.—H. Rix, Sermons, Addresses, and Essays, p. 90. II. 10.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 286. F. C. Spurr, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 117. J. B. Slack, A Book of Lay Sermons, p. 19. A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part ii. p. 235. II. 10, 11.—C. A. Briggs, The Incarnation of the Lord, p. 3. II. 12.—J. McNeill, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 182. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 1269. II. 13-22.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 70.

THE GUESTS AT CHRIST'S OWN TABLE

'As Jesus sat at meat in His house, many publicans and sinners sat together with Jesus and His disciples.'—MARK II. 15.

I. THIS is to my mind the most unique passage in the New Testament. It is the only instance I know in which Jesus plays the part of host or entertainer. Everywhere else He is a guest; here, for the first and last time, we meet Him in His own house, at His own table. It was not a communion table. The disciples were there; but publicans and sinners were there also. Around that table there must have been a great diversity of theological opinion. The disciples and the publicans had no dogmas in common; yet they both sat at Christ's board.

II. What enabled them to sit together? We can understand how men can 'sit together in heavenly places'—in the sense of a common faith. But what bound in one these souls so different? It was their love for the Son of Man. It was their love for the earthly Christ—the brother-Christ, the Christ of the street and of the lane. The publicans and sinners were not yet dreaming of salvation. They were seeking no supernatural help. It was the natural in Christ which they loved—the voice, the gait, the manner, the countenance. They loved Him for less than He was worth. The private friends of a poet may be unable to appreciate any poetry; yet the man may be very dear to them, and he will accept their outside fondness. So did Jesus accept a love for that which was His least possession. It was a love for something inferior, but it was not an inferior love.

III. Do not measure the strength of love by its cause. Many of these publicans would have gone to the stake as readily as the disciples—though they would have gone for another motive. The love in the disciple was fire on the mount, the love in the publican was fire on the plain; but a fire on the plain may be as hot as a fire on the mount. Jesus saw the difference, but He accepted both.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 218.

FAILURE

'They that are whole have no need of the physician, but they that are sick: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners.'—MARK II. 17.

THERE is no question that Jesus looked upon His mission as to all men, and yet He says distinctly that it is only a mission for sinners, the obvious inference being that all have sinned.

Although, however, the sinfulness of human nature is one in different ages, and individuals, it manifests itself in different forms, and in the teaching of Jesus we have very full notice of the forms in which it displayed itself in His time.

I. There were the sins of the publicans and sinners. These were sins of the senses, what St. Paul calls the sins of the flesh, as distinguished from what he calls the sins of the mind, open sins that cannot hide themselves. Such sins are most fully described in the parable of the prodigal son; in fact, the prodigal is simply an image of the sins of the flesh, their course, and their consequences.

II. There were the sins of the Pharisees. These are what Paul would have called sins of the mind, as distinguished from sins of the flesh, but they are not less deadly. There is another character besides the prodigal in the parable of the prodigal son. It is the prodigal's brother, and shall we not say with truth that he was as far away from his father as even the prodigal was, if not farther? In fact, Jesus Himself said distinctly to the Pharisees, 'The publicans and sinners enter into the kingdom of heaven before you,' meaning that it was easier to make them Christians than to make the Pharisees followers of Christ. The distinctive sin of the Pharisees was hypocrisy. 'Pharisee' and 'hypocrite' are interchangeable terms.

III. The sins of the Sadducees. What was the sin of the Sadducees? It is depicted in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. People sometimes ask what Dives did that he should be consigned to the flames of Gehenna. All that is said about him is that he was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day. Wherein consisted his sin? It was negative, and Jesus was very severe on negative sins. It was just that he did nothing. He made no use of his means and talents. He did nothing for his fellow-men. He did nothing for God. He was wrapped up in Himself.

IV. The sentiments of Jesus on the subject we have before us are most impressively given in the three parables in the fifteenth chapter of St. Luke, and if you want to know the mind of Christ on man's failure, I would say brood deeply upon these three parables—the parable of the lost sheep, the lost coin, and the lost son. As the lost coin has fallen away from its usefulness, so man is not doing the lifework for which his Maker intended him; and as the lost son was wasting his substance in riotous living, so every sinner can be accused of misusing and mispending the talents which God has given him. And yet, just as the lost coin, though hidden among dust and dirt, was not itself a lump of dirt, but a piece of precious metal; and as the prodigal, though far from his home and his father and his obedience, was still a son, so the soul of man, in spite of its sin, is infinitely precious, and its destiny is Divine and eternal.—J. STALKER, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LVII. 1900, p. 76.

REFERENCES.—II. 17.—D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 98. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiii. No. 1345. II. 18.—

C. H. Thomas, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 149.

'Can the children of the bride-chamber fast, while the bridegroom is with them?'—MARK II. 19.

SAMUEL RUTHERFORD once wrote this sensible advice to Marion M'Naught, after the latter's dangerous illness. 'Remember you are in the body, and it is the lodging-house; and you may not, without offending the Lord, suffer the old walls of that house to fall down through want of necessary food. Your body is the dwelling-place of the spirit; and therefore, for the love you carry to the sweet Guest, give a due regard to His house of clay. When He looseth the wall, why not? Welcome, Lord Jesus! But it is a fearful sin in us, by hurting the body by fasting, to loose one stone or the least piece of timber in it, for the house is not our own. The bridegroom is with you yet; so fast as that also you may feast and rejoice in Him.

REFERENCES.—II. 19.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 75. II. 19, 20.—N. Bushnell, Christ and His Salvation, p. 176. II. 20.—F. B. Woodward, Sermons (1st Series), p. 69. A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part ii. p. 235. II. 21, 22.—D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 106. II. 22.—J. Stuart Holden, The Pre-Eminent Lord, p. 47. II. 23-28.—W. H. Murray, The Fruits of the Spirit, p. 430. II. 23-28; III. 1-5.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 87. II. 24.—Marcus Dods, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 43.

THE SABBATH

'The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath.'—MARK II. 27.

I. You may notice these words in two ways.

1. 'The Sabbath was made for man.' That is, for the benefit of man; just as the golden sun that scatters his light over the world was made for man, so in the same sense was the Sabbath made for man.

2. The Sabbath was made for the whole human race. It does not say that the Sabbath was made only for the Jew; it was made for man. It is like the sun, a universal blessing.

II. In what follows I desire shortly to prove to you the proposition that the Sabbath was made for man.

1. For his body. Those who keep horses know quite well that, if they are to be wrought up to their strength, you must give them rest one day in seven. So it is with man; if he has to work up to his strength, he requires one day of rest in seven. Does not this prove that He that made our bodies has also appointed the Sabbath for the whole human race; for had He pleased He could have made our bodies of iron. The greater part of men work up to their strength, therefore they require one day of rest in seven. It is the same with the mind, it requires one day of rest in seven. The same thing is true of the soul. If there be a God, and if there be a Church of redeemed men, then it is agreeable to reason that they should worship Him with the whole mind and strength and will. Then, if it be agreeable to reason that you are to worship Him with your whole heart, it requires a time for it, and that a set time, and it requires that it be regular.

2. The Sabbath was made for man according to the example of God. We are told in the second of Genesis of God making the Sabbath. Now it seems to me quite plain that, if God rested on the first Sabbath, it was made for His creatures; it could not be for Himself. 'Hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Creator, fainteth not, neither is weary?' It is a very common thing for Sabbath-breakers to say that it is a Jewish ordinance. But the first Sabbath dawned on a sinless world two thousand years before ever the mention of a Jew was heard of.

3. I would show you that the Sabbath was made for man from the command that God gave concerning it. When God brought Israel out of Egypt to the rocky mount of Sinai He there gave them a clear revelation of His holy law; and it is said, that 'It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made'. And in the very bosom of it was written, 'Remember the Sabbath Day to keep it holy'. When Christ came into the world, He said, 'I came not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it'.

4. That all God's children love the Sabbath Day. God said to Israel, 'My Sabbaths you shall reverence'. And the Prophet Ezekiel says: 'He gave them a Sabbath to be a sign between them and Him'; it marked them out as God's peculiar people.

5. It is those that are God's enemies who hate the Sabbath Day.—R. MURRAY MCCHEYNE, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. II. p. 63.

REFERENCES.—II. 27.—T. H. Ball, Persuasions, p. 133. C. J. Ridgeway, Plain Sermons on Sunday Observance, p. 64. H. D. M. Spence, Voices and Silences, p. 259. W. F. Cobb, Church Times, vol. XI. 1898, p. 273. II. 27, 28.—M. H. James, Plain Sermons on Sunday Observance, p. 52. R. Allen, The Words of Christ, p. 231. F. Pickett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 148. III. 1-5.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 257. S. A. Tipton, The Admiring Guest, p. 44. III. 1-6.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 148. J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 189. III. 3, 5.—H. E. Brierley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 243.

TRUE LAWFULNESS

'Is it lawful to do good on the Sabbath days, or to do evil?'—MARK III. 4.

THIS is one of the instances of Christ's power of subtle and at first sight unperceived retort. Have you really collated into one radiant conspectus the answers of Christ to the people who wished to take Him by guile or otherwise? You would make quite a little Bible if you were to collate all those happy and even thrilling instances of Christ's power in retort, in sending back in another form that which had been flung at Him by hostile hands. He was great in asking questions, and peculiarly great in reply. His replies were always on the spur of the moment, He never took any time to consider what answer He would make to anybody.

I. Let us look into this case a little further, and see how it touches us. Learn first that a man may break the law—say, the Sabbath—in the very act of ostentatiously keeping it. You can only keep the Sabbath in the heart, you can only keep it in penitence and in thankfulness; it can only be kept in its own spirit, which is a spirit of peace and meekness, restfulness and love. Christ's resurrection day cannot be kept by finding fault with the way in which other people keep it. When we enter into these deeper sympathies and realizations of the Divine Spirit we shall have a cleansed world.

II. A man may dishonour the Bible in the very act of ostentatiously believing that every dot, every comma, is the punctuation of the almost visible Divine hand. The Bible is alive. You may have taken off its coat or patched it here and there with some historic or syntactical patching, and the coat may be none the worse for it, but the revelation is still alive, the truth is still as energetic in the Bible, as it ever was. He honours, keeps, the Bible who finds its truth, its Gospel, its mighty blood, and holds them up as the ministries and evidences of God. We owe nothing to ignorance. Ignorance is only pardonable when it knows that it is ignorant and wants to be instructed, refined, and ennobled.

III. See then how we are driven back, back into the spirituality of religion. The true religion is not a certificate which you take out annually; the true faith is not a renewal of your registration at a guinea a year: it is something that belongs to the soul, the very soul of the soul, so that religion is an affair between man and God, between God and man, away among the unspeakables, away among the saddest, gladder ministries. We may keep the letter, and deny the spirit. We may have the book, but not the revelation; a beautifully bound Bible, but no spirit Bible, no spirit Gospel, singing to us and teaching us and helping us along all the way of life.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. IV. p. 184.

REFERENCES.—III. 5.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 94. C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 297. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1893. III. 6-19.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 105. III. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvi. No. 1529. III. 10.—Ibid. vol. xiv. No. 841. III. 13-15.—W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 304.

'And He appointed twelve.'—MARK III. 14.

THE chosen Apostles themselves misunderstand and misinterpret their Master. Peter, after being told that his confession is the rock on which the Church should be built, is spoken of as a tempter and an offence to his Master, as one who savours not of the things which are of God, but of those which are of men. John is twice rebuked, once for his revengeful spirit, once for his short-sighted ambition. Judas's treachery is predicted. All the twelve are warned that they will fail at the hour of Christ's trial, and that warning, like the more individual prediction addressed to Peter, is certainly most unlikely to have been conceived after the event. In a word, from beginning to end of the Gospels, we have evidence which no one could have managed to forge, that Christ deliberately chose materials of which it would have been impossible for any one to build a great organization, unless he could otherwise provide, and continue to provide, the power by which that organization was to stand.—R. H. HURTON, Theological Essays, p. 150.

‘That they might be with Him.’—MARK III. 14.

His hold over all his pupils I know perfectly astonished me. It was not so much an enthusiastic admiration for his genius or learning or eloquence which stirred within them; it was a sympathetic thrill, caught from a spirit that was earnestly at work in the world—whose work was healthy, sustained, and constantly carried forward in the fear of God.—Mr. Price in STANLEY’S Life of Arnold, II.

REFERENCES.—III. 14.—J. Rendel Harris, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxii. 1902, p. 153. H. C. G. Moule, My Brethren and Companions, p. 14. III. 20, 21.—John Watson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 273. III. 20-35.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 47.

ENTHUSIASM

‘They said, He is beside Himself.’—MARK III. 21.

I. JESUS was counted mad simply because He was enthusiastic, and the incident is therefore typical. Our Master illustrates that passion for religion which is prepared to sacrifice everything, even life itself, in the service of God, and His family represents for the time the worldly mind which regarded Him with angry suspicion and has been pouring cold water on enthusiasm ever since. Two states of mind are contrasted—one inspired and self-forgetful, the other prosaic and self-regarding.

From time to time a tide of emotion has swept through the Church, cleansing her life from the pollution of the world and lifting it to a higher spiritual level, as when the ocean fills the bed of a shrunken river with its wholesome buoyant water. Every such springtime has been a lift to religion, and has been condemned as madness by the world.

II. There are two convincing pleas for enthusiasm and the first is its reasonableness. A man may be keen about many interests, but of all things he ought to be keenest about religion. If any one believes that the kingdom of God will remain when this world has disappeared like a shadow, then he is right to fling away all that he possesses, and himself too, for its advancement and victory.

My second plea for enthusiasm is its success. Take if you please the enthusiast who has not always been perfectly wise, and whose plans any one can criticize; the man who has not had tangible success. It does not follow that the cause of God is condemned in him or has lost by him. There is something more important than results which can be tabulated in reports, there is the spirit which inspires action and without which there will be no report to write. When a knight dies in his steel armour it does not matter much in the long result whether he lost or won. Every one who saw him fall, fearless to the last, leaves the lists with a higher idea of manhood.

III. We are hag-ridden in the Church of God by the idea of machinery, and we forget that the motive power of religion is inspiration. ‘The world,’ some one has said, ‘is filled with the proverbs of a base prudence which adores the rule of three, which never subscribes, which never gives, which seldom lends, and only asks one question—Will it bake bread?’ What we have to search for high and low is imprudent people, self-forgetful, uncalculating, heroic people.—J. WATSON (IAN MACLAREN), The Inspiration of Our Faith, p. 24.

REFERENCES.—III. 21.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 112. Vincent Tymms, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxix. 1905, p. 27. Henry Drummond, The Ideal Life, p. 9. III. 22-35.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 122.

AN ETERNAL SIN

‘In danger of eternal damnation.’—MARK III. 29.

OR—‘guilty of an eternal sin’. This is almost certainly the true rendering of the words of the Evangelist, from which some transcribers shrank as something strange and unusual, and took refuge in a word more easy to be explained and more closely related to cognate expressions.

I. What may we take it to mean, this description of a state, which men seem to have hesitated even to write down? It means surely, first of all, a great mistake. You may notice that our blessed Lord had just been speaking about that mysterious blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, which has so exercised the thoughts and guesses, and even terrors of men. It is this which brings man into the imminent danger of which we are thinking. Surely we are face to face with the possibility of a great mistake where a man gets so entirely out of sympathy with God that where there is God, he can only see an evil spirit; where there is goodness, he can only see malignity; where there is mercy, he can only see cruel tyranny. The great mistake! It begins, perhaps, in the will. Life is presented with all its fascinating material; there is the deadly bias of disposition, while there is the make-weight of grace; and the will gives in. And the dishonoured will now seeks to justify its degradation by an appeal to the intellect. Sin is decried as an ecclesiastical bogey. And then from the intellect it goes to the heart. ‘I will pull down my barns, and build greater.’ This is the extent of the heart’s ambition. See how the great mistake has spread! Self has deflected all the relations of life until the man has become denaturalized. He has made a great mistake—his relations to the world, to God, to self, are inverted unless God interferes, i.e. unless the man allows God to interfere; he is guilty of an eternal sin, in the sense of having made an irreparable mistake, and missed the object for which he was created, the purpose for which he was endowed.

II. But, besides a great mistake, an eternal sin means a great catastrophe.

What a terrible consciousness to wake up to the thought that the position which God has given us, the talents, the intellect, the skill, have been abused by a real perversion of life, and that we have been only doing harm when we were meant to be centres of good! See how an eternal sin may mean an eternal catastrophe, where the forces of life have become mutinous and disobedient; where self-control has gone for ever, and anarchy or misrule riot across life, where there is the perversion of blessings which reaches its climax in the fact that man is the great exception in the order of nature; that while every other living thing is striving for its own good, man alone is found choosing what he knows to be for his hurt. There is no ruin to compare to it, no depravity so utterly depraved as that which comes from a disordered and shattered human nature.

III. Lastly, we are face to face with a great loss. 'I do not wonder at what people suffer, but I wonder often at what they lose.'

The loss of God out of life, which begins, it may be, with a deprivation, and is a disquieting pang, which, if it is not arrested, becomes death, which, if persisted in, becomes eternal, becomes utter and complete separation from God, which becomes what we know as hell—the condition of an eternal sin.—W. C. E. NEWBOLT, Words of Exhortation, p. 230.

Illustration.—It was only that petty thieving from the bag, which Judas forgot as the miracles flashed before him, in speaking tongues, in unstopped ears, healed lepers, and awakened dead. It was only the selfish love of the world which he forgot, as he listened to the wondrous word of searching power, of veiling parable, or piercing insight, but insensibly it has begun to tell. A rift has begun to open in the lute. He finds himself as he never did before, a critic; he finds himself a grumbler; he finds himself in opposition. He is outside the charmed circle; 'this ointment might have been sold for much, and given to the poor'. He has a policy and a purpose of his own, 'what will ye give me, and I will deliver Him unto you?' Christ has dropped out of his life. He is definitely on the side of His enemies, 'And Judas also, which betrayed Him, stood with them'. 'I have sinned;' remorse pushes out repentance, and he stands in the piteous void of the awful and eternal loss.—W. C. E. NEWBOLT, Words of Exhortation, p. 243.

REFERENCES.—III. 29.—William Alexander, Primary Convictions, p. 133. W. Leighton Grane, Hard Sayings of Jesus Christ, p. 133. W. Temple, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 214. III. 31-35.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 129. R. Rainy, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 109. III. 33-35.—R. J. Campbell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 409. T. Vincent Tymms, ibid. vol. lxxix. 1906, p. 219. III. 34.—R. Rainy, Soljourning With God, p. 114. III. 35.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 138. IV. 1-25.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2512. IV. 1-34.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 54.

IV. 3-8, 14-20.—C. G. Lang, Thoughts on Some of the Parables of Jesus, p. 13. IV. 4.—F. Y. Leggatt, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 337. IV. 5, 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1132.

'Others fell into the good ground and yielded fruit.'—MARK IV. 8.

THE mate of an American whaler, Mr. Whalon, was captured by the cannibals of Hiva-Oa, one of the Marquesan islands, and rescued bravely by the intervention of a native Christian, Kekela, who was subsequently rewarded by President Lincoln for his gallant charity. Mr. Stevenson, in his volume In the South Seas (pp. 89, 90), quotes an extract from Kekela's letter of thanks, adding, 'I do not envy the man who can read it without emotion'.

After telling of the rescue, Kekela proceeds: 'As to this friendly deed of mine in saving Mr. Whalon, its seed came from your great land, and was brought by certain of your countrymen, who had received the love of God. It was planted in Hawaii, and I brought it to plant in this land and in these dark regions, that they might receive the best of all that is good and true, which is love. . . . This is a great thing for your nation to boast of, before the nations of the earth. From your great land a most precious seed was brought to the land of darkness. It was planted here, not by means of guns and men-of-war and threatenings. It was planted by means of the ignorant, the neglected, the despised. Such was the introduction of the Word of the Almighty God into this group of Nuuhiwa.'

REFERENCES.—IV. 10-20.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Mark I.-VIII. p. 139. IV. 11.—George Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 71. IV. 11, 12.—W. Leighton Grane, Hard Sayings of Jesus Christ, p. 19.

ONE THING, EVERYTHING

'Know ye not this parable? and how then will ye know all parables?'—MARK IV. 13.

THERE is a great philosophy in this inquiry, as there is in every inquiry propounded by the Son of God. If you know one, you know all. There is a master-key which opens all the locks; if you fail to lay hold of the master-key you will be fumbling round the locks all your days and never open a single cabinet or a single drawer. That is the great teaching of the text. If you do not know this parable you will know no parable at all.

I. What great lessons this text suggests! See the unity of Christ's teaching. To our poor half-educated eyes the teaching often seems to be disjointed, but who gave us the final vision, what right have we to say that this is correct, and that is only partially correct, or to make any such foolish judgments upon the great scheme of God? You say about a certain man, 'He has been very consistent throughout'. What do you mean? If he has preached the same sermon twice every Sunday and once every Thursday for thirty odd years, would you say he is consistent! Nothing of the kind; quite a blunder and quite an insult offered to the spirit of consistency. Orthodoxy is not in words; it is in blood-drops, in heart-throbs, in a purpose that cannot be quenched. A man may have verbally contradicted himself every time he has spoken, and yet he may be perfectly consistent in the sight of God as to his purpose and design and holy prayer. I have believed that there is no consistency where there is any growing. Give me the consistency of the growing flower, the expanding, fruit-bearing tree; let the leaves shed themselves every year, and the next year I know the apple will be bonnier, the pear will be sweeter, the tree will be larger and more capacious to receive more sunshine and produce more fruitful benedictions. God bless all growing things. This is the power, this is the beauty of the teaching of Christ; it is all one, it never breaks itself into two opposing and dis severed parts; from the beginning to the end it is one blessing, one gospel, one thought of love and healing and redeeming blood.

II. Notice the surprise of disappointed teachers. What, said Christ, 'Know ye not this parable?' I thought you, even you, so young in discipleship and so green in knowledge, even you would have seen the meaning that I have been endeavouring to convey. How often we are disappointed in our hearers, as well as in our preachers! I do not know that that is a subject much talked of abroad; but, you know, it is quite as possible for you to disappoint the preacher as it is for the preacher to disappoint you. It is so disheartening to talk to people who do not answer you in the great silence of love, in the sublime applause of obedience.

III. And yet see, on the other hand, a right disposition towards Christian knowledge. They went and said to Him, 'What is the meaning of this parable?' Be that said in memory of these men; they went for the meaning. 'Tell us the soul of it.' That is the right disposition of the soul towards all Christian teaching. Now, stripping the whole thing of its surroundings, its shells, and searching into the kernel, what does it mean? It all means one thing; the Lord Himself gathered up the whole speech of His heart into one sentence which reads as two: 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and soul and mind and strength, and thy neighbour as thyself'. It is a poor philosophy that cannot be wrapped up into one cannon-ball sentence; it is a poor sermon that cannot be condensed into the briefest message.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. VI. p. 107.

'The sower soweth the word.'—MARK IV. 14.

THE sower who casts in the seed, the father or mother casting in the fruitful Word, are accomplishing a pontifical act and ought to perform it with religious awe, with prayer and gravity, for they are labouring at the kingdom of God. All seed-sowing is a mysterious thing, whether the seed fall into the earth or into souls. Man is a husbandman; his whole work, rightly understood, is to develop life, to sow it everywhere. Such is the mission of humanity, and of this Divine mission the great instrument is speech.

We forget too often that language is both a seed-sowing and a revelation.—AMIEL's Journal, 2 May, 1852.

IN describing the impression made by Millet's picture, 'The Sower,' Theophile Gautier writes: 'Night approaches, unfurling its grey veil over the brown earth. The sower, covered with dingy rags, a shapeless cap on his head, goes forth with rhythmic steps, scattering the grain in the furrows, followed by a flight of greedy birds. Although bony, emaciated, and thin under his livery of misery, life flows from his generous hand; with a superb gesture, he who has nothing scatters far and wide the bread of the future.'

'Straightway cometh Satan and taketh away the word which hath been sown in them.'—MARK IV. 15.

SET beside this verse the following entry in Wesley's Journal for 1746: 'Fri. May 30th (Bristol). I light upon a poor, pretty, fluttering thing, lately come from Ireland, and going to be a singer at the play-house. She went in the evening to the chapel, and thence to the watch-night, and was almost persuaded to be a Christian. Her convictions continued strong for a few days; but then her old acquaintance found her, and we saw her no more.'

'With joy.'—MARK IV. 16.

THE man should move towards God in Christ in knowledge and understanding, taking up God's device of saving sinners by Christ as the Scripture holds it out; not fancying a Christ to himself, otherwise than the Gospel speaketh of Him, nor another way of relief by Him than the Word of God holdeth out. . . . I mean here also that a man be in calmness of spirit, and, as it were, in his cold blood, in closing with Christ Jesus; not in a single fit of affection which soon vanisheth. He that receiveth the seed into stony places, the same is he that heareth the word and anon with joy receiveth it. A man must here act rationally, as being master of himself, in some measure able to judge of the good or evil of the thing as it stands before him.—WILLIAM GUTHRIE of Fenwick.

REFERENCES.—IV. 16, 17.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ii. p. 49. IV. 17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2846.

'The cares of the world and the deceitfulness of riches.'—MARK IV. 19.

'HAPPY (said I); I was only happy once; that was at Hyères; it came to an end from a variety of reasons, decline of health, change of place, increase of money, age with his stealing steps.'—R. L. STEVENSON, Vailima Letters.

REFERENCES.—IV. 21.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 148. IV. 21-25.—H. Hensley Henson, Christ and the Nation, p. 227. IV. 22.—A. Martin, Winning the Soul, p. 181. IV. 24.—W. Farquhar Hook, Take Heed What ye Hear, p. 15. W. L. Watkinson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 252. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2512. IV. 25.—E. S. Talbot, Keele College Sermons, 1870-76, p. 20. W. Lock, ibid. p. 240.

SPIRITUAL DEVELOPMENT

So is the kingdom of God, as if a man should cast seed into the ground; and should sleep, and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how. For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear. But when the fruit is brought forth, immediately he putteth in the sickle, because the harvest is come.—MARK IV. 26.

I. THE beginning of religious life is always an awakening to the greatness that underlies the littleness of our ordinary existence. Now, Christianity was just the greatest of all such awakenings of mankind to the true meaning of life.

II. It is the more remarkable that Jesus Christ, who is in one sense the greatest revolutionist the world ever saw, should so constantly present spiritual life to us, not as the inroad upon our being of something entirely new, but simply as an awakening to something that was always there; not as a sudden revolutionary change by which the link between the past and present was snapped, but simply as the further development and manifestation of a principle which was working in human life and history from its first beginning.

III. And this view of the development of Christianity out of the past is naturally accompanied by a similar view of its future. Several of the parables of the kingdom of God are parables of evolution, in which processes of the spiritual life are compared to the organic processes of nature. We have here a parable which, perhaps more fully than any of the others, brings before us the idea of a spiritual evolution in all its various aspects. By the illustration of the growth of the wheat to the harvest, it calls attention, on one hand, to the quietness, continuity and naturalness of the process whereby spiritual life is developed, which makes it almost entirely escape notice while it is going on; and, on the other hand, to the wonderful transforming power of that process, which we discover when, after a time, we compare the later with the earlier stages of it. A man, or a society of men, sows the seeds of good and evil, conscious of the particular acts they do, but taking no thought of the enormous agencies they are setting in motion. Their minds at the time are occupied with special pleasures or with the gains they think they are making, but they do not attach any great importance to their acts; and, afterwards, they take no thought of what they have done, or perhaps forget all about it. But the spiritual world, like the natural, has its laws of growth, and slowly but certainly within the man or the nation, the seed ripens to the fruit. Inevitably the good or evil act lays the train for the good or evil tendency, and the good or evil tendency spreads out its influence till it permeates the whole life, moulding all the habits, all the manifold ways of thinking or acting, till the development and organization of character in the individual or the nation surprises us with the full-grown harvest of justice or injustice, salvation or moral ruin.—E. CAIRD, Lay Sermons and Addresses, p. 151.

REFERENCES.—IV. 26, 27.—E. C. Paget, Silence, p. 186. J. Burton, Christian Life and Truth, p. 293. Lyman Abbott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 259. IV. 26-28.—H. Jellott, Sermons on Special and Festival Occasions, p. 87. G. Matheson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. p. 195. C. W. Stubbs, Christus Imperator, p. 151. IV. 26-29.—J. Brown, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 106; see also vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 216. H. Scott Holland, ibid. vol. lii. 1897, p. 184. A. B. Davidson, Waiting Upon God, p. 205. W. Binnie, Sermons, p. 120. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1603. Rayner Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven, p. 16. W. Hay M. H. Aitken, The Highway of Holiness, p. 47. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 476. IV. 26-30.—A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part iv. p. 225.

First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear.—MARK IV. 28.

THE main duty of those who care for the young is to secure their wholesome, their entire growth, for health is just the development of the whole nature in its due sequences and proportions: first the blade, then the ear, then, and not till then, the full corn in the ear.

It is not easy to keep this always before one's mind, that the young 'idea' is in a young body, and that healthy growth and harmless passing of the time are more to be cared for than what is vainly called accomplishment. . . . So cultivate observation, energy, handicraft, ingenuity, outness in boys, so as to give them a pursuit as well as a study. Look after the blade, and don't coax or crush the ear out too soon, and remember that the full corn in the ear is not due till the harvest, when the great School breaks up, and we meet all divisions and go our several ways.—DR. BROWN, Horæ Subsecivæ.

First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear.—MARK IV. 28.

EPICETUS, at the close of his humorous, sensible remonstrance addressed to people who hastily rush into the use of the philosophic garb, employs this figure thus: 'Man,' he exclaims, 'first strive that it be not known what you are. Be a philosopher to yourself for a little. Fruit grows thus: the seed must be buried for some time, hidden; it must grow slowly if it is to mature. If it produces the ear before the jointed stem, it is imperfect. . . . So do you consider, my man; you have shot up too soon, you have hurried towards a little fame before the proper season.' He uses the same figure elsewhere, as in this paragraph: 'Nothing great is produced suddenly. Not even the grape or the fig is. If you tell me now that you want a fig, my answer will be, that requires time. Let it flower first, then put forth fruit, then ripen. If the fruit of the fig-tree is not matured suddenly, in an hour, would you possess the fruit of a man's mind so quickly and so easily? Do not expect such a thing, not even were I to tell you it could be.'

REFERENCES.—IV. 28.—R. S. Gregg, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 348. W. P. Balfour, Lessons from Jesus, p. 129. H. Harris, Short Sermons, p. 192. IV. 28, 29.—Edward White, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 24.

'And He said, How shall we liken the wisdom of God? It is like a grain of mustard seed.'—MARK IV. 30.

WHAT is a farm but a mute gospel? The chaff and the wheat, weeds and plants, blight, rain, insects, sun—it is a sacred emblem from the first furrow of spring to the last stack which the snow of winter overtakes in the fields. . . . Nor can it be doubted that this moral sentiment which thus scents the air, grows in the grain, and impregnates the waters of the world, is caught by man and sinks into his soul. The moral influence of nature upon every individual is that amount of truth which it illustrates to him.—EMERSON.

WITH WHAT COMPARISON

'With what comparison shall we compare it?'—MARK IV. 30.

MAN must have comparisons. He is a born parabolist; it may take another kind of man to put the parable into shape, but the parable, as to its substance and essence, is in every child and every heart. He is always seeking for a likeness, a comparison, something which will tell of something else than itself. It is peculiarly and eternally so in the kingdom of God; it takes up all other subjects, and uses them by first mocking them, by bringing them, in some instances, into ridicule, in order that it may point out the greatness of something else quite beyond words and quite beyond the region of visible picture. We must discover in this, as in all other respects, the way of the Lord.

I. God first belittles that He may afterwards magnify. That is the effect of all great examples. If you have been living amongst little folks you are no doubt a little creature. This is the Lord's way; He takes us into a new atmosphere, a new relationship, and measures us by a new standard. Comparing ourselves with ourselves we become very wise; but comparing ourselves with God, we are foolish and men of no understanding. When the Lord magnifies Himself against us it is not really to reduce us, but to bring us into that temper of mind in which we can receive a just revelation of our own personality; He reduces us to nothingness in our own esteem that He may afterwards put us together again, and begin by the power of the grace of the Cross to build us up in the true manhood.

II. God makes use of contrasts that He may reveal the Source of all strength. Here is a great work to be done, and God calls to it little children. The picture is a picture of ridicule; we say, Where is the proportion? This great work is to be constructed, and a number of little children have been called to do it. God's way! God hath chosen the weak things of this world, God hath chosen the foolish things of this world, God hath chosen things that are not, that no flesh should glory in His presence, but reveal Himself as the true source of strength.

III. God uses the partially impossible to magnify the essentially impossible. The great Teacher says, Heaven and earth shall pass away—meaning they shall not pass away—but My word shall not pass away. The mountains shall melt—yet they will not melt—the meaning is, Sooner shall heaven and earth pass away than My word shall pass away: sooner shall the partially impossible become the actually impossible than My word shall cease to be the life of creation, and the door into the security of true heaven. Sometimes He magnifies the partially impossible that He may magnify the truly impossible. He said, when He saw a mother nursing her child once, Can a woman forget her sucking child? yea, it is partially impossible, but it may be the fact—yet will not I forget Thee. For a small moment have I forsaken Thee, but with everlasting mercies I have gathered Thee. He only speaks of the small moment that He may get your attention to the eternal duration. Thou dost, by thunderstorm or earthquake or great wind or still small voice or in a thousand other ways, strive to get our attention, that foolish man may begin, even late in life, to take his first lesson in the kingdom of God.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. vii. p. 194.

REFERENCES.—IV. 30-32.—J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 81. C. G. Lang, Thoughts on Some of the Parables of Jesus, p. 41. H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 173. Rayner Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven, p. 52. IV. 33.—J. R. Cohu, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 11. IV. 33, 34.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1669.

UNREPORTED INTERVIEWS

'When they were alone, He expounded all things to His disciples.'—MARK IV. 34.

THESE were unreported interviews; these were secret conferences. We do not speak our best things in the public air; our whispers are costlier than our thunder; they may have more life in them, more tenderness, more poetry. We cannot report what we have heard, except in some poor dull way of words. That is hardly a report at all. To hear any man tell over what he has heard you say, that is punishment! He may speak your very words, and leave out your soul; with the best intention, he may report the interview upside down. Communications are not in words, except in some rough, commercial, and debtor-and-creditor way. Communications are in the breathing, in the looking, in the touching, in the invisible and the inaudible.

I. Jesus Christ had two speeches. The one to the great multitude. For them He had toys and stories and miracles and parables; He knew them well, He knew precisely what was adapted to their receptive power and their then state of intellectual culture. He always took out with Him toys enough to amuse and interest and haply instruct the gaping mob. To hear Jesus you must wait until He comes into the house; let Him read the Scriptures to you when your number is but small. His greatest tones are in the minor key; the way in which He finds the heart is a way of His own; never man spake like this Man.

II. I live with Christ, and He has taught me that there are two ways of reading everything. Sometimes I have thought my Lord partly amused at the greatness of us when we were really least. I am not quite literally sure, but I think I have sometimes seen the outline of a smile upon His face as He has watched the development of what we call our civilization. He has spoken very frankly to me upon this matter, He has told me that civilization must be very carefully watched, or it will become our ruin; He says that civilization unsanctified is a breach of the very first commandment of the decalogue.

III. Jesus takes us one by one, according to our gift and function, and talks to us alone. What lovely, tender, inspiring talks we may have with our Lord! We come out of them filled with His own inspiration, and enriched with His own patience and forbearance. We, being young, inexperienced, and foolish, want to have everything settled to-morrow. Jesus says, It takes a long time to make a rock; I have been a million ages in making this little pebble at the bottom of the stream, and thinkest thou that a man can be made in no time? If it required a million ages to make half a dozen smooth pebbles, how long will it take to make a redeemed and sanctified Church? Be patient, take larger views of things; the whole process is going on; there are first-born sons in knowledge, as well as in nature; first-born sons in prophecy and revelation and song, as well as in estates and titles and inheritances; the whole mystery was settled from the beginning of the creation, and long before the creation was in existence. All things are primordially in God; out of God they come, and God's will must be done on earth as in heaven, but day by day, five thousand more years, fifty thousand more risings of the sun, a million more revolutions of this planet or of that. But all the revolutions, all the silent dancing of the planets mean final music, beauty, rest.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. II. p. 70.

REFERENCES.—IV. 35-41.—J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 61. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 158. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 202. Walter Smith, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 340. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 119. IV. 35; VI. 6.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 67. IV. 36.—D. Sage Mackay, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxvi. 1904, p. 22. IV. 36-38.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 162.

'Master, carest Thou not that we perish?'—MARK IV. 38.

OUR worries always come from our weaknesses.—
JOUBERT.

REFERENCE.—IV. 38.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1121.

'And He rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, Peace, be still.'—MARK IV. 39.

WHILE it is a portentous fact that England still needs, at this stage of history, to be terrified into morality and religion by the threat of temporal retribution, it must be ever a lowering of Carlyle in the scale of greatness that he taught rather like his own Mohammed than like the Master of Light. 'What can you say of him,' asked Ruskin, 'except that he lived in the clouds and was struck by lightning?' a beautiful and true summary of the man's spirit in deed as in word. But struck by lightning he was; he could not wield it with impunity. How much less could he say to the storm raging all through his century, 'Peace, be still!' He spoke mighty words, but he had little in common with that dove-like brooding spirit which drew forth strength out of sweetness, and was able to hush the great waters and rebuke the waves. Facta est tranquillitas magna. That is the miracle which Carlyle never wrought on himself or any man that sought his aid.—From DR. W. BARRY'S Heralds of Revolt, p. 73.

SEE WESLEY'S Journal for 26 July, 1736.

MARK IV. 39 with VI. 50.

You have of course remarked the rise from the first storm-calming to the second. . . . One of the points of difference is, that He first calms the elements, then the soul, but in the second case the soul and then the elements, which is, in truth, the difference between the Old Testament and the New. And then there is the remarkable difference in the mode of address. To the elements, Peace, be still!—the command of a sovereign; to the soul, It is I; be not afraid!—the approach of a friend. You and I will try to feel that it is under this last and higher treatment we are put, that the troubles are kept round us for a while to have our souls made strong in the midst of them.—DR. JOHN KER'S Letters.

'Peace, be still.'—MARK IV. 39.

WE are as safe at sea, safer in the storm which God sends us, than in a calm when we are befriended by the world.—JEREMY TAYLOR.

PERSONALITY AND POWER

'He arose . . . and there was a great calm.'—MARK IV. 39.

IN the thirty-seventh verse we read, 'And there arose a great storm of wind'; in the thirty-ninth verse we read, 'And He arose . . . and there was a great calm'. This is the poetry of life. There is a storm side, and there is a side of great calm.

When Jesus Christ arose there was a great calm. Not only because He rebuked the winds and the waves, but because, primarily and wholly because, He Himself was calm. Peace brings peace; repose is mastery. He arose—but the wind had risen: the wind will retire when its Master arises. Do not consider or concern yourselves about the wind, the storm, the screaming, hurrying tempest. Hope thou in God; thou shalt take thy Saviour's peace as part of thine own tranquillity: My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth give I unto you; peace, be still; peace, be not afraid. We have a derived peace; tranquillity of our own we have none, but we have the whole river of the grace and peace of God flung through our hearts, and we are at peace because we build our tents for a night by the river of peace.

I. Let us take it in the matter of those little angers, vexations, and bitternesses, that trouble our uncertain and peevish life. When the great Christ-like considerations come up, rise in the soul, instantly the anger falls away and a sweet calm supervenes. You were not to be reasoned with in the moment of your anger; you felt that you were superior to all argument; in fact, you felt that there was no argument except your own; you looked down with a kind of contempt upon those who thought they could argue you out of your mean condition of mind. They could do nothing with you; but when Christ arose, when you remembered what He was, what He did, what He is, what He expects, you were ashamed; and for anger there came great Christly love. It is just as true, therefore, of us as it was of the sea.

II. Take it in the matter of anxiety. Some people are dying of care, thought; they wonder what will happen to-morrow, in anticipation they meet all the difficulties of the next seven years. They set themselves little problems in moral arithmetic, asking, If this should be equal to that, and a third thing should affect both the things now in opposition, what will possibly happen this day five years? The Lord does not ask you to be arithmeticians in that sense; in fact, very little arithmetic will satisfy the Lord. We do not want all this anticipation and multiplication of difficulties and dangers, losses and crosses. We may never live to see to-morrow; some men die in the night-time; in some nights the bridge is lost that connects the days. What then? Watch; be vigilant, be sober; expect the Lord: the great watchword of the Lord's Church should be, 'The kingdom of heaven is at hand!' The worlds touch one another, not by material tact, but by magnetic, sympathetic, inexpressible relation and ministry. All the wrinkles upon your face were made by thinking about to-morrow.

III. Take it in the matter of social strife. Let Christ arise; Christ will settle all your social disputes, all your trade strikes, all your collisions, oppositions, and competitions. Let the Spirit of Christ work; let this mind be in you that was also in Christ Jesus: and when the Christ Spirit rises in our hearts we will meet one another in mutual apology, in large concession, in noble charity, in generous justice. The storm is not still until Christ calms it, and when He calms it no power can ruffle it again, it is still and tranquil under the sovereignty of Christ.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. iv. p. 50.

REFERENCES.—IV. 39.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 23. IV. 40.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiii. No. 1964. IV. 41 (R.V.).—J. Jackson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 260. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1686. V.—J. McNeill, Regent Square Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 177. V. 1-20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2262. J. Morley Mills, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 234. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 212. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 125. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 177. John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 218. V. 1-24.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2507. V. 2.—H. Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 123. V. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2507. V. 7.—Ibid. vol. li. No. 2966. W. Ralph, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxii.

1907, p. 309. V. 15.—W. P. Balfour, Lessons from Jesus, p. 81. V. 17.—W. Gilbert, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxvii. 1905, p. 134. V. 17-19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2262. V. 18, 19.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 186.

THE SAVIOUR AND THE MANIAC

'He besought Jesus that he might be with Him.'—MARK V. 18. OF all the encounters of Jesus with men, surely none is more striking than His meeting with the maniac whose home was among the tombs. Jesus had just left the boat, and stepped upon the shore, when from out one of the caves that served for a burying-place among the limestone hills there rushed towards Him a creature that seemed not so much like a human being as like an evil spirit incarnate. Perhaps the unhappy man had been watching the boat coming across the lake; and with the swift bounds of a maniac, he made straight for the Master as He disembarked. It was always so with Jesus. No sooner did He touch the land than He was met by human want and misery.

How very touching is the contrast between these two men—the Saviour and the maniac; immortal symbol of the world, wild and gloomy, hopeless, and homeless, rushing on to offer its instinctive and unconscious homage to the Jesus whom it needs. There stands the Master, with His quiet, fearless bearing, with His sorrowful face and His beautiful eyes; and there, at His feet, is the demoniac, wild and fierce and naked, with the strength of a demon in his right arm and the awful light of madness in his eye. Not only all the day, but all the night, when other men were sleeping, the lonely hills where he made his home would ring with his unearthly cries, and he would gash himself with stones until the blood would spurt. So powerful was he that he could burst the heavy chains with which he had been bound, and so terrible was he that the bravest were afraid to pass that way.

I. No one would pass but Jesus. He was not afraid. Such were the ways He loved to pass. He loved to set the fallen upon their feet, to restore again the ruins of human nature; and to heal this wild misery which rushed towards Him from the hills, and then threw itself impulsively at His feet, was just to do the work which His Father had given Him to do. A brave heart might well have quailed before such an onset, and fled perhaps in terror; but Jesus stood and, looking upon him, loved him. We listen with bated breath to hear what He will say to this poor, unhappy, and dangerous man. Jesus is always simple, serenely and sublimely simple. He does not begin by preaching any gospel, He simply asks the man his name. And we may well believe that the maniac's manner would be instantly transformed. Here was a voice which sounded as perhaps no human voice before or since has sounded—the quiet, gentle, affectionate tone must have gone home with healing to the recesses of that shattered mind; and here were the words of One who spoke to him as a man speaks to his friend. Other men had repeatedly come to bind him with their cruel chains; who could this be who came with no chain, but who bound him all the more firmly by the gentle bonds of love?

Is it any wonder that in the quiet, authoritative presence of Jesus the maniac is transformed? He, who before was naked, now is clothed. He, who before rushed with wild frenzy about the desolate hills, now sits quietly at the feet of Jesus. He, who before was possessed by devils, is now possessed by the spirit of Jesus.

II. Why did Jesus refuse the man's request? Partly for the world's sake and partly for the man's own. 'Go,' said Jesus, 'to thy house, to thine own people, and tell them all that the Lord, in pity, hath done for thee.' The saved man has to be, in his turn, a saviour, or at least a preacher. Anything that he knows about Jesus, those who are dear to him should know too. 'Go to thine own people and tell them.' Upon the man who has been redeemed, who has passed from insanity to soundness of mind, from lonely misery to fullness of joy, lies the obligation to tell the story to those whom he can influence, first to those of his own household, and then to those beyond it; for if a man has been healed by the shores of the sea of Galilee, then Decapolis has a right to know about it too. Life upon the mountains and among the tombs is no more possible for such an one: he must go with his message among the men who need it. The new power which Jesus has brought into his life is not only for himself but for them. Inspiration has to be translated into action, knowledge and power into service. The work for which he was redeemed will not be done if he sits at Jesus' feet. So, for the world's sake, Jesus says, 'Go'.

But no less for the man's sake. He has to learn that the power which redeemed him can keep him, whether the bodily presence of Jesus is near him or not. Perhaps, like many men, he was anxiously dependent upon a visible support to his faith; and the gracious Jesus, who loved him better than he knew, deliberately sent him away, that he might learn the true meaning of spiritual religion. 'Go and tell what the Lord hath done.' The Lord was the Lord of all the earth, and everywhere He might be found. When Jesus entered into His boat, and was lost to sight across the lake, the power which He represented did not vanish with Him; and Jesus wished to bring home to this redeemed but anxious soul, that the Divine resources were always at the disposal of the man who trusted them—alike upon the sea and land, upon the valleys and the hills, in the crowded city and on the waste and desolate place where no man is. God and His power and His love are everywhere.—J. E. McFADYEN, The City With Foundations, p. 33.

REFERENCE.—V. 10.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, God's Heroes, p. 217. H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (4th Series), p. 30. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 100. V. 22-24.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 149.

V. 22-24, 35-43.—John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 338. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 230. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 194. V. 25.—J. Halsey, The Spirit of Truth, p. 183. V. 25-27.—M. Guy Pearse, Jesus Christ and the People, p. 158. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in a Religious House, vol. i. p. 104. V. 25-28.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 199. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 827. V. 25-34.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 157. J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 229. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 243. V. 26.—J. Service, Sermons, p. 73. V. 28.—C. Brown, God and Man, p. 236. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiii. No. 1382. V. 28-34.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 213.

PERSONAL EXPERIENCE

'She felt that she was healed.'—MARK v. 29.

ALL Christians have to be witnesses, to be living testimonies, that they have become connected with the eternal fountains, and are no longer in need of supply from inferior streams.

I. What a marvellous picture this is! But there is a counter side, shall we say a corroborative side, strongly and perfectly confirming the woman's own feeling. You have it in the very next verse; that is to say, Mark v. 30, 'And Jesus, immediately knowing in Himself that virtue had gone out of Him'. There you have the double picture: the woman knew she had received something, and Jesus that He had given something; with that double testimony who shall stand up and deny it in either of its aspects? This mystery of intercommunication is going on all the day, the outgoing of faith, the incoming of healing. That is the gracious mystery, and in that mystery we ought to live and grow and become quite strong. Ministers surely know when virtue has gone out of them. There are sermons that cost nothing; there are discourses that are delivered from the lips; there is a fluent ignorance. There are sermons that tear the soul as they come out of it—the upper side of that marvellous demoniacal possession. It may be quite possible for persons to preach and to lose nothing, but if they lose nothing they gain nothing. That is the solemn and all but tragical mystery. Jesus Christ gave Himself; He turned His own soul into wisdom, parable, gospel invitation, and feast of mercy. What wonder that He lived but a little time when the drain or the strain upon Him was so exhausting?

II. What a wonderful testimony we find in the first Epistle of John, chapter one, and the opening of the chapter, 'That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life . . . that which we have seen and heard declare we unto you.' Had they no personally original remarks to make? None. How did they preach? By telling what they knew; not by telling what somebody else knew. That is preaching, preaching that cannot be put down; not preaching in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but in the power of the Spirit and the demonstration of the omnipotent grace of the Cross.

III. Have we touched the Saviour? If so, why not say so? why not be personal witnesses to a Divine experience? If we only have what the books have given us, all that we have can be taken away from our hearts; but if the Spirit itself bear witness with our spirits that we are the children of God, then our religion, if I may so say, is treasured where moth and rust do not corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal.

This also is the true strength. If we have our salvation only in our memory we may lose it at any moment. Salvation is not a recollection only, it is a present experience, it is the joy of the morning, it is the crown of the noonday. This is true joy—what we ourselves have felt and known and seen and handled—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. iv. p. 203.

REFERENCES.—V. 30, 31.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1640. V. 32.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 215. V. 33.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ix. No. 514. V. 35-43.—Ibid. vol. xliii. No. 2507. V. 36.—‘Plain Sermons’ by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. i. p. 99. S. Martin, Sermons, p. 191. J. J. Tayler, Christian Aspects of Faith and Duty, p. 169. VI. 1-13.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 228. VI. 2.—N. Dwight Hillis, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 74. VI. 2, 3.—J. Clifford, The Dawn of Manhood, p. 20. VI. 2-4.—H. Scott Holland, Church Times, vol. lvii. 1907, p. 53; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 17.

‘Is not this the carpenter.’—MARK VI. 3.

In a letter written from Pavia, during his early mission there, Savonarola explains to his mother why he is working in Lombardy instead of nearer home. ‘Seeing that He hath chosen me for this sacred office, rest ye content that I fulfil it far from my native place, for I bear better fruit than I could have borne at Ferrara. There it would be with me as it was with Christ, when His countrymen said: Is not this man a carpenter, and the son of a carpenter? But out of my own place this has never been said to me; rather, when I have to depart, men and women shed tears, and hold my words in much esteem.’

REFERENCES.—VI. 3.—C. Jordan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 44. C. W. Stubbs, Pro Patria, p. 160; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 129. J. Farquhar, The Schools and Schoolmasters of Christ, p. 61. Mark Guy Pearse, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 118. T. Vincent Tymms, ibid. vol. lxxvii. 1903, p. 264. J. Clifford, The Dawn of Manhood, p. 34. C. New, The Baptism of the Spirit, p. 231.

‘A prophet is not without honour save in his own country.’—MARK VI. 4.

MR. BENTHAM is one of those persons who verify the old adage, that ‘a prophet has most honour out of his own country’. His reputation lies at the circumference; and the lights of his understanding are reflected, with increasing lustre, on the other side of the globe. His name is little known in England, better in Europe, best of all in the plains of Chili and the mines of Mexico.—HAZLITT, Spirit of the Age.

THE following extract from Horace Walpole touches a similar chord: ‘Adieu, retrospect! It is as idle as prophecy, the characteristic of which is never to be believed where alone it could be useful, i.e. in its own country.’

COMPARE Mrs. Oliphant’s account of Edward Irving’s reception in Annandale in 1828.

REFERENCES.—VI. 5, 6.—R. Scott, Oxford University Sermons, p. 276. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 237.

ABNORMAL UNBELIEF

‘And He marvelled because of their unbelief.’—MARK VI. 6.

I. As Jesus stood face to face with the unbelief of His townsmen, His kinsfolk, and even of the disciples themselves, He found Himself in a world that jarred His Divine instincts and sensibilities. Although it was true of Him here, as in Jerusalem at a later stage, ‘He knew what was in man,’ He did not look for such a deadening psychic atmosphere. The crisis through which He passed must have been akin to that of the child trained in a refined and gracious home, who goes forth into the world to find a treasured name bandied about by scoffers and treated as though it were of little worth. ‘He marvelled because of their unbelief.’

1. Is not the pained surprise flushing his face as eloquent of Divine Sonship as a glint of transfiguration splendour? Our Lord’s amazement at this widespread unbelief is a sign of separateness from His infirm and blemished contemporaries. Could He visit again even those who call themselves by His name the same anomaly would recur.

2. This flash of surprise shows that, during His thirty years’ sojourn in Nazareth, Jesus had not been subdued to the temper of doubt abroad, but had kept untarnished the fine bloom of His faith.

3. As we see this surprise reflected in the face of Jesus, may we not infer that He came down to His work amongst men from a holy world, where faith was the all-pervading law? That world had put its enduring imprint upon His personality, or rather His personality had put its sovereign imprint upon the world.

II. Our Lord’s amazement must have been aggravated as He marked the frivolous causes which fostered this unbelief, and the poor apology His fellow-townsmen made for themselves. Faith is a spiritual principle, demanding for its growth and fruitful development congruous conditions. It is not intellectual in its origin, although some of the perplexities which assail our faith and test its genuineness can only be dispelled by close and clear thinking. It cannot be created by the methods of logic, or finally destroyed by the processes of criticism. If we analyse current phases of unbelief, we find that many causes have entered into it. It is, perhaps, not to be wondered at when the great tumultuous passions of the flesh blind the eyes, and men refuse to believe what is holy; but it is strange and curious, when the only excuse men offer for their lack of faith is that the authority which invites it is devoid of pomp and outward trappings. Hands which have held plane and saw can scarcely be Divine. If the townsmen of Nazareth had believed in a man of God because he was a professional scribe, rather than a carpenter, such homage of social rank would have been specious and would have been no better than the unbelief which astonished Jesus. They despised the man who had lived and wrought alongside them, though He was wise in word and holy in deed. In the sacredness of One Who had toiled for His daily bread, and wore homely clothes, they could put no confidence. They had eyes for dress and rank, but none for truth, honour, holiness, transcendent personal force.

Vanity always proves itself a prolific soil for the growth of unbelief.

III. In His dependence upon the co-acting faith of men, Jesus Christ reflects the ways of God in the world to-day. We forget how God conditions His work in our midst, and aim inane reproaches against His dealings with us; whilst all the time we know that, apart from our co-operation, He will not do great things for us. This is an established method of His redemptive government.

Let us see to it that we have a faith which satisfies the Lord upon Whom it takes hold and helps on His redemptive acts.—T. G. SELBY, The Strenuous Gospel, p. 245.

REFERENCES.—VI. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 935. VI. 7, 12, 13.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. II p. 391. VI. 7; VII. 23.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 84. VI. 16.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 247. E. B. Speirs, A Present Advent, p. 149. W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 89. VI. 16, 20.—S. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 115. VI. 17-28.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 256.

'For John had said to Herod, it is not lawful for thee to have her.'—MARK VI. 18.

SPEAKING of Fénelon's 'Télémaque,' in his Lectures on the Ancien Régime, Kingsley protests: 'It is something to have spoken to a prince, in such an age, without servility and without etiquette, of the frailties and dangers which beset rulers; to have told him that royalty, "when assumed to content oneself, is a monstrous tyranny: when assumed to fulfil its duties, and to conduct an innumerable people, as a father conducts his children, a crushing slavery, which demands an heroic courage and patience". Let us honour the courtier who dared to speak such truths.'

If the canker of the age can be traced to any single source, it is to the Princess herself. Its sycophancy had its apotheosis in every word said or written to, or said or written of, and meant to be seen by, the sovereign. An abject form of so-called loyalty vitiates and mars almost all the loftiest prose and verse of the time. . . . A margin of servility remains, either explanation of which is alike distasteful; for, honest or dishonest, it showed an otherwise incredible weakness of judgment or character. Bacon's treatment of Essex was nowise treacherous, but it was not noble; his relation to James was ignoble.—PROF. NICHOL'S Bacon, i. 24, 67.

'He heard him gladly.'—MARK VI. 20.

WHEN George Fox arrived in Edinburgh in 1657, he was summoned by the magistrates, examined, and then ordered to leave Scotland in a week's time. 'I desired them to hear what I had to say to them, but they said they would not hear me. I told them Pharaoh heard Moses and Aaron, and yet he was a heathen and no Christian, and Herod heard John the Baptist; and they should not be worse than these. But they cried, Withdraw, withdraw!'

REFERENCES.—VI. 20.—W. C. E. Newbolt, Church Times, vol. xxxii. 1894, p. 219. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 347; vol. xxvi No. 1548. VI. 26-29.—G. Salmon, Non-Miraculous Christianity, p. 155. VI. 30-44.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 268. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 262. John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 74.

A DESERT PLACE

'Come apart into a desert place.'—MARK VI. 31.

FEW sentences in the New Testament are more pathetic than this: 'There were many coming and going, and the Apostles of Jesus had no leisure so much as to eat'. Jesus had sent them away to do their beneficent work upon the bodies and the minds of men. They had done it; and now they had come back and gathered about Him to tell Him of all that had befallen them. Jesus listened with an interest mingled with joy and pity. He knew that for the happy prosecution of the work of life men need not only enthusiasm but strength. And so when their tale is told, He simply says, 'Come by yourselves apart into a desert place, and take a little rest'. And in words of simple pathos, the Evangelist adds, 'For crowds were coming and going, and they had not even a chance to eat'. So, at the Master's bidding, they entered a boat and went away to a desert place apart.

This is indeed very touching; but the sequel is more touching still. For the kind wish of Jesus was defeated by the importunity of the crowd; and when they crossed to their desert place where they had hoped to be by themselves apart, they found the place crowded with a waiting throng that had hurried round the lake on foot. The work had to be begun again, and the repose seemed further off than ever. In the attitude of Jesus to this new and unexpected obligation, we get a glimpse into the depths of His great heart. An ordinary man would have resented the appearance of a crowd which so effectively dispelled all hope of repose and deprived Him and His of the rest they so sorely needed. But not so Jesus. 'When He landed and saw the great crowds, He had pity upon them and began to teach them many things.' Those who had come to Him in such a way He could in no wise cast out. The seeming annoyance He accepted as a Divine opportunity, and tired and disappointed as He and His disciples were, He gladly and uncomplainingly began again the great work which His Father had given Him to do.

I. It is worth pondering that Jesus deliberately sought for Himself and His disciples to escape from the crowd. It is also worth pondering that that escape proved impossible. In such a world as ours we are sometimes compelled by circumstances, or by regard for some high moral law, or for the sake of a needy brother, to act against our better knowledge. We know very well that we must spare ourselves, or our strength—and to that extent, our efficiency—will be impaired. Yet the circumstances of our life so arrange themselves that to spare ourselves is impossible; and so long as we have strength to stand upon our feet, we must go on with our work. These exacting demands, which seem at times so cruel, have no doubt their high compensations both here and hereafter; but while we must learn the stern obligation of service from the willingness of Jesus to do what He could for the crowd at the very time that He so yearned to be alone with His disciples, we have also to learn from His desire that they should go apart—and perhaps many of us need this lesson still more—how indispensable is rest and loneliness to all continued and effective work.

II. It is not without interest that the words for 'come' and 'rest' which Jesus used in His invitation to the disciples are the same as those in which He gave to all that laboured and were heavy laden that other invitation which has rung as an evangel throughout the centuries: 'Come unto Me and I will give you rest'. Perhaps here, too, in the suggestion that they go to a desert place there is a similar undertone. Not merely in the desert place will the inspiration be; for Jesus is to be there too. Nor is it only through going apart by themselves that they will renew their strength; for they are to go apart with Him. But all the same, the passage sounds an immortal warning to men who are consumed by zeal for the work to which they are giving their lives. The strongest and the most zealous need to go apart into a desert place and rest awhile. They need it for their own sake; they need it for their work's sake. Much of the work has to be done 'in the midst of the street'; and we can only possess our souls there in patience and peace if we have rested for awhile apart in the desert place.

III. It was to satisfy two needs that Jesus urged upon His disciples this escape from the crowd—the need of aloofness and the need of rest. First, 'Come by yourselves apart'. The disciples had no doubt enjoyed some measure of success in their mission, and they may have been a little elated by their temporary popularity. At any rate, it was now time for them to go apart by themselves, away from the disturbing illusions of the crowd, to a desert place where they could view themselves and their work in truer perspective. A crowd is a terrible thing and a good man may well fear it. He will fear its false standards of success. He will fear lest he come to measure his worth by the size of his crowd. He will fear lest he come to care more for their applause than to tell them the truth. Yes, the crowd is a menace to a man's true estimate of himself; and as he loves his soul, he will once in a while leave it all for the desert place where there is little to turn his head or distort his vision of the eternal things. 'For my part,' said Stevenson, 'I should try to secure some part of every day for meditation, above all, in the early morning and the open air.' Apart from men, and, above all, in the healthful presence of the primeval things, the sky, the mountains, the sea, we can look ourselves more honestly in the face, lift up our hearts to God, and give our panting lives a chance.

When Père Didon had been banished to Corsica, Pasteur wrote to him: 'You will come back with your soul still loftier, your thought more firm, more disengaged from earthly things'. Most of the world's best work has been done by men who prepared for it in some desert place. Jesus began His own ministry with a season in the wilderness, and often afterwards he sought the loneliness of the mountain-side. Paul had his Arabia, and John Bunyan his prison. The street has its place in the religious life, but so also has the desert. He will work best for the crowd who has rested in the wilderness. And not less needful than when first it was spoken is this healing word of Jesus to the crowded and distracted lives of men to-day: 'Come by yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest yourselves awhile'.—J. E. McFADYEN, The City With Foundations, p. 227.

REST THE BASIS OF CHARACTER

'Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest awhile: for there were many coming and going.'—MARK VI. 31.

THERE are two ways of looking at life, and there are two ways of living. The one attracts but does not satisfy. The other satisfies while it attracts. The former, which is the natural, is broad and shallow. The latter, which is the spiritual, is not less wide, but it is deep. In the one case the man begins with observation and ends in criticism, spending himself in busy activity till there is nothing left but self-disgust. In the other an ever-growing sympathy expands into the life and love of God.

I. The life of prayer—the only real and true life—is one that springs from a profound sympathy with the universe, which sees in the great order of which we form a part not only the length and the breadth, but also, and much more vividly, the depth.

The man of prayer is he whose work in the world is the stronger because it manifests the sense of God's nearness; who, always busy, is yet ever at rest; about whom the casual stranger feels that there is a background, a hidden life, a fountain of living water from wells of salvation that our father Jacob gave us not.

II. And the men of prayer teach their brethren that which is the hardest, while it is the truest lesson of life, how to die.

Why is it that we are so slow to learn the secret of Jesus? When He has bidden us watch and pray; when He has begged that for His sake we will give Him one last hour; He comes and finds us sleeping, for our eyes are heavy and the flesh is weak.

And yet it is just for these supreme moments that Christ came into the world. He came, that out of the deep of our human character He might cry to the Father in that perfectness of unbroken communion, wherein prayer gathers itself up into words that are the expression of a life—'Thy will be done'. Not once nor twice in that career of tireless activity did He go away and pray, 'saying again the same words'. For Jesus' life meant not to do but to be, not to live but to die. Jesus Christ did most for the world when He was doing nothing. The finished work of Christ is not the bustle of a great activity, but the peace of a surrendered life.—J. G. SIMPSON, Christian Ideals, p. 183.

'Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest awhile.'
—MARK VI. 31.

WE must know how to put occupation aside, which does not mean that we must be idle. In an inaction which is meditative and attentive, the wrinkles of the soul are smoothed away. The soul itself spreads, unfolds, and springs afresh, and, like the trodden grass of the roadside or the bruised leaf of a plant, repairs its injuries, becomes new, spontaneous, true, and original.—AMIEL.

'A MAN,' said Carlyle once, 'must not only be able to work, but to give over working.'

REFERENCES.—VI. 31.—S. Baring-Gould, Plain Sermons on Sunday Observance, p. 33. W. Pierce, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 93. C. F. Aked, ibid. vol. lxvi. 1904, p. 85. A. B. Boyd Carpenter, ibid. vol. lxx. 1906, p. 180. W. P. Balfour, Lessons from Jesus, p. 47. T. Teignmouth Shore, The Life of the World to Come, p. 53. C. J. Vaughan, Last Words in the Parish Church of Doncaster, p. 259. Stopford A. Brooke, Short Sermons, p. 246. G. S. Reaney, Religion in Common Life, p. 24.

'He had compassion on them . . . and He began to teach them many things.'—MARK VI. 34, 35.

SEE P. G. HAMERTON'S Intellectual Life, pp. 350 f.

REFERENCES.—VI. 34.—R. W. Church, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 91. C. S. Robinson, Simon Peter, p. 211. VI. 34-43.—Mark Guy Pearse, Jesus Christ and the People, p. 23. VI. 35-44.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 217. VI. 36, 37.—J. C. Edghill, Church Times, vol. xxxvii. 1897, p. 641.

'Give ye them to eat.'—MARK VI. 37.

ONCE, when asked by the rector of his church to subscribe to a fund for erecting ten new churches in Manchester, Cobden replied: 'The first and most pressing need of the poor is for food; all other wants are secondary to this. It is in vain to try and elevate the moral and religious character of a people whose physical condition is degraded by the privation of the first necessities of life; and hence we are taught to pray for our daily bread before spiritual grace. . . . Until this object [i.e. the repeal of the Corn Laws] be attained, I shall be compelled to deny myself the satisfaction of contributing to other public undertakings of great importance in themselves, and secondary only to the first of all duties—the feeding of the hungry. It is for this reason that I am reluctantly obliged to decline to contribute to the fund for building ten new churches. My course is, I submit, in strict harmony with the example afforded me by the Divine Author of Christianity, who preached upon the mountain and in the desert, beneath no other roof than the canopy of heaven, and who yet, we are told, was careful to feed the multitude that flocked around him.

REFERENCES.—VI. 37.—G. Campbell Morgan, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 289. Archdeacon Colley, ibid. vol. xliii. 1893, p. 253. J. D. Jones, ibid. vol. lix. 1901, p. 144. VI. 45-51.—Eugene Bersier, Twelve Sermons, p. 177. VI. 45-52.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 223. John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 87. VI. 45-53.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 232. VI. 48.—C. S. Robinson, Sermons on Neglected Texts, p. 152. J. S. Wood, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lii. 1897, p. 310.

THE MISUNDERSTOOD CHRIST

'But they, when they saw Him walking on the sea, supposed that it was an apparition and cried out: for they all saw Him, and were troubled.'—MARK VI. 49.

I. The Misunderstood Christ.—Why was it the disciples 'cried out'? Why was it that when they saw Him they were troubled? This is the answer. They took Jesus for other than He was.

Multitudes are troubled by Christ, hate the very name and thought of Christ, because they cleave to their sins and have said to evil—be thou my good. But while admitting all that, I do not believe it wholly meets the case or accounts for the prevailing indifference or hostility to Christ.

Men are indifferent to Christ, not to say hostile to Him, because of the false ideas they have of Him, because of the distorted representations given to them of Him. They imagine, somehow, that He will empty and impoverish life for them. They do not realize that wherever He goes He carries joy and brightness with Him, and always transmutes life's water into wine. And so it comes to pass that multitudes reject their Best Friend, and face life's temptations and trials without Christ's succour; and try to bear life's sorrows without Christ's comfort, and go down into the valley of the shadow of death without His presence to strengthen them.

II. The Welcome Given to the Real Christ.—The disciples were troubled by the phantom Christ they thought they saw, but when He spoke to them, and they realized it was Jesus Himself, they received Him willingly, gladly, eagerly into the ship.

When men see the real Christ their hearts are drawn to Him. This Christ without fleck or fault Himself, but identifying Himself in His love and pity with our sinful race—compassionating men, helping men, hoping for men with an indomitable hope, and dying for them in the might of His sacrificial love—men have no fault to find with this Christ. The Christ of the schools may not attract them very much; the Christ they see in the average Christian may even repel them; but the real Christ always wins admiration, worship, love.—J. D. JONES, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII. 1907, p. 257.

REFERENCES.—VI. 50.—W. Gilbert, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 68. A. Maclaren, Creed and Conduct, p. 15. VI. 52.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1218. VI. 54, 55, 56.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 193. VI. 56.—A. MacKenzie, ibid. vol. lii. 1897, p. 166. VII. 8.—Charles Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 145. VII. 9-13.—J. H. Bernard, From Faith to Faith, p. 181. VII. 12.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 216.

'Making void the word of God by your tradition.'—MARK VII. 13.

IN his declaration to the Irish people, in 1650, Cromwell assails the Roman clergy thus: 'How dare you assume to call these men your "flocks," whom you have plunged into so horrid a Rebellion, by which you have made them and the country almost a ruinous heap? You cannot feed them! You poison them with your false, abominable, and anti-christian doctrines and practices. You keep the Word of God from them; and instead thereof give them your senseless Orders and Traditions.'

REFERENCES.—VII. 13.—Bishop Percival, Sermons at Rugby, p. 32.

THE SPHERE NOT PROHIBITED

'When He had called all the people unto Him, He said unto them, There is nothing from without a man that can defile him.'—MARK VII. 14, 15.

It is not often that Jesus 'calls the people unto Him' for the purpose of giving an address. He commonly finds the people already gathered, and the address is a matter of accident. But here is a solemn exception. I say solemn. If Christ called the people to give them a message, He must have thought it a very important message.

I. 'Nothing from without can defile a man.' It is the sweepingness that startles us. 'Nothing from without.' What!—nothing? Not the theatre, not the opera, not the concert-room, not the public dancing-hall? No—not in so far as these are things outside. These buildings are all right until they are painted—and it is the soul that paints them. All the tarnish they ever get is from the brush of the soul.

II. You go to walk on a Sunday because other people are at church; you will show them how you are emancipated from superstition. The walk makes you feel atheistic, reckless, disdainful of sacred things. Have you got harm, then, from the outside landscape? No, it is the landscape that has got harm from you. Why did you go out with the belief that your Sunday walk was prohibited! It was that belief which poisoned the whole air.

III. If you had only made your walk a worship, if you had gone, not to repel man but to meet God, the outside world would have smiled upon you. The roses would have been radiant; the grass would have been green; the thrush would have been thrilling; the woods would have waved their welcome. The soul that feels God's presence in the garden will be hurt by no plant of Eden.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 269.

REFERENCE.—VII. 17.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 66.

'That which cometh out of the man, that defileth the man.'—MARK VII. 20.

WE can run up nearly all faults of conduct into two classes—faults of temper and faults of sensuality; to be referred, nearly all of them, to one or other of these two instincts. Now Jesus not only says that things coming from within a man's heart defile him, He adds expressly what these things that, coming from within a man, defile him are. And what He enumerates are the following: evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, stealings, greeds, viciousnesses, fraud, dissoluteness, envy, evil-speaking, pride, folly. These fall into two groups; one, of faults of self-assertion, graspingness, and violence, all of which we may call faults of temper; and the other, of faults of sensuality. . . . This was the method of Jesus; the setting up of a great unceasing inward movement of attention and verification in matters which are three-fourths of human life, where to see true and to verify is not difficult, the difficult thing is to care and to attend. And the inducement to attend was because joy and peace, missed on every other line, were to be reached on this.—M. ARNOLD, Literature and Dogma.

THE GENESIS OF EVIL

'And Jesus said, That which cometh out of the man, that defileth the man. For from within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness: all these evil things come from within, and defile the man.'—MARK VII. 20-23.

OUR Lord here declares the human heart to be origina-tive; that the vices which darken the world take their rise within us; in the mystery of the soul He teaches us to seek for the mystery of iniquity.

I. Let us Observe Several Theories of the Origin of Evil which are Condemned by the Text.

1. The theory which finds the origin of evil in the physical world is thus condemned. Several sins mentioned in the text have nothing whatever to do with the body, and when fleshly sins are specified they are imputed to interior causes. Sin, then, can never be treated adequately whilst it is treated only medicinally.

2. The text condemns the theory which finds the origin of evil in the intellectual nature of man. Intellectual culture does not touch the inertia, the blindness, the ingratitude, the selfishness, the cruelty, the wilfulness, which bring our acutest sense of guilt, our bitterest experiences of woe. And careful observers are beginning to see that the redemption of the intelligence is not the redemption of the heart; that the race will not be saved by intellect; and that it is easy to expect too much from the spread of knowledge.

3. The text condemns the theory which finds the origin of evil in the power of circumstances.

Christ taught that human character is a question of soul and not of situation. He taught us to look into the infinite depths of the heart for the reasons of good and evil doing. And sin will not be cured by circumstances.

II. Christ's Treatment of Evil.—In the soul Christ declared that it took its origin, and in the soul Christ sought to deal with it—supplying a spiritual antidote for a spiritual plague. He sets before us the highest thoughts and ideals; He creates within us strong faith in these thoughts and ideals; He strengthens us in the inner man that we may scale the heights thus unveiled. The Cross is the symbol of pure thought; it is the truth, love, righteousness of God, appealing to the reason, heart, and conscience of the race. The New Testament is filled with this idea—the renewal of all things through the renewal of the soul.

1. We must remember the inwardness and spirituality of Christ's treatment of sin in the culture of our personal life.

We see here the necessity for that regeneration upon which Christ insists. The heart is the fountain of evil; it must be changed and become the fountain of good. 'Marvel not that I said unto you, ye must be born again.'

The perfecting of character throughout must be from within—must be worked out in sanctified thought, feeling, and will. Says Jacob Boehme in a deep passage, 'All now depends on what I set my imagination upon'. Setting his imagination upon the kingdom of God, upon the highest objects, patterns, and callings of the spiritual universe, the believer conquers successively all selfishness and sensuality, perfecting holiness in the fear of God. Let us set our thought on Christ, who is the Sum of all beauty, and that beauty shall dawn in us.

2. We must remember the spirituality of Christ's treatment of sin as we attempt the renovation of the world. It is the habit of some reformers to think very slightly of what they are pleased to consider the sentimentalism of Christianity. But was not Christ right in trusting everything to the power of sanctified thought and feeling? The history of the world is the history of thought. The catastrophe of the race arose in thought—in a thought from beneath. 'And when the woman saw.' Out of that look, imagination, desire, arose the vast tragedy. The great redeeming system began in a thought—in a thought from above. 'It came into His heart to visit His brethren.' Out of that generous thought arose the whole magnificent history of Israel.—W. L. WATKINSON, The Transfigured Sackcloth, p. 25.

REFERENCE.—VII. 20-23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1911.

'Covetousness.'—MARK VII. 22.

A SLAVE unto mammon makes no servant unto God. Covetousness cracks the sinews of faith; numbs the apprehension of anything above sense; and, only affected with the certainty of things present, makes a peradventure of things to come; lives but unto one world, nor hopes but fears another; makes their own death sweet unto others, bitter unto themselves; brings formal sadness, scenical mourning, and no wet eyes at the grave.—SIR THOMAS BROWNE, Christian Morals.

IN Peking captured concessions were bragged about as the Indians used to pride themselves on the number of scalps they had made. Nowhere as in China have I been so conscious of the infiniteness of space, yet nowhere as in Peking did it seem as if the wide world were not sufficient for the demands of men. The battle of existence was carried on there with that envious jealousy which would rather see a country waste and barren than leave it to the hands of others. However rich and big the world is, the weak will always be empty-handed, for the covetousness of the strong is larger than the largest space.—The Letters Which Never Reached Him, pp. 9, 10.

THE MYSTERY OF CHRIST'S FAME

'He could not be hid.'—MARK VII. 24.

I. THERE is a great peculiarity about the fame of Jesus: it came to Him through shut doors. For one thing, His own will shut the door against it. He wanted to be hid—to do good by stealth and escape the praise of it; He was afraid lest Divine Majesty should crush human love. When He performed a benevolent action He charged His followers that they should not make it known; when He was accidentally revealed in glory He said, 'Tell the vision to no man until the Son of Man be risen'—removed from human sight.

II. The men who win fame in this world are usually the men who strive for it. But the peculiarity of Jesus is that worldly fame beset Him when He was striving to avoid it. That is the paradox which Paul points out in the Epistle to the Philippians. He says that God gave Him a name that is above every name at the very time when He was performing an act of self-burial—when He was emptying Himself, assuming the form of a servant, wearing the fashion of human poverty, taking a lowly place, carrying the burden of the Cross, closing His career by a premature death.

III. And then, every natural circumstance in the life of Jesus was unfavourable to His fame. His birth was humble, His surroundings poor, His home isolated, His youth toiling, His brothers adverse, His era prosaic, His country a Roman province, His auditors unlettered, His enemies influential, His ideal unshared. Is anything conceivable more opposed to fame! And yet, in spite of all, 'He could not be hid'. He has broken through the thickest cloud in the universe—the cloud of social obscurity. Truly was it written 'at midnight there was a cry heard, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh!"' His sunshine was unheralded by dawn; it flashed from a rayless sky. It was by night that Bethlehem's plains were flooded with His glory. His light shone from darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not—never has comprehended it. It has been the mystery of mysteries how a bad world has glorified a great soul. If there had been physical ornaments round that soul, we could have understood it; but it passes human knowledge to explain how in a field consecrated to materialism a life of spiritual beauty 'could not be hid'.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 277.

THE EVER-EVIDENT CHRIST

'He could not be hid'.—MARK VII. 24.

I. Christ's Personality Prevents His being Hid.—How could or can such a personality be hid? He was evidently man, but He was all but as evidently God. He was more than 'Rabbi' to those who were in the secret of His presence. He was 'the Christ' and 'Lord' and 'God'.

This is an eternal circumstance. Jesus Christ never has been and never can be absolutely hid. Jesus may have been, but Jesus Christ never. The Saviour was the Saviour or ever He was historified. Before His Incarnation He could not be hid. He was not hid from prophets and kings and priests and psalmists and lowly souls in the dispensation of imperfect times.

As in Old Testament times and as in New Testament times, so now, in these times, Jesus Christ cannot be hid. Here is the Christ's future history as well as His past history—'He could not be hid'. My text is prophecy, and not history alone. In heaven Christ cannot be hid. He never was hidden there.

II. Some Things in Christ are Hid.—Being man we can perceive much of His personality, but being God-man we realize that there is in Him much we cannot discern. Christ becomes less and less 'hid' to His followers as they follow on to know Him. He discovers Himself to them. They see Him in His own light.

III. Sometimes Christ Seeks to be Hid.—There is a sense in which Christ can and will be hid. He wills to be hid from those who have grieved Him, but He longingly awaits their penitence that He may disclose Himself to them again. He at times seeks to be hid that He may save and help. He did thus to His disciples when He was here. Often He hides Himself in events. He hides Himself in persons. Christ hides Himself in influences.

IV. There are Those who Cause Christ to be Hid. They who do not preach Him are such. The pulpit may extinguish the Saviour it was built to uplift. When Christ is not lived He is hid. They who obey Him reveal Him.

V. There are Hallowed Spheres in which Christ cannot be Hid.—In a truly Christian Church He cannot be hid. In a truly Christian life Christ cannot be hid. There are few scenes in which it is more impossible to hide Christ than a Christian home. In a Christian sick chamber Christ cannot be hid. In the death of a saint Christ cannot be hid.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Crimson Book, p. 190.

REFERENCES.—VII. 24-30.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 295. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 280. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 268. John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 247. VII. 24-37; VIII. 22; IX. 29.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 99. VII. 26-28.—C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 258. VII. 27, 28.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1309. VII. 28, 29.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. vii. p. 28. VII. 31.—John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 258. VII. 31-37.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 187. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 288. VII. 32.—R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 100. W. C. E. Newbolt, Church Times, vol. lviii. 1907, p. 229. A. G. Mortimer, One Hundred Miniature Sermons, vol. ii. p. 76. VII. 33, 34.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 273.

DOES GOD SUFFER?

'And looking up to heaven, He sighed, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened'.—MARK VII. 34.

I. Jesus sighed when He said 'Ephphatha'.—He sighed at the new possibilities of temptation, suffering, and sin that He was conferring by opening channels to a mind that had hitherto been closed, and empowering a tongue hitherto silent, but in spite of the sigh He spoke the Ephphatha. Whatever the risk, the gift must be given that the end may be attained.

I think that we have in this consideration the assurance of the unconditional responsibility of Almighty God for the final consummation of His purpose upon each one of us. He knew how much the gift of life would cost us. He did not give it frivolously and carelessly. He gave it because of the magnificent result that He purposes from it. And this knowledge, in our higher moods, should encourage us in unquestioning submission to His blessed will, even when it seems most sharply to cross our human will.

II. Jesus is unceasingly saying 'Ephphatha' to every human soul. He is saying, 'Be opened' to those dormant faculties of our spiritual nature which we have overlaid with the flesh. The circumstances of the daily life of each one of us provide the medium through which the call comes. But we are not automata, we are not machines; and constantly the sigh of the Divine Humanity is intensified by our miserable human perversity, which enables us to go on hardening ourselves year after year against the influence of the God within us.

Human goodness, or character, is like the beauty that you admire in a flower; it is from within and not from without. You cannot make a flower beautiful by paint and enamel; you cannot make a life beautiful by external moralities and austerities, and the like—the beauty that is on the flower was in the flower first. The sun shining in its powerspeaks the 'Ephphatha, Be opened,' to the bud, and it obeys. And when that bud opens, when that Divine potentiality begins to spring within you, when those aspirations are felt struggling, when the heart, half-shrinkingly, turns Godward, when it recognizes fitfully the truth of Divine Sonship, when it begins to say, 'My Jesus, I love Thee, I know Thou art mine,' must not its capacities be stimulated and its life be fed? If you could see through a very powerful microscope the surface of a leaf, you would find that it was covered with tiny mouths, with lips like human lips seizing the invisible carbonic acid gas from sunbeam and air, and incorporating it into itself. It is as though the sunbeam had said to the flower, 'He that eateth me, the same shall live by me'. Similarly, the will, forcing the spirit upwards, drinks in and absorbs the life of God.

III. Finally, every opened flower speaks its Ephphatha to all that is around it; it appeals to the sense of beauty and to the sense of smell. And so every opened heart must be lifted above timidity, fear of criticism, moral cowardice, and must strive to help others. The first law of a converted soul is effort for the brethren. — BASIL WILBERFORCE, Sermons Preached in Westminster Abbey, p. 30.

THE CONDITIONS OF SUCCESSFUL WORK

'Looking up to heaven, He sighed, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened.'—MARK VII. 34.

HAVING regard to the text and to our Lord's actions we discern three things.

The first is, fellowship with God. 'Looking up to heaven.'

Second, sympathy with man. 'He sighed.'

Third, these are the conditions of successful work. He spake the word of power. 'Be opened.'

I. Fellowship with God.—'He looked up to heaven.' It is a way our Lord had. When He felt that any work required to be done, or when He had to make a fresh departure in His work, He always looked up to heaven. He felt He was doing the Father's work, and as He did the work He looked to the Father for help and guidance.

Heaven was always open to Jesus. It was His home, and its presence was always felt. To other men the atmosphere of heaven seems strange. 'If a flower fell now and then from heaven,' says Mrs. Browning, 'we soon would catch the trick of looking up.' There is intercourse between earth and heaven, or there may be. Moment by moment the thoughts and prayers of man may ascend to God, and swiftly the answers of God may return to man. The example of habitual fellowship is one to follow. The example of looking up to heaven when any work has to be done, or when we are thinking of any new undertaking, is also one to follow.

II. Sympathy with Man.—'He sighed.' It is the outcome of the deepest sympathy with the wretched, miserable condition of man. This pity finds expression in that natural sign of an oppressed spirit—the sigh. It is also the expression of compassion, and of the hope that in some way they may be able to remove the causes of misery. But this feeling of compassion does not rest in mere feeling. With our Lord it is always the prelude to action for the removal of the causes of sorrow. Observe, however, that the conditions of successful work always go together. Fellowship with God and sympathy with man are the two conditions of successful work.

III. The man who has fellow-ship with God and sympathy with man can speak the word of power, and say to the darkened eye, 'Be opened,' and to the stammering tongue 'speak'. This is no mere expectation, no mere enthusiastic expression of hope. It is a fact which is as well attested as any fact within human experience. It is a fact guaranteed to us many times and often in the history of Christ's Church.—J. IVERACH, The Other Side of Greatness, p. 203.

'And looking up to heaven, He sighed.'—MARK VII. 34.

SEE KEBLE'S lines on 'The Twelfth Sunday after Trinity'.

THE SAVIOUR'S SIGH

'Looking up to heaven, He sighed.'—MARK VII. 34.

It would seem that while our Lord was doing acts of mercy publicly, intending them to impress the minds of the people as the prophetic marks of the Messiah (Is. xxxiii. 5-7), this miracle He reserved to be a private act of charity. He took the poor afflicted man aside from the multitude, and so effected his cure in private. The friends of the afflicted man entreated our Lord to 'put His hands upon him'. This our Lord did not do; perhaps there was superstition in their request. They may have attributed a magical charm to this particular action, instead of ascribing the cure of disease to the Divine power acting through the visible sign. But though our Lord would not perform this cure precisely in the manner dictated, yet nevertheless, on this as on other occasions He had recourse to an outward and visible sign. As in the Sacraments of His Church, which He instituted, our Blessed Lord seems to have kept in view a congruity between the outward and visible thing signifying, and the inward and spiritual gift signified, so, in this miracle, we may discern a propriety in putting His fingers into the man's ears, when He intended to pierce them; and in loosening the tongue, which had so long cleaved to the dumb man's mouth, by moisture taken from His own. The ceremonies were alike suggestive to the man himself, and must have awakened in him that degree of faith in Christ of which he was capable.

And now we come to what is very striking in this miracle: 'Looking up to heaven, He sighed'.

I. It may be that He sighed because there was some struggle or exhaustion in His human nature, and whenever He exerted His omnipotence He felt the virtue to go out of Him. But, passing by this consideration, may we not suppose that the sigh was occasioned by His foreknowledge of the abuse of that good gift He was about to bestow—an abuse which could scarcely fail to happen when the blessing was conferred upon a fallen man?

It is a cause of sadness at all times that no good can be done without its being mingled and clogged with evil. When, for instance, a child is baptized, there is joy and gladness in the Church. But, alas!

that very child may, in after years, sin away baptismal grace, may crucify afresh the Lord of Life, and become twofold more the child of hell than before. Beyond all other thoughts, consider when God the Son became Incarnate, while the angels were praising God; was there not, think you, something of sadness in the praises of Simeon? Surely he must have sighed whilst, looking up to heaven in thanksgiving, he said: 'Behold this Child (our Incarnate God) is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel'. It was given him to foreknow that what would be 'a savour of life unto life' to some, would be to others 'a savour of death unto death'.

II. Our Saviour sighed, then, to think how the gift He was conferring might be abused. He sighed at contemplating the various temptations to wrong with which the blessing could not fail to be attended. But He looked to heaven, to have the comfort of seeing there the joys awaiting all the blessed, who, having been redeemed by His Blood, shall have passed faithfully the time of their probation here, and so, through much tribulation, have entered into glory.

What was present to the omniscient Saviour is still future to us; and, when that future comes, God grant that we may be among the redeemed, and bear our parts in the celestial song. Let us pray to our gracious Lord that He will open our ears to hear His commandments; that He will write His laws upon our hearts; and that out of the fullness of the heart our lips may speak words of devotion to Him, and of brotherly kindness to our neighbour.

REFERENCES.—VII. 34.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 109. C. S. Robinson, Sermons on Neglected Texts, p. 281. W. Boyd Carpenter, The Burning Bush, p. 111.

CHRIST THE GOOD MAKER AND DOER (Epiphany)

'He hath done all things well: He maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak.'—MARK VII. 37.

I. ST. MARK probably saw in the saying of the multitude an unintended likeness to the language which the book of Genesis uses about the finishing of the work of Creation. 'God saw everything that He had made, and behold it was very good.' The words as given by St. Mark are nearly the same, though not obviously so in English: He hath made all things in a good manner: but the later saying goes further than the earlier.

For who is the 'He' in each case? In the book of Genesis we are told that God saw everything that He had made. God therefore was the maker. In St. Mark when the multitude said, 'He hath done all things well,' they were speaking of Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of Mary. Jesus therefore was the maker and the doer. We have all been taught not only that Jesus of Nazareth was Himself God, but that the Creation was especially His work. We, who already believe that He who restored speech and hearing to that poor man was the Son of God Himself, may gather from it much that we ought never to forget both about creation and about the work of Christ on earth, that is, the very substance of the Gospel itself.

II. Creation, in the way we usually think of it, cannot appear otherwise than a very cold and distant thing. But the Gospel brings near to us Him who once was afar off, and with Him all His works. When He in whom the world was made became man, every man might henceforth feel that the world belonged to himself in a way that was impossible before. All Christ's acts as man were so many signs that the powers which so plainly and wonderfully obeyed Him had in truth been obeying Him from the time they came into being.

III. 'God saw everything that He had made, and behold it was very good;'; 'Christ hath done all things well' is the Gospel comment upon His miracles. In the time between these two sayings the fall of man had come to pass. In some way or other men fancied that the fall had touched God and His dealings with us men. But no. The Son of God doth all things well now no less than before man had fallen. He knows of man's fall and all the miseries that it has brought on body and spirit far better than man can do. Therefore He came from heaven to become a suffering man Himself. The virtue which went forth from His hands to cure those diseases of ear and tongue was but a faint token of the virtue which should hereafter go forth from His Cross to heal the more grievous hurts which sin had brought upon men's spirits.—F. J. A. HOBT, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 73.

REFERENCES.—VII. 37.—C. Parsons Reichel, Sermons, p. 277. H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1895, p. 200. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 99. C. W. Furse, Sermons Preached at Richmond, p. 121.

THE COMPASSION OF THE CHRIST

'Jesus called His disciples unto Him, and saith unto them, I have compassion on the multitude.'—MARK VIII. 1, 2.

So spake the Christ; so wrote the Holy Spirit; short, simple words, 'I have compassion'; pregnant with strength and with comfort for the toiling and heaving crowds of each succeeding age. There was nothing attractive then, even as there is nothing attractive now, in an eastern crowd. The motive power of the miracle was the eternal love of God manifest in the flesh.

I. Observe how Christ takes the disciples into His confidence. Then, as now, He demanded with a tender urgency the sympathy of His people.

Observe the tender, condescending attention to detail; hour by hour the little store gradually failing; the perplexity creeping over them as to the future. 'They have nothing to eat; they have been with Me three days; I have compassion.'

Very feeble is the faith; very poor—oh, there is such comfort in that!—very poor is the response of those earth-bound disciples. 'Whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?'

Gently He strengthens their faith; patiently the great Teacher develops their slowly dawning intelligence. He will not dispense with their help. He will not deprive them of the new teaching that they will gain from co-operating with His Divine wisdom. He will not deny to Himself, in His great heart of love, the joy of their co-operation. 'How many loaves have ye? Go and see!'

II. It was not a mere passing emotion by which the heart of Jesus was stirred in that desert place. You find the same compassion all through His life on earth. In the forty days after His resurrection you find it still the same. He is 'the same' in the Acts of the Apostles. When St. Paul was in great perplexity the Lord stood by him and strengthened him.

III. Do you feel that if only you were good—if only you had done right all your life, if only you had loved God as you ought to have loved Him—that then you could look up to Jesus Christ, and ask Him to have compassion upon you?

Do you understand this: that when Christ died on the Cross, it was God and Man Who was there; and that all your life was known to Him, even then? What has surprised you in your failures does not surprise Him. What weighs down your spirit has weighed on the Spirit of Jesus of Nazareth all through the long ages. He has borne your griefs and carried your sorrows; from the beginning your sins were all present to Him. But He says, 'I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and, as a cloud, thy sins: return unto Me; for I have redeemed thee'. 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.'—BISHOP HOWARD WILKINSON, The Invisible Glory, p. 38.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 1, 2.—H. M. Butler, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 94. VIII. 1-9.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 293. John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 105. VIII. 1-10.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 307. VIII. 1-30.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2761. VIII. 2.—B. Wilberforce, Feeling After Him, p. 94. W. Boyd Carpenter, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 65. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 58. E. S. Talbot, 'Considerateness,' Sermons, 1828-93.

'From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?'—MARK VIII. 4.

SEE KEBLE's lines on 'The Seventh Sunday after Trinity'.

THE multiplication of readers is the multiplication of loaves. On the day when Christ created that symbol, He caught a glimpse of printing. His miracle is this marvel. Here is a book; with it I will feed five thousand souls, a hundred thousand souls, a million souls—all humanity. In the action of Christ bringing forth the loaves, there is Gutenberg bringing forth books. One sower heralds the other.—VICTOR HUGO.

BREAD IN THE WILDERNESS

'And His disciples answered Him, From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?'—MARK VIII. 4.

THE question of the disciples is one which we often ask, at least in spirit, when we contrast our work with what may seem the nobler work of others, our circumstances with the more favourable circumstances in which they are placed.

I. From Whence can a Man Satisfy these Men with Bread Here in the Wilderness?—It appears to us to be impossible to fulfil Christ's commands. The very nature of our work is against us. We would labour much if we might choose our own field, but here the return is uncertain and at best scanty. Whatever lies before us, poor and mean and trivial as it may seem, is the work of God. We dare not weigh in our earthly balance the issues of life. Fame, honour, reputation, eminence are only reflections, or too often shadows, of worth and heroism. Great and small are terms relative to our little world. We can labour honestly and heartily though we know not to what end. When David kept his few sheep in the wilderness he was gaining strength to rule over Israel.

II. From Whence can a Man Satisfy these Men with Bread Here in the Wilderness?—Our situation, we think, is peculiarly difficult. The tone of our surroundings is uncongenial to devotion. Temptations are many and powerful. There is no quarter to which we can look for immediate help. If it were otherwise we too should be changed. And yet shall we allow that right has no inalienable power: that truth and purity are mere accidents of outward things. It was in the wilderness that Christ revealed Himself as the supporter of His fainting people. Let us not doubt. The sense of our need is the condition of God's help.

III. For let us not be mistaken. If the wilderness is to be crowned for us with the beauty of Eden; if our difficulties and trials are to be changed into blessings, we must first be found waiting upon Christ. He will not remove our wants, but He will satisfy them. He will not take away our temptations, but He will give us strength to conquer them. He will bless the little which we offer Him, and so it will overflow with a rich increase.—B. F. WESTCOTT, Village Sermons, p. 280.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 4.—F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 100. R. Winterbotham, Sermons and Expositions, p. 173. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1885.

THE VEILING FROM MAN OF DIVINE ENERGY

'He commanded the people to sit down, and He took the seven loaves, and gave to His disciples to set before them.'—MARK VIII. 6.

I. SUCH was Christ's method of distributing the bread among a starving multitude. From a physical point of view it must have been highly satisfactory to them—they were hungry. But from a religious point of view it was perhaps a little disconcerting. I think they would have liked better to have been served by His own hand.

II. From a Christian standpoint one is disposed to ask, If Jesus had 'compassion on the multitude,' why did He consult the disciples at all? They certainly had very little compassion; they did all they could to damp His benevolence. Why make use of such miserable agents, such retarding agents? These could only carry His bequest in wagons; He could have borne it Himself on wings. Why did he not use the wings? Why commit an errand so momentous into hands so sluggish when His own hand was burning to fulfil the deed?

III. It was because, great as was His compassion for the multitude, He had a compassion greater still for His own disciples. It was sad the multitude should be hungry; it was sadder still that His followers should be blunted to that hunger. We all know that the Divine mercy could at any time take a short road to the land of Canaan—could send showers of manna in a moment and banish want at a word. That would be compassion on the multitude, but not compassion on me. The multitude would have the broken bread; but I should lose the breaking of the bread—the greater blessing of the two.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 284.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 8.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. ii. p. 214. VIII. 11, 12.—R. Duckworth, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 209.

THE SPONTANEITY OF TRUE CHARITY

'He sighed deeply in His spirit, and saith, Why doth this generation seek after a sign?'—MARK VIII. 12.

I. THE Pharisees had asked Christ for a sign from heaven—that is to say, a sign from the sky. It was as if they had said, 'We see a great deal of bodily healing by your hand. Yet, after all, there is nothing supernatural in bodily healing. We all know that mind has influence over body—that faith can strengthen the physical, that hope can aid health, that love can cure lassitude, that novelty can divert from nerves. All this happens quite naturally. But let us see you arrest a star, let us behold you turn the course of a planet, let us witness you bringing the rain after drought or the sunshine after rain, and then we shall believe in you.'

II. Now, where lay the sting of this to Jesus; what was there in it that made Him sigh in spirit? Was it because men doubted His power to work a sign in heaven? No; it was because they attributed His benevolence to the desire of working a sign upon earth. Such an imputation would make any philanthropist sigh. Imagine a child meeting with an accident when a doctor was passing and that the doctor offered his services. Imagine that the next morning a paragraph appeared in the newspapers stating that he offered his help with a view to manifest his medical skill. Would not this physician feel that he had been misrepresented in character and depreciated in the moral scale.

III. That is an exact parallel. When Jesus saw an accident in the streets of life He offered His services; but He did not offer His services as a proof of His Messianic skill. He offered them because He could not help it. He brought succour, not to show that He was master of Divine power, but because the sorrows of human nature mastered Him. He was never more passive than in His acts of healing. Our calamities overwhelmed Him. His charities taught a lesson, but He did not bestow them to teach a lesson. He bestowed them to ease His own pain. Cana's poverty made Him uncomfortable. Bethany's grief bowed Him. The leper's fate lacerated Him. The demoniac's cry disturbed Him. The task of the toilers tired Him. The burdens of the worldly wearied Him. The pain of Dives's thirst parched Him. The remorse of Magdalene marred His visage. He gave because He must.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 226.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 12-25.—J. Parker, Wednesday Evenings at Cuvendish Chapel, p. 110. VIII. 13-21.—J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 105.

ON MEMORY

'Now the disciples had forgotten.'—MARK VIII. 14.

MEMORY is man's link with the past, with his own past and with the past of the world. Further, it is one of the great factors of character. It is our past history which makes us what we are, and every incident as it occurs, before it slips into the past, has a distinct influence on us. It is like the little stroke of the sculptor's chisel on the statue, the little touch of the painter's brush on the canvas. It helps or mars the general effect.

I. All this shows the importance of educating the memory, for all our faculties should be enlisted in the service of Christ, and memory is not always on Christ's side. It is sometimes in active mutiny against Him. How, then, may we best train the memory?

1. One of the best ways of training the memory is to learn good things by heart.

2. But in this, as in all else that concerns the spiritual life, you can have no better aid than prayer. Offer this prayer every morning of your life: 'Grant, I beseech Thee, Lord, that I may forget what I ought to forget, and remember what I ought to remember.' Does this seem to you too small a thing to pray about? It is not small, for is it not memory that gives half their strength to promptings of evil—books read which have given us evil suggestions, words spoken which we had better never have heard?

3. 'That you may forget what you ought to forget! Yes. This is one of the ways in which our memory most needs training. What not to remember!

Forget all injuries, slights, and grounds of offence, all unkindness done to us or hasty words. In nine cases out of ten we have provoked the injury ourselves, magnified the slight, taken offence where none was intended. In such cases forgetfulness is a duty.

4. There is One who remembers. God knows everything, sees everything, and forgets nothing. Our idea of Godhead involves of necessity a wakeful and unerring memory.

5. Forget, also, any unkind story you may have heard about others. If you remember it, you may be tempted to repeat it; even if you refrain from this, the memory is apt to prejudice you against the person, perhaps quite unfairly.

II. Then the second half of the prayer: 'That I may remember what I ought to remember'.

Have you ever reflected on the extraordinary difference it would make in the world's happiness if every one remembered the right thing at the right time? What terrible mischief is sometimes caused by a simple act of forgetfulness!

Pray to remember others. Think how what you say and do will affect them.

III. 'Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report: if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.'—C. H. BUTCHER, The Sound of a Voice that is Still, p. 154.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 15.—D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 135. VIII. 17, 18.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 302.

'Having eyes, see ye not.'—MARK VIII. 18.

VISION is essentially personal and individual, involving selection and interpretation. . . . All our knowledge is affected by our personality, and this really makes it knowledge. The naked reflection of a mirror is not knowledge.—F. J. A. HORT.

'WITH rich munificence,' says Carlyle of Mirabeau, 'in a most bespectacled, logic-chopping generation, nature has gifted this man with an eye.'

REFERENCES.—VIII. 18.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 310. VIII. 19-21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxi. No. 1822. VIII. 22-25.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 318. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 701; vol. xlviii. No. 2761. VIII. 22-26.—John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 268. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 256. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Ministry of Our Lord, p. 206. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 2802. VIII. 23.—W. P. Balfern, Lessons from Jesus, p. 115. VIII. 27.—W. Watson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 113. VIII. 27-29.—S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 94. VIII. 27; IX. 1.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark I.-VIII. p. 330.

THE GRIEF THAT IMPLIES GLORY

'He began to teach them, that the Son of Man must suffer many things.'—MARK VIII. 31.

I. 'He began to teach them.' It was indeed the beginning of a new lesson for humanity. The old lesson for humanity had been that a 'Son of Man' must suffer nothing—that the higher the life the more exempt should it be from pain. That belief was embedded deep in the heart both of Gentile and Jew. The Gentile deified massive strength—strength on which the woes of the world could make no impression and which was incapable of tears. The Jew exalted the sons of the morning—the men who basked in fortune's radiant smile; he deemed that the most dowered must be to God the dearest.

II. Christianity began to paint a fresh ideal of humanity—an opposite ideal. It said that the test of a man's height was not his inability, but his capacity, to feel. 'The Son of Man must suffer many things.' It is not merely that He may, but that He must.

Suffering is involved in the fact that He is the Son of Man—that He is at the top of the hill. If He were lower down, He would be protected. The very elevation of His person has put Him in collision with the full sweep of the blast and the full coldness of the air. Remember, that was the very source of Christ's temptation in the wilderness.

III. And though He stands at the top, the principle is in measure true for those who are climbing. There is a suffering which the good alone can know. There is a furnace which is only heated for the man of God, a den of lions which only awaits the holy. Not every eye can weep over Jerusalem—that is a Divine gift of tears. Men said of Jesus, 'Let God deliver Him if He delighted in Him!'—if He is good, why is He so burdened? Had He been less good He would have been less burdened. His purity made His pain; His tenderness made His tears; His selflessness made His sorrow; His righteousness made Him restless; His lustre made Him lonely; His kindness made Him kinless; His crown made His cross. It was because He was the Son of Man He had not where to lay His head.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 11.

REFERENCE.—VIII. 33.—C. S. Robinson, Simon Peter, p. 267.

'Let him deny himself.'—MARK VIII. 34.

COMPARE the following passage from Samuel Rutherford's letters, which curiously resembles the tone of the Theologia Germanica. 'Oh that I were free of that idol which they call myself; and that Christ were for myself; and myself a decourted cypher, and a denied and forsworn thing! But that proud thing, myself, will not play, except it ride up side by side with Christ, or rather have place before Him. . . . Oh, but we have much need to be ransomed and redeemed by Christ from that master-tyrant, that cruel and lawless lord, myself. Nay, when I am seeking Christ, and am out of myself, I have the third part of a squint eye upon that vain, vain thing, myself, myself, and something of mine own.

'O blessed are they that can deny themselves, and put Christ in the room of themselves! Oh, would to the Lord that I had not a myself but Christ; nor a my lust but Christ; nor a my ease but Christ; nor a my honour but Christ!'

'Let him take up his cross.'—MARK VIII. 34.

PEOPLE who saw only the weaker side of his studies in religion were apt to think of him as diluting Christianity with a kind of sentiment, half philosophic and half poetic. Yet what we find here is that the things most quoted from the Gospels are the things most uniquely and sternly Christian. Those tremendous sayings, which so few of us dare really face, Whosoever will save his life shall lose it; whosoever taketh not up his cross, and cometh after Me, he cannot be My disciple, are just the texts that he set down to have before him again and again.—Fortnightly Review, 1903, p. 462, on 'Matthew Arnold's Notebooks'.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 34.—C. Parsons Reichel, Sermons, p. 204. W. J. Butler, The Oxford Sermon Library, Sermons for Working Men, p. 177. W. Scott Page, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 45. H. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 197. VIII. 35.—E. H. Bickersteth, Thoughts in Past Years, p. 261. C. Jerdan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 277. VIII. 35, 36.—J. B. Lightfoot, Ordination Addresses, p. 271.

‘What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?’—MARK VIII. 36.

AN arctic torpor seizes upon men. Although built of nerves, and set adrift in a stimulating world, they develop a tendency to go bodily to sleep; consciousness becomes engrossed among the reflex and mechanical parts of life, and soon loses both the will and the power to look higher considerations in the face. This is ruin; this is the last failure in life; this is temporal damnation, damnation on the spot and without the form of judgment. What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose himself?—R. L. STEVENSON, Lay Morals.

THAT Wrong is not only different from Right, but that it is in strict scientific terms infinitely different; even as the gaining of the whole world set against the losing of one's own soul, or (as Johnson had it) a Heaven set against a Hell; that in all situations out of the Pit of Tophet, wherein a living man has stood or can stand, there is actually a Prize of quite infinite value placed within his reach, namely a Duty for him to do; this highest Gospel, which forms the basis and worth of all other gospels whatsoever, had been revealed to Samuel Johnson; the man had believed it, and laid it faithfully to heart.—CARLYLE.

PROFIT AND LOSS

‘What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?’—MARK VIII. 36.

I SHALL place side by side the world and the soul, and shortly compare their respective value.

I. What then shall I say of the things of this world, which men appear to think so valuable—money, houses, land, clothes, food, drink, learning, honours, titles, pleasures, and the like? I shall say two things. First, they are all really worthless: capable, no doubt, of being turned to a good use (every creature of God, says the Bible, is good if sanctified by the Word of God and prayer), but I mean this, that if you suppose they are in themselves able to make you really happy, you are woefully deceived.

Secondly, I say that all the things of the world are perishable.

II. Such is the world; and now what shall I say of the soul, which people appear to hold so cheap?

1. It is the most valuable part of man, because it is the part in which we differ from the brute creation. It is that wonderful principle by which God made a distinction between ourselves and the other works of His hand, for we read that ‘God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life,’ and then what was the grand conclusion?—‘man became a living soul’. It was the soul for which Christ was content to take our nature on Him, and suffer death upon the cross.

2. It is eternal. The soul shall never perish, and when the earth and all that it contains are burning up, the soul shall enter upon a new state of existence, which shall never change, and that state shall be everlasting life or everlasting fire.

III. You wish to be saved. There are few that do not; but unfortunately men generally want to be saved in their own way, and not according to the Bible; they love the crown, although they will seldom take up the cross. You need not be in any uncertainty about it; you may soon know what your state is; it is all to be found in this little book; the marks, the signs, the tokens, the evidences are so clearly recorded, that he who runs may read. And what are they?

1. It is written here: ‘All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God’; ‘There is not a just man upon earth that doeth good and sinneth not’. Do you know this?

2. Again it is written: ‘Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God’; ‘Ye must be born again’. Have you gone through that mighty change?

3. Again it is written: ‘He that believeth not shall be damned’. ‘Without faith it is impossible to please Him.’ Have you any of this faith?

4. Lastly, it is written: ‘Be ye holy, for I am holy’. ‘Without holiness no man shall see the Lord.’ What do you know of this holiness?—J. C. RYLE, The Christian Race, p. 231.

‘What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?’—MARK VIII. 36.

THESE words, spoken by Ignatius Loyola, had a deep influence on Francis Xavier. The two were walking one day in the gardens belonging to the University of Paris. ‘Francis’s thoughts were full of the applause his last lecture had gained him, in which he had even outdone himself. Ignatius was thinking of it too; and as they walked up and down they talked of learning and talents and of the glory which is earned by them,’ and then having proved to his companion, by the interest he showed, how fully he entered into his feelings, Ignatius said softly, as if half to himself, ‘But what shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?’

REFERENCES.—VIII. 36.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ii. No. 92. VIII. 36, 37.—C. Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 161. R. W. Dale, ibid. vol. i. 1896, p. 36. J. R. Wilkin, ibid. vol. liii. 1898, p. 262. N. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 259.

‘What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?’—MARK VIII. 37.

It is remarkable that notwithstanding the universal favour with which the New Testament is outwardly received, and even the bigotry with which it is defended, there is no hospitality shown to, there is no appreciation of, the order of truth with which it deals. I know of no book that has so few readers. There is none so truly strange and heretical and unpopular. To Christians, no less than Greeks and Jews, it is foolishness and a stumbling-block. There are, indeed, some things in it which no man should read aloud more than once. Seek first the kingdom of heaven. Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth. If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven. For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? Think of this, Yankees! . . . Think of repeating these things to a New England audience! . . . Who, without cant, can read them aloud? Who, without cant, can hear them and not go out of the meeting-house? They never were read, they never were heard.—From THOREAU'S Week on the Concord.

REFERENCES.—IX. 1.—A. T. Pierson, The Heights of the Gospel, p. 141. IX. 1-8.—A. B. Davidson, Waiting Upon God, p. 139. IX. 2.—A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part ii. p. 277. W. Ernest Beet, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1904, p. 396. IX. 2, 3.—G. Campbell Morgan, ibid. vol. lix. 1901, p. 365. IX. 2-8.—C. S. Macfarland, ibid. vol. lxii. 1902, p. 39. IX. 2-13.—A. MacLaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 1. IX. 2-29.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2454; vol. l. No. 2881. IX. 6.—George Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 174

'This is My beloved Son: hear Him.'—MARK IX. 7.

Oh that this misled and blindfolded world would see that Christ doth not rise and fall, stand or lie by men's apprehensions! What is Christ the lighter, that men do with Him by open proclamation as men do with clipped and light money? They are now crying down Christ. . . . But the Lord hath weighed Him and balanced Him already: This is My beloved Son in Whom I am well pleased: hear ye Him! This worth and weight stand still. It is our part to cry: 'Up, up with Christ, and down, down with all created glory before Him!' Oh that I could heighten Him, and heighten His name, and heighten His throne!—SAMUEL RUTHERFORD.

REFERENCES.—IX. 7.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. i. p. 259. A. MacLaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 7.

JESUS ONLY

'Jesus only with themselves.'—MARK IX. 8.

THESE words conclude St. Mark's narrative of our Lord being transfigured upon the Holy Mount. St. Luke's words, concluding the same narrative, are very closely like those of St. Mark, 'Jesus was found alone'. St. Matthew's words contain this same striking expression: 'They saw no man save Jesus only,' but omits 'with themselves,' which St. Mark uses to show how Jesus was found, identified by the three chosen Apostles, who were participators in that mysterious and glorious scene: St. Peter, St. James, and St. John. Of the three St. James was not permitted to contribute to the New Testament, for he fell by the sword of Herod. St. Peter refers in his Second Epistle in explicit terms to the Transfiguration; St. John in a passage in the opening of his Gospel speaks of the same event. This is a very striking and magnificent part of the Scriptures, and the event itself was a very striking and magnificent event in the Lord's life on earth, and the narratives of St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke are very striking and beautiful. The more we consider them the more do we see the import of the closing sentence. Evidently the three Evangelists were guided by the Holy Spirit to put particular emphasis upon that little sentence, 'Jesus only'. It cannot be by accident, it cannot be a mere coincidence, and it cannot be—as it might have been if it had been mentioned by only one of the Evangelists—only a subordinate phase of the Transfiguration. It is clear that this is one of the most solemn and suggestive passages in the whole Scriptures. Let us take a view of the Transfiguration as a whole, so that we may understand this concluding lesson of it.

I. Historical Meaning of the Transfiguration.—

We shall see that it was a very real event in our Lord's history. It is recorded in detail by three Evangelists and with absolute independence. Each Evangelist compares the brightness of Christ to three things. That shows how deeply rooted in fact it was. It was no fiction; it was no illusion, no mere vision. It was an actual sight seen by the eyes of the three chosen Evangelists. This was a great and real event, and it is only when you grasp what a real thing it was that you will understand the concluding meaning of it. We must lay hold of the fact that our Lord was transfigured visibly, physically, so that the brightness of His Transfiguration passed through His raiment. We must lay hold of the reality of the Transfiguration. Of what value is the reality of the Transfiguration? It is first of all valuable as history.

II. Doctrinal Significance of the Transfiguration.

—The Transfiguration is also important doctrinally. St. Peter said, in answer to our Lord, 'Let us make three tabernacles, one for Thee, one for Moses, and one for Elias'. But then came the Divine voice, which peremptorily forbade the making of the tabernacles. 'This,' said the Father's voice, 'is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased: hear ye Him,' and you will observe that whenever St. Peter refers to the Transfiguration he makes no reference to Moses and Elijah. He did not want to learn the lesson twice. 'This is My beloved Son: hear ye Him.' Now you see the meaning of the text, 'They saw no man but Jesus only'.

III. Personal Application.—'Jesus only with themselves.' Christ must be all in all to each one of us. That is the lesson of the Transfiguration. Our Lord Jesus Christ must be the chief among ten thousand. It seems as if St. Peter was thinking of the Transfiguration when he said, 'There is none other name under heaven given amongst men whereby we must be saved'. Jesus Christ must take first place before everything else. We must remember that Jesus Christ alone can save us. This is true, simple, evangelical religion. I think that is why the whole of the Evangelists wrote the text like this in order that they might put down their testimony to what the great voice of the Father meant. What Jesus is this? This is the Jesus Who was transfigured. This is the Jesus Who can save, keep, console, and sanctify us, if we commit ourselves to Him in the simplicity of faith and the strength of obedience to that great word which is God's own word: 'This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased: hear ye Him'.

REFERENCES.—IX. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2634. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 11. IX. 14.—J. McNeill, Regent Square Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 137. IX. 14-29.—A. B. Davidson, Waiting Upon God, p. 163. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 319. Archbishop Trevelick, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 299. John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 278. IX. 14-32 and 43-48.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2844. IX. 17.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 216. IX. 17-20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2731. C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 190. IX. 19.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 13.

THE PRICE I PAY FOR SEEING CHRIST

'When he saw Him, straightway the spirit tare him.'—MARK IX. 20.

I. THIS invalid only knew himself to be a weakling when he saw Jesus. There is nothing which rends the spirit like the sight of a high ideal. Spiritual stagnancy is the result of a low standard. There is a phrase we often hear: 'He is on very good terms with himself'. We apply it to a man who has never had any rending of the spirit. I can never be on bad terms with myself as long as there is only one man within me. If in my heart there hangs the picture of a second self, a higher self, a self which mimics my errors and tells me how things ought to be done—if there is in my soul a man who sings after me the song I have spoiled, reads after me the piece I have ruined, performs after me the service I have poorly rendered—that presence makes me small. It puts me on bad terms with myself—on wrestling terms, the terms on which Jacob stood with his angel.

II. It will not in the least soothe my struggle to know that I am the first man in the company, in the village, or even in the kingdom. There was not a man of his day so good as Jacob—he was the chosen patriarch of God. But he was far below his angel—the ideal of what he would like to have been. It was his angel that made him miserable.

III. When Paul met a storm at sea, the men of Malta said he must be a bad man. We are all apt to feel like the men of Malta. When we see a storm-tossed spirit toiling with its own waves and battling with its own breezes, we say, Surely he is a child of the darkness! We are wrong; he is a child of the light. It is only because he is a child of the light that he wrestles with the deep. He felt no discord till he heard the music. He knew no midnight till he saw the morning. He dreamed not of his mean attire till he gazed on the seamless robe. He got his cross from Christ, his ladenness from light, his burden from seeing beauty.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 117.

REFERENCES.—IX. 20-22.—J. S. Swan, Short Sermons, p. 242. IX. 21.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 216. IX. 22, 23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvii. No. 2224. IX. 22-24.—H. M. Butler, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 81. IX. 23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. viii. No. 474; vol. xxix. No. 1744. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 22. J. M. Neale, Sermons for the Church Year, vol. ii. p. 193. J. W. Diggle, Sermons for Daily Life, p. 239. IX. 23, 24.—J. Leckie, Sermons Preached at Ibrox, p. 362.

'Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief.'—MARK IX. 24.

ACCORDING to Dr. Oncken, Bismarck's last words were: 'Dear Lord, I believe. Help Thou my unbelief, and receive me into Thy heavenly kingdom.' See also R. H. HUTTON's Theological Essays, pp. 245, 246.

I HAVE sometimes, in looking back on the doubts and questionings of this period, thought and perhaps even spoken of myself as an infidel. But an infidel I assuredly was not: my belief was at least as real as my incredulity, and had, I am inclined to think, a much deeper seat in my mind. But, wavering between the two extremes—now a believer, and now a sceptic—the belief usually exhibiting itself as a strongly based instinct, the scepticism as the result of some intellectual process—I lived on for years in a sort of uneasy, see-saw condition, without any middle ground between the two extremes, on which I could at once reason and believe.—HUGH MILLER, My Schools and Schoolmasters, xvii.

UNBELIEVING BELIEF

'And straightway the father of the child cried out, and said with tears, Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief.'—MARK IX. 24.

I THINK in these wonderful words we have four things—the birth, the infancy, the cry, and the education of faith.

I. The Birth of Faith.

There are three elements here: eager desire, the sense of utter helplessness, and the acceptance of Christ's calm assurances.

This man knew what he wanted, and he wanted it very sorely. Whosoever has any intensity and reality of desire for the great gifts which Jesus Christ comes to bestow, has taken at least one step on the way to faith. Conversely, the hindrances which block the path of a great many of us are simply that we do not care to possess the blessings which Jesus Christ in His Gospel offers. If we saw things as they are, and our needs as they are, nothing would kindle such intensity of longing in our hearts as that rejected or neglected promise of life eternal and Divine, which Jesus Christ brings.

Further, we have here the other element of a sense of utter helplessness. If we understand what is wanted in order to bring one soul into harmony and fellowship with God, we shall recognize that we ourselves can do nothing to save, and little to help ourselves.

And the last of the elements here is listening to the calm assurance of Jesus Christ. He stands at the door of each of our hearts and speaks to each of our needs, and says: 'I can satisfy it'. His assurance helps trembling confidence to be born, and out of doubt the great, calm word of the Master smites the fire of trust.

II. The Infancy of Faith.

As soon as the consciousness of belief dawned upon the father, and the effort to exercise it was put forth, there sprang up the consciousness of its own imperfection. He would never have known that he did not believe unless he had tried to believe.

Thus, then, in its infancy, faith may and does co-exist with much unfaith and doubt. The same state of mind, looked at from its two opposite ends, as it were, may be designated faith or unbelief; just as a piece of shot silk, according to the angle at which you hold it, may show you only the bright colours of its warp or the dark ones of its weft.

There follows from that thought this practical lesson, that the discovery of much unbelief should never make a man doubt the reality or genuineness of his little faith.

III. Notice the Cry of Infant Faith.

'Help Thou mine unbelief.'

The lesson is that, even when we are conscious of much tremulousness in our faith, we have a right to ask and expect that it shall be answered. Weak faith is faith. The tremulous hand does touch. The cord may be slender as a spider's web that binds a heart to Jesus, but it does bind.

But let us remember that, whilst thus the cry of infant faith is heard, the stronger voice of stronger faith is more abundantly heard. The measure of our belief is the measure of our blessing.

IV. We have here the Education of Faith.

Christ paid no heed in words to this confession of unbelief, but proceeded to do the work which answered the prayer in both its possible meanings.

Thus He educates us by His answers—His over-answers—to our poor desires; and the abundance of His gifts rebukes the poverty of our petitions, more emphatically than any words of remonstrance beforehand could have done. He does not lecture us into faith, but He blesses us into it.—A. MACLAREN, The Wearied Christ, p. 125.

REFERENCES.—IX. 24.—H. W. Mellows, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 359. A. Cowe, ibid. vol. lxx. 1904, p. 286. H. E. Thomas, ibid. vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 421. Morgan Dix, Sermons Doctrinal and Practical, p. 195. J. Martineau, Endeavours After the Christian Life (2nd Series), p. 48. II. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 61. B. F. Westcott, The Historic Faith, p. 3. A. MacLaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 33. Andrew Murray, The Children for Christ, p. 248. W. Page Roberts, Our Prayer Book, Conformity and Conscience, p. 102. C. H. Parkhurst, A Little Lower than the Angels, p. 186. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xviii. No. 1033; vol. I. No. 2881. IX. 25.—J. M. Neale, Sermons for the Church Year, vol. ii. p. 8. IX. 27.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 128. IX. 28.—James Denney, Gospel Questions and Answers, p. 30. IX. 28, 29.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2454. IX. 29.—C. New, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1895, p. 248.

R. T. Davidson, ibid. vol. li. 1897, p. 120. IX. 30, 31.—H. Scott Holland, ibid. vol. liv. 1898, p. 193. IX. 30-40.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2494. IX. 30-80.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 136. IX. 33.—A. MacLaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 54. IX. 33-42.—Ibid. p. 44. IX. 33-37.—George MacDonald, Unspoken Sermons, p. 1. IX. 35.—H. C. Beeching, Seven Sermons to Schoolboys, p. 1. IX. 35-37.—D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 157. IX. 36.—H. Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 86. T. A. Sedgwick, Pedagogus, p. 9. IX. 36, 37.—Bishop J. Percival, Sermons at Rugby, p. 11. IX. 36, 37, 42.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1894, p. 177.

DEFENDERS OF THE FAITH

'He followeth not with us.'—MARK IX. 38.

A STRANGELY pathetic interest attaches to a great disciple when we find him making a great mistake. For even loyal disciples are not infallible. Sometimes they seriously misrepresent the mind of Jesus, and have to be brought back to wisdom by the stern way of rebuke. Such a rebuke was once administered to John the beloved. And it was very necessary, for he had been betrayed by his zeal into a great error. He had misread the large charity of Jesus. He had taken it upon him to rebuke one who had been doing beneficent work in the name of Jesus; and Jesus had been constrained to rebuke him in the memorable words, 'Forbid him not'.

The attitude of John is remarkable; more remarkable still is the reason for that attitude. 'Master, we saw one casting out devils in Thy name; and we forbade him, because he followeth not with us.' One would have supposed that John might well have felt sure of this man, for he had given two indubitable proofs of being on the side of Jesus. He was casting out devils—and was not that part of the very work which Jesus had commissioned His disciples to do? And he was doing this in Jesus' name, proving thereby that he was a believer in the power of that name and a disciple at heart; for, as Jesus said, no man could do a mighty work in His name and thereafter lightly revile Him. But John, with sublime indifference to these conclusive marks of discipleship, condemns and forbids him for no better reason than that 'he followeth not with us'. We would say it was amazing if we did not know that it was the way of the human heart always. It is indeed the commonplace of Church history. We forbade him, because he followeth not with us.

I. Apparently, then, it is possible for those who love Jesus dearly to misunderstand Him seriously, and to hamper the work of others who are serving Him with as much zeal as themselves and with more intelligence; for we cannot help feeling that the unknown man who owes his place in history to John's foolish rebuke, had an instinctive penetration into the essential conditions of discipleship far superior to John's own. For John's measure of discipleship was, at any rate for the moment, a purely external one—he followeth not with us—whereas this man felt that the true disciple is one who does the work of the Master, and that whether he follows 'with us' or not is a matter of the most utter indifference. Of course there were reasons at that time why John should have so completely, though mistakenly, identified the cause of his Master with that of His little disciple band; all the same, there is struck here the first note of that well-intentioned arrogance which has seldom been wanting in the history of the Church. It has too often seemed to the powers that be that because some one 'followeth not with us,' does not share their opinions or endorse their methods, he is necessarily wrong, and must therefore be denounced, censured, or excommunicated, as the temper of the age suggests; whereas all the time it may be he that is right and they that are wrong. He may be, by his actions or words, interpreting the spirit of his Master far more profoundly than they; and they may need the solemn rebuke, 'Forbid him not'.

II. In this spirit which is ever ready to rebuke unconventional service, there is something not altogether to be de-pised, for it is animated by jealousy for the honour of the Lord. Nevertheless, it is one of the most hateful sins of which a disciple of Christ can be guilty. For in insisting upon external standards, it displays a lack of insight into the real conditions of service; in rebuking a man who is doing the work of Jesus in the name of Jesus it displays an utter lack of charity as well as of intelligence; and in hampering the work of a sincere, devoted, and intelligent servant, it is injuring the work of Christ Himself, and retarding the progress of the world.

III. The spirit of Jesus is slowly working, and there are signs that the day is perhaps not so very far distant when men who are casting out devils in His name will be free to do their work serenely, none either daring or desiring to make them afraid. Then the true Church union will be consummated; for then men will be more eager to welcome than to forbid, more ready to accentuate the glorious hopes they share in common than the relatively trivial speculations which divide them. They will care more for the person of Christ than for a particular view of His person, and more for truth than for a specific formulation of it. So long as we refuse to welcome other disciples of Christ—be they men or churches—simply because they 'follow not with us,' we shall have to remain in an isolation that is anything but splendid—the poorer for the lack of the resources and stimulus which they might bring us. When we recognize the relative unimportance of the things which separate us, and what Réville has called 'the inanity of all these discussions in matters which exceed the capacity of our intelligence,' then will be seen the folly of saying, 'We forbade him, because he followeth not with us'; and such a whisper will not be heard in all the land.—J. E. McFADYEN, The City With Foundations, p. 87.

'And John answered, . . . We forbade him because he followeth not us.'—MARK IX. 38.

I REMEMBER one instance of Keble's narrowness extremely characteristic of him. A member of a family with which he had been intimate had adopted liberal opinions in theology. Keble probably did not know what these opinions were, but regarded this person as an apostate who had sinned against light. He came to call one day when the erring brother happened to be at home; and learning that he was in the house, he refused to enter, and remained sitting in the porch. St. John is reported to have fled out of a bath at Ephesus on hearing that the heretic Cerinthus was under the roof. Keble, I presume, remembered the story, and acted like the Apostle.—FROUDE'S Short Studies, vi. p. 269.

REFERENCES.—IX. 38-42.—J. Adderley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 284. IX. 39, 40.—Newman Smyth, ibid. vol. xlvii. 1894, p. 38. IX. 40.—Hugh Black, ibid. vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 20. W. J. Knox-Little, Church Times, vol. xxx. 1892, p. 338.

'If thy hand cause thee to stumble, cut it off.'—MARK IX. 43 f. PRESCOTT, in the opening chapters of his Mexico, observes that the magnificent table-land of forest-trees in Mexico had to be destroyed for prudential reasons. 'The early Spaniards made as indiscriminate war upon the forest as did our Puritan ancestors, though with much less reason. After once conquering the country, they had no lurking ambush to fear from the submissive, semi-civilized Indian, and were not, like our forefathers, obliged to keep watch and ward for a century.'

REFERENCES.—IX. 43, 44.—J. E. Roberts, Studies in the Lord's Prayer, p. 94. R. J. Campbell, Sermons Addressed to Individuals, p. 151. IX. 43, 47, and 48.—W. Leighton Grane, Hard Sayings of Jesus Christ, p. 179. IX. 49.—George Jamieson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 377. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 55. IX. 49, 50.—Stopford A. Brooke, Short Sermons, p. 30. IX. 50.—E. E. Lark, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxii. 1902, p. 21. E. M. Goulburn, Occasional Sermons, p. 390. R. Waddy Moss, The Discipline of the Soul, p. 137. F. E. Paget, Sermons on Duties of Daily Life, p. 103. F. J. Jayne, Keble College Sermons, 1870-76, p. 229. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 64. X. 1-31.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 144. X. 2-9.—H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxix. 1906, p. 177. X. 6.—J. Parker, Studies in Texts, vol. i. p. 84. X. 6-9.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 417. X. 7, 8, 9.—J. Phillips Dickson, Church Times, vol. xxxvi. 1896, p. 640.

THE DIRECTING OF THE EARLY MIND

'They brought young children to Him, that He should touch them.'—MARK X. 13.

I. 'THAT He should touch them'—not simply 'that they should touch Him'. This latter was quite unnecessary. Touching is the metaphor for influence. There was no difficulty in the heart of Jesus being touched by the children; but it was extremely difficult to arrange that the heart of the children should be touched by Jesus.

II. It is easy for the developed mind to understand the child—the developed mind has itself been a child and retains a memory of its beginning. But it is not at all easy for the child to understand the developed mind—that is a stage still in its future. Yet it is by higher models that the child must be touched if it is to have any mental growth. It is not enough that it should be thrown into the company of its equals. Two children of equal age and capacity might play for ever in the Garden of Eden without rising a step higher, if there were not heard betimes a more mature voice walking through the garden in the cool of the day. And I would add that, the more mature the new voice is, the better will it be for the child. A boy's best chance of growth is in associating with people already grown. If you want to make him a poet, do not point him to the model of the village rhymster. Point him to the greatest. It is always the voice of the Lord God that develops young Adam.

III. The element of childhood remains in the greatest. The perfected soul gathers up its past. It has many mansions in its nature and it prepares a place for all surmounted stages. It can understand the child better than the youth can, for it has a mansion for childhood—which the youth has not. The youth is ever pressing onward and upward; he fain would forget. But the mature soul goes back. It lives in sympathy with the things beneath it. There is no model so fitted to the heart of the child as that which is planted at the summit of the hill.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 181.

REFERENCES.—X. 13, 14.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. iii. p. 241. X. 13-15.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 70. X. 13-16.—C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 60. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 581; vol. xxxii. No. 1925.

'Suffer the little children to come unto Me.'—MARK X. 14.

TENDERNESS is as necessary as courage if a life of sorrow is to be made wholly heroic. The very unselfishness of such a man's work for others is in danger of bringing with it something of isolation as well as of sympathy. Against his will a certain sternness and aridity will infuse itself into his manner and his style. . . .

It is against such an impression of Mazzini as this that his friends are at most pains to guard. They wish us to imagine him as a man kept in deep peace by aspiration only, and by such simple pleasures as are inseparable from the childlike heart. They tell us of his playful humour, of the mild brightness of his friendly eyes, of his delight in birds, in flowers, in children.—F. W. H. MYERS, Modern Essays.

LUTHER is said to have remarked upon this text: 'We must not look at this text with the eyes of a calf or of a cow vaguely gaping at a new gate, but do with it as at court we do with the prince's letters, read it and weigh it again and again, with our most earnest attention'. He particularly refers to its sanction of infant baptism.

GOETHE once gave the amazing dictum to Eckermann that 'if Christ were painted suffering the little children to come unto Him, it would be a picture that expressed nothing—at any rate nothing of importance'. Much truer is the remark of Maeterlinck in Wisdom and Destiny: 'When Christ Jesus met the Samaritan woman, met a few children, and the woman who had been an adulteress, then did humanity rise three times in succession to the level of God'.

THE CHILDREN'S FRIEND

'Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God.'—MARK X. 14.

As we read the narrative of Christ's life, you will find that not many miracles are recorded to us in anything like fullness of detail, and yet of those miracles you will find that four are given to the children. In four of those miracles do we have a child brought in the arms of faith to a loving Saviour. You will find that they occupy different social stations, from a nobleman's son to an outcast's daughter, and yet each one can claim the loving sympathy and ready help of the Children's Friend.

What then more appropriate sequel to all this interest and kindness could you have than that, on His last journey, His tragical journey to death, there should be a troop of these little children brought to the Children's Friend? His disciples rebuked those that brought them. 'But when Jesus saw it, He was much displeased.' This is a very strong word used of Jesus Christ. In fact it is the only time in the whole of the Gospel narrative that such a strong word is ever used of Him. 'Much displeased'; you will find the same Greek word used in the Gospel narrative of the ten disciples when they heard that James and John had tried to secure the best places in the coming kingdom, and there it is translated 'Moved with indignation'. We can therefore quite consistently translate our passage, 'When Jesus saw it, He was moved with indignation'.

I. Take Heed lest you Stand in the Way of a Little One Coming to Jesus, or He will be moved with indignation. Through three long years He had borne with them with infinite patience; misunderstandings He had tolerated, ignorance He had enlightened, jealousy He had put on one side; but when at last they would stand in the way of the children and keep the children from Him, then He seemed to be overpowered with a sense of the injustice and the wrong, and He was moved with indignation. In the light of this narrative let us be careful what we do in the interests of the children. For if this patient Christ could be moved with indignation at the men who would keep the children back from Him, I pity the men to-day who are doing the like thing. I pity the man who has first polluted the child-like innocence.

II. What Is the Reason for this Sympathy?—We have it in the words, 'Of such is the kingdom of God'. A traveller in a far-off country comes across a piece of scenery that is just like that to which he is familiar in his homeland. Among strangers, speaking an unknown tongue, he one day comes across one with whom he can hold converse, and he says, 'How refreshing this is. It reminds me of home.' And so it was with Jesus Christ. Moving along this earth of ours, desolated through sin, where He was indeed a lonely stranger, ever and again He came across these fragrant little flowers, which reminded Him of those which grow on the mossy banks of the heavenly kingdom, and when He saw their innocence and guilelessness and purity, He felt, 'That is like home,' and He grasped the treasure in His embrace. 'Of such is the kingdom of God.' And so we thank those disciples for their interruption and their action, if only for the gracious response which it drew out from the Saviour.

REFERENCES.—X. 14.—W. C. E. Newbolt, Counsels of Faith and Practice, p. 104. X. 14-16.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 357. X. 15.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Holy-Tide Teaching, p. 35. X. 15, 16.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. x. p. 275.

'And He took them in His arms.'—MARK X. 16.

'ARTISTS,' says Dostoeffsky in one of his novels, 'always draw the Saviour as one who is acting in some story related in the Gospels. I should do differently. I should represent Christ alone—the disciples did leave Him alone occasionally. I should paint one little child left with Him; this child had been playing about with Him, and had probably just been telling the Saviour something in its pretty, baby prattle. Christ had listened to it, but was now musing—one hand rested on the child's bright head; His eyes gazing out with a far-off expression. Thought—great as the universe—was in His eyes. His face was sad. The little one leant its elbow on Christ's knee, and with its cheek resting on its hand, gazed up at Him as only children gaze. The sun was setting. And there you have my picture.'

REFERENCES.—X. 16.—H. Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 80. R. Collyer, Where the Light Dwelleth, p. 105.

'THEN JESUS, BEHOLDING HIM, LOVED HIM'

'And when He was gone forth into the way, there came one running, and kneeled to Him, and asked Him, Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?'—MARK X. 17.

LET us consider the subject of the young man of great possessions coming to our Lord, and the wonderful fact that is recorded of him, that Jesus beholding him, loved him.

I. What was There that Attracted this Divine Love in this young man? Was it not that every word of the young man was verily and indeed true? But there was in his heart a feeling of insufficiency. There was something more to be done, to be learned. He had tried to keep his life pure, he had tried to keep away from the allurements of wealth, and he had done well, but somehow there was something lacking. He felt that his character was not yet formed, that there was some trial, some treatment from on high, that was necessary to perfect his character, and a perfect character he would have. So he comes to our Lord with that desire in his heart, and our Lord gives him the answer, and his heart leaps. 'One thing thou lackest: go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor.'

II. A Tremendous Charge.—This young man wanted an answer to his question, and expected a hard one, but not so hard, and he went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions. Tradition tells us that this young man was Lazarus, of whom it is said again that the Lord loved Lazarus and his sisters, and we can see how his heart was touched. 'And the Lord, beholding him, loved him,' and that love would not let him go. It followed him even through death, and coming back from death it caught him, and Lazarus in the end gave up all. Not for reward. We never hear of him again. He disappears from our sight after the wonder of his recall from the dead. No, no great reward, but only the fact that he did give up all and followed Jesus.

III. Self-sacrifice must Mark the Life of Every Christian.—The life that is not marked by self-sacrifice is not the life of a true disciple of the Lord. To some the call comes to-day just as it did to that young man, but this is not the case with everybody. The call comes in different ways to every person, and it is for every soul to realize the voice of Jesus in guiding his life.

(a) Sometimes the command will come to us at a crisis in our life.

(b) Sometimes in the most sacred moments of our Eucharistic Feast.

(c) Sometimes in the still, small, persistent voice of our conscience.

Then somehow we get to know that our Lord would have us give up something for His sake and we must be ready.

They who learn the power of giving up for the Master and giving up for others learn indeed the secret of true joy.

REFERENCES.—X. 17.—C. Stanford, Expository Sermons on the New Testament, p. 57. T. Sadler, Sunday Thoughts, pp. 201, 250. W. Webb-Peploe, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 368. R. Duckworth, ibid. vol. xlii. 1893, p. 267. X. 17-21.—J. B. M. Grimes, ibid. vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 340. X. 17-22.—A. B. Davidson, The Called of God, p. 301. Richard Glover, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 350. J. McNeill, Regent Square Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 49; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 131. X. 17-27.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVII. p. 74. X. 17-45.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. li. No. 2046. X. 18.—A. B. Bruce, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 219.

THE DISTINCTIVENESS OF CHRISTIAN MORALITY

'He answered and said unto Him, Master, all these have I observed from my youth. Then Jesus said unto him, One thing thou lackest: sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor.'—MARK X. 20, 21.

THESE are the words of that young man who won the love of Jesus before he had embraced the cause of Jesus. It is something to know that one can win the love of Christ before he calls himself a Christian—that the Divine eye recognizes a virtue conferred by nature as well as a virtue derived from grace.

I. The question the young man asked was really this: In what respect does Christianity differ from the Ten Commandments? What is there in your doctrine that can give it a more permanent life than can be claimed by these precepts of Moses? He tells Jesus that, so far as his consciousness goes, he has kept undeviatingly the law of these commandments. He asks what more can be wanted to make him a Christian.

II. The answer of Christ is striking: 'Go, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor'. If we would see its significance, we must look at the Spirit, and not the mere form of the words. Let me try to paraphrase what our Lord means: 'You say you have given to every one his due. It is well; I admit your integrity in this respect. But is this the measure of all possible integrity? Is it the climax of goodness when a man can say that he has rendered to every one his due? It is the climax of justice; but is justice the highest step on the ladder of goodness? No; there is a step beyond justice—generosity. It is not enough that you give to your brother what he has a legal right to; you must impart to him that to which he has no legal right. You have done well to respect his person, to keep your hands from his property, to abstain from calumniating his name. But after all, that is only a refraining of the hand. Is there to be no outstretching of the hand?

III. Are you content with doing your brother no wrong? Is there no good that you can do him? You have not killed your brother; but have you enlarged his life? You have not stolen; but have you added to his store? You have not defamed; but have you spread his virtues? You have brought him no domestic dispeace; but have you brought him domestic joy? You have refused to covet his possessions; but have you ever coveted possessions for him? If not, there remaineth for you a rest that is still unachieved.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 185.

REFERENCE.—X. 20-22.—James Martineau, Endeavour After the Christian Life (2nd Series), p. 13.

JESUS' APPRECIATION OF MORALITY

'Then Jesus beholding him loved him.'—MARK X. 21.

WHEN it is recorded in this vivid Gospel, as by one who had seen the affection in the Master's eye, that Jesus loved the young ruler, we ought to allow their full meaning to the words.

I. Upon the face of it Jesus did not regard a person who is moral, but not religious, as utterly depraved.

To say that people who are not pious are depraved is an absurdity, for we know that many persons who are not religious practise higher morals, in business especially, than some who are. When Jesus considered this young man's life the Master loved him, and He did not love what was not good.

II. Jesus' appreciation of the young ruler also reminds us that the more morality there is in the community, the better both for Church and State.

III. And Jesus' treatment of this excellent young man suggests that one object of Jesus' mission is to raise morality into spirituality. Morality is like the clean and well-chiselled marble of the ancient story, beautiful, but cold. When the Spirit of Jesus touches it the stone reddens and lives. Religion is morality touched with emotion, till, instead of duty we speak of love, and to the treasure of a good conscience and an honourable life are added the peace which passeth all understanding, the joy unspeakable and full of glory and that vision of God which in itself is life everlasting.

It was not in vain that the young ruler kept the commandments; it was because he kept them that Jesus loved him. It is not in vain that any man has lived bravely outside religion, it is because he has done so well that Jesus desires to have him for a disciple. Our Lord has a welcome for all men who will come to Him, even the thief upon the cross; but of only one seeker in the Gospels is it written that Jesus loved him. He was not a reprobate, nor was he a Pharisee, he was a well-living and high-minded man. When, therefore, one like the young ruler approaches Jesus, the Master sees a man after His own heart. When such a man refuses the cross which alone can raise him to his full manhood the Master is bitterly disappointed. And that man suffers the chief loss of life.—J. WATSON (IAN MACLAREN), The Inspiration of Our Faith, p. 98.

'Give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven.'—MARK X. 21.

IN the morning my servant brought me word that Levett was called to another state, a state for which, I think, he was not unprepared, for he was very useful to the poor.—DR. JOHNSON'S Letters.

THE purest forms of our own religion have always consisted in sacrificing less things to win greater; time, to win eternity; the world, to win the skies. The order, sell that thou hast, is not given without the promise—thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and well for the modern Christian if he accepts the alternative as his Master left it—and does not practically read the command and promise thus: Sell that thou hast in the best market, and thou shalt have treasure in eternity also.—RUSKIN'S Queen of the Air, sec. 50.

REFERENCES.—X. 21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. li. No. 2946. J. Clifford, The Dawn of Manhood, p. 1. Caroline Fry, Christ Our Example, p. 102. R. W. Church, The Gifts of Civilization, p. 27. David Ross, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 42. A. Balmain Bruce, ibid. vol. liv. 1898, p. 359. George Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 246. X. 21, 22.—J. H. Gurney, Plain Preaching to Poor People (5th Series), p. 13. X. 21, 28-30.—Stopford A. Brooke, The Fight of Fate, p. 254. X. 22.—C. A. Berry, Vision and Duty, p. 217; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 264. X. 23.—W. Hudson Shaw, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 131. X. 23-26.—C. Gore, The New Theology and the Old Religion, p. 274; see also Church Times, vol. lvi. 1906, p. 398, and Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 209. X. 23-27.—J. S. Swan, Short Sermons, p. 55.

'It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.'—MARK X. 25.

EVEN a desirable mansion may come in useful for some purpose. But you, if any way possible, clear out of it, your place is not there, and between these walls, built on the despair and degradation of others, you will find it as hard to lead a pure life as is it for a camel to go through the eye of a needle. The evil base of our society eats right through. That our wealthy homes are founded on the spoliation of the poor vitiates all the life that goes on within them.—FROM EDWARD CARPENTER, England's Ideal.

OF riches, in particular, as of all the grossest species of prosperity, the perils are recorded by all moralists; and ever, as of old, must the sad observation from time to time occur: Easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle! Riches in a cultured community . . . are the readiest to become a great blessing or a great curse. 'Beneath gold thrones and mountains,' says Jean Paul, 'who knows how many giant spirits lie entombed?' The first fruit of riches, especially for the man born rich, is to teach him faith in them, and all but hide from him that there is any other faith.—CARLYLE on Goethe's Works.

AVARICE is rarely the vice of a young man: it is rarely the vice of a great man: but Marlborough was one of the few who have, in the bloom of youth, loved lucre more than wine or women, and who have, at the height of greatness, loved lucre more than power or fame. All the precious gifts which nature had lavished on him he valued chiefly for what they would fetch. At twenty he made money of his beauty and vigour. At sixty he made money of his genius and glory.—MACAULAY's History of England, xiv.

THE OMNIPOTENCE OF FAITH

'Jesus looking upon them saith, With men it is impossible, but not with God: for all things are possible with God.'—MARK X. 27.

I. Man with God.—Perhaps in no passage has a preposition been more persistently misread than in this saying of Christ. It is usually interpreted as if 'with' were the equivalent of 'to'. Jesus did not say 'to' but 'with'; and the distinction is important. One sets forth the contrast between man's impotence and God's power. The other links the impotent man with the omnipotent God, and makes him strong in the strength of God.

The subject under discussion is salvation. All the resources of humanity at its best are inadequate for salvation; but in salvation we are dealing not with the resources of man but of God, and all things are possible with God.

II. The Only Condition of this Fellowship is Power in Faith.—The promise is to him that believes. The Scriptures attribute to faith the power of the Infinite. This is not true of all faith, for all faith is not all-powerful. There are some who trust God whom God cannot trust. It is the faith that commands confidence to which all things are possible.

There are three stages of faith. There is the faith that receives, the faith that reckons, and the faith that risks. By the first we are justified. By the second we are sanctified. By the third we are endowed with the gift of power. Faith that goes forward triumphs. The man of faith is omnipotent. Being with God, he becomes as God.

III. What do we Mean by Omnipotence?—The explanation of this power in man must be the same as that given to the attribute of omnipotence in God. When we say all things are possible to God, we mean all things consistent with Himself and with the nature of that on which He works. There is nothing of the magician in God. He does not work by magic, but by law.

So with man. When Jesus assures men that all things are possible through faith, because faith links man with God, He does not mean that there is given him unlimited power for capricious use. Power is subject to law, and is to be exercised according to the will of God.

With God, all man ought to be he can be, and with God, all man ought to do he can do.

IV. The Impossible Demands of the Kingdom.—The kingdom makes impossible demands of all men. Every man finds in his life that which corresponds to the young ruler's possessions. The last conflict is over some possession whose roots are buried in our hearts, or some call for which we have no strength. Take hold of God, and nothing shall be impossible to you.

The kingdom demands the impossible in character as well as in its conditions of entrance.

The fig-tree that Jesus cursed is a parable. The kingdom of Christ demands that every false and unholy thing shall be destroyed from the root. He did not come to regulate sin, but to destroy it.

God's call is always to the impossible, but He blots the word out of the Christian's vocabulary by making all things possible with him.—S. CHADWICK, Humanity and God, p. 157.

REFERENCES.—X. 28-30.—Eugene Bersier, Sermons, p. 311. X. 29.—E. H. Bickersteth, Thoughts in Past Years, p. 261. X. 30.—B. Wilberforce, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 291. X. 32.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 81. X. 32-52.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 157. X. 33.—A. Baker, Addresses and Sermons, p. 66.

'Master, we would that Thou shouldst do for us whatever we ask of Thee.'—MARK X. 35.

IN society and politics we call those great who have devoted their energies to some noble course, or have influenced the course of things in some extraordinary way. But in every instance, whether in art, science, or religion, or public life, there is an universal condition, that a man shall have forgotten himself in his work. If any fraction of his attention is given to the honours or rewards which success will bring him, there will be a taint of weakness in what he does.—FROUDE'S Beaconsfield, p. 259.

REFERENCES.—X. 35.—E. E. Cleal, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 295. X. 35-45.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 90.

'Ye shall indeed drink of the cup that I drink of.'—MARK X. 39. 'I BLESS my God,' Samuel Rutherford once wrote, 'that there is a death and a heaven. I would weary to begin again to be a Christian, so bitter is it to drink of the cup that Christ drank of, if I knew not that there is no poison in it.'

And again: 'There is no question but that our King and Lord shall be master of the fields at length. And we would all be glad to divide the spoil with Christ, and to ride in triumph with Him; but, oh, how few will take a cold bed of straw in the camp with Him!'

REFERENCES.—X. 42-45.—H. C. Beeching, The Grace of Episcopacy, p. 1. X. 43, 44.—N. Boynton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 136. X. 43-45.—A. Pearson, Sermons for the People (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 198.

'Whosoever would be first among you, shall be servant of all.'—MARK X. 44.

WITH Hildebrand . . . the action of the Church as a party or a power came before all thoughts of its higher duties.—FREEMAN, William the Conqueror, vi.

REFERENCES.—X. 44.—G. Campbell Morgan, The Missionary Manifesto, p. 143. X. 45.—J. E. Carpenter, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 348. H. Hensley Henson, ibid. vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 177. X. 46.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 95. X. 46-48.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 344. X. 46-52.—J. Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 323. W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 400. B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 24. Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 351. R. Higinbotham, Sermons, p. 122. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. li. No. 2955; vol. v. No. 266. X. 47.—M. Guy Pearse, Jesus Christ and the People, p. 177. X. 47, 48.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 645.

THE PRINCIPLE OF CHRIST'S SELECTION

'Jesus stood still, and commanded him to be called. And they call the blind man, saying unto him, Be of good comfort, rise; He calleth thee.'—MARK X. 49.

You will observe Jesus called the blind man while he was yet in his blindness. This is the most significant and the most suggestive feature of the narrative.

I. We all feel the value and the glory of religious light; but it is a great mistake to imagine that religious light is essential to a man's call. We have come to look upon the intellectual perplexities of a human soul as a sign that this soul is unconverted. They are no such sign. This man in the streets of Jericho is a typical case. The typical thing about him is not that he regains his sight, but that he comes to Christ before he has regained his sight. The thing that makes him spiritually fit for the kingdom of God is not his vision of the light but his contact with Jesus.

II. The moral would to my mind have been equally effective without the cure. All the men in the streets of Jericho were saying, 'This man's darkness proves him to be outside the kingdom of God'. Jesus says, 'I will refute that belief; bring the man to Me in his present state of dilapidation; bring him with the burden unrelieved and the night unbroken, and even thus I will let him in'.

III. Christ is the only Master that has membership for the benighted. All others cry, 'Get your sight and come'. He says, 'Come and get your sight'. Moses asks cleansing; Socrates desires knowledge; Plato needs philosophy; Buddha seeks worldly renunciation; Confucius demands orderly life; John Baptist requires the fruits of repentance. But Christ will accept the hearing of a voice in the night. He does not ask preliminary morning. He does not ask antecedent vision. He does not ask, for the opening miles, a knowledge of the way. He only appeals to the ear; He says, 'Come'.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 83.

REFERENCES.—X. 49.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiii. No. 1389; vol. xxvii. No. 1587. X. 50.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 106.

'Lord, that I might receive my sight.'—MARK X. 51.

COMPARE Longfellow's lines on Bartimæus. Also George Macdonald's saying about prayer: 'Him 'at gangs to God wi' a sair heid 'ill the suner gang til 'im wi' a sair hert'.

REFERENCES.—X. 51.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2458. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Plain Preaching to Poor People (9th Series), p. 102. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 107. XI. 1; XII. 44.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 169. XI. 2.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 109. XI. 2-6.—Father Benson, Eight Sermons and Addresses, p. 11. XI. 3.—S. Baring-Gould, Plain Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 314. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 119.

'And they bring the colt to Jesus, and He sat upon him.'—MARK XI. 7.

NATURE is thoroughly mediate. It is made to serve. It receives the dominion of man as meekly as the ass on which the Saviour rode. It offers all its kingdoms to man as the raw material which he may mould into what is useful.—EMERSON.

REFERENCE.—XI. 9, 10.—W. J. Butler, Sermons for Working Men, The Oxford Sermon Library, vol. ii. p. 200.

THE PROFANATION OF THE TEMPLE

'And Jesus entered into Jerusalem, and into the temple: and when He had looked round about upon all things, and now the eventide was come, He went out unto Bethany with the twelve.'—MARK XI. 11.

WHAT was it that Jesus Christ saw in the Temple? What was it that He determined to cleanse on that day of His wrath which was coming, that day which began with the withered fig-tree and ended with flying barterers, overturned counters, scattered sheep and oxen?

I. He saw meaningless formalism. The sheep and oxen were in the Temple courts for a religious purpose, and the changers are there that nothing but the Temple shekel might intrude upon the reverence due to holy things, and yet Jesus Christ turns out both one and the other. Why is it? There is nothing to compare with the irreverence of habit when we let religion get into a mechanical groove to such an extent that we lose all sense of the object of our religious worship. Surely it has reached the height of irony when He to Whom all worship pointed, He Who was the true Lamb of God, He Who initiated and appointed the service of the Temple for Himself, must stand there alone and unknown in His Temple, and He to Whom Israel looked as their peace, should be constrained to visit Israel only in wrath.

II. His eye lightens on a more positive insult still to His Father's house. The sheep and the oxen, as they herded together in the Temple courts, were a living proof that the Jew had forgotten the great reverence due to holy places and holy things.

We feel we must ask ourselves with some earnestness, Does He trace in my worship itself that reverence which He ought to find for the presence of God and the honour of His holy house? We do not drive out the sheep and oxen of unworthy, wandering, irreverent thoughts which prevent our worship because we do not really feel the presence of God.

III. But besides the irreverence which profanes the sanctuary, our Blessed Lord, as He gazes round the magnificent Temple, cannot but have seen the sight, painful to His holy eyes, of men who had grown away from religion, men in whom religion contributed nothing to the solid welfare of their life, but rather stood outside it: railed off, shut in, like some church in a busy city rarely used, and thinly attended, by worshippers. It must have stood out with a sharp and ghastly contrast before the eyes of Christ on this Palm Sunday evening—the sacrifice of the whole burnt-offering, symbolizing the exhaustion of God's wrath on sin; the trespass-offering as if to do away with the recurrent burden of sin; the peace-offering of a soul at peace with God, this was the meaning of the oxen, and the sheep, and of the doves for purification—this on the one hand; and on the other, there were the loose lives, the broken morality, the cruelty, the deceit, the injustice, the inability to recognize the higher life. Everything to symbolize, and to effect the complete extirpation of sin, with sin scientifically encamped in high places before the very forces which were meant to overthrow it.

Is our religion touching our life? This is the vital question for us all. Or is it merely a crowd of sheep and oxen, a multiplicity of sacrifices outside us, which leave us uninfluenced and untouched? Christ surely looks from the Temple to the life, from the life to the Temple, to see in life sin pursued with an exhaustion of hatred until it is consumed, to see the soul gradually gaining peace with God through Jesus Christ.—W. C. E. NEWBOLT, Words of Exhortation, p. 131.

REFERENCES.—XI. 11.—J. S. MAVER, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 247. J. BANNERMAN, Sermons, p.

163. Mandell Creighton, University and other Sermons, p. 48. XI. 12-14.—Archbishop Trench, Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord, p. 357. XI. 12-14, 20-24.—John Laidlaw, The Miracles of Our Lord, p. 125. XI. 12-14, 20-28.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 413. XI. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 555. XI. 13, 14.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 127. XI. 14.—J. S. Swan, Short Sermons, p. 202.

‘And Jesus went into the temple, and began to cast out them that sold and bought.’—MARK XI. 15.

‘ONE is struck,’ says Dr. John Ker (Thoughts, pp. 102, 103), ‘in reading the account of the purifying of the Temple by Christ that He should have bestowed so much thought on what was so sure to become obsolete by His own word, It is finished. We do not read elsewhere of the indignation of our Lord rising to such a height, and taking the form of actual compulsion. It is the seal of Christ set on the sacredness of the old Temple worship, all the more needed that He was about to remove it; but still more is it a vivid warning against the union between covetousness and religion or rather the form of religion. That evil reached a visible height when the sale of indulgences and the building of St. Peter's went hand in hand. But it has appeared so often, and in all sections of the Church, that the entrance of the money-changers into the Temple may be called the normal danger of Christianity. Drunkenness and sensuality, which had their shrines in the old pagan pantheon, have still a place in the hearts of many professed worshippers in the house of God, but it is Mammon who still sets up his tables in the open court.’

WORKING TOWARDS IDEALS

‘For all nations.’—MARK XI. 17.

‘ALL nations,’ ‘of all nations’. It was a great reading of the Scriptures: this was a thunder sermon. Jesus Christ was no patriot, Jesus Christ was a philanthropist; the Son of God was no politician, He was a statesman, He grasped the whole situation, and allotted to everyone, east or west, north or south, what was proper to the occasion and the environment.

I. Jesus Christ looked over all the walls of the Temple and the outside parts of the Temple, the low walls that marked definitions of space and in a certain sense of consecration and proprietorship. He recognized the Temple in its unity, the Temple in its ideality, in its high poetic spiritual meaning, and, making a lash, He scourged these fellows from the purlieus of the holy place; for, said He, My Father's house is for all nations; every bit of it is sanctified, every stone has been purified in the fire of the Divine acceptance; be off! go! and the thong made itself heard in the air. What a blessed and comforting thought that Jesus Christ saw the whole house, the whole idea, and that He foresaw a day when that idea would spread amongst all nations, and king and peasant of this land and of that shall be equally welcome and equally recognized as members of the Father's household.

Now in this instance Jesus Christ accuses the intruders, and those who permitted the intrusion, of narrow-minded ideas, and He accuses them of being imperfect and misleading interpreters of the Divine revelation and purpose. To have Jesus Christ read the Bible with us, that would be educational, spiritual instruction, Divine inspiration. He would take us into the roots of things, He would get behind the north wind of words and fill us with the spirit of wisdom and of grace.

II. Jesus Christ included the whole human race in the Temple idea. God never commanded any temples to be built for twos and threes, and to end their purpose in these trivial numbers. When He saved the twos and threes it was that He might save the world through them. Sometimes the number was very small, but it was a vital number; there was enough saved, sometimes called the remnant, out of which to get the biggest forests that ever waved on the hill-sides of the world. He said He would save a city, He would save a remnant, He would save one little child, He would save eight persons, He would save an Isaac; He would do a wonder of this kind, but always having before His eyes the world, the whole world, all nations, every creature. That is the Divine love, and it is useless our endeavouring to whittle it away by verbal criticism and by some monstrous display of our ignorance or our selfishness.

III. If we take this principle and carry it round the whole area of human life, it will be a light to lighten the narrowest mind. We are to regard the child in the light of his manhood. See the man in the child; see all the rights of property in any little bit of string which the child calls his own; see the citizenship of heaven in the child nestling trustfully in your breast and heart. Thus take the larger view; thus interpret all things ideally and transcendently.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. III. p. 78.

REFERENCES.—XI. 17.—G. C. Lorimer, Christian World Pulpit, vol. II. 1898, p. 259. J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. III. p. 78. XI. 19.—W. L. Watkinson, Noon-Day Addresses, p. 85. C. F. Aked, Christian World Pulpit, vol. XXXVIII. 1890, p. 408. XI. 20-23.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. IX. 1901, p. 153; see also Church Times, vol. XLVI. 1901, p. 280.

'Have faith in God.'—MARK XI. 22-24.

If man has in all ages had enough to encounter, there has, in most civilized ages, been an inward force vouchsafed him, whereby the pressure of things outward might be withstood. Obstruction abounded; but faith also was not wanting. It is by faith that man removes mountains; while he had faith his limbs might be wearied with toiling, his back galled with bearing; but the heart within him was peaceable and resolved. . . . Faith gave him an inward willingness; a world of strength wherewith to confront a world of difficulty. The true wretchedness is here: that the difficulty remain and the strength be lost; that we have the labour and want the willingness.—CARLYLE on Characteristics.

REFERENCES.—XI. 22.—J. Marshall Lang, Christian World Pulpit, vol. I. 1896, p. 390. Ambrose Shepherd, ibid. vol. LXIV. 1903, p. 267. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. XXIV. No. 1444. XI. 22, 23.—J. Hamilton, Faith in God, p. 43. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. I. p. 187. XI. 23, 24.—J. G. James, Problems of Prayer, p. 91.

'What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them.'—MARK XI. 24.

WHAT an awful weapon prayer is! Mark XI. 24 saved me from madness in my twelve months' sorrows; and it is so simple and so wide—wide as eternity, simple as light, true as God Himself; and yet it is just the last text of Scripture which is talked of, or preached on, or used.—CHARLES KINGSLEY.

PRAYER

'What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them.'—MARK XI. 24.

I. It is not quite easy to see what our Lord meant. It is quite easy, however, to see one thing that He did not mean. His disciples certainly did not understand their Teacher to offer them the wishing-cap of a children's tale; they did not understand Him to say that all who pray can get what they want. For they must constantly have prayed as they felt to no purpose; yet they prayed and believed in prayer; they could not have disbelieved in it without throwing over their faith altogether.

May not the explanation be something of this kind? Our instinct bears witness to the fact and the belief that prayer is a beneficent force. We realize this dimly, but our Lord with His infinitely greater spiritual sensitiveness and His infinitely clearer spiritual insight saw this as we do not see it—saw it so clearly and so certainly that He can hardly find words strong enough to express His meaning or to impress it on the minds of His followers.

II. Prayer is an instinct; that which we desire deeply enough we pray for.

We may by wilful neglect, by careless indifference, have fallen from the habit; we may have almost persuaded ourselves that it is, from the theistic point of view, illogical or irreverent, when suddenly we are caught, as it were unawares; some great crisis has arisen, some great desire has seized us, and before we have time to think, we are praying—a poor kind of praying this, but yet praying.

Why is not the momentary mood of a crisis the constant habit of a lifetime? Is it because desire is absent? It certainly is so in many cases. We do not pray, not because we doubt, but because we do not desire, or because we do not desire persistently. While desire compels us to pray, prayer also limits and directs, stimulates and strengthens desire.

So our Lord teaches that prayer is not only a privilege, but a duty; not only that we may pray, but that we must pray; not only occasional prayer as the outcome of a great and special need, but habitual prayer as the consequence of our continued necessities.

If the first is a spiritual instinct which our Lord recognizes and encourages, the second is a spiritual effort which He urges and assists.

III. Christ laid down no value as to the times and seasons of prayer—these He leaves to the individual conscience—but He offers us a pattern, very short, but very comprehensive, of what our habitual prayer should be.

The beginning and the end of it is God. We may tell God of our bodily wants, plead for the forgiveness our souls need. But it is upon God's will, not ours, that the emphasis is laid; His will is our sanctification.—F. EALAND, The Spirit of Life, p. 38.

REFERENCES.—XI. 24.—R. J. Campbell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1903, p. 248. J. G. James, Problems of Prayer, p. 67. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 328.

'Forgive . . . that your heavenly Father may forgive you.'—MARK XI. 25.

'FORGIVE US,' say we, 'our offences, as we forgive them that trespass against us.' What else inferre we by that petition, but that we offer Him our soule void of all revenge and free from all rancour? We nevertheless invoke God and call on His aid, even in the complot of our grievousest faults, and desire His assistance in all manner of injustice and iniquitie.—MONTAIGNE (Florio's version).

CAN you conceive Jesus Christ—nay, any wise man you have happened to meet—amid the unnatural gloom of Elsinore? Is not every action of Hamlet prompted by a fanatical impulse, which tells him that duty consists in revenge alone? And does it require a superhuman effort to recognize that revenge never can be a duty?—MAETERLINCK.

PRAYER is the peace of our spirit, the stillness of our thoughts, the evenness of recollection, the seat of meditation, the rest of our cares, and the calm of our tempest; prayer is the issue of a quiet mind, of untroubled thoughts, it is the daughter of charity, and the sister of meekness; and he that prays to God with an angry, that is, with a troubled and discomposed spirit, is like him that retires into a battle to meditate, and sets up his closet in the outquarters of an army.—JEREMY TAYLOR.

REFERENCES.—XI. 32.—C. Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 161. XI. 33.—E. B. Speirs, A Present Advent, p. 307. XII. 1-9.—W. Gray Elmslie, Expository Lectures and Sermons, p. 230. XII. 1-12.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 137.

THE SACRIFICE OF GOD

'He had yet one, a beloved son; He sent him last unto them, saying, They will reverence my son.'—MARK XII. 6.

In this brief and simple verse I find two great things, the things that constitute the very core and heart of the Gospel. I find in it the glory of Christ and the infinite love of the Father.

I. The Glory of Christ.—You remember the comment John makes, in the very opening verses of his Gospel, upon the earthly life of our Lord. John and the other disciples had lived for two or three years in closest intimacy with the Word made flesh. And looking back upon that marvellous life, John says that the dominant impression created by it was that of glory, and the glory was that of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. Now that is the glory that Jesus in this parable claims for Himself. He declares Himself to be 'the only begotten of the Father'. Look at the words, 'He had yet one, a beloved Son,' or as the old version puts it, 'He had yet one Son, His well-beloved'. This sentence, as Dr. A. B. Bruce says, has a most important and vital bearing on the self-consciousness of Jesus. It shows us that Jesus thought of Himself as holding an absolutely unique relationship to God.

II. The Love of the Father.—God is the real subject of this verse. 'He had yet one, a beloved son: He sent Him last unto them, saying, "They will reverence my Son."' And the 'He' who did all this is God. The subject of it all, you may say, is God's care and love for Israel. Israel is the vineyard around which He has set a hedge, in which He has digged a pit, and to defend which He has built a tower; and the Israelites are the people to whom He sends servant after servant, and as a last device His Son. And He sent servant after servant and at last His Son because of His great and unspeakable love for them. But though primarily it sets forth the love of God for Israel, it is a picture, too, of God's love for all men. With the great love of which this parable speaks He besets us and pursues us and seeks to save us. And there are two characteristics of this love which my text emphasizes.

1. This is the first—its persistency. Of all the dimensions of the Divine love I marvel most at its length, at its persistency, at its endurance. I know of human loves that have reached down deep and have stretched out wide, and have lifted up their objects high. But I know no human love that can last, and persist, and endure, like the love of God. It is the length of it that fills me with wonder and amazement. It is the length of it that passes knowledge. It outlasts, and out-persists, and out-endures every human love. 'When father and mother forsake me, the Lord will take me up.' That is a true word that Peter says, that the long-suffering of our Lord is salvation. The long-suffering of the Lord, the patience and persistence of the love of God, the length of it, that is our salvation.

2. And the second characteristic of the love of God I find in the text is the self-sacrifice of it. 'He had yet one,' the text says, 'a beloved Son; He sent Him'. What a world of almost heart-breaking pathos there is in that little sentence! 'He had yet One, a beloved Son; He sent Him.' How eager and anxious that master of the vineyard must have been for those husbandmen when, to restore right relations between himself and them, He sent His only Son, His well-beloved Son, knowing to what He was sending Him. And this is just a symbol and suggestion of the love of God. How God must have loved us men, who had so grievously sinned against Him, when, to save us, He gave His only begotten Son that whosoever beliveth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life. I have no plummet to 'athom a love like that. You ask me how great is God's love. I can only answer, it is as great as the Cross of His only Son.—J. D. JONES, The Gospel of Grace, p. 102.

REFERENCES.—XII. 6.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 144. XII. 6-9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiii. No. 1951. XII. 12-44.—Ibid. vol. lii. No. 2989.

PHARISAISM STILL ALIVE

'They knew that He had spoken the parable against them: and they left Him, and went their way.'—MARK XII. 12.

TOWARDS the very end of our great Master's ministry, He seems, almost of set purpose, to come to quite close quarters with the various recognized authorities of His own Jewish Church, as well as with the self-constituted authority of its various parties.

His object, I take it, was twofold. First, He must assert the supremacy of Divine principle over human rule, and secondly, He must be the Divine Champion on behalf of humanity of its own responsible mental and moral freedom.

I. He is not afraid of human nature, though He is 'grieved at the hardness of their hearts'. He challenges it to come out into the open away from all mere temporary expedients and mechanical rules. He even challenges by His actions conventional authority, conventional opinions, views, and prejudices. There is a suspicion of a mighty claim as He faces Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians, and their current, highly reputable, yet self-centred rules of life and ways of thought and action.

II. And in the rule of life and service to Himself, and, on His behalf, to humanity, there is the same avoidance of all party formulas and party definitions. He strikes home to the very heart of humanity from the Heart of Divinity. 'Preach the Gospel' to every creature—we might almost say to 'all creation'.

In each parable we hear a voice behind the voice, a mystic note within the music, that attracts without violence and subdues without force, until we find our own souls answering. We, too, perceive, like the Pharisees, that 'He has spoken this parable against ourselves'.

III. And each time the voice comes home to conscience as a final issue, as an eternal principle. The Divine Master, the consummate Teacher, the Good Physician, the Eternal Wisdom of God has cut clean through our sophistries, swept aside our partialities, torn off the soothing poultice of self-flattery and opened the wound itself, the wound of pride, and let out the deadly matter, and pours in the wine of penitential grace and the healing unction of His forgiveness; and brings us by His own transporting grace to the House of Rest, where He leaves us His own Incarnate life and the virtue of that life, in sacramental, healing, strengthening, perfecting power; and yet so greatly does He respect our moral freedom that this glory of a perfect life only results—so far as we co-operate in faith and effort. The Pharisees, mask-wearers—as all are tempted to be—recognizing the Voice of Eternal Truth, avoided it; perceiving the final issue laid at their feet, yet spurned it, and 'left Him and went their way' into the outer darkness.—BISHOP GAUL, The Church Family Newspaper, 18 September, 1908, p. 795.

'Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's.'—MARK XII. 17.

CHRIST answered the Herodians according to their condition. 'Show me the tribute-money,' said He—and one took a penny out of his pocket—if you use money which has the image of Cæsar upon it, and which he has made current and valuable—that is, if you are men of the state, and gladly enjoy the advantages of Cæsar's government, then pay him back some of his own when he demands it. 'Render therefore to Cæsar that which is Cæsar's, and to God those things which are God's'—leaving them no wiser than before as to which was which, for they did not wish to know.—THOREAU on Civil Disobedience.

REFERENCES.—XII. 17.—S. King, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 359. G. D. Hooper, ibid. vol. xl. 1891, p. 355. XII. 18-27.—J. Denney, ibid. vol. xli. 1894, p. 366. XII. 21-31. (R.V.).—J. Martin, ibid. vol. lii. 1897, p. 36.

'When they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry nor are given in marriage; but are as the angels which are in heaven.'—MARK XII. 25.

SEE Mrs. Berry's remarks in the forty-fourth chapter of The Ordeal of Richard Feverel.

REFERENCES.—XII. 26, 27.—C. Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 251. XII. 28.—J. A. Bain, Questions Answered by Christ, p. 88. XII. 28-31.—T. F. Lockyer, Inspirations of the Christian Life, p. 35.

'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God.'—MARK XII. 30.

CHAUCER's remarkably trustful and affectionate character appears in his familiar, yet innocent and reverent manner of speaking of his God. He comes into his thought without any false reverence, and with no more parade than the zephyr to his ear. If Nature is our mother, then God is our father. There is less love and simple practical trust in Shakespeare and Milton. How rarely in our English tongue do we find expressed any affection for God! Certainly, there is no sentiment so rare as the love of God. Herbert almost alone expresses it, 'Ah, my dear God'.—THOREAU, A Week on the Concord (Friday).

'With all thy mind.'—MARK XII. 30.

THE queen (Caroline) had some higher intellectual interests, which to Walpole probably seemed as pure nonsense as they seemed to King George. She often tried to make him read Butler's Analogy, but he told her that his religion was fixed, and that he had no desire either to change or to improve it.—MORLEY'S Walpole, p. 97.

WHILE I was in that country, viz of the Penpont district, I had advantage of converse with Mr. Murray, a learned and holy man; the meeting of which two in a character was not very frequent there.—THOMAS BOSTON.

REFERENCES.—XII. 30.—L. R. Rawnsley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 38. E. W. Attwood, Sermons for Clergy and Laity, p. 223. J. H. Thom, A Spiritual Faith, p. 99. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 162. XII. 30, 31.—W. H. Murray, The Fruits of the Spirit, pp. 246, 257.

MARK XII. 31.

ANY one associated with Lord Aberdeen might always rest assured that he was safe in his hands. When our law did not allow prisoners the benefit of counsel, it was commonly said that the judge was counsel for the prisoner. Lord Aberdeen was always counsel for the absent. Doubtless he had pondered much upon the law, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. It had entered profoundly into his being, and formed a large part of it.—GLADSTONE, quoted in Morley's Life, II. pp. 639, 640).

REFERENCES.—XII. 33.—W. Brock, The Religious Difficulty in the Schools and the Education Bill, Sermons, 1900-1902. C. Silvester Horne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 355.

NOT FAR FROM THE KINGDOM

'Thou art not far from the kingdom of God.'—MARK XII. 34.

WHAT became of this hopeful young lawyer I cannot tell. Whether he actually reached and entered the kingdom he was so near to, we are not informed.

I. He was 'not far from the kingdom,' because he had begun to think seriously on religion.

II. Because he had already begun to attach greater importance to the spirit than to the letter.

III. Because he was sincerely desirous of acting up to the measure of light which he possessed.

IV. Because he was amiable and virtuous. He was strictly moral, circumspect, and pure.—J. THAIN DAVIDSON, The City Youth, p. 267.

NOT FAR OFF

'Thou art not far from the kingdom of God.'—MARK XII. 34.

THE man to whom these words were addressed was a candid inquirer.

I. The Characteristics of those who are not far from the Kingdom.

1. They may possess considerable knowledge of Scripture.

2. They may make a candid confession of their belief.

3. They may have strong convictions of sin.

4. They may have a desire to amend their lives.

5. They may have partially reformed.

They only need Repentance and Faith.

II. The Reasons why they do not Enter the Kingdom.

1. Difficulties in the way.

2. Advantages in a middle course.

3. Belief that they are Christians already.

4. Reluctance to observe the needful conditions.

III. The Inducements to Enter.

1. The blessedness of those who do.

2. The misery of those who do not.—F. J. AUSTIN, Seeds and Saplings, p. 38.

REFERENCES.—XII. 34.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 148. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 258. R. L. Drummond, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 85. W. L. Watkinson, ibid. vol. lxi. 1902, p. 259. H. Hensley Henson, ibid. vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 180. H. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 63. J. S. Swan, Short Sermons, p. 213. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. v. p. 297. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvi. No. 1517; vol. lli. No. 2989. XII. 37.—A. B. Bruce, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. p. 42. P. M. Muir, ibid. vol. xlv. 1893, p. 107. J. H. Jellett, The Elder Son, p. 141. Mark Guy Pearse, Jesus Christ and the People, p. 57.

CASTING INTO THE TREASURY

'And Jesus sat down over against the treasury, and beheld how the multitude cast money into the treasury, and many that were rich cast in much. And there came a poor widow, and she cast in two mites, which make a farthing.'

—MARK XII. 41.

TAKE the incident of this Gospel story. May it not suggest to us a special fact of immense significance not apparent on the surface of things? That Temple court, those thirteen brazen chests, that procession of contributors, each with his special offering—may they not represent to us, in idea at least, a picture or parable of what is going on perpetually in the drama of human life, and at the same time bring before us a vision of the unseen, unheard judgment of Christ upon the works and ways of men?

I. Every single life is in itself an offertory, a contribution, made to the great sum of human influences and examples. Some faint resemblance to this idea of a common treasury to which all in their several ways contribute may be seen in the demands and expectations of men and women when united in social groups. The rich and powerful are welcome as the 'benefactors' of society, and society rewards them with its smiles. Modest and humble goodness may pass by with its slender offering, rich only in the coin of love and self-sacrifice, but such coinage has no appreciable value in the eyes of the 'children of this world'.

II. As a contrast, let us look at the spirit in which our Lord appraised the two types of character that passed before Him in the Temple court, and notice which of the two appeared to Him to be the pure gold and which the showy tinsel.

1. First, we cannot fail to see that the test applied by Christ to human conduct, here as always, was a spiritual test. In the matter of giving He pronounced that the vital question is not how much you give, but what element of sacrifice enters into your gift. Love and self-surrender are the core of practical Christianity. 'My son, give Me thy heart,' is the sum and substance of all the commandments. In God's sight he who does not give himself as the best part of his offering, with no eye to any future recompense, gives what has no spiritual value.

2. Another point is that there may be more spiritual nobleness, more of the morally sublime, in some obscure, hidden life that hardly anyone notices than in many of the conspicuous acts of distinguished persons which are recorded in the pages of history. We are reminded by our Lord's praise of the poor widow that obscurity is a condition, sometimes the necessary condition, of much of the most self-denying work that is done in the world.

III. Our own experience may teach the lesson that it is not often to the wealthy, the powerful, or the brilliant that we owe the deepest gratitude for timely aid, generous sympathy, or ennobling influence.

It should never be forgotten that the true givers, the true helpers of mankind, are those whose efforts cost them much labour and suffering, and who, in seeking the good of others, purchase it with their own heart's blood. Only in those who cast into life's treasury their love and sympathy, the most precious of offerings, charged with sore travail of soul and much inward pain, does Christ recognize the image and likeness of His own perfect sacrifice of Himself.

—J. W. SHEPARD, Light and Life, p. 192.

REFERENCES.—XII. 41-44.—C. H. Parkhurst, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 179. T. Martin, ibid. vol. lxix. 1906, p. 397. John McNeill, Regent Square Pulpit, vol. II. p. 65. S. Martin, Rain Upon the Mown Grass, p. 380. Lynch, Three Months' Ministry, p. 118.

MARK XII. 42.

IN 'the book of the Three Maiden Sisters' (Professor at the Breakfast Table, x.), Oliver Wendell Holmes tells of a poor widow who, 'fighting hard to feed and clothe and educate her children, had not forgotten the poorer ancient maidens,' sending the three spinsters 'a fractional pudding from her own table. I remembered it the other day as I stood by the place of rest, and I felt sure that it was remembered elsewhere. I know there are prettier words than pudding, but I can't help it—the pudding went upon the record, I feel sure, with the mite which was cast into the treasury by that other poor widow whose deed the world shall remember for ever.'

REFERENCES.—XII. 43.—M. Guy Pearse, Jesus Christ and the People, p. 238. XII. 43, 44.—R. Collyer, Where the Light Dwelleth, p. 122. E. L. Hull, Sermons Preached at King's Lynn (3rd Series), p. 213. XIII.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 208.

THE MATERIAL AND THE SPIRITUAL

'And as He went out of the temple, one of His disciples saith unto Him: Master, see what manner of stones and what buildings are here!'—MARK XIII. 1.

It stands out clearly in our story that Jesus did not care for the Titanic stones on which the Jewish Temple rested. They were crying out to the disciples of man's power over matter, and the disciples were full of wonder at it, but Jesus did not care for it. There was a higher, fuller power of man, another conquest of the world which these men had missed, and, because of their missing that, this mere material triumph did not interest or move Him. He prophesied how transitory it was all to prove, and so passed on and left it.

I. We need to know that that is always true. It is something which we who call ourselves the servants of Jesus Christ have no right ever to forget—that He never is impressed by merely material success or power any more than He was when He saw them in Jerusalem. It was not what He came into the world to bring to pass.

II. Christ does value the material, but always with an outlook beyond it to the spiritual. If we keep this in view, I think we may believe, with the profoundest reverence, that there is no work upon material things faithfully done by man which God does not look upon with pleasure. Thoroughness and beauty are the two excellent qualities of man's work upon material things. God is the Creator, and if in the creation we can read anything of the Creator, these two dispositions, thoroughness and beauty, must lie at the very centre of His Being; for they everywhere pervade the world that He has made.

No man can read the Gospels and not catch the tone of such a sympathy as proves that wherever the eye of Christ fell upon any man in Palestine who in those days was doing thorough or beautiful work in any department of activity, the Man of men honoured him for it and rejoiced in it. Do not think of Him who brought our nature to its best as being totally estranged from those things which ninety-nine-hundredths of our race are doing all the time. Think of Him as caring for it all, as caring for what they did and for what you are doing; but always as being preserved from the slavery of material things by two principles which were absolutely despotic and invariable with Him—the principle that no material thing was entirely satisfactory unless it could reveal some spiritual usefulness, and the principle that if any material thing, however beautiful, hindered any spirituality, there should be no hesitation about sacrificing it. Look at those two principles. See if they did not both absolutely rule in Christ, and see if they are not just what we need to save us from the tyranny of material things.

III. How shall one reach that freedom? It is only by entering into the higher anxieties of Jesus that one is freed from the lower anxieties of men. You must care with all your soul that God should be glorified and that men should be saved. And you can do that only by letting God first glorify Himself in you by saving you. Let Christ be your Saviour. Then, tasting His salvation, your one great wish will be that all men may be saved, and, wishing that intensely, you will be free from every other wish that does not harmonize with that.—PHILLIPS BROOKS, The Law of Growth, p. 150.

'Master, behold what manner of stones and what manner of buildings!'—MARK XIII. 1.

LET every dawn of morning be to you as the beginning of life, and every setting sun be to you as its close; then let every one of these short lives leave its sure record of some kindly thing done for others, some goodly strength or knowledge gained for yourselves; so, from day to day, and strength to strength, you shall build up indeed, by art, by thought, and by just will, an Ecclesia of England, of which it shall not be said, 'See what manner of stones are here!' but, 'See what manner of men'.—RUSKIN, Lectures on Art, iv.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 1.—Phillips Brooks, The Law of Growth, p. 150. XIII. 6.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 151.

'He that shall endure to the end, the same shall be saved.'—MARK XIII. 13.

THE great thing is not to be discouraged by seeming reverse or relapse. The victory is to endurance, and there would be no endurance if we were always gaining. So we shall endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, and be sure of success.—DR. JOHN KER's Letters.

REFERENCE.—XIII. 13.—Christian World Pulpit, vol. 1. 1896, p. 10.

'If any man say to you, Lo, here is the Christ; or lo, there; believe it not.'—MARK XIII. 21.

EACH people has its own periods of national life, with their own characters. The period which is now ending for England is that which began when, after the sensuous tumult of the Renaissance, Catholicism being discredited and gone, a serious nation desired, as had been foretold, to see one of the days of the Son of Man, and did not see it; but men said to them See here or See there, and they went after the blind guides and followed the false direction; and the actual civilization of England and of America is the result.—M. ARNOLD, in 1882.

'Now from the fig-tree learn her parable.'—MARK XIII. 28.

ALL things are moral and in their boundless changes have an unceasing reference to spiritual nature. Therefore is nature glorious with form, colour, and motion, that every globe in the remotest heaven; every chemical change from the rudest crystal up to the laws of life; every change of vegetation from the first principle of growth in the eye of a leaf, to the tropical forest and antediluvian gold-mine; every animal function from the sponge up to Hercules, shall hint or thunder to man the laws of right and wrong, and echo the Ten Commandments. Therefore is nature ever the ally of religion: lends all her pomp and riches to the religious sentiment. Prophet and priest, David, Isaiah, Jesus have drawn deeply from this source.—EMERSON.

'Heaven and earth shall pass away: but My words shall not pass away.'—MARK XIII. 31.

'ONE of the strongest pieces of objective evidence in favour of Christianity is not sufficiently enforced by apologists. Indeed, I am not aware that I have ever seen it mentioned. It is the absence from the biography of Christ of any doctrines which the subsequent growth of human knowledge—whether in natural science, ethics, political economy, or elsewhere—has had to discount. This negative argument is really almost as strong as is the positive one from what Christ did teach. For when we consider what a large number of sayings are recorded of—or at least attributed to Him, it becomes most remarkable that in literal truth there is no reason why any of His words should ever pass away in the sense of becoming obsolete. "Not even now could it be easy," says John Stuart Mill, "even for an unbeliever, to find a better translation of the rule of virtue from the abstract into the concrete, than to endeavour so to live that Christ would approve our life." Contrast Jesus Christ in this respect with other thinkers of like antiquity.' Mr. G. J. Romanes, from whom these words are quoted, goes on to instance Plato, in whose dialogues there occur errors 'reaching even to absurdity in respect of reason, and to sayings shocking to the moral sense'.

THE INCARNATE SON OF GOD

'Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father.'—MARK XIII. 32.

I. God became man. The Incarnation of our Lord is a mystery which, like that of the creation of all things, or that of the immanency of the great Creator in His works, can never be comprehended by human thought. The will of God is a will to love, to seek and to save the lost, and for such reasons God became man.

II. How far were the limitations of the Lord's manhood affected by its union with the Godhead? We affirm in the person of Christ two perfect natures—the human and the Divine. If we admit the true and limited humanity of our Lord, how are we to reconcile His Divine omniscience therewith? I cannot understand what transcends my finite capacity, but neither will I deny this mysterious truth. The same difficulty is presented by the uniformity of nature and the freedom of the human will. I believe that the eternal Son of God had during His human life so emptied Himself of all those Divine attributes which would have interfered with the reality of His manhood that He was really affected by human sorrow, that He really felt the seductive strain of temptation, that when He quoted passages from the Old Testament He might have no more knowledge of their age and actual authors than that which was current in His own time.—BISHOP MOORHOUSE, The Sermon Year Book, 1891, p. 349.

REFERENCE.—XIII. 32.—R. J. Campbell, Sermons Addressed to Individuals, p. 277.

WATCHING

'Take ye heed, watch and pray: for ye know not when the time is.'—MARK XIII. 33.

HE watches for Christ who has a sensitive, eager, apprehensive mind; who is awake, alive, quick-sighted, zealous in seeking and honouring Him; who looks out for Him in all that happens, and who would not be surprised, who would not be over-agitated or overwhelmed, if he found that He was coming at once.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 33.—Sir G. R. Fetherston, The Shortness of Time, Sermons, 1842-79. XIII. 33, 34.—Henry Home-man, Seven Sermon Stories, p. 97.

OUR WORK FOR CHRIST

'To every man his work.'—MARK XIII. 34.

THE Lord Jesus is Himself the great Worker. He is the Head of the body, the Church; and He needs members, as the medium through which He may convey His purposes of grace and power towards the world.

Note a few hints which may be of assistance to Christian workers.

I. Work from Pure Motives.—Legends tell us that when the Emperor Justinian had built the Byzantine Church with a view to his own aggrandizement and glory, on the day of dedication he looked in vain for his own name on the memorial stone. Angel hands had obliterated it, and substituted for it that of the widow, Euphrasia—whose only merit was, that out of pure devotion she had strewn a little straw in front of the beasts that drew the heavily-laden trucks of marble from the quarry to the sacred pile. His motive was so ignoble that heaven ignored his gift; hers was so pure and lovely that she received credit for the whole.

II. Work on God's Plan.—One of the most suggestive texts in the Bible, far-reaching in its many applications, is that in which God says to Moses, 'See that thou make all things according to the pattern showed thee in the Mount'. Not a stake, or a curtain, or an atom of fragrant spice was left to the genius of the artificer, or the fancy of the lawgiver. All was unfolded to Moses in elaborate detail; and all he had to do was to produce that plan in careful and exact obedience, until at last it stood complete before the wondering host of Israel.

III. Work as Those Freshly Cleansed.—The priests must wash in the laver before they perform the service of the sanctuary. They must be clean who bear the vessels of the Lord.

In our hospitals the instruments used in operations are constantly kept in carbolic acid, that they may not carry the slightest contagion to the open wound; and we cannot touch the open and festering wounds which sin has caused without injury to ourselves and others, unless we are ever in the flow of the Blood and Water of which St. John speaks.

IV. Work in God's Strength.—He does not want our strength—it is often a hindrance to Him; because we are so apt to rely on it, to the exclusion of Himself. He wants our weakness, our infirmities, our nothingness—'that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us'.

And there is no way so good of getting God's strength as being diligent students of His precious Word.

V. Work in Believing Expectancy.—In this, as in all other spiritual work, we are governed by one unchanging law: according to your faith be it done unto you. 'Only be thou strong and very courageous.'—F. B. MEYER, Christian Living, p. 114.

THE CALL TO WORK AND WATCH

'For the Son of Man is as a man taking a far journey, who left his house, and gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work, and commanded the porter to watch.'—MARK XIII. 34.

THE text reminds us of the state in which Christ has left, during His absence, what He is graciously pleased to call 'His house,' i.e. His Church. He has not left His Church without giving most express and definite instructions what everybody is to do while He is away. The household of the Church ought to be, according to the intention of its Lord, a system of beautiful order and arrangement, as long as He is away from it. And yet, if He were to come to-day, would He find it as He left it?

Three things Christ appointed to His servants: an authority—a work—and a watch.

I. The Authority.—First, then, we have to look at the Church's authority; and remark that this authority is given expressly to servants—'He gave authority to His servants'. The more we serve and the lowlier the place we take, the more is the authority given. For what is authority? Not position, not office, but a certain moral power: the power of truth, the power of the affections, the power of virtue over vice, the power of the true over the false, the power of faith over sight, the essential power of the great Head delegated to all His members, which is ultimately to command the universe. Let a man be deeply convinced of the truth of the Gospel by the best of all evidences, the experience of his own soul—i.e. in other words, let him really be a member of the household of faith, and immediately that man carries with him an authority. He has a commission, and a power by which that commission is to be fulfilled—the commission is to glorify Christ by extending His kingdom, and the power is the Holy Ghost, given to him for this very end.

II. The Work.—And now what is the work?—for authority is never given in the Church of Christ for any other end but work. And here again I note that every man's work is special. The authority was general—the work is specific; for He says 'he gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work'. There is scarcely anything more important that any Christian has to do than to pray that he may see, and not rest till he has found out, what the particular work is which God has assigned him to do in this present life. And when he has once found it, do not let him wheedle and destroy it by trying to do everybody's work besides; but let him do his own with fixedness and wholeheartedness.

III. The Watch.—There are two ways of watching. There is a watching against a thing we fear; and there is a watching for a thing we love. Most persons when they are told to watch, think chiefly of what they are to watch against; but I conceive it was far more in our Saviour's mind to bid us to be full of what we are to watch for. For, if we watch against sin, is it not for this very reason because we are watching for Christ? Watch, therefore, for the second advent, and you will be sure to be vigilant against slothfulness and sin. In all, therefore, you do, and in all you suffer, you are to be in the spirit of a man who, expecting a dear friend, has taken his stand at the gate to meet him when he arrives.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 34.—John Ker, Sermons, p. 139. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 167. XIII. 35-37.—C. Parsons Reichel, Sermons, p. 162. D. Fraser, Metaphors in the Gospels, p. 243. XIII. 36.—R. T. Davidson, Promise and Fulfilment, p. 21. XIII. 37.—T. McCrie, Sermons, p. 205. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 8. Washington Gladden, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. p. 227. J. Stalker, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 390. J. Addison Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 262. J. Fraser, University Sermons, p. 41. A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part iv. p. 237. XIV. 1-11.—J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 161. XIV. 1-41.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 212. XIV. 3.—W. H. Brookfield, Sermons, p. 158. F. F. Shannon, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxvii. 1905, p. 238.

FOREIGN MISSIONS

'Why was this waste of ointment made.'—MARK XIV. 4.

THE incident from which our text is taken is distinguished above all others by the fact that Jesus mentions it as one that shall be held in world-wide and undying remembrance (v. 9). What is there said has been realized wherever missions have been established.

But, unfortunately, the obvious moral of the story has not prevented the application to foreign missions of a question, oft repeated and loud sounding, which amounts almost in so many words to the question of Judas, 'Why was this waste?'

I. Its Apparent Justification.

(a) In the face of home needs, is it not a waste that thousands are spent yearly on missions to the heathen?

(b) In face of the great mortality in Africa and elsewhere, is it not a waste to be constantly sending out missionaries to these fever-stricken countries?

(c) In face of the great dearth of faithful pastors at home, is it not a waste to send so many capable and trained clergy to places where their services are not appreciated?

II. Its Absolute Injustice.

(a) The motive of the question is entirely wrong: as shown by Judas himself, who was not concerned on account of the poor, but was a thief (John xii. 6). Some opponents of missions are actuated by selfishness, and so ask this question simply out of a spirit of narrowness, not because of their zeal for the glory of God's kingdom.

(b) The very idea itself is wrong, viz. that Mary's offering was lost, wasted, and thus profitless. The most convincing instance of this is the life, sufferings, and death of Jesus Himself; thirty years in the quiet of Nazareth, only three years of public life, hidden away in a little corner of the earth—what a waste of a beautiful life! But see John xii. 24. Though Mary's example is very similar, so-called waste in God's service is justified.

(c) The question is especially wrong when asked in connexion with missions to the heathen. While the amount spent in this way is compared with other objects of expenditure—war, luxuries, vice—it is a mere trifle, and it must be remembered it brings a fruitful return in increased scientific knowledge, commerce, and (colonial extension). The support of foreign missions has a beneficial effect on the Church at home by deepening the feeling of devotion, and the rich blessings of all sorts reflected.

III. Similarly as to the Deaths of Missionaries in the Field.

(a) No one exclaims against a man who accepts a lucrative trade or official appointment to a pestilential climate, or is ordered off on military service to a post of danger.

(b) The number of missionary deaths is as nothing compared with the losses in even a minor war.

(c) The deaths of missionaries stimulate the devotion of the Church; e.g. how many men and women have been led to give themselves to God's work at home as well as abroad by such deaths as those of Livingstone, Patteson, and Hannington?

REFERENCES.—XIV. 4-6.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. x. p. 98. XIV. 5.—D. T. Young, The Travels of the Heart, p. 69. XIV. 6.—J. Coats Shanks, God Within Us, p. 10. John Clifford, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 79. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 76. Bishop F. Temple, Church Times vol. xxviii. 1890, p. 1060. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxi. No. 1834. XIV. 6-9.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 162.

THE PASSING OF OPPORTUNITY

'Me ye have not always.'—MARK XIV. 7.

JESUS is a continual surprise. You could never guess if you did not know, how He will reply to a disputant, or what He will do in a dilemma. He always does the original thing, says the unexpected thing. His deeds and words are a source of astonishment even to the disciples who know and love Him best. Those whom they rebuke, He welcomes; and on those with whom they are indignant, He bestows the loftiest and most deliberate commendation. Verily His ways are not as their ways, and perhaps still less as our ways.

No one could be long with Jesus without learning that He loved the poor; and it is hardly surprising that when a woman, in the wealth of her devotion, broke a box of very precious ointment and poured it over the head of her Lord, the disciples were indignant and harsh. They counted her act one of foolish extravagance and condemned it in words which we might almost imagine were the Master's own. 'What is the good of such waste?' they say; 'for this ointment might have been sold and given to the poor.' It would not have been hard to believe that these were words of Jesus' own—words of mild rebuke to the eager woman who had forgotten how dear the poor were to Jesus. But no! The surprise is here as everywhere. What Jesus said was very different: 'Leave her alone; it is a beautiful work that she has wrought upon Me. For ye have the poor with you all the time, but Me ye have not always.' Jesus has not forgotten His love for the poor, nor has He forgotten how much might be done with the money; but the poor might be helped at any time, while if He was to be thus honoured, it must be now or never. There is a time to sell the precious ointment, and a time to break the box and pour its treasure over the head of Jesus; and happy is he who knows these times and seasons.

I. Jesus is here enunciating, in His own inimitable way, the great truth of the relative value of opportunities. The good is not the best; and His words suggest that the man who would do homage to the best must be daring enough to rise above the temptation to be merely good, or to govern his life by the standards even of a noble convention. Jesus came not to be ministered unto, yet He was glad, very glad, when such spontaneous ministrations came. Though meek and lowly, He unhesitatingly accepted the costliest service, and counted Himself worthy of the noblest that men could offer. He loved the poor, but to Him life had other than economic aspects; and amid the cruelty, suspicion and misunderstanding that clouded the last of His earthly days, He welcomed with peculiar joy the daring generosity of this woman's heart.

The great words in which Jesus justified the breaking of the alabaster box in His own behalf embody a principle which should run through all wise life. The words were these: 'The poor ye have always with you, but Me ye have not always'. The principle is this—that opportunities differ in value and importance, and that wisdom consists in reading their value aright and in selecting the one which will not be always with us. Certain things may be done at any time; certain other things must be done now or never. Certain privileges may be enjoyed at any time; certain others, now or never. Every life is confronted at many points with this strange contrast—between the ordinary opportunities which come with every day, and some great opportunity which, if not grasped at once, may vanish for ever. The poor and Jesus! There is the living contrast which is symbolical of so much in our life. The presence of the poor we can depend on; the pathetic commonplace is ever about us; but unique opportunities are not always with us. They are rare. Sometimes they come to us but once; and though we should wait for a century, they would never come again.

II. Every life, however humble, has unique opportunities of its own. The Sabbath Day—do we use it for the better things? The holiday—do we let it bring us nearer the God of the mountains and the sea? The rare opportunities of travel—what do we do with them? Are we of those who would rather read a newspaper than watch a brilliant sunset? Common days and common sights will come again; but to him that hath ears to hear, every unique opportunity rings out the reminder, 'The poor ye have always with you, but Me ye have not always'.

And if we cannot distinguish between opportunities, we have yet much to learn from Jesus.

In its primary reference, this word of Jesus referred not to getting, but to doing good; and here, as there, opportunities differ. It is not always easy, of course, to judge the real significance of an opportunity. A whole career has often been determined by a choice which at the moment seemed trivial. At the same time, there are opportunities whose greatness no sane man would dispute; and it would be well for those whose life is before them to learn to understand and value how much is theirs and how soon and how surely it will pass away. It is too late to break the alabaster box when Jesus is in His grave.—J. E. McFADYEN, The City With Foundations, p. 63.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 8.—T. Binney, Sermons Preached in the King's Weigh-House Chapel, p. 188. J. Page Hopps, Sermons of Sympathy, p. 53. H. Bushnell, Christ and His Salvation, p. 35. E. R. Wilberforce, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1900, p. 305. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 252. XIV. 9.—T. T. Munger, The Freedom of Faith, p. 109. Ambrose Shepherd, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1904, p. 53.

* And Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve, went unto the chief priests, to betray Him unto them.—MARK XIV. 10.

THE BATTLE OF CHALONS, where Hunland met Rome, and the earth was played for, at sword-fence, by two earth-bestrident giants, the sweep of whose swords cut kingdoms in pieces, hovers dim in the languid remembrance of a few; while the poor police-court treachery of a wretched Iscariot, transacted in the wretched land of Palestine, centuries earlier, for thirty pieces of silver, lives clear in the heads, in the hearts of all men.—CARLYLE in History Again.

THE GOODMAN OF THE HOUSE

* And the first day of unleavened bread, when they killed the passover, His disciples said unto Him, Where wilt Thou that we go and prepare that Thou mayest eat the passover? And He sendeth forth two of His disciples, and saith unto them, Go ye into the city, and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water: follow him. And wheresoever he shall go in, say ye to the goodman of the house, the Master saith, Where is the guestchamber, where I shall eat the passover with My disciples? And he will shew you a large upper room furnished and prepared: there make ready for us.—MARK XIV. 12-15.

LET us take the 'Goodman of the House'. That he was well-to-do seems clear, and though there is no hint of his identity in the narrative, many would like to feel that it was the Evangelist John Mark himself, or at any rate the head of the household of which St. Mark and his mother, who was apparently a widow, formed a part.

I. The first thing we notice about the man is this: that he was an unknown friend of Jesus, unknown, that is to say, to the other disciples, as we see from the directions given to St. Peter and St. John. The Master tells them to follow a man bearing a pitcher of water.

II. If the goodman was unknown, he was also unassuming. He does not stand upon his dignity, nay, he is quite willing to pass into the background when he has done his Lord's command. He prepared the room, but there was no place for him in it. His part is to remain alone outside in the passage, to watch that his Guest should be undisturbed.

III. Notice how prepared the goodman was for the Lord's message, and how willingly he responded to it. He must have made the offer to Jesus some time before. Can we not almost see the smile of happy contentment on his face when he heard the words, 'The Master saith, Where is the guestchamber where I shall eat the passover with My disciples?' His preparations had not been made in vain—the Upper Room was 'furnished and prepared'—all was ready for the Master's use.

IV. May we not think that the goodman had a greater reward still? If his house really did contain the Upper Room in which the Risen Christ appeared, what a joy to feel that in his house the disciples found their Easter Peace. And may he not have had a share? One Evangelist distinctly tells us that others were gathered with the ten Apostles where the Risen Lord appeared on that first Easter night. Surely we may hope and believe that the goodman this time no longer remained outside the door, but was admitted to that happy circle of rejoicing friends, unknown no longer, but welcomed by the others, and greeted by the Lord Himself.—W. V. MASON, Short Addresses for Holy Week, p. 9.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 12-16.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 171. XIV. 12-26.—Ibid. p. 175. XIV. 13, 14, 15.—C. S. Macfarland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 344. XIV. 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiii. No. 785. XIV. 19.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 341. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 182.

JUDAS

'The Son of Man goeth, & it is written of Him: but woe to that man by whom the Son of Man is betrayed!'—MARK XIV. 21.

I. WOULD Christ have chosen Judas as His disciple if he was wholly bad? No; we lose the significance of the lesson of Judas if we do not realize that Judas had his noble side. (1) There must have been something noble in Judas to have made him throw in his lot with the disciples as they went homeless and houseless and almost penniless up and down Judæa. (2) There is not the slightest reason to suppose but that Judas himself took part in spiritual work—the disciples went out; they preached in different villages the Gospel. (3) You find that our Lord Jesus Christ was always appealing to the good side of Judas; He never gave him up even to the last. (4) When we compare the dealings of God with men, we find that He could not possibly have dealt with Judas otherwise than He has dealt with other men; the history of human nature is the same in every generation, and you may be quite certain that in tracing the history of Judas we are tracing the history of a man who had, and displayed before the eyes of the world, a devolution of character, the devolution of which is the greatest lesson to ourselves.

II. What was it that turned a man of probably naturally noble character, with aspirations which made him join a band of poor men standing for the right, into the traitor Judas?

It was the self-deception of one dominant idea, a dominant idea that was fostered and increased by the very things which should have crushed it out of him in the discipline of his character. He was an able man, but, with that business ability which distinguished Judas, he had what so often goes with it—a love of power and a love of money. It became a dominant idea in the mind of Judas to become the treasurer of a great kingdom, and as the idea grew with him, so the impatience became greater with the ways of his Master. When he pressed the fatal kiss upon His Master, probably to the very last he thought he was doing it for His good, and it was not until the lightning flash came at last when his Master was really taken, when the Son of Man was really betrayed, when He was led away and did nothing for His rescue—then the lightning flash showed Judas where he was, the veil slipped from his eyes, conscience had its revenge, and he departed and went and hanged himself.

III. Can there be at this moment some terrible self-deception which may be blinding our eyes, and leading us on almost against our own knowledge to betray our Lord?

1. What self-deception is there about what is called friendship?

2. So again with our churchmanship or our religion.

3. Whom are you working for really in your religious life?—BISHOP WINNINGTON INGRAM, Addresses in Holy Week in St. Paul's Cathedral, 1902, p. 7.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 22-24.—James Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 180. XIV. 23.—E. S. Talbot, Some Titles and Aspects of the Eucharist, p. 1.

'They went out unto the Mount of Olives.'—MARK XIV. 26.

AFTER moralizing on the pagan uses of the olive-tree, 'which has triple significance from the use of its oil for sacred anointing, for strength in the gymnasium, and for light,' Ruskin finishes by bidding his readers, 'above and beyond all, think how strange it is that the chief Agonia of humanity, and the chief giving of strength from heaven for its fulfilment, should have been under its night shadow in Palestine.'—Queen of the Air, sec. 38.

It was when bowed down beneath this internal conflict that Dante, one day, wandering across the mountains of Lunigiana, knocked at the gate of the monastery of Santa Croce del Corvo. The monk who opened it read at a single glance all the long history of misery on the pale thin face of the stranger. 'What do you seek here?' said he. Dante gazed around, with one of those looks in which the soul speaks, and slowly replied, 'Peace,' Pacem. There is in this scene something that leads our thoughts up to the eternal type of all martyrs of genius and love, praying to His Father, to the Father of All, upon the Mount of Olives, for peace of soul and strength for the sacrifice.—From MAZZINI's essay on The Minor Works of Dante.

HERE was a great beautiful chamber for him! And what better bed than God's heather! What better canopy than God's high star-studded night, with its airy curtains of dusky darkness! Was it not in this very chamber that Jacob had his vision of the mighty stair leading up to the gate of heaven? Was it not under such a roof that Jesus spent His last nights on earth? For comfort and protection he sought no human shelter, but went out into His Father's house—out under His Father's heaven! The small and narrow were not to Him the safe, but the wide and open. Thick walls cover men from the enemies they fear; the Lord sought space. There the angels come and go more freely than where roofs gather distrust.—G. MACDONALD in the third chapter of Donald Grant.

THE MESSAGE OF OLIVET

'They went out into the Mount of Olives.'—MARK XIV. 26.

OLIVET took its name from the olive-trees which grew in luxuriant abundance upon its slopes. The Jews also called it the Mountain of Three Lights.

Strangely enough, too, the oil obtained from the olive-trees had, in ancient time, a triple significance—that of sacredness, strength, and light. More important still is the truth, as Ruskin puts it, 'that the chief Agonia of humanity, and the chief giving of strength from heaven for its fulfilment' was worked out under the night shade of the olives. For Christ's agony in the garden has endowed the human race with entirely new ideas of sacredness, strength, and light.

I. Sacredness.—The oil from the olive-trees was used for purposes of sacred anointing. Christ's agony under the olives bequeathed to men a fresh and revolutionary conception of the inspiring sacredness of the human soul. Since Christ in His matchless sorrow raised to His lips the brimming cup of man's iniquity, we may rest assured that each one of us is of the greatest value to Him. The intensity of His Passion is the measure, on the one hand, of man's sin—on the other hand, of the greatness of redeeming love. And the revelation of that love bequeathed a new conception of the sacredness of life. Suffering is then seen to be the refining process—the method by which the sacred life finds its highest realization.

II. Strength.—A second use for the oil was found in the gymnasiums. Hence the olive-tree became also an emblem of strength.

But how does the agony of Christ convey a message of strength? Never was there such a wrestling in prayer as in the garden, and never was there such a victory won. And it conveys a message of strength to us because it reveals the unlimited resources that await the beseechings of prayer. Christ therefore has shown us, where, and how, to obtain strength in our Gethsemane trials, by Himself leading us to the supreme source of all power. Your season of anguish is your period of opportunity.

III. Light.—The oil procured from the olive-trees was also used for purposes of illumination. The oil for the Temple lamps was brought from the Mount of Olives. Hence the olive-trees became also an emblem of light. But how does that awful gloom of the agony suggest a lesson in light? I think it is in this wise. When the surging multitude invaded the sanctuary of the Master's devotions, and the profane signal of Judas had been given, Jesus stepped forth and confronted the throng. Then we read 'They went backward and fell to the ground'. What caused the retreat? It was the sudden vision of that face, gleaming with the pure light of heaven. The faces of men who walk and talk with God are lit up with the glowing reflection of Divine beauty.—W. GILBERT, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII. 1907, p. 100.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 26.—R. J. Campbell, Sermons Addressed to Individuals, p. 23. J. Baines, Twenty Sermons, p. 125. XIV. 27-31.—W. H. Simcox, The Cessation of Prophecy, p. 259. XIV. 29.—C. G. Lang, Church Times, vol. xvi. 1901, p. 25; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lx. 1901, p. 4.

'Thou shalt deny Me thrice.'—MARK XIV. 30.

HE who tells a lie is not sensible how great a task he undertakes; for he must be forced to invent twenty more to maintain that one.—SWIFT.

THE moment we cross the primitive border of equity, all things seem to fail us; one falsehood gives rise to a hundred, and treachery returns to us through a thousand channels.—MAETERLINCK.

'He spake exceeding vehemently, If I must die with Thee, I will not deny Thee. And in like manner also said they all.'—MARK XIV. 31.

IN his Microcosmography Earle describes a staid man as 'one that thinks what he does, and does what he says, and foresees what he may do before he purposes. One whose 'If I can' is more than another's assurance; and his doubtful tale before some men's protestations: that is not too hasty to say after others.

RELIGIOUS EMOTION

'But he spake the more vehemently, If I should die with Thee, I will not deny Thee in any wise.'—MARK XIV. 31.

LET us not be content with saying, 'Lord, Lord,' without 'doing the thing which He says'. The husbandman's son who said, 'I go, sir,' yet went not to the vineyard, gained nothing by his fair words. One secret act of self-denial, one sacrifice of inclination to duty, is worth all the mere good thoughts, warm feelings, passionate prayers, in which idle people indulge themselves. It will give us more comfort on our death-bed to reflect on one deed of self-denying mercy, purity, or humility, than to recollect the shedding of many tears, and the recurrence of frequent transports, and much spiritual exultation. Those latter feelings come and go; they may or may not accompany hearty obedience; they are never tests of it; but good actions are the fruits of faith, and assure us that we are Christ's; they comfort us as an evidence of the Spirit working in us. By them we shall be judged at the last day; and though they have no worth in themselves, by reason of that infection of sin which gives its character to everything we do, yet they will be accepted for His sake, who bore the agony in the garden, and suffered as a sinner on the Cross.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 31.—J. H. Newman, Parochial and Plain Sermons, vol. i. p. 177. XIV. 32-42.—J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 177. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 187. XIV. 37.—Ibid. p. 194. XIV. 38.—Reuben Thomas, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 342. XIV. 41.—J. Addison Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 305. J. L. Fraser, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 408. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Blessed Sacrament, pp. 103, 113, 124, 133, 138. XIV. 42; XV. 41.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 232. XIV. 43-54. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 203.

'Judas . . . kissed Him.'—MARK XIV. 45.

THE deed of Judas has been attributed to far-reaching views, and the wish to hasten his Master's declaration of Himself as the Messiah. Perhaps—I will not maintain the contrary—Judas represented his wishes in this way, and felt justified in his traitorous kiss; but my belief that he deserved, metaphorically speaking, to be where Dante saw him, at the bottom of the Malebolge, would not be the less strong because he was not convinced that his action was detestable. I refuse to accept a man who has the stomach for such treachery as a hero impatient for the redemption of mankind and for the beginning of a reign when the kisses shall be those of peace and righteousness.—GEORGE ELIOT in Theophrastus Such.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 46.—C. Stanford, The Evening of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 191. XIV. 46, 47.—W. M. Taylor, The Miracles of Our Saviour, p. 426.

'They all forsook Him, and fled.'—MARK XIV. 50.

CHARLES LAMB, in his essay on The South-Sea House, describes the accountant, John Tipp, as endowed by nature 'with a sufficient measure of the principle of self-preservation. Tipp never mounted the box of a stage-coach in his life; or leaned against the rail of a balcony; or walked upon the ridge of a parapet; or looked down a precipice; or let off a gun; or went upon a water-party; or would willingly let you go, if he could have helped it; neither was it recorded of him that for lucre, or for intimidation, he ever forsook friend or principle.'

'This life was to Johnson, and to almost all the earnest thinkers of his time, unhappy in itself—a schoolhouse where the rod was ever active. But in its unhappiness Johnson found no power that could overthrow his faith. To him this world was but a place of education for the happiness that would be to the faithful in the world to come. There was a great dread for him in the question, who shall be found faithful?—PROFESSOR HENRY MORLEY.

A CERTAIN YOUNG MAN

'And they all forsook Him, and fled. And there followed Him a certain young man, having a linen cloth cast about his naked body; and the young men laid hold on Him: and he left the linen cloth, and fled from them naked.'—MARK XIV. 50-52.

'Who was this young man?' A good many guesses have been made. Some think that he was only an ordinary bystander who had nothing to do with Jesus. Some have thought it was the owner of the garden himself, who, sleeping hard by, heard the noise and tumult, and hurried out in haste to see what it was all about. Others say it may have been Lazarus of Bethany. The most likely guess is that it was the Evangelist, John Mark.

I. Let us think first of the young man as simply being an ordinary bystander, curious as to the cause of the disturbance, and thus showing greater bravery than our Lord's own followers by hovering on the outskirts of the crowd. It is an instance of the courage of curiosity. Now curiosity as to things unlawful and forbidden is, we need hardly say, wrong and sinful, and the courage that may spring from it is a thing not to be desired. But pass to a higher plane where all is purged, leave the mere animal, and think rather of the spiritual, and we shall find something corresponding to the courage of curiosity, which is higher and nobler both in scope and aim than that could ever be, but yet something which seems to develop quite naturally from it, and this is surely the fortitude of faith. As curiosity brings out brute courage, so does faith bring out that true fortitude which is indeed a Christian virtue. Could the certain young man's curiosity only have become faith in Jesus, then the little courage which he showed might have passed into such fortitude as would have led him even to the Cross itself, and if the disciples had possessed that faith in Jesus which, after all their advantages they should have gained, they would not have turned cowards and fled when danger came.

II. If the 'certain young man' were St. Mark, or some other one of the friends of Jesus, we have a lesson which should come home with especial force to us professing Church people. All the disciples fled, this unknown friend remained at any rate for a short time behind. How often, alas! do we see the same thing happening now. The professing Christian, it may be the regular communicant, who ought to stand up bravely for what is just and true, is put to shame by the man who makes no Christian profession, but whose actions are so clearly good. Why is it? A passage from the late Mr. Holden's book, The Holy Ghost the Comforter, supplies the answer. The reason is because Christians forget to use the gift of Ghostly strength. Look at the disciples who now fled and forsook their Lord, and call them cowards if you will, but look a few weeks later at these same men, look at them after Pentecost, and what a change we find. What has wrought the change? There is only one answer: the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in the Upper Room. And all through the history of the Church you will find the same thing true. The cross is borne, the temptation is overcome, the victory is won, the crown is gained, because men have learnt to trust in a power greater than their own, the gift of Ghostly strength.—W. V. MASON, Short Addresses for Holy Week, p. 20.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 50-52.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. liii. No. 3023. XIV. 51, 52.—B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 146. XIV. 53.—C. Stanford, The Evening of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 216. J. Baines, Twenty Sermons, p. 107. XIV. 55-55.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 211.

STOPPING PLACES IN EVIDENCE

'What need we any further witnesses?'—MARK XIV. 63.

LET us take this in a way that is not usually taken; let us regard the question as equal to: Why not stop the case here? why add to the edifice? That is an illustration of what occurs in our own day in many a legal instance; the judge inquires whether the jury cares to proceed any further in the matter, and the jury notifies to the judge that they have heard enough, they have made up their minds, and so far as they are concerned they wish an end to be put to the case. I have thought that this might well apply to Christ and His Gospel, the question being asked, not with a view to the condemnation of Christ, but with a view to His being accredited and glorified as the Saviour of the world. Why call any more witnesses? why publish any more volumes of apologetics? is not the case proved? why add to the witness, the testimony, and the vindication? I think Jesus Christ is entitled to have this question asked.

The subject is the stopping places in Christian evidences. What further need have we? why go on with the case? may it not be well settled at this point?

I. Apply that inquiry to the whole range of Christian thought. Apply it to the Bible.

Let us turn the high priest's question the other way, and if men will only be faithful to their own spiritual apprehension and appreciation of the Bible, and repay the Bible what it has already paid them, we shall terminate many a foolish controversy. I want Christians and Bible students to speak up for their Bible; do not make a secret letter of it, but say, 'This is the Book that helped me; whether it can help you or not I say not, but this is the Book that made a man of me'. More testimony, personal testimony, experiential testimony, and the case is established for ever.

II. Well, suppose it is, in the second place, the Gospel that is on its defence, where do you join the Gospel? One man says: 'I really cared nothing about the Gospel as an energetic and reclamatory force until I saw what it did in our neighbourhood'. What did it do in your neighbourhood? 'It made a new neighbourhood of it; the wilderness blossomed as the rose, and the wayside is as a garden of God.' Ah, how so? 'The Gospel was preached in its simplicity, power, and holy unction; man after man, woman after woman fell before its gracious power and accepted it.' And what became of them? 'Their very houses were cleaner, and their children were more attended to, and all they had to do was sweeter, wholesomer, gladder, diviner.' Well? and the man whom I am inquiring of answers, 'I could not resist a Gospel that has done such wonderful things in my own neighbourhood'. That will do; what further need have we of witnesses? stop the case there, declare what you have seen, yield to facts.

III. Well, what do you say about the effect of the Gospel upon heathen and barbarous countries? Marvellous, beyond all imagining. The Gospel has gone into a kind of hell, it has gone amongst people who have never heard of its existence, who have never heard of the Cross and the blood and the offer of redemption, and these men have been threatened, many of them have been murdered, and still the Gospel has gone on repeating its sweet, tender, redeeming story; and places that have been embroiled and bedevilled, places that have been next door to hell, if not part of its very centre, have become civilized, evangelized, and now there are schools and homes and churches, and the altar of God is beloved and adored, and the Cross gathers up into its grim symbolism all that is holy, inspiring, and blessing in human life. What further need have we of witnesses? None, stop the case.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 165.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 63, 64.—Gordon Calthrop, Penny Pulpit, No. 798, vol. xiv. p. 82. XIV. 64.—R. Winterbotham, Sermons Preached in Holy Trinity Church, Edinburgh, p. 175. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1643. XIV. 67.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 219. XIV. 68.—C. Jerdan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 387. XIV. 69, 75.—G. Jackson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 284. XIV. 71.—T. H. Archer-Hind, Some Scripture Problems and their Solution, p. 19. XIV. 72.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2735. XV. 1-4.—R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 53. XV. 1-20.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 219.

'But Jesus no more answered anything; so that Pilate marvelled.'—MARK XV. 5.

THERE are few tests of a man's spiritual condition more searching and decisive than the temper with which he bears unmerited insult and railing speech. I do not refer to mere self-command, to the self-respect which forbids an answer in kind, and imposes an external calmness of manner on a swelling indignation within. . . . The question is not one of self-mastery under, but of superiority to, insult, which feels no anger or resentment at insolence or contempt; and this not from an abject or craven spirit, but from living on a plane of feeling up to which personal insult does not reach. This equanimity in no wise prejudices the question whether injurious language should not be reprov'd, and in some cases punished; as by a judge for contempt of court. We are only concerned with that serenity of spirit which is not touched or wounded by opprobrious speech, and all will admit it is a very rare gift.—MR. CORRIE MORISON'S Service of Man, III.

'But the chief priests stirred up the multitude, that he should rather release Barabbas unto them.'—MARK XV. 11.

A CERTAIN People, once upon a time, clamorously voted by overwhelming majority 'Not he; Barabbas! not he! Him, and what He is, and what He deserves, we know well enough; a reviler of the chief priests and sacred chancery wigs; a seditious heretic, physical force chartist, and enemy of His country and mankind: To the gallows and the cross with Him! Barabbas is our man; Barabbas! we are for Barabbas!' They got Barabbas;—have you well considered what a fund of purblind obduracy, of opaque flunkeyism grown truculent and transcendent; what an eye for the phylacteries, and want of eye for the eternal noblenesses; sordid loyalty to the prosperous semblances, and high treason against the supreme Fact, such a vote betokens in these natures? For it was the consummation of a long series of such; they and their fathers had long kept voting so. A singular People, who could both produce such Divine men, and then could so stone and crucify them; a People terrible from the beginning! Well, they got Barabbas; and they got, of course, such guidance as Barabbas and the like of him could give them; and, of course, they stumbled ever downwards and devilwards, in their truculent, stiff-necked way.—CARLYLE, Latter-day Pamphlets, 1.

REFERENCES.—XV. 13.—J. H. Jelleit, The Elder Son, p. 141. XV. 15.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 266. W. J. Knox-Little, Sunlight and Shadow, p. 242. XV. 15-20.—C. Stanford, The Evening of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 239. XV. 15-39.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2443.

'And the men that held Jesus mocked Him and smote Him.'—MARK XV. 19.

FROUDE, in describing Newman's preaching at Oxford, tells how once he 'described closely some of the incidents of our Lord's Passion; he then paused. For a few moments there was a breathless silence. Then, in a low, clear voice, of which the faintest vibration was audible in the farthest corner of St. Mary's, he said, "Now, I bid you recollect that He to Whom these things were done was Almighty God". It was as if an electric stroke had gone through the church, as if every person present understood for the first time the meaning of what he had all his life been saying. I suppose it was an epoch in the mental history of more than one of my Oxford contemporaries.'

REFERENCE.—XV. 20, 21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1683.

SIMON THE CYRENIAN

'They compelled one Simon a Cyrenian, who passed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear His cross.'—MARK XV. 21.

I. The greatness of trifles. If he had started five minutes earlier or later, his whole life would have been different.

II. The blessedness and honour of helping Jesus Christ. Let us share His shame and help in carrying out the purposes for which the cross was borne.

III. The perpetual recompense and record of humblest Christian work.

IV. The blessed results of contact with the suffering Christ. We suppose that he yielded to the soul-conquering power of Christ. He was 'the father of Alexander and Rufus'.—ALEXANDER MACLAREN, Contemporary Pulpit, vol. 1. p. 378.

SIMON OF CYRENE

'And they compel one Simon a Cyrenian, who passed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear His cross.'—MARK XV. 21.

THERE is more than a picture here, there is a parable for the soul. Let us understand not only the honour of the deed, but its blessedness. No one can ever do for Jesus precisely what Simon did. And yet in spirit, in the words and deeds of our daily lives, and pre-eminently in the greater hours of trial and sorrow, what we are called upon to do is this very thing—to walk in the way after Jesus, and to carry His cross.

I. First: Mark the greatness of the service Simon did for Jesus. As often as our thoughts are true and our love to Jesus rises in flood, we all have a blameless envy of those who did Him service. We know no distinction to compare with theirs. The women who ministered to Him; Martha, who made Him a supper; Mary, who poured her spikenard over His head; Joseph, who gave Him a grave, stand out above all the benefactors of men. All the pre-eminences and attainments of time are less than vanity compared to theirs. But if you will give rank to the services rendered to Jesus, if you will pitch upon the greatest deed done for Him—next to that supreme office of the woman who nursed Him in her bosom and gave Him suck at her breasts—easily first of all is this deed of Simon in bearing His cross.

To this day the greatest service to be done for Christ is to carry His cross.

II. Mark, in the second place, the greatness of Simon's reward. Christ never allowed any honour paid to Him, or any service done to Him to pass unrewarded. When a village girl asked Him to her wedding feast, He turned the water into wine. When a humble home offered Him hospitality on the Sabbath Day, He touched its mistress, and expelled her fever. When a Samaritan gave Him a draught from the well, He gave her to drink of the Living Water. When a poor, abandoned, city waif stooped to kiss His feet, He sent her out with a blessing of peace. No cup of cold water given to Christ ever lost its reward. And this pre-eminent service done by Simon enjoyed its great reward.

What was that reward? It was the deepest desire of his heart. Perhaps you say it was his own salvation. There is little doubt that he became Christ's disciple. It would have been contrary, both to nature and to grace, that any man should come so near Jesus, and should do so much for Him, and not be called into His kingdom. But as I read the Evangelists, I conceive that Simon's reward was greater than the saving of his own soul. It was the answer of his most instant and constant and urgent prayers. Away in Cyrene this pilgrim to the Holy City had left two little sons, and as he looked upon them, exiles from the land of Israel, as he taught them the fear of the God of Jacob, the very passion of his heart was distilled into prayer, that they might grow in the faith and obedience of God. Christ saw the names Rufus and Alexander graven on Simon's heart. And the great reward was given to Simon of seeing both his sons known and loved and honoured in the Church of Christ. As I read a father's heart, I do not know whether he was prouder of the deed done for Jesus, or of the holy fame of being the father of Alexander and Rufus.

III. Mark, in the third place, the greatness of Simon's opportunity. That Simon should have been coming into the city as Jesus was coming out might be called a strange coincidence. It was more. It was the predestination of God. That was the predestined moment when Simon's opportunity came to him. It was the moment when he was compelled to be alone with Christ. It was a golden opportunity. How Simon used it we can do more than guess. He might have struggled, like a galled ox, burning with deep resentment at the wrong done to him. He might have carried off his contumely with a bravado which would have appealed to the humour of the crowd. But this devout pilgrim had a spirit prepared for another way. He was precisely the man to profit by being alone with Jesus. We dare not say that any unreported words, or soft whisper, passed from Jesus to Simon. But we can be sure that Jesus turned and looked on Simon—a look of human gratitude and of Divine compassion, and of irresistible appeal. He could not resist the Divine look. Simon saw, on the way to Calvary, the light of the knowledge of the glory of God revealed in the face of Jesus Christ. No man ever saw the face of God and lived. And as Simon looked into the face of Christ, the old nature died within him, and he knew the Lord.—W. M. Clow, The Day of the Cross, p. 157.

REFERENCES.—XV. 21.—E. B. Spiers, A Present Advent, p. 192. R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 392. J. Durran, ibid. vol. lvi. 1899, p. 6. J. Burns, ibid. vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 211. C. Stanford, The Evening of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 313. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 237. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxi. No. 1853. XV. 21-39.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 228.

CHRIST REFUSING THE STUPEFYING DRAUGHT

‘And they gave Him to drink wine mingled with myrrh: but He received it not.’—MARK XV. 23.

THE intention of the soldiers was humane. Crucifixion was so lingering and painful that it was customary thus to deaden the consciousness of the criminal.

I. What was the Saviour's Condition at that Moment?—Intense anguish of soul combined with physical suffering.

Christ's nature was peculiarly sensitive.

The sorrow at Gethsemane had already weakened Him.

Now His sorrow had reached its height.

II. Why did He Refuse the Proffered Relief?—

Not to awaken men's admiration.

Not to awaken men's sympathy.

1. Because His sufferings were by Divine appointment; not simply accidental. He would not escape the full force of the penalty which He had undertaken to endure.

2. Because He was unwilling to die without a full consciousness of the conquest which He was achieving over sin and death.

III. What Enabled Him to Dispense with this Stupefying Draught?—It was the direct result of His self-surrender to the Father.

He who gives up will, purpose, life, into the hands of God, may expect that God will be all in all to him.

IV. What Lessons does His Refusal Teach Us?

1. His true nobility.

2. Our own duty under trial.

‘The cup which My Father hath given Me, shall I not drink it?’

It is our privilege to accept the Saviour's love.

He suffered, died, arose, ascended to heaven, and pleads now for us.—F. G. Austin, Seeds and Saplings, p. 19.

‘They gave Him to drink wine mingled with myrrh: but He received it not.’—MARK XV. 23.

SEE KEBLE's lines on ‘The Tuesday before Easter’.

‘JOHNSON,’ says Boswell, ‘with that native fortitude which amidst all his bodily distress and mental sufferings never forsook him, asked Dr. Brocklesby, as a man in whom he had confidence, to tell him plainly whether he could recover. “Give me,” said he, “a direct answer.” The doctor having first asked him if he could bear the whole truth, which way soever it might lead, and being answered that he could, declared that in his opinion he could not recover without a miracle. “Then,” said Johnson, “I will take no more physic, not even my opiates; but I have prayed that I may render up my soul to God unclouded.” In this resolution he persevered.’

In Burnet's History of My Own Times it is related that of the regicides punished after the Restoration ‘the only one who died dastardly was Hugh Peters, a very vicious man, but a sort of buffoon preacher, who had been serviceable to Cromwell on several accounts, and a fierce instigator of the king's death. He had neither honesty to repent of his sin, nor strength of mind to suffer for it as the rest had done, but was perpetually drinking some strong cordial liquors to keep up his spirits or make him insensible.’

REFERENCES.—XV. 23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2443. XV. 25.—W. P. Balfern, Lessons from Jesus, p. 220. XV. 31.—R. Winterbotham, Sermons Preached in Holy Trinity Church, Edinburgh, p. 148.

FIXING OUR OWN EVIDENCES

'That we may see and believe.'—MARK XV. 32.

'THAT we may see and believe:' here you have a pack of men who are setting up their own standard of evidence. What a proud 'we' was that; what a blind 'see' was that; what an impossible 'believe' was that! Observe their line of reasoning: they charged Jesus Christ to do something of their own fixing in order that they might see and believe. They would arrest the universe in order that they might get a first-class seat upon any chariot that was driving towards the gratification of selfish conceit and desire. Were they so anxious to see and believe that they would call upon God to arrest the sun and the moon upon the hills of time? Certainly not; they were not anxious to believe, they did not want to believe, but they wanted to gratify a conceit or to satisfy a fancy or an ambition; they wanted to create a new anecdote, saying, 'We said, if He would come down from the Cross we would see it and believe Him'; and God sent upon them a great negative, a contemptuous denial. None can be so deaf as God. We must take care how we set up our own little schools of evidence and our small little bodies of apologies for the deity of Christ and the redeeming efficacy of His Cross.

I. We cannot stop at any one definition of evidence, even if God were to grant it to us. He would not satisfy us, He would awaken and provoke a still keener and fouler temptation.

The eye never saved a soul, the eye is a poor instrument at best; the human may probably be the very poorest of eyes in the higher classes of animals. There is a way which the eagle knoweth not, and there is a path which the vulture's eye hath not seen, and there are paths and ways and courses of development which no human eye can see; it is the soul that sees.

II. Jesus Christ never did respond to any test set by the enemy, set by anybody. He does not accept suggestions, He reveals truths. Christ never fell into an intellectual man-trap; He laid down the law, He expounded the kingdom, He spoke in the imperative; in the subjunctive or the potential He could not speak, He was free of all that limited and hesitant grammar. Did Jesus Christ accept the suggestion of the enemy in the wilderness? He said—what a philosophy it was that He spake in that grand retort—'Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God': a new conception of life, an enlargement of our limited view of bread, of substance, of tables and dinings. Christ in effect swept all these out of the way, saying, 'Man shall live by every word, every kind of method Divinely conceived and Divinely provided: away!'

III. Many have suggested short and easy methods of proving this and that. Jesus Christ never adopted one of them. They treat Jesus Christ as if He knew nothing about these things; whereas He lived before the universe lived. They seem to think that if He would only accept their ideas, their short and easy methods, all would instantly rise and follow Christ, and make the welkin ring with thunderous acclamation.

From the beginning man has had everything that was necessary to redemption and salvation. Once a lawyer thought not; he conceived the idea that the Divine revelation would be vexed by cross-examination, and he said, 'Master, which is the great commandment of the law?' Jesus answering said unto him, 'How readest thou?' The answer was given before the question was asked; there is no need for such questions, they have all been anticipated. 'Lawyer, how readest thou?' 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and soul and mind and strength.' 'Very good,' said Christ, 'I add nothing to it, there is no need to add anything to it; I came to see the law fulfilled, the written law turned into unwritten life. This do, and thou shalt live.' But the lawyer still thought that his plan was the best; so did they on Calvary, they said, 'O Thou that destroyest the temple and buildest it in three days, save Thyself and come down from the Cross; we would thus put Thee to the test; Thou claimant of the highest throne in Jewry, come down!' The suggestion was not accepted; it was like Christ not to answer foolish, frivolous, and conceited questions.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. VI p. 49.

REFERENCES.—XV. 33, 34.—J. Hunter, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 187. W. Alexander, Verbum Crucis, p. 65.

'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?'—MARK XV. 34.

IN the thirty-seventh chapter of Transformation, Hawthorne describes Sodoma's well-known fresco of the suffering Christ at Siena. 'It is inexpressibly touching. So weary is the Saviour, and utterly worn out with agony, that His lips have fallen apart from mere exhaustion; His eyes seem to be set; He tries to lean His head against the pillar, but is kept from sinking down upon the ground only by the cords that bind Him. One of the most striking effects produced is the sense of loneliness. You behold Christ deserted both in heaven and earth; that despair is in Him which wrung forth the saddest utterance man ever made, "Why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Even in this extremity, however, He is still Divine. The great and reverent painter has not suffered the Son of God to be merely an object of pity, though depicting Him in a state so profoundly pitiful. He is as much and as visibly our Redeemer, there bound, there fainting and bleeding from the scourge, with the cross in view, as if He sat on the throne of His glory in the heavens.'

TOWARDS the end of her life Mrs. Fry said to a friend: 'I have passed through deep baptism of spirit in this illness. I may say, unworthy as I am to say it, that I have had to drink in very small measure of the Saviour's cup when He said, My God! My God! why hast Thou forsaken Me? Some of my friends have thought there was a danger of my being exalted, but I believe the danger has been on the opposite side, of my being too low.'

THE CRY OF DERELICTION

'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?'—MARK XV. 34.

THE tragedy of the Crucifixion reached its climax at the sixth hour. The Blessed Master had passed through the outer circle of sorrow, and now the pale, bruised Form is lost in the thick darkness which surrounds Him. During the first hours our Blessed Lord reigns as a King—interceding, absolving, and commending His loved ones. Now a change passes over Him; His soul enters into a great loneliness. This cry shows that there was something deeper, something more awful, than the fear of death. He must taste death for every man, He must be made perfect through suffering; but the cry we hear from the cross was the cry of a soul which had been faithful, loyal all His life, but from Whom the conscious Presence of God had been withdrawn.

I. Do We ever Feel Forsaken?—Such days come to even the best of us—days of darkness, days of depression. But here is our comfort. When all seems lost in life, when our work never seems to bring success, when we toil without any recognition and without any reward, when there seems for us no comfort in our prayers, when there is no light to gladden our eyes, then it is for us to realize that because of that One's bitter cry which rang out in the darkness, Jesus is always with us because He knew what it was to be forsaken even by God Himself. So you and I may always know that when this darkness comes upon us we may of a certainty count, because of this bitter cry, that Jesus is always with us. Oh, let us cling to the cross for this our comfort in our time of darkness!

II. The Guilt of Sin.—And yet surely it must mean more than this, something deeper than this, for it reveals to us the guilt of sin. He Who knew no sin was made sin for us; He came to make an atonement. 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself.' What does it all mean? What do you and I mean by that word that is so often on our lips? Let me carry your thoughts back to the old Levitical days when the high priest once in the year made an atonement for the sins of the people. You will remember the ritual of that day. What did it all mean? What was the meaning, then, to the people who saw these acts going on? Surely that sin was something very awful and terrible in God's sight; that God could not look upon sin; that it must be taken right away, and until this was done the people could not approach God. We all feel its power, do we not? We see its stain. But how few of us recognize its guilt! We cannot think little of sin when you and I realize that it cost the best, the noblest, the purest blood, when we realize that it has cost the Blood of God Himself to take away that sin; that for one great atonement it needed God to come down and live our life, it needed God to be surrounded by the darkness on the cross, to live out His life, as it were, just for a few hours making that atonement, forsaken by God Himself. Can you and I think lightly of sin after that? When we are tempted to call some sins little and some great, as they are reckoned in our social life, let us realize what it meant when our Lord cried from the cross, 'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?'

III. The Punishment of Sin.—I think we have here not only the revelation of the guilt of sin, but we have more—we have a revelation of the punishment of sin. This one hour had loomed before Christ all His life. At this last dread moment we are shown something, only something, but surely sufficient, of what the punishment of sin really is. Our Blessed Master could endure all else but this. The thought of His Father hiding His face, and the thought of entering that darkness, was something which He could not contemplate unmoved. We are inclined—are we not?—to guess at the future condition of the soul; but after we have stood beneath the Cross, after we have heard this cry, we need not have any further speculation, for sin always means here and there separation from God. No bodily penalty, none of those mediaeval thoughts of hell which we are sometimes inclined to have in our mind, can compare with the awfulness of what it must mean for you and me for God to hide His face. Separation from God—does not the sinner know it now? Ah, but the sinner always has a feeling that he can turn to God when he likes; but to realize that sin will bring this separation, entire and complete, from God is the most awful thing that man could contemplate. To-day Jesus calls to us, 'Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?' nothing to us who stand by the Cross? Was there ever such sorrow, ever such love?

Let us turn with thoughts of devotion and thoughts of love to behold the Lamb slain as an atonement for sin, to look and live.

REFERENCES.—XV. 34.—Selected Sermons of Schleiermacher, p. 62. A. F. Winnington Ingram, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 276. A. S. Peake, ibid. vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 1. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 92. A. N. Obbard, Plain Sermons, p. 222. Father Bernard Vaughan, Society, Sin, and the Saviour, p. 211. A. G. Mortimer, The Spiritual Life in the Seven Last Words, p. 37. XV. 34-47.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xl. No. 2390.

MISUNDERSTOOD

'Behold, He calleth Elias.'—MARK XV. 35.

'BEHOLD, He calleth Elias.' They misinterpreted that last drear cry. They thought He was speaking to Elias and not to God. So at the very end, and on the Cross itself, Jesus was misunderstood.

I. I want to follow that misinterpretation into one or two spheres of the earthly life of Jesus, and I notice first that men misunderstood His motives. Think, for example, of His healing miracles—'He casteth out devils by Beelzebub,' they said. Or think of His eating with publicans and sinners. That condemnation spelled out love Divine, and they thought it was proof positive of guilt.

Men misunderstood the mystical and poetic speech of Jesus. They took Him very prosaically and literally when He only meant to suggest as music does, and so time and again they misconstrued Him. Take, for example, one of His early words, 'Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up again'. So, too, in the sad sweet story of the house at Bethany you recall how Jesus said to His disciples, 'Our friend Lazarus sleepeth'. They answered at once, 'Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well,' and Jesus, with a touch of pity at their dullness, has to tell them plainly that Lazarus was dead.

I think that Jesus is still misunderstood that way. There are men who love Him as these disciples did, and who are striving to serve Him in a life of duty, but they have taken the music of His speech, that was meant to suggest and to lead into the infinite, and they have built their arguments upon the letter of it, forgetting that it is the spirit that giveth life.

II. The world, then, misunderstood the speech of Jesus; but it also misunderstood His silence. And if ever the silence of Jesus was misunderstood, it was by Herod.

Is not Christ's silence still misunderstood? There is nothing harder for many a mind to grapple with than the apparent silence of our ascended Lord. It is not what God does, it is what He fails to do: it is not what Christ says, it is what He fails to say, that puzzles and perplexes many an earnest soul.

III. 'Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani,' and when they heard it they said He calleth Elias. Do you see the reason why they misunderstood Him? They had only caught a fragment of His speech.

There never was a time when Christ was more misunderstood than now, for the very reason that we find at Calvary. There was never a time when fragments of the Gospel were proclaimed with such assurance as the whole round truth. To take a part and think it is the whole is the sure way of misunderstanding Christ.—G. H. MORRISON, The Unlighted Lustre, p. 244.

REFERENCE.—XV. 37, 38.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. viii. p. 76.

THE ROMAN CENTURION

'And when the centurion, which stood over against Him, saw that He so cried out, and gave up the ghost, he said, Truly this man was the Son of God.'—MARK XV. 39.

ONE man, and one man only, is wholly competent to tell us the story of the death of Jesus. That man is this Roman centurion. It was he who sent his band across the brook Kedron, in the soft moonlight, to arrest Jesus. It was he who guarded Him as He was led to the house of Caiaphas, and then marched Him as a dangerous rebel to Pilate, and then to Herod, and then back to Pilate again. He overheard the strange parleying between Jesus and Pilate; he superintended the scourging; he looked on when the soldiers mocked Him; and it was by his lips that the message of Pilate's wife reached the governor's ears. At his word of command the glittering spears began to move along the way to Calvary; he saw the nails driven in, and then he stood with watchful eye and open ear, in the strength of his Roman discipline, and marked how Jesus died. I cannot tell you, and no man can tell you, the precise state of the blessed dead, but surely for all of us it shall be a state in which many things covered shall be revealed. And when the great multitude of the redeemed shall long to know the whole story of the last great day, we shall press round this Roman centurion, and he will inflame our hearts as he tells us how Jesus loved unto the end.

I. Of this man we know nothing certainly until he stands in the light of the dying face of Jesus. That he was a soldier assures us of an ingrained habit of obedience, a perfect courage, an unflinching loyalty, and an honest and greatly simple heart. That he was a Roman soldier tells us that he belonged to the most dauntless army the world has known, whose deeds of valour went back through an almost unbroken record of success through seven centuries. And that he was a centurion tells us that he was a man in middle life, who had seen service, and had risen through merit to his high command. No inexperienced stripling was ever appointed to a Roman post of authority. It may be safely said that among the centurions of the Roman army was to be found the very flower of honour and chivalry. The Roman Empire was already in decline; but, like every great organization, it had begun to die at the heart. And when the pestilence of moral corruption had infected the governors and counsellors of Rome, there were still to be found in its armies men of fearless truth, of fine courtesy, and of incorruptible purity. How the governors in the New Testament stand out in contrast to its centurions! All the four centurions are men of moral, even of spiritual beauty. Of one of them the Jews said, 'He loveth our nation, and hath built us a synagogue,' and Jesus said, 'I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel'. Of another, Cornelius, the record is that 'he was a just man, and one that feareth God'. The third was Julius, the centurion of Augustus' band, who 'courteously entertained Paul, and gave him liberty'. And the fourth was this centurion at the cross, who, as the slow hours of the day passed away, watched Jesus die, and in the few and emphatic words of a soldier's lips, bore to Him his confident testimony.

II. Now the question this man allows us to answer is what a man of a good and honest heart, with only a Roman's education, and with Pagan ideas, thought of Jesus when he saw Him die. He knew nothing about the life of Jesus. He was not even familiar with His name. 'This Man' was the word that came to his tongue as he looked on His head sunken in death. But as he witnessed the dying of the Lord Jesus, the Roman's contempt was changed into an adoration that broke out into great and memorable words of suggestive confession.

1. His first witness to Jesus is 'certainly this was a righteous Man'. It was the innocence, the moral beauty, the unspotted righteousness of Jesus, which dawned upon Him. He broke the stillness of that awful moment with his strong, soldier-like words: 'Certainly this was a righteous Man'. He had not learned the music of the Hebrew Psalms, but if he had, this wise and true-hearted man could surely have broken out in the fervent words: 'Thou art fairer than the sons of men. Grace is poured into Thy lips. Therefore God hath blessed Thee for ever.'

2. The centurion was arrested, not only by the character of Jesus, but by the manner of His dying. Jesus died as a hero dies. For as two of the Evangelists report, he cried: 'Truly this Man was a Son of God'. His primary meaning is that Jesus was plainly no ordinary mortal, no such man as he was himself, cast in a merely earthly mould, but, like the heroes who had done the great deeds of Roman valour, of the lineage of the gods. Such heroism in dying out-distanced all he knew, and he knew well the meaning of heroism. It was a soldier spirit who had witnessed that 'Never man spake like this Man,' and this fellow-soldier testified, 'Never man died like this Man'.

3. On his darkened pagan mind there fell an awe and a sense of having been in the presence of the Divine. He saw the darkened sky, he felt the vibrating earth, he was appalled by the last great cry, and he looked up at the cross, and realized that the Divine Being whom Jesus had called His Father had owned Him for a Son.

III. Now this is what the Roman centurion saw in Jesus as he watched Him die, and when we remember what he was in mind and training, we see that his confession was very great. It had the greatness of sincerity and of fearlessness. And yet, while we commend, we cannot but pity. We cannot refrain from thinking and whispering to ourselves, 'If thou hadst but known the day of thy visitation'. His eyes were holden. He saw in Jesus only what he had eyes to see.

1. The first defect in the centurion was his want of the sense of sin.

2. The second defect in the centurion was his want of a true conception of God.

3. The third defect in this centurion was his ignorance of a love which will die to redeem.

There are men among us to-day, after all the centuries of the light and the teaching of Jesus and His cross, who see no more in Him than was seen by this sincere and honest centurion.

These do not enter into the secret of Jesus. They never see 'the Lord'. What do they need to cleanse their eyes? They need exactly what this centurion needed. The only evidence which will move mind and heart and will must appeal to the conscience; and the only apologetic which will successfully plead the deity of Jesus must rise above all questions of criticism, must base itself on the history, and prove itself in that experience in which both scholar and peasant have a common ground. Toplady's 'Rock of Ages' is a more convincing and convicting apology than Butler's noble and unanswerable Analogy. One vivid sight of the print of the nails alone can evoke the rapturous and adoring confession, 'My Lord and My God'—W. M. Clow, The Day of the Cross, p. 299.

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHAEA

'And now when the even was come, because it was the preparation, that is, the day before the Sabbath, Joseph of Arimathea, an honourable counsellor, which also waited for the kingdom of God, came, and went in boldly unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus.'—MARK XV. 42, 43.

It is significant that all the four Evangelists tell the deed of Joseph. We can understand why it was so indelibly imprinted on their memories, and was deemed so worthy of record. The day of Jesus' death had been one long sorrow and shame. From the midnight hour in Gethsemane until Christ bowed his head in death, there had been the awful contrast between love and constancy and tender pity and holy sacrifice on the one side, and betrayal, denial, desertion, and derision on the other. But then at the close of it all, there is this brave and beautiful deed. It is a touch of tenderness after a day of unrelenting hate and cruel wrong.

I. But now let us look at the doer of this good work on Jesus. His mind and spirit are made very clear to us. Each Evangelist adds some revealing trait. Joseph of Arimathea was a man of means, of refined mind, and of high social position. He was a member of the Jewish Sanhedrin, and held in good repute among his fellow-counsellors. He stood marked out from many by his high and serious mind, his incorruptible passion for justice, his native goodness of heart. He wore all through his years 'the white flower of a blameless life'. He belonged, to use a pardonable analogy, to that class to which our country in the days of her struggle for civil and religious liberty owed so much—the class of high-minded, devout, patriotic, country gentlemen.

We are told one very revealing thing about him. 'He also waited for the kingdom of God.' The kingdom of God was the phrase into which had been condensed all the high hopes and holy ambitions, all the dreams of a better state, and all the visions of the reign of God among men, foretold by Prophet and Psalmist. To wait for the kingdom of God was to be one of that band of devout and prayerful men and women, who were steeped in the spirit of the Old Testament, who had sure faith in the God of Israel, who waited for the hour to strike when the Messiah would come, and the will of God be done on earth as it was in heaven. It was that kingdom which Simeon and Anna longed to see before death should seal their eyes; before whose narrow door Nicodemus stood and did not know it, or understand its call. It was that kingdom which poor, blinded, reckless Barabbas and his fellow-brigands sought to establish in their mistaken ungodly way. That he 'waited' meant that in the heart of Joseph there was a noble discontent with the corruptions and miseries and bondages of the times, and an unquenchable longing for the reign of righteousness, peace, and joy. As he passed through the land and remembered the great days of old, his heart was pained within him.

As he walked in the city and saw, as Jesus saw, iniquity infesting it, and the vultures of vengeance hovering over it, his mind was filled with brooding thoughts. And as he sat in the council and looked with his clear, honest eyes into the craft and chicanery of Caiaphas and his tools, hope almost died within him. What could such a man, with his shadowed spirit do, but join these who had lost everything but faith in God, who could only wait and long and pray for the kingdom of God?

Very naturally this man became Jesus' disciple. Like the iron to its magnet he was drawn to Christ. Like the flower to the sun he turned his face to Jesus.

It was this man, rich, cultured, of conspicuous social position, of holy and blameless character, with his mind already enlightened by Jesus, and His heart drawn to Him, with everything true and just and pure within him, rising up in a moral horror at the wrong which is being done, who stood under the cross of Christ. The events of the day had all smitten him troubled, questioning, fearful heart. And as he stood over against the cross, and heard Christ's words, and at last saw Him die, not only reverence, not only a hot moral anger, not only an afflicting pity, but a victorious and liberating faith and a passion of remorse for his past shrinking smote him, and forthwith—heedless of the scornful looks, and of the muttered taunts of scribe and Sadducee, 'he went in boldly unto Pilate,' and with the hunger of a man eager to do a service to his Lord, and to atone for days of lost opportunity, he besought the body of Jesus. And then, in his own grave, prepared for his own costly burial, with his own hands, unheeding all thought of defilement, he laid Jesus to His rest.

II. Now very plainly Jesus did more for Joseph of Arimathæa on the cross, and by the cross, than by all the words and deeds of His life. With him, as with every other man, the cross was a savour of life unto life, or of death unto death. Let us think of the deep and enduring spiritual changes which passed upon this disciple as he saw Jesus die.

1. The first of these was the perfecting of his religious character.

2. The second spiritual change which passed upon Joseph as he witnessed the cross was an enlightenment as to the use of his wealth.

3. The sight of the cross perfected his religious character; it enlightened his mind in the use of his wealth. It had a third effect, which was the root and cause of these two great changes—it filled him with a penitent shame.—W. M. CLOW, The Day of the Cross, p. 341.

REFERENCES.—XV. 42-XVI. 8.—W. H. Bennett, The Life of Christ According to St. Mark, p. 268. XV. 43-46.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1789.

'And taking Him down, he laid Him in a tomb.'—MARK XV. 46.

DOSTOIEFFSKY, in his powerful romance, The Idiot, describes two Russians stopping before Holbein's picture of Jesus being lowered from the cross, with mangled body, and traces of pain, wounds, and bruises on His limbs. 'I like looking at that picture,' says one. 'That picture!' exclaims his friend. 'That picture! Why, some people's faith is ruined by that picture!' He goes on to explain that it is a representation of death as a blind, implacable force, working its will on this grand, priceless Being, Himself worth more than all nature and all the earth. Scepticism, he argues, is started by the sight of this huge monster having power to destroy the Christ.

REFERENCES.—XV. 47.—R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 12. XVI.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2467; vol. xlviii. No. 2780. R. Stier, The Words of the Angels, p. 72.

'That they might come and anoint Him.'—MARK XVI. 1.

GEILER of Kaysersberg said on this text; 'If thou desirest, like the three holy women, to anoint the dead Lord, thou must anoint Him inwardly, that is, thou must remember how for thy sake God died and for thy sake was raised again; thou must be willing to do what thou knowest to be the will of God and pleasing unto Him, for this ointment is nothing else but thy resolve to do God's will and that of none other. If thou hast thus spiritually anointed Christ our Lord in His own Person, thou must anoint Him also in His members. . . . Thou must anoint the saints by giving them honour, by speaking of them, by contemplating their holy lives and by invoking them.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 1.—R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 12. XVI. 1-4.—A. J. Parry, Phases of Christian Truth, p. 268. XVI. 1-13.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 248. XVI. 1-14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2408. XVI. 2, 3.—A. G. Mortimer, Jesus and the Resurrection, p. 74.

'And they were saying among themselves, who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the tomb?'—MARK XVI. 3.

THE Israelites, marching up to the edge of the Red Sea till the waves parted before their feet, step by step, are often taken as an illustration of what our faith should do—advance to the limit of possibility, and then the seemingly impossible may be found to open.

But there is another illustration in the New Testament, more sacred and striking—the women going to the sepulchre of our Lord. With true woman's nature they did not begin to calculate the obstacles till on the way. On the road reason met them with the objection, 'Who shall roll us away the stone?' And faith itself could not help them, but love did. A bond stronger than death drew them on, and 'when they looked, they saw that the stone was rolled away'.

We may bless God that He can put into men's hearts impulses stronger than reason, and more powerful even than faith, such impulses that, if they are going to Himself, they shall find that He is able to do exceeding abundantly above all we can ask or think.—DR. JOHN KER'S Thoughts for Heart and Life, p. 101.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 3.—R. H. McKim, The Gospel in the Christian Year, p. 240. F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. i. p. 168. XVI. 3, 4.—C. Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lii. 1897, p. 21. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 300. XVI. 4.—W. Howell, Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 113. XVI. 4-8.—R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 63. XVI. 5.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 25. XVI. 5, 6.—Ibid. p. 274. XVI. 6.—W. P. Balfour, Glimpses of Jesus, p. 259. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 279; see also 2nd Series, p. 201. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Bought With a Price, p. 94.

'Go tell His disciples and Peter.'—MARK XVI. 7.

AFTER attending a Quaker's meeting in London, at which he heard Rebecca Collins speak, Locke wrote to thank her for the experience. His letter closes with the remark, 'Woman, indeed, had the honour first to publish the resurrection of the Lord of Love—why not again the resurrection of the Spirit of Love? And let all the disciples of Christ rejoice therein, as doth your partner, John Locke.'

REFERENCES.—XVI. 7.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 284. J. S. Mayer, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 318. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2060. XVI. 8.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 341. XVI. 9.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 302. J. Grierson, Scenes and Interviews with the Risen Saviour, p. 42. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 625. vol. xiv. No. 792. XVI. 9-11.—R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 93. B. F. Westcott, The Revelation of the Risen Lord, p. 15. XVI. 9-12.—J. E. Rattenbury, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 248. XVI. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2518.

OUR LORD APPEARING IN THE COUNTRY (Second Sunday After Trinity)

'After that He appeared in another form unto two of them, as they walked, and went into the country.'—MARK XVI. 12.

I. 'He appeared in another form.' If we only had eyes to see it, how many ways there are in which He appears to us!

1. He appears to us in the shape of the poor, for He was Himself so poor that He had not where to lay His head; and He will say at the end of the world, 'Inasmuch as ye did it unto them, ye did it unto Me'.

2. He taught His disciples by the flowers: He would teach us by the flowers also. 'Consider the lilies of the field.'

3. Our Lord has left us another lesson. 'Learn a parable of the fig-tree: when his branch is yet tender and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it—that is the Day of Judgment—is nigh, even at the doors.' All the beauty of the green leaves, and of the woods and of the flowers ought to make us look forward to that Last Day, which will be so terrible a day for all, and should make us ask, 'If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?' Yes, and they make us look beyond the Day of Judgment to the kingdom that is laid up for God's true servants hereafter. For see how we are told of the Tree of Life that bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month; and the river of the water of life, clear as crystal; and the utmost bound of the everlasting hills.

II. Our Lord may appear to us in a thousand different ways, may teach us a thousand different lessons, and yet, like these two disciples, our eyes may be holden, that we should not know Him. Why? Our Lord Himself teaches us. 'Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God.' If we are not trying to be like Him, purifying ourselves, as St. John says, even as He is pure, neither shall we see Him.

If we may see Christ, when we will, in this world, so also we may do work for Him, where we will, in this world.

III. 'He appeared in another form, as they went into the country.' But we desire, as St. Paul says, a better country: that is, an heavenly. And if, of God's great goodness, we are ever permitted to enter into that land, it will be indeed in a different form that our Lord appears to us there. Not in outward signs, but eye to eye, face to face, as a man speaketh to his friend. That will be the sight of all sights; that will be the happiness of all happiness.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. II. p. 9.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 12.—B. F. Westcott, The Revelation of the Risen Lord, p. 41. J. Parker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 264. J. M. Neale, Readings for the Aged (3rd Series), p. 103. XVI. 12, 13.—R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 387. XVI. 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. I. No. 2890. R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 408. J. Grierson, Scenes and Interviews with the Risen Saviour, p. 150. B. F. Westcott, The Revelation of the Risen Lord, p. 59. XVI. 14, 15.—R. Glover, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 292. XVI. 15.—S. Martin, Rain Upon the Mown Grass, p. 128. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 308. A. M. Fairbairn, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 305. J. Parker, ibid. vol. xlix. 1896, p. 177. J. Johnson, ibid. vol. lvii. 1900, p. 324. J. Shaw Banks, ibid. vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 347. Ambrose Shepherd, ibid. vol. lxvii. 1905, p. 297. F. W. Atkin, ibid. vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 284. C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 121. Phillips Brooks, The Mystery of Iniquity, p. 346.

THE EVANGEL TO CREATION

'Go ye into all the kosmos, and preach the gospel to the whole creation. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that disbelieveth shall be condemned.'—MARK XVI. 15, 16.

THE Gospel according to Mark is that which pre-eminently reveals Jesus as the Servant of God. It is interesting to remember that the book of the Old Testament which reveals the Servant of God is the prophecy of Isaiah. To that prophecy Mark made reference in the very first sentences of his Gospel; when introducing the herald of Messiah he declared that he came in fulfilment of the prophecy of Isaiah, which foretold the sending of a messenger to prepare the way of the Lord.

In the messages of the ancient Prophet there are evidences of his almost overwhelming sense of the polluting effect upon the whole earth of the sin of man. Perhaps this is most pointedly and clearly declared in the twenty-fourth chapter. When we turn to the Gospel of Mark we find that he chronicled the words in the commission of Jesus which reveal the fact that the ultimate purpose of His mission was that of the redemption and renewal of the whole creation through the salvation of individual men.

In our consideration of this aspect of the commission we shall again seek to discover the deposit, the debt, and the dynamic.

I. First, then, as to the deposit, that particular truth committed to the Church, for the proclamation of which she is held responsible. This is only suggested by one inclusive word, which, standing alone, is characterized by indefiniteness. The word 'Gospel' is inclusive, but it needs explanation if we would understand the nature of the deposit suggested.

What then is 'the Gospel'? It is the good news that the Lord is risen. It may be affirmed that this is a narrowing of the intention of the great word in this commission; that nothing is said of the teaching of Jesus, the life of Jesus, the cross of Jesus. As a matter of fact all these are involved in resurrection, and become parts of the Gospel because of the resurrection. If we only have the teaching of Jesus, we have no Gospel. If we only have the account of His perfect life, we have no Gospel. If we only have the Cross, we have no Gospel. All these become part of the Gospel because of its central truth, which is that of the resurrection. The deposit then, the essential and central truth referred to in this phase of the commission, is that of the actual resurrection of Jesus from among the dead. The resurrection of Jesus was the demonstration of His perfect victory over all opposing forces; and of the fact that His victory enabled Him to baptize such as believe in Him into union with His life.

If the first phase of the Missionary Manifesto was that of the absolute Lordship of Jesus, which the Church is to affirm and declare, the second is that of the risen Jesus Who is Renewer and Restorer of the whole creation.

This is the great glad news committed to the Church, and we have been in danger of minimizing the meaning of the Gospel. Our outlook has been appallingly narrow, and we have disastrously failed to see the application of the fact of the resurrection of Christ to the whole creation. Our failure to discover His meaning does not mean His failure to work His purposes out to final fulfilment. He is the risen Lord, and is therefore Master of death. He is also, therefore, Master of all the forces that spoil, and is able to renew everything that has been corrupted.

II. What then, in this respect is our debt? At this point the commission leaves us in no doubt. The words of Jesus are perfectly clear. 'Go ye into all the kosmos, and herald the evangel to the whole creation.' A natural reading of these words should immediately arrest attention by reason of the inclusive nature of the terms, 'the kosmos,' and 'the whole creation'.

By translating the former 'the world' we have been at least in danger of thinking that our Lord's reference was to humanity only. As a matter of fact it is a far more comprehensive term, which He interprets by the second of the phrases referred to, 'the whole creation'. To take the first term, 'the kosmos,' and to trace the history of the word, is to be admitted to the larger outlook. The Greek word kosmos originally signified an ornament, or something beautiful. It was a word used entirely in the realm of art. In process of time, long before the ministry of Jesus was exercised or these Gospel stories were written, the word acquired a more spacious meaning, and was used in reference to the whole universe, because the Greek mind came to an understanding of the fact that the universe is beautiful and orderly. Then again, as the Greek mind failed to grasp the truth of the spiritual, the word passed back into a more restricted use, and was applied to the material frame in the midst of which man lives his life. In the days in which John made use of it—and it was peculiarly his word among New Testament writers—it referred to the earth and the heavens enwrapping it, the heaven of the atmosphere and the heaven of the stellar spaces, that system of which our planet is so small a part.

III. We pass finally to the subject of the dynamic. This is no more clearly revealed than is the deposit, but it is as certainly involved. When Jesus said, 'He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that disbelieveth shall be condemned,' He suggested a response on the part of God to a certain attitude on the part of man. The alternative attitudes are described in the phrases, 'he that believeth,' 'he that disbelieveth'. The ultimate results are described in the words, 'shall be saved' and 'shall be condemned'. The dynamic phrase is 'and is baptized'. That refers to the work of God. No man can baptize himself, or be baptized by another. Essential baptism is baptism in the Spirit. Water baptism is symbolic. In the moment in which a man believes, he is baptized by God in the Spirit, and so into the resurrection life of Jesus, and therefore he is saved. If a man disbelieves, he is not saved, but rather condemned because he does not enter into the regenerate life, seeing that he lacks baptism in the Spirit. The suggestion of these words is that as we herald the evangel of the Cross we do so in co-operation with the risen Lord, so that when men hearing the evangel believe, they are immediately baptized into living union with the living Christ, and so come into possession of the regenerative forces which being applied, produce the restoration of creation.—G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, The Missionary Manifesto, p. 57.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 15, 16.—George Moberly, A Sermon Preached in Salisbury Cathedral, 21 July, 1872. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 573; vol. xv. No. 900. XVI. 15-20.—J. Grierson, Scenes and Interviews with the Risen Saviour, p.

247. XVI. 16.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 197. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2339. F. B. Woodward, Sermons (1st Series), p. 202. C. E. Shirley Woolmer, Church Times, vol. xxxix. 1898, p. 720. W. Page Roberts, Our Prayer Book Conformity and Conscience, p. 225. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. x. p. 153. J. H. Bernard, From Faith to Faith, p. 245. A. H. Bradford, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 17.

'And these signs shall follow them that believe,' etc.—MARK XVI. 17 f.

In his Development of Christian Doctrine (p. 441), Newman applies this passage to Catholicism: 'If it were a falsehood or a corruption,' he pleads, 'like the systems of men, it would be as weak as they are; whereas it is able even to impart to them a strength which they have not, and it uses them for its own purposes, and locates them in its own territory. The Church can extract good from evil, or at least gets no harm from it. She inherits the promise made to the disciples, that they should take up serpents, and, if they drank any deadly thing, it should not hurt them.'

For the use of this passage at the ceremony of touching for scrofula, see MACAULAY'S History of England, xiv.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 17, 18.—W. Robertson Nicoll, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 357. John Wordsworth, University Sermons on Gospel Subjects, p. 15.

HE ASCENDED INTO HEAVEN

(For Ascension Day)

'After the Lord had spoken unto them, He was received up into heaven.'—MARK XVI. 19.

It is most inspiring to read what it was that the Lord spake unto His disciples just before His Ascension, how that they were to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. But it is not of the Great Commission that we would think now, so much as of the Ascension itself. If we would understand its lessons aright we must read the Epistle to the Colossians: 'If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things that are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God'. Since Christ is in the heavenlies, since He hath risen in His glory, therefore, be ye imitators of Christ as dear children. Walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given Himself for us.

I. The Ground of Hope.—Christ's Ascension means that He Whose words we love, Whose life was love, Whose name is love, is now set in the heavenlies at God's right hand, far above all principality and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world but also that which is to come. It means this, and therefore in whatever aspect we look at it, it means a lesson of infinite hope; it means that He Who died upon the Cross for man is the Lord of man, and that the Judge of man is the Saviour of man. It means that, however deeply we have sinned in the past, in Him is power even on earth to forgive sins. It means that we can find strength in the present, because when He ascended up on high He received gifts for men, and He giveth His Holy Spirit to them that ask Him. It means that we can face the future without terror because His footsteps have illuminated even the dreary valley of the shadow of death; and since all this is involved in Ascension Day, this (a) forgiveness of the past, this (b) strength in the present, this (c) hope for the future, it were well for us, both as individuals and as a nation, if Ascension Day were more carefully commemorated, and if we dwelt more and more devoutly on that truth, 'He ascended into heaven'.

II. The Root of Faith.—But besides our hope, our faith must also depend on the Ascension of our Lord. If Christians dwelt more on the truth that their Lord is exalted on the throne of His Father's glory, they would have more of the calm and the quietness and the confidence of strength. How often have Christians gone rushing up in alarm to the Ark of God because to them it seems to be tottering! Is Christ denied? Is Christ insulted? Is Christ betrayed? Well, the Christian, however sorrowful his heart may be, will not lose his calm or his courage. He believeth that the Lord is in heaven where He sitteth, that He sees it all, and that because He is omniscient and because He is eternal, He, in His own good time, will shine forth again, and for that time Christians will humbly wait.

THE ASCENSION

'So then the Lord Jesus, after He had spoken unto them, was received up into heaven, and sat down at the right hand of God.'—MARK XVI. 19.

THE story of the Ascension of Jesus is given three times in the New Testament. It is given in the verse of my text, though candour compels the remark that the last eleven verses of this Gospel are wanting in the oldest MSS. and are probably in the nature of an appendix added to Mark's Gospel by another hand. It is given very briefly in the concluding verses of St. Luke's Gospel, and once again by Luke with more circumstantiality and detail in the opening chapter of the book of the Acts of the Apostles. All three accounts are marked by a certain reticence and reverent brevity.

I. The Ascension is the natural and inevitable completion of the Resurrection. When Jesus rose from the dead on the morning of the third day, it was not to resume the old life He had led before dying. You remember when Mary recognized Jesus in the garden her first impulse was to clasp her dear Lord's feet. She thought that now Jesus had come back to them from the dead, the conditions that existed before His dying would be restored also. But Jesus gently and lovingly corrects her. 'Touch me not,' He said, 'for I am not yet ascended unto the Father.' Mary's arms were flung in affectionate embrace around her Lord as if to retain Him, as if to say, 'You shall never leave us more'. But Jesus had not risen from the grave simply to resume His old life, however gracious and beautiful that may have been. He had risen from the dead in order to enter into glory. His reward for becoming obedient unto death was to be exalted, and to be given a name above every name. He only delayed His entrance upon this life until His disciples were convinced that He was not dead, but alive. He remained forty days with them; appearing now to one, now to another; now to two, as they walked together to a country village; now to the whole company of disciples in the Upper Room; and again in Galilee to about five hundred brethren at once. He showed them His hands and His feet; He talked with them, He ate with them, until the most incredulous were convinced, and even Thomas believed, and their doubt and despair had given way to radiant hope and dauntless courage. And having done that, 'He was received up into heaven, and sat down at the right hand of God'. What a day that must have been in heaven when Christ came back again, glorious in His apparel, travelling in the greatness of His strength!

II. When Christ left earth He was not bereaving His people. He was depriving them of a lesser good in order to bestow upon them a richer and a nobler. We have that on His own plain and unequivocal assurance.

Wherein does that expediency consist?

1. In this, primarily. Christ went away from His disciples in order that—paradoxical as it may sound—He might come nearer to them. He left them in bodily presence, that spiritually He might be present with them everywhere and at all times.

2. And it was expedient for us that He should go away in the second place, because He went away to take unto Him His great power and reign. The Resurrection of Christ proclaims that He is not dead, but alive. The Ascension proclaims that He not only lives, but reigns. 'He sat down at the right hand of God,' says the sacred writer. Now, the 'right hand of God' always means in the Scriptures the omnipotent energy of God, and to sit down at the right hand of God means to be clothed with all the energy and power of omnipotence. Jesus sat down at the right hand of God. He ascended that He might reign. 'Jesus sat down at the right hand of God,' and His disciples went everywhere. Christ in the place of power—indomitable courage in the hearts of His disciples; Christ on the throne—and twelve poor men, with an audacity that was magnificent and sublime, went forth to conquer an unbelieving and hostile world.—J. D. JONES, The Gospel of Grace, p. 134.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 19.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—St. Mark IX.-XVI. p. 312. J. Grierson, Scenes and Interviews with the Risen Saviour, p. 333. B. F. Westcott, The Revelation of the Risen Lord, p. 173. E. W. Attwood, Sermons for Clergy and Laity, p. 182. D. Donaldson, Pulpit Discourses, Berwick Presbytery, p. 90. XVI. 19, 20.—R. M. Benson, The Life Beyond the Grave, p. 616. XVI. 20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2467.

INDEX TO OUTLINES

Aaron's blessing, The, 127.
Abel, The undeveloped, 23.
Abraham, 37, 38, 43, 44, 45.
 — and Lot, a contrast, 40.
Absolute good, The, 517.
Adam and Eve—the knowledge of God, 20.
 — the child, 7.
Added years, 604.
Advent, 918.
Affliction, The furnace of, 710.
Age and youth, 267.
Agony, The word of, 980.
Ahas's rejection of God's mercies, and what it pictures to us, 771.
Aims, The blessing of unrealised, 293.
All Souls, 264.
Altar and the Temple, The, 290.
Alternatives, The, 977.
Always with God, 500.
Amos, The Prophet, 736.
Andrew, The call of St., 787.
Angels, Holy, 963.
Angels, Life of the, 814.
 — Return of the, 54.
 — The ministry of, 449.
Anger changed to compassion, 750.
Anniversaries kept in heaven, The, 443.
Answer by fire, An, 245.
 — to a great question, An, 334.
Antagonism, The law of, 161.
Anticipations, Earthly, 360.
Apathy, Civic, 671.
Apologia of the coward, The, 178.
Apostles, List of the, 849.
Apparently ridiculous, The, 332.
Appearances, 343.
Appointments, Divine, 719.
Arise, 842.
Ark in the harvest-field, The, 207.
Armour of God, The, 168.
Arms, The everlasting, 162.
Arrow of the Lord's deliverance, The, 268.
As the man is, so is his strength, 185.
Ascended into heaven, He, 1049.
Ascension, The, 1049.
Asceticism, The place for Christian, 830.
Aspirations, 404.
Assimilation of doctrine, The, 679.
Assurance in God, 375.
Atheism, 372.
Authority, 723.
 — of the king, The, 984.
 — One having, 834.
Awakings, The two, 376.

Backgrounds of life, The, 46.
Bacteria in the chalice, 111.
Balaam, 136.
Balaam's 'I have sinned,' 137.
Balm in Gilead, 655.
Banner, The sacred, 102.
Baptism, of fire, The, 780.
 — The final, 780.

Baptist, Preaching of the, 779.
Barabbas, 970.
Barter, The fatal, 666.
Be of good cheer, 842.
 — still, my soul, 399.
Beatitudes, The, 791-6.
 — illustrated by events in the Passion, The, 789.
Beer, or the digging of the well by staves, 134.
Belief, Unbelieving, 1018.
Belshazzar's feast, 712.
Benefits, Bundles of, 464.
Benjamin, Birth of, 61.
Betrayal, The, 957.
Bible, The, 4.
 — How to read the, 931.
 — language, The figurative element in, 33.
 — valleys, 296.
 — wells, 135.
Bird, The wandering, 528.
Blessing, of unrealised aims, The, 293.
 — on the storehouse, A, 158.
 — Showers of, 698.
 — The Aaronic, 127.
Blessings, Superabundant, 881.
Blood of Christ, The, 124.
Blunder of the builder, The, 482.
Boasting axe, The, 584.
Bones of Elisha; or the power of the past, The, 269.
 — of Joseph, The, 89.
Bow in the cloud, The, 35.
Boys and girls, A talk to, 273.
Brazen serpent, The, 134.
Bread in the wilderness, 1013.
Bringing the king back, 225.
Brook, Failure of the, 242.
 — that dried up, The, 241.
Brother, Keeping our, 25, 26, 27.
Bruisings, Prophecy of the, 21.
Builder, Blunder of the, 482.
 — of Jerusalem, 508.
Building God, The, 427.
Bunyan's application of an Old Testament text, John, 528.
Burden-bearers, Enfeebled, 302.
Burden of Egypt, The, 587.
Burial of Moses, Significance of the, 165.
Burning but not burnt, 75.
Business here and there, 249.

CALAPHAS, 965.
Cain and Abel, 22.
Cain, The crime of, 24.
Cain-worship, 23.
Cake of barley bread, A, 184.
Calamity that hurts not, The, 717.
 — The deepest stage of, 522.
Caleb, 131.
Call of Christ, 1 ne, 844.
 — of Samuel, The, 206.
 — The Divine, 581, 845.
Calm, The great, 841.

Canaan, From Egypt to, 100.
Care, The cure for, 455.
Carriion and the vultures, The, 939.
Cathedrals, Their use and abuse, 224.
Ceasing of the Manna, The, 168.
Cedar and curtains, 279.
Centurion, The Roman, 1044.
Change, The discipline of, 415.
Changes, Imperative and desirable, 142.
Character, Differences in, 86.
 — The element of unconsciousness in, 120.
 — the spring of life, 868.
Charity, The necessity of selflessness to, 633.
 — — spontaneity of true, 1014.
Chastisement and mercy, 749.
Child in the midst, A, 902.
 — Samuel, The, 203.
 — spirit dies, When the, 908.
Children, Becoming as little, 903.
 — Little, 903.
Children's friend, The, 1021.
Choice, The Eternal, 170.
Christ and nature, 823.
 — and the national life, 180.
 — and the Herodians, 926.
 — in the first Psalm, 364.
 — is God, 878.
 — our Master, 932.
 — The all-sufficiency of, 881.
 — Compassion of the, 1012.
 — The Desire of nations, 754.
 — — Ever-evident, 1010.
 — — Incomparableness of, 567.
 — — Misunderstood, 1007.
 — a perplexity, 973.
 — refusing the stupefying draught, 1041.
 — shrieking from the Cross, 961.
 — The Supreme claim of, 854.
 — — True Joseph, 41.
 — — unconscious service of, 975.
 — waiting at the gate, 563.
 — walking on the sea, 840.
 — with the wild beasts, 988.
Christian faith and modern thought, 928.
 — fruitfulness, 71.
Christianity a failure, Is, 871.
 — and wealth, 815.
 — The catholicity of, 925.
 — The reasonableness of, 831.
Christ's advents, 781.
 — authority, The springs of, 834.
 — conception of the Christian life, 798.
 — fame, The mystery of, 1009.
 — nearness to His people, 160.
 — selection, The principle of, 1028.
 — supreme way, 835.
Church a blessing in the world, The, 646.
 — A message to the, 789.
 — and social evils, The, 301.

INDEX TO OUTLINES

Church, The future of the Christian, 383.
 — — unshakeable, 889.
Churchgoing, On, 852.
City of God, The, 443.
Civic apathy, 671.
Clerical training, The moral ground-work of, 346.
Clouds removed, 615.
Collapses of life, The, 656.
Come, He said, 882.
Comfort of physical inferiority, The, 394.
 — Vain, 338.
 — Comfort ye! 606.
Coming of the Lord, The, 764.
Commandment, The first and greatest, 669.
Commandments, 102, 103.
 — Finality of the Ten, 150.
Commonplace people, 52.
Communion of Saints, The, 506.
 — with God, Moral effects of, 390.
Comparison, With what, 1000.
Compassion, Anger changed to, 750.
 — of Christ, 848, 881.
Compensation, 355.
Compensations, Dark days and their, 474.
Concentration, Religious, 442.
Conception of God, The true, 500.
Confession of Sin, 223, 727.
 — St. Peter's, 890.
Confirmation, 760.
Conflicting forces, 244
Contrition, 760.
Conscience, A personalized, 242.
 — Perversions of, 577.
 — The power of, 66.
Consciousness, The primal, 454.
Consecration, 287.
 — and expectation, 439.
 — of the commonplace, 278.
Considering, 367.
Contradictions of life, The, 422
Contrition, The way of, 669.
Controversy, 226.
Conversion, 734, 902.
 — The Apostle's, 844.
Cords of a man, 730.
Correspondence of the deeps, The, 403.
Courage, Child, 843.
Covenant, People of the, 149.
 — Terms of the, 150.
Creation, The, 1, 2.
Creator, The, 10.
Crippledness, Victorious, 602.
Cross, Fourth word from the, 978.
Cross and the throne, The, 914.
 — blazoned on the skies, The, 940.
 — Shadow of the, 673.
 — Words from the, 976.
Cry of the awakened soul, The, 945.
 — heart for God, The, 417.
Cup in the hand of the Lord, The, 430.
Curse God and die, 319.
 — turned into a blessing, The, 306.
DAILY bread, 816.
 — prayer, 395.
 — service, 278.
Daniel, 714.
Daniel's self-denial, 706.
Dark, After that the, 707.
 — days and their compensations, 474.

Darkness, to light, From, 757.
 — The bed of, 336.
 — treasures of, 616.
David, The character of, 214.
David's greater son, 'Great,' 930.
 — harp, 215.
 — music and its influence on Saul, 215.
 — sin in the numbering of the people, 282.
Dawn, At the gates of the, 6.
Day of the east wind, The, 595.
 — The first, 5.
Days that are past, 148.
Death in the desert, A, 164.
 — of Israel's first king, The, 218.
 — the gate of life, 375.
Deborah, 177.
Deceptions of God, The, 660.
Decision, The great, 244.
Deeps, Correspondence of the, 403.
Defeat under sin, The, 60.
Deliverance, A message of, 735.
Delusions, The genesis of, 648.
Denial, The, 907.
Dereliction, The cry of, 978, 1043.
Desert Place, A, 1005.
Desertion, The, 963.
 — 965.
Despondency, Remedies for, 398.
Details of life, The, 933.
Development, The twofold, 874.
 — Spiritual, 999.
Devotion, True, 673.
Devourers and endeavourers, 691.
Devout life, An outline of the, 339.
Dew and its influences, The, 732.
 — manna, 128.
 — the plants, The, 732.
Discernment, Spiritual, 885.
Disciple, Mark of the, 893.
Discipline, Of, 945.
Discontent of the times, The, 533.
Discouragement, 133.
Disheartened, To the, 402.
Dislike of the commonplace, The, 262.
Disobedient Prophet, The, 239.
Distinctiveness of the Christian life, The, 809.
Divine Acceptance, The, 950.
Divine call, 205.
 — fellow-ship, The first token of, 110.
 — power, Hiding of the, 753.
 — requirements, The, 745.
 — scrutiny and guidance, 501.
 — service a speculation, 491.
 — voice in man, The, 246.
Divinely girded, 616.
Doctrine, The assimilation of, 679.
Donec aspires Dies, Advent, 564.
Doubt, The sword of, 852.
Draw me, 559.
Dreams, 52.
Drink from the depths, 435.
Dwarf, Limitation of the, 125.
Dwell among your own, 258.
Dying to live, 905.
 — year, The, 446.
EASTERN DAY morning, 483.
Easy work, 692.
Eating of God's words, The, 658.
Egypt to Canaan, From, 100.
Elijah or Jeremiah, 888.
Elijah's disappointment, 248.

Elijah's farewell to Elisha, 254.
Elisha, The bones of, 269.
Emotion, Religious, 1037.
Emotions of a saint in heaven, 376.
Empire day, 307.
Encouragement to return to God, 147.
End of the Christian year, The, 765.
Endurance, the Christian's portion, 61.
Enduring trial, 317.
Enemy in the field, The, 873.
Energy, Divine, 875.
Enlargement of heart, 639.
Enoch, 28, 29.
Enthusiasm 996.
Enthusiasm of God, The, 664.
Environment, Response of the, 478.
Environments, Two, 982.
Envy, 586.
Envy's evil work, 971.
Ephraim and his idols, 726.
Equipoise of God, The, 542.
Equivalents, The law of, 545.
Esau, 50.
Escape, The wish to, 656.
Eternal and His habitations, The, 631.
 — God thy refuge, The, 163.
Eternity of God, The, 532.
Evangel to Creation, The, 1047.
Evangelization of the world, The, 24.
Eve the unfolded, 14.
Even from thence, 147.
Everlasting arms, The, 162.
Evidences, Fixing our own, 1042.
Evidences sealed and evidences open, 663.
Evil, The Divine coercion of, 431.
 — Genesis of, 1008.
 — Plea of, 990.
 — punishment of, 668.
Examination, Self, 958.
Expectation, 591.
Experience, Personal, 1003.
Eye of the soul, The, 819.
Ezekiel, The significance of, 694.
FADING leaves, 645.
Failure, 993.
Failure, God's pity for, 600.
 — Reasons of, 900.
Fair play? Does God have, 154.
Faith, 837, 887.
 — An act of, 590.
 — and character, 331.
 — Defenders of the, 1019.
 — haste, 597.
 — obedience, 909.
 — Anticipations of, 94.
 — in darkness, 765.
 — The expectancy of, 942.
 — leisure of, 597.
 — mustard seed of, 900.
 — obedience of, 31.
 — omnipotence of, 1024.
 — reward of, 847.
 — title for justification, 838.
 — true outlook for, 441.
 — ventures of, 913.
 — Vicarious, 902.
 — The victory of, 899.
 — to morality, The necessity of, 753.
 — tried and triumphing, 330.
Faithfulness, The fact of, 948.
Fall, The, 14, 18, 19, 21.
False standard, A, 728.
Family, Religion in the, 662.

INDEX TO OUTLINES

Far off, Yet nigh, 601.
 Fasting, The dangers of, 633.
 Father and his children, The, 467.
 Fathers and children, 406.
 Fear of God, The, 66, 316.
 — — man and the fear of God, The, 620.
 — The antidote to, 612.
 Fearing the Lord from one's youth, 244.
 Feast of tabernacles, The, 156.
 Feeding his flock, 697.
 Fellow-labourers with God, 180.
 Fellowship with the past, 257.
 Fences and serpents, 549.
 Fever, Life's, 839.
 Fewness of saints, 226.
 Fig-tree, The barren, 920.
 Fishers of men, 989.
 Flood, Story of the, 32.
 Follow Me, 789.
 Forfeited gift, A, 193.
 Forgetfulness, The Divine, 437.
 Forgive us our debts, 817.
 Forgiveness, 844.
 Forgiveness mingled with judgment, 461.
 — Nature and possibility of, 412.
 — The infinite, 406.
 Formalism, 935.
 Forsaking Christ, 904.
 Forty days, 108.
 Foundation, From the, 915.
 Free-thinker among the Prophets, The, 751.
 Friendship of Christ, The, 155.
 Friendships, Our, 295.
 Frivolous spirit, The, 922.
 Fruitlessness, 920.
 Fulfilment, 800.
 — Not destruction, the method of Jesus, 801.
 Full house, A, 260.
 Future all unknown, The, 167.

GARDEN, A watered, 634.
 Gehazi, 262.
 Genesis, The first chapter of, 356.
 — — Gospel of, 20.
 Gethsemane, 961.
 Giants, Great and small, 280.
 Gideon the humble, 182.
 Giving, 55.
 Gladness, The goodness of, 542.
 — — pattern of human, 400.
 Gleaning, The duty of, 197.
 Glory of God, The, 712.
 Go thou thy way, 724.
 God, Assurance in, 375.
 — fearing, Reward of the, 492.
 — in human life, 279.
 — is a consuming fire, 600.
 — of the frail, The, 467.
 — our father, 812.
 — the builder of the home, 491.
 — — character of, 372.
 — — giver, 42.
 — — irony of, 377.
 — — sole delight of the elect, 429.
 — with the judges, 175.
 — with us, 583, 772.
 God's answer to man's trust, 450.
 — bounty, 394.
 — cure for a hero's depression, 248.
 — dealings with men, 654.
 — deepest horror in sin, 516.

God's doings in the time of old, 405.
 — face, The dark line in, 117.
 — goodness to man, 397.
 — greatness and condescension, 369.
 — house, Delight in, 439.
 — — The glory of, 764.
 — inheritance in saints, 511.
 — inner circle, 448.
 — love for Israel, 732.
 — microscope, 502.
 — omnipresence, The comfort of, 498.
 — pity for failure, 660.
 — presence and God's rest, 115.
 — promises conditional, 204.
 — requirements, 155.
 — riddle, 529.
 — second best, 211.
 — two homes, 632.
 — will, On doing, 814.
 — word, The honey of, 378.
 — work for us, 425.
 Gold and onyx not enough, 12.
 Golden age, The, 744.
 Good and evil, The knowledge of, 18.
 — soil, 872.
 Goodman of the house, The, 1035.
 Goodness not good enough, 943.
 — of the Lord, The preventient, 382.
 — Preventient, 381.
 Gospel of the left hand, The, 341.
 — palaces, The, 437.
 Grace, Law of the Life of, 952.
 — of God to sinners, The, 750.
 — Preventient, 380.
 Greatness and condescension, God's, 369.
 — — littleness of human life, The, 69.
 — by service, 915.
 Green pastures, In, 385.
 Grief that implies Glory, The, 1015.
 — and silence, 320.
 Growing great ideas, 153.
 Growth, Three typical forms of, 453.
 Guests at Christ's Own Table, The, 993.
 Guide, The heavenly, 651.
 Guided by God, 386.
 Guiding pillar, The, 127.

HABIT, 657.
 Hands of the Lord, Let me fall into the, 229.
 Happiness, 163.
 Harvest-field, Ark in the, 207.
 Healing of the leper, The, 836.
 Hearing for others, 151.
 Heart, A bad, 659.
 — — new, 609.
 — — perfect, 290.
 — Enlargement of, 639.
 — purity, 794.
 Heart's obstruction to the hearer, The, 83.
 Heaven, The way to, 607.
 Heavens and man, The, 368.
 Helper, The one, 618.
 Hem of Christ's garment, The, 846.
 Heroism, 228.
 Hezekiah, 272.
 — and the brazen serpent, 271.
 Hezekiah's confidence, 271.
 Hiding of the Divine power, The, 753.
 High priest and the atonement, The, 122.

Highway in the sea, The, 433.
 — of holiness, The, 603.
 Hobab's opportunity, 127.
 Holiness, The highway of, 603.
 Holy and common, 123.
 — communion: The bread of life, 96.
 — eucharist, 246.
 — ground, 76.
 — Spirit, Guidance of the, 633.
 — things, On guarding, 827.
 Homeliness of Jesus, The, 559.
 Hope, A message of undying, 447.
 — The reason of, 674.
 House and its battlement, The, 157.
 — of God, The, 440.
 — — the Lord, The, 284.
 How long? 582.
 — not to pray, 191.
 — to die well, 333.
 Human coins, 924.
 — solidarity, 251.
 Humanity, The prospect of, 370.
 Humbling questions, 334.
 Humility, 220.
 — Some aspects of, 837.
 Hyssop, The bunch of, 231.
 I THOUGHT, 261.
 I will build My Church, 888.
 — — make all My mountains a way, 618.
 Ideal city, The, 704.
 Ideas, Growing great, 153.
 Image of God, The, 925.
 Immanence of God, The, 614.
 Immortality, Man's need of, 444.
 — The hope of, 926.
 Impatience, 856.
 Imperialism, True, 598, 628.
 Imprecatory Psalm, An, 475.
 Inadequacy of spiritual solitude, The, 303.
 Incarnate Son of God, The, 1032.
 Incentives to worship, The, 761.
 Incomparableness of Christ, The, 567.
 Indirect aim, Advantage of an, 294.
 Inferiority, Comfort of physical, 394.
 Influence, The gift of, 64.
 Inheritance of blessing, An, 101.
 Innocence, The state of, 540.
 Innocent's Day, 778.
 Instruments of God, Unlikely, 669.
 Interpretation, The ministry of, 354.
 Interpreter, The, 771.
 Interruptions of life, The, 784.
 Interviews, Unreported, 1000.
 Intruder at the feast, The, 923.
 Intrusion of the world, The, 938.
 Inventions, Their, 473.
 Investments, Wise, 629.
 Invisible Church, The, 507.
 — realities of the eternal world, The, 263.
 Inward truth, 413.
 Irony of God, The, 377.
 Is it nothing to you? 671.
 Isaac, 45, 60.
 Ishmael the outcast, 43.
 Israel, God's love for, 732.
 Israel's first king, The death of, 218.
 Issachar, 70.

JABESH-GILEAD, The relief of, 211.
 Jabez, 275.
 Jacob, 53, 55, 56, 58, 68.

INDEX TO OUTLINES

Jealousy, 23.
 — The Divine, 118.
Jehoiakim's penknife, 665.
Jehovah our Redeemer, 643.
 — Jireh, 48.
Jeroboam, The sin of, 238.
Jesus, beholding him, loved him, 1022.
 — charged with blasphemy, 966.
 — and Joshua, 772.
 — Christ our refuge, 140.
 — 'Lover of my soul,' 474.
 — only, 898, 1017.
 — the Saviour, 769.
Jews, The Old Testament a history of the, 431.
Jewish zeal, a pattern to Christians, 182.
Jezebel, The character of, 265.
Job, The book of, 360.
John the divine, Old age of St., 913.
Jonah's character, 741.
Jonathan, Character of, 216.
Joseph of Arimathea, 1045.
 — and his brethren, 62.
 — The bones of, 89.
 — the optimist, 65.
 — The trial of, 470.
Joseph's faith, 71.
Joshua encouraged, 166.
 — The character of, 166.
Joy of our Lord? What is the, 949.
Joyful sound, The, 444.
Judas, 1026.
 — Iscariot, 962.
Judas's 'I have sinned,' 969.
Judge the quick and the dead, From thence He shall come to, 897.
Judgment on Moses, 146.
 — Redemption by, 674.
 — Reversal of, 910.
 — The, 538.
Just and the unjust, The, 808.
Justification, 343.
 — by words, 809.

KEDESH, 650.
Keeping of the heart, The, 515.
Key of the house of David, The, 589.
Kindness of the Lord, The, 628.
 — The ministry of, 837.
Kingdom, Not far from the, 1030.
Kingdom of the saints, The, 708.
 — Substance of the, 942.
Kiss of the Prince of peace, The, 558.
Knowledge: Revealed and secret, 159.
 — through spiritual insight, True, 479.
Known and the unknown, The, 345.

LAMP, My, 487.
 — of heaven, The glorious, 440.
 — memory, The, 153.
Land flowing with milk and honey, A, 129.
Laughter and sorrow, 620.
Law of antagonism, The, 161.
 — equivalents, The, 545.
Lawfulness, True, 995.
Laws, The book of, 123.
Lead, Kindly light, 378.
League of Christians, The, 207.
Least, One of the, 954.
Leaven, Parable of the, 876.
Legs of the lame are not equal, The, 526.
Lengthening and strengthening, 627.

Lengthening the cords and strengthening the stakes, 326.
Lent, Temptations to sin, 751.
Leper, Healing of the, 836.
Lessons from an unfamiliar text, Some, 240.
Let me fall into the hands of the Lord, 229.
 — nothing you dismay, 450.
Leviticus old and new, 747.
Life on God's plan, 51.
 — The religious, 557.
 — — sum total of, 573.
 — — value of, 606.
 — — verdict of, 531.
 — transfigured. Its necessity for the Church, 566.
Life's discipline, 521.
 — unfinished tasks, 164.
Light, 3, 4.
 — and truth, 404.
 — in earthly darkness, Heavenly, 478.
 — obtained: light diffused, 637.
 — of other days, The, 764.
 — the Lord, The, 575.
 — shine, Let your, 798.
Lighthousefulness, The religious ground of, 416.
Lightning, 939.
Lilies, Human, 822.
Limitation and co-operation, 285.
Limits, 328.
Listening stones, 171.
 — to God, 410.
Little child shall lead them, A, 585.
 — lower than God, But, 371.
Living Christ, The, 138.
Long-suffering of God, The, 84.
Looking and not finding, 428.
 — for the coming One, 857.
Looks, Seven, 613.
Lord coming out of His place, The, 595.
 — in His temple, The, 373.
 — of hosts, The God of Jacob, 408.
 — our judge, The, 601.
 — will provide, The, 821.
Lord's prayer, Cosmopolitanism of the, 813.
 — servant deaf and blind, The, 613.
Losing the soul to save it, 895.
Lot's choice, 39.
Love and courtship, 49.
 — peace, The consummation of, 392.
 — to God—service to man, 928.
 — your enemies, 807.
Loving-kindness of Jesus, The, 865.
Lowering the sea, 270.

MAOR, Visit of the, 775.
Magnitudes, Mistaken, 934.
Maid of Israel, The, 261.
Making light of the Gospel, 922.
Man, A, 653.
 — good, 715.
 — after God's own heart, A, 212.
 — God and, 8.
 — succeeding man, 274.
 — The brotherhood of, 27.
 — first temptation of, 15.
 — origin and destiny of, 7.
 — real and the ideal, 370.
 — serpent tempting, 17.
 — unaccountable, 879.
 — ? What is, B, 368, 370.
 — with the measuring line, The, 755.

Manna, Ceasing of the, 168.
Man's schemes, 598.
Many called, but few chosen, 912.
Marks of a true man, Three, 747.
Marriage, 22.
Marring, The marvellous, 623.
Massah and Meribah, The lesson of, 98.
Material and the Spiritual, The, 1031.
 — to the Spiritual, Through the, 587.
May, The Prophet, 940.
Mediocrity, Useful, 947.
Meditation, The subject of, 409.
Melchisedek the uncannical, 40.
Memorable days, 504.
 — sights in life, 323.
Memory, On, 1014.
 — at the altar, 804.
 — hope, and effort, 435.
 — The lamp of, 153.
 — — religious uses of, 617.
Men of the world, 376.
Mercies of God, The manifold, 2.
 — It is of the Lord's, 675.
 — Remembrance of past, 53.
Mercy, Chastisement and, 749.
 — and not sacrifice, 728.
 — — truth, 389.
 — preferred to sacrifice, 845.
 — seat, The, 109.
Message of the book of Genesis, 2.
 — — — Exodus, 88.
 — — — Deuteronomy, 152.
 — — — Joel, 734.
 — — — Joshua, 186.
 — — — Judges, 176.
 — — — Leviticus, 125.
 — — — Numbers, 130.
 — — — Ruth, 199.
 — — books of Chronicles, The, 274.
 — — — Kings, 231.
 — — first book of Samuel, 201.
 — — second book of Samuel, 222.
 — Micah, 748.
Messianic consciousness of Jesus, The, 782.
 — watchword, The, 401.
Middle-aged, Perils of the, 449.
Might have been, The, 225.
Mighty to save, 642.
Mind, Directing of the Early, 1020.
Ministry and the masses, The, 809.
 — of angels, The, 396.
Minute philosopher, The, 668.
Miracles, 883.
 — Nothing but, 421.
Mirage and the pool, The, 603.
Missing one, The, 194.
Missionary, The first, 37.
Missions, Foreign, 1034.
 — Growth of the kingdom, 428.
 — Home, 24.
 — Promises and prophecies, 364.
Mistrust that destroys, 436.
Misunderstood, 1043.
Moments, The use of isolated, 117.
Money cannot buy, What, 347.
Moral consequences of single sins, 140.
Morality, The Distinctiveness of Christian, 1022.
 — Jesus' appreciation of, 1023.
More than human, 220.
Morning, The desired, 158.

INDEX TO OUTLINES

Moses, Significance of the burial of, 165.
 — The death of, 164.
 — — sin of, 132.
 — to Israel, The address of, 146.
 — smites the rock, 132.
Moulding of the vessels, The, 292.
Mountains, Bible, 489.
Music and religion, 512.
 — as a factor in culture, 512.
 — Prophetic, 286.
 — in the house of God, 52.
My beloved is mine, 563.

NAAMAN was a leper, but—, 259.
Name of God, The, 58.
 — and surname, 956.
Nameless girl heroine, A, 260.
Names of God, The, 82.
Nathan and David, 222.
National life, Christ and the, 180.
 — prosperity, The test of, 155.
 — repentance, 495.
 — safeguards, 168.
Nature, The powers of, 468.
Near-cuts not God's, 89.
Nearer, my God, to Thee, 55.
Negative side, The, 76.
New period, The portal of a, 432.
 — song, A, 457, 459.
 'No mores' of life, The, 636.
Noah, 31, 32, 33.
Not afraid of sackcloth, 309.
 — far off, 1030.
 — peace, but a sword, 853.
 — sufficient, 609.
Nothingness of this world, The, 896.

OBADIAH, a palm in the desert, 243.
Obedience, 213.
 — the remedy for religious perplexity, 400.
Obscure, exultation of the, 855.
Obviousness of the essential in questions of faith, The, 859.
Offence of the Cross, The, 622.
Offerings for the sanctuary, 639.
Old paths, 654.
Olivet, The message of, 1037.
Omer for each man, An, 97.
On the edge of the land, Afraid to go up, 131.
One thing, everything, 997.
Opportunity, The Passing of, 1034.
Optimism, 644, 984.
Optimist, Outlook of the, 698.
Outward business, 306.
Over-prudence, The fault of, 551.
Over-righteousness, 543.
Ownership, Divine, 688.

PAIN, The Christian palliation of, 850.
 — The endurance of, 976.
Palm Sunday and its lessons, 917.
 — The message of, 607.
Palm-tree, I said, I will go up to the, 568.
 — The, 452.
Pantheism? What is, 445.
Parable of harvest, The, 325.
 — in a miracle, A, 991.
Parables, Principle of the, 875.
Pardon with punishment, 460.
Partial exclusion of God, The, 249.

Partial truth, 144.
Passion, In view of the, 672.
 — of God, The, 642.
Passover, The, 87.
Past and present, 541.
Patient waiting, The, 944.
Patriotism, Christian, 496.
 — Imperial, 496.
Peace, The gift of, 583.
 — — mark for recognising God's, 592.
 — — reign of, 744.
Peaceful in the midst of strife, Kept, 592.
Pearl of great price, Parable of the, 877.
Penalty of hate, The, 313.
Penitent, Psalm of the, 413.
Pentateuch—Genesis, The, 619.
People near unto Him, 511.
 — of the Covenant, The, 149.
 — who think they have done no good in life, 594.
Permanence of spirit in the fleetingness of nature, The, 463.
Persecution, The blessing of, 605.
Personality, 992.
 — and power, 1001.
Pessimistic and optimistic views of life, The, 554.
Pharaoh, 83, 84, 85.
Pharisaism still alive, 1029.
Pilate, 967.
 — washing his hands, 974.
Pilate's wife, moral influence of women, 972.
Pillar, The guiding, 127.
Plants grown up in their youth, 506.
Play the man, 221.
Pleasant Land, The, 472.
Pleasure to affliction, From, 196.
Plural yet singular, 652.
Pollution of the world, The, 743.
Poor and needy, The, 693.
Possessions possessed, 739.
Poverty of spirit the other side of greatness, 791.
Power, On, 870.
Praise and life, 507.
 — Reasons for, 374.
 — The argument for, 289.
 — life of, 475.
Prayer, 1027.
 — A pattern of, 442.
 — and conduct, 714.
 — Daily, 395.
 — for middle life, A, 752.
 — of a patriot, The, 441.
 — Private, 811.
 — Simplicity in, 173.
 — The golden key of, 829.
 — — mystery of, 419.
 — — practical difficulty of, 721.
 — — reasonableness of, 829.
 — — spirit of, 715.
 — Times of private, 812.
Prayers of the Saints, The, 647.
 — that must cease, 144.
Preacher and his message, The, 138.
 — Requirements and difficulties of the, 555.
Preparation and power, 297.
 — for a religious life, The, 438.

Preparation, The spirit of, 943.
Presence, The abiding, 985, 987.
 — of Christ Jesus in the Holy Eucharist, The real, 959.
 — God's, 115.
 — of God, The, 42.
 — — — invisible, 600.
 — that never faileth, The, 986.
 — The real, 986.
 — shall enlighten the way, The, 115.
Present, The attraction of the, 50.
Presentation, 292.
Presuppositions of Christianity—The Old Testament, 799.
Prevent goodiness, 381.
 — — of the Lord, The, 382.
 — grace, 380.
Priest after the order of Melchisedek, A, 477.
Principle, The solitariness of, 309.
Proclamation, The great, 629.
Profit and loss, 1016.
Promising without doing, 921.
Prophecy, The cessation of, 767.
 — — supreme need of our age, The gift of, 767.
Prophet, A, 856.
Prophetic element, The, 90.
Prophets of righteousness, 573.
Proportion, The doctrine of, 934.
Providence, An ever-watchful, 313.
 — as revealed in the Gospel, A particular, 41.
 — or a temptation, A, 216.
Prudence of Christ, The, 621.
Psalm for the day, The, 277.
Public spirit, 312.
 — worship, 731.
Punishment, 919.
 — of evil, The, 666.
Purification, 758, 762.
Purpose in life, 301.
 — of God, The, 237.

QUALIFICATION and duty, 276.
Queen Esther, The story of, 311.
Question on the Cross, The Saviour's, 980.
Questions, Humbling, 334.

RACE not to the swift, The, 548.
Rachel the placid, 56.
Rain and the word, The, 630.
Rainbow, The, 35.
Reason of things, The, 545.
Rebekah the far-seeing, 48.
Recollection, 811.
Recompense, Just, 827.
Reconquests, 208.
Recreations and amusements, 113.
Redemption by judgment, 574.
 — The mightiness of, 438.
Refuge, The eternal God thy, 163.
Refused stone, The, 481.
Religion at home, 462.
 — for the entire man, 927.
 — in the family, 662.
 — made easy, 238.
 — mistaken views of, 81.
 — Natural and supernatural, 860.
 — of the threshold, The, 488.
 — Permanent elements of, 417.
 — Sincerity in, 858.
 — The irksomeness of, 128.

INDEX TO OUTLINES

- Religion, The office of, 786.
 — — perfect ideal of, 748.
Religious aspect of history, The, 148.
 — enthusiasm, True and false, 218.
 — excitement, The use of, 897.
 — life, The, 537.
 — solidity, 560.
Remembering the past, 145.
 Remnant of God's people, The, 586.
Remonstrance with his soul, The Psalmist's, 405.
Renewed confidence, 740.
Repent and return, 730.
Repentance, 400, 740.
 Reputation of God, The, 630.
 Requirements, The Divine, 745.
 Respectable sin, 936.
Responsibility for your brother, Your, 157.
 — of office, The, 696.
Rest the basis of character, 1006.
 — for God's servants, 725.
 — — the sufferers, 862.
 — — the workers, 861.
 — — weary feet, 862.
 — The soldier's, 505.
Return to Christ's love, The, 577.
 Returns, The two, 553.
 Reuben, 70.
Revelation, A Divine, 6.
 Revenge, The law of, 805.
 Reverence, Christian, 365.
 — The call to, 77.
 Reviews, The book of, 142.
 Revivals, Their necessity, 753.
Reward, The Christian's highest, 518.
 Righteous over-much, 543.
 Righteousness, The blessing of, 453.
 — — illuminating power of, 766.
 — — Lord our, 661.
 — — standard of, 13.
 River of God, The, 408, 420.
 Rizpah, 238.
 Rod and staff, 387.
 — that is in Thine hand, The, 79.
 Room, The large, 391.
 Royal kinship of service, The, 276.
 Rule, The Gift of, 948.
 Ruth, The book of, 423.
 — — Moabitess, 198.
SABBATH, The, 994.
Sackcloth, Not afraid of, 309.
 — The transfigured, 310.
Sacramental moment, A, 268.
Sacred privileges, Difficulty of realizing, 482.
Sacrifice, 895.
 — of God, The, 1028.
 — and song, 297.
 — of thanksgiving, The, 411.
 — without obedience, 138.
Sad, Making the righteous, 684.
Saint in heaven, Emotions of a, 376.
 — of God, A, 426.
 Saints, The weapons of, 911.
 Salt without savour, 797.
 Samuel the seer, 202.
 Samuel's dismissal, 211.
Sanctity and salubrity, The connexion between, 423.
Sanctuary, Jesus Christ our, 659.
 — of God, The, 433.
Sarah the steadfast, 43.
Satan in history, 13.
 Satan's wiles, 15.
 Satisfied, 625.
 Saviour and the Maniac, The, 1003.
 Saul and the witch of Endor, 217.
 Saul's hiding himself, 211.
 — 'I have sinned,' 213.
 Scapegoat, The, 123.
 Schemes, Man's, 598.
 Schism, The tragic, 635.
 Scriptures, According to the, 979.
 Sea to the city, From the, 473.
 Seal upon thine heart, Set Me as a, 570.
 Seals, Bible, 569.
 Seamen, A sermon to, 420.
 Searching of God, The, 497.
 Seaside sermon, A, 455.
 Season for Divine help, The, 57.
 Second mile, The, 806.
 Secrecy of God, The, 434.
 Secret of the Lord, The, 390.
 — — — Son, The, 860.
 — — — Jesus, 981.
 — — — Tranquillity, The, 399.
 — and the unrevealed things, The, 159.
 Security of insecurity, The, 415.
 Seeing and following, 917.
 Seeking God's kingdom and righteousness, 823.
 — the beloved, 564.
 — — Lord an immediate duty, 729.
 Seen all, 534.
 Seer and prophet, 209.
 Self-confidence, The sin of, 379.
 Self-containedness, 520.
 Self-deceiver detected, The, 924.
 Self-encouragement, The golden art of, 217.
 Self-examination, 958.
 Self-judgment, 223.
 Selflessness to charity, The necessity of, 633.
 Self-love—new version, 929.
 Self-mutilation for self-preservation, 904.
 Self-offering, The highest, 47.
 Self-reliant or God-reliant? 514.
 Self-respect and companionship, 210.
 Self-sacrifice, 311.
 Servant-Lord and his servants, The, 916.
 Servant, Qualification of a, 488.
 Service, Daily, 278.
 — The call to, 788.
 — — condition and obligation of, 849.
 Severity to pardon, The relation of, 460.
 Shepherd-Psalm, The, 384.
 Shoot out of the dry stock, The, 584.
 Sigh, The Saviour's, 1011.
 — of the sincere, The, 601.
 Sights in life, memorable, 323.
 Silence, Divine, 884.
 — Thoughts on, 537.
 Simeon and Levi: bad brothers, 70.
 Simon the Cyrenian, 1040.
 Simplicity in prayer, 173.
 Sin, 23.
 — against God, 412.
 — — the Holy Ghost, The, 866.
 — and its mockers, 619.
 — — redemption, Beginning of, 16.
 — as separation from God, 635.
 — — the transgression of law, 687.
 — Causing others to, 904.
 — An Eternal, 996.
 Sin, Far-reaching consequences of, 283.
 — God's deepest horror in, 516.
 — — use of, 332.
 — Making light of, 519.
 — of self-confidence, The, 379.
 — Original, 688.
 — put away, 224.
 — Respectable, 936.
 — Temptations to, 751.
 — The confession of, 727.
 — — contagion of, 252.
 — — knowledge of, 331.
 — — sinfulness of, 30.
 — — unpardonable, 867.
 Sincerity, 414.
 — in religion, 858.
 Singing time, The, 562.
 Sinner and the saviour, The, 486.
 Sinners, The grace of God to, 750.
 Sins always find us out? Do our, 468.
 — of the fathers and the children, The, 689.
 — — Scripture saints, 393.
 — Spiritual, 901.
 — Unobserved, 74.
 Sleep, The gift of, 492.
 Sluggard in harvest, The, 522.
 Smoking flax, The, 612.
 Social reform, 872.
 — worship, 906.
 Sojourning with God, 126.
 Solitude of success, The, 220.
 Solidarity of Man and God, The, 954.
 Solidity, Religious, 560.
 Solitariness of principle, The, 309.
 Solomon and toleration, 235.
 — The reign of, 640.
 — — temple builder, 235.
 Solomon's decline, 236.
 — folly and sin, 306.
 — garden, 565.
 — prayer, 233.
 — temple, 232.
 Song and the prayer, The, 403.
 — of the builders, The, 494.
 — — well, The, 134.
 Songs of Zion, The, 495.
 Sons of Eli, yet sons of Belial, 202.
 Sorrows of the night, The, 403.
 Soul, Ascent of the, 425.
 — Biography of a, 470.
 — food, 436.
 — Individuality of the, 553.
 — its meaning and value, The, 896.
 — Preparation of the, 400.
 — Refuge of the devout, 449.
 — The Pursuing, 419.
 Souls, Little, 11.
 Soul's master, leader, and restorer, The, 386.
 — summer, The, 562.
 — thirst and satisfaction, The, 418.
 Sources of delight, The Christian's hidden, 454.
 Sow to yourselves, 729.
 Sower, Parable of the, 871.
 Sowing and reaping, 550.
 — in tears, 490.
 Sown light, 459.
 Spade-work of the kingdom, The, 233.
 Speaking in the wrong temper, 328.
 Spell of Christ, The, 432.
 Sphere not prohibited, The, 1008.
 Spikenard of the bride, The, 560.
 Spiritual beauty, 119.

INDEX TO OUTLINES

- Spiritual diversity, 308.
 — experiences at home, 681.
 — health, 227.
 — sins, 901.
 — transformation, 575.
 — transports, 567.
Springtide, A sermon for, 822.
Stand still awhile, 209.
Star of the wise men, The, 773.
 — The guiding, 777.
Stars that lead to Christ, 777.
Startling absences, 865.
Steadfastly minded, 100.
Steadfastness in the old paths, 655.
Steward, The unjust, 907.
Still small voice, The, 247.
 — with thee, 499.
Stopping places in evidence, 1039.
Storehouse, A blessing on the, 153.
Strength in joy, 305.
 — of the Lord, Going in the, 423.
 — The secret of, 599.
Success, 410.
Successive monarchies, 707.
Suffer, Does God, 1010.
Suffering, Manifestation of, 624.
 — The consecration of, 590.
 — — mystery of, 396.
Sun of my soul, Thou Saviour dear, 300.
Supreme acquisitions, 515.
Surprise, The ministry of, 382.
Sword and trowel, 303.
 — of the Lord, The, 282.
 — Sending of the, 854.
Sympathy and sacrifice, 892.
 — of God, The, 642.
- Labels prepared in presence of foes, The, 387.
Talent was buried, Why the, 951.
Talents, The use of, 946.
Talk to boys and girls, A, 273.
Telling Jesus, 880.
Tell me where thou feedest, 559.
Temperament and grace, 68.
Temple and the Church, The, 288.
 — Profanation of the, 1025.
 — The visible, 933.
Temptation, 513, 783.
 — in the Garden of Eden, The, 16.
 — in the wilderness, The, 784.
 — of Abraham, The, 44.
 — of Jesus, The, 783.
 — of man, The first, 15.
 — The sources of, 818.
Temptations to sin, 751.
 — of the Spirit, 968.
Tempters, 513.
Tenderness of God, The, 651.
Ten virgins, The, 943.
Thanksgiving, The duty of, 572.
 — The sacrifice of, 411.
 — — spirit of, 469.
That thou mayest do it, 161.
Theology and science, 469.
Things no man could say, 803.
 — that matter, The, 251.
Thirst for the living God, The, 402.
Thistle and the Cedar, The, 269.
Thou killedst the Egyptian, 75.
 — shalt answer, Lord, for me, 623.
Thought, 523.
Threefold cord, A, 527.
 — — The, 539.
- Three hundred men that lapped, The, 183.
Threescore years and ten, 446.
Throne, Next the, 914.
Thy God thy glory, 639.
Time, The lapse of, 548.
Tower, The lesson of the, 30.
Towers of Zion, 409.
Trance and trench, 139.
Tranquillity, The secret of, 399.
Transfiguration, The, 898.
Travail of Christ's soul, The, 624.
Travels of the heart, The, 263.
Treasure of heaven, The, 338.
Treasury, Casting into the, 1030.
Tree and the chaff, The, 363.
 — planted by rivers of water, A, 363.
Trifle, Providence of the, 851.
Trimming, 650.
Trinity, Fourteenth Sunday after, 480.
 — in the Resurrection, Love of the, 391.
 — The Holy, 2, 6.
 — Twenty-fourth Sunday after, 486.
Trouble, Trivial, 657.
Troubles, A sea of, 67.
Troubling, The valley of, 728.
Trust in God, 593.
Truth, Buying the, 624.
 — Inward, 413.
 — The tenure of, 952.
Twilight and trembling, 588.
- UNBELIEF, 899.
 — Abnormal, 1004.
 — of the fool, The, 374.
Unconsciousness in character, The element of, 120.
Unemployed, The, 388.
Unfinished life, An, 462.
Unlighted lustre, The, 397.
Unpossessed possessions, 250.
Unrealized purposes, 234.
Unseen environment, 264.
Until I went into the sanctuary, 428.
Unto all nations, 423.
Upward and onward, 610.
- VARIEDNESS of the Divine benevolence, The, 305.
Velling from man of Divine energy, The, 1013.
Verdict of life, The, 531.
Verifying faculty, The, 596.
Victories in old age, 169.
Victory of conscience and faith over impulse and opportunity, The, 64.
 — The Lord's, 483.
Vigilant, Be, 910.
Vision and drudgery, 106.
 — — duty, 206.
 — Isaiah's, 578, 580.
 — of God and the feast before Him, The, 106.
 — — The, 107, 580.
 — Redeeming, 578.
 — The unseen, 720.
 — which saves, The, 528.
Voice of the Church, The, 832.
Voices of God, The, 344.
 — — — unrecognized, 202.
Vox clamantis, 608.
- WAITING, 599.
 — for God, 591.
 — — Samuel, 212.
- Waiting, The patient, 944.
Walking without fainting, 611.
Wall of fire, The, 756.
Wandering bird, The, 528.
War for the sake of peace, 391.
Wasted gains, 518.
Watching, 1032.
Watchword, The Messianic, 401.
Way in the wilderness, The, 154.
Weakness our strength, Our, 230.
Wealth, Christianity and, 815.
Weapons of Saints, The, 911.
Wearied in the greatness of the way, 631.
Weather, The, 509.
Weather-wise, 550.
Weaving, Hopeless, 636.
Wells, Bible, 135.
 — The checked, 48, 51.
'What are these wounds in Thine hands?' 761.
 — God will do for us, 451.
 — — is this? 918.
 — Think ye of Christ? 930.
Whose son art thou, young man? 218.
Wild flowers—the thyme and the daisy, 517.
Wilderness, Coming up from the, 569.
 — The Christian in the, 720.
Will of God, The, 319.
Willing mind, The, 280.
 — offerings, 288.
Wills, The two, 969.
Window, The open, 716.
Windows, The opened, 716.
Wings of the dove, The silver, 424.
Winter is past, The, 561.
Wisdom, Man's best, 349.
 — — highest, 347.
 — The beginning of, 477.
 — — builder, 525.
 — ? Where is, 348.
Wise men from the East, The, 774.
 — over-much, 544.
 — woman of Abel, The, 227.
 — Words of the, 555.
Witness of the children, The, 774.
 — — — saints, The, 143.
Woes of the unjust, The, 661.
Woman's logic, A, 188.
Women, Moral influence of, 972.
Word of the Lord, The, 204, 251.
Words of the wise, The, 555.
 — Our, 503.
Work for Christ, Our, 1033.
 — The conditions of Successful, 1011.
 — A great, 303.
 — and play, 759.
 — Easy, 692.
 — for us, God's, 425.
 — in God's vineyard, 911.
 — The day's, 469.
 — and watch, The call to, 1033.
Working as unto God, 447.
 — for the master, 921.
 — towards Ideals, 1026.
Works of God, The, 737.
World for Christ, The, 365.
Worry, 824, 825.
Worship, A preparation for Christ's coming, 600.
 — and conduct, 747.
 — Christian, 440.
 — Social, 906.
 — The incentives to, 761.

INDEX TO OUTLINES

Worship, The spirit of, 418.
 Worshipping Christ, 775.
 Wrestling with God, 59.
 Writing on the roll, The, 665.
 Wrong in the heart, 457.

YEARS, Added, 604.

Yoke of Christ, The, 863, 864.
 Young and getting old, On keeping, 647.
 — man, A certain, 1038.
 — — The choice, 208.
 Young men, A message to, 758.
 — people, The religious life of, 510.

Youth and after, 36.
 Youth and age, 510.
 — of Jesus, Creation's witness to the,
 476.
 — The secret of immortal, 610.
 Youthfulness recovered, 484.

[The following outlines are indexed as specially suitable for the Church Year and Special Occasions. A full Church Year Index will be supplied at the end of Vol. II.]

THE ADVENT SEASON

Advent, 918.
 Christ's advents, 781.
 Donec Aspiret Dies, 564.
 Faith, The expectancy of, 942.
 Invisible presence of God, The, 600.
 I will make all My mountains a way, 618.
 Lord our judge, The, 601.
 Preparation, The spirit of, 943.
 Redemption by judgment, 574.
 Sum total of life, The, 573.
 Ten virgins, The, 943.
 Waiting, The patient, 944.
 Worship, A preparation for Christ's coming, 600.
 Waiting for God, 591.

CHRISTMAS DAY

Child in the midst, A, 902.
 Christ's nearness to His people, 160.
 Expectation, 591.
 God with us, 583.
 Jesus the Saviour, 769.
 Little child shall lead them, A, 585.
 Personality, 992.
 Worshipping Christ, 775.

HOLY INNOCENTS' DAY

Child in the midst, The, 902.
 Innocents' day, 778.
 Witness of the children, The, 774.

THE EPIPHANY

Christ the good Maker and Doer, 1012.
 Epiphany, 114.
 God's presence and God's rest, 115.
 Guiding star, The, 777.
 Light obtained: Light diffused, 637.
 Some aspects of humility as suggested by the story of the Centurion, 837.
 Star of the wise men, The, 773.
 Stars that lead to Christ, 777.

SUNDAYS BEFORE LENT

Creation, Story of the, 11.
 Seeking God's kingdom and righteousness, 823.
 Fall, The, 18.
 Sinfulness of sin, The, 30.

ASH WEDNESDAY

Conversion, 734.
 Deliverance, A message of, 735.
 Fasting, The dangers of, 633.
 Repentance, 740.

LENT

Interruptions of life, The, 784.
 Temptation in the wilderness, 784.

PALM SUNDAY

I said, I will go up to the Palm-tree, 568.
 Message of Palm Sunday, 607.
 Palm Sunday and its lessons, 917.
 Shadow of the Cross, The, 673.

HOLY WEEK AND PASSIONTIDE

Long-suffering of God, The, 84.
 Suffering, The mystery of, 396.
 Sympathy of God, The, 642.

GOOD FRIDAY

Blood of Christ, The, 124.
 Good Friday, 671.
 Return to Christ's love, The, 577.
 Saviour's question on the Cross, The, 980.
 Word of agony, The, 980.
 Words from the Cross, The, 976.

EASTER EVEN

Sin put away, 224.

EASTER DAY

Easter Day Morning, 483.
 Environments, Two, 982.
 Faith the title for justification, 838.
 Lord's victory, The, 483.
 Sacred privileges, Difficulty of realizing, 482.
 Singing time, The, 562.
 Winter is past, 561.

ASCENSION DAY

Abiding Presence, The, 987.
 Ascended into Heaven, He, 1049.
 Ascension, The, 1049.
 Incentives to worship, The, 761.

WHIT SUNDAY

Presence that never faileth, The, 986.

TRINITY SUNDAY

Divine revelation, A, 6.
 God our Father, 812.
 Holy Trinity, The, 2.
 Isaiah's vision, 580.
 Lord appearing in the country, Our, 1047.
 Lord will provide, The, 821.
 Sins of the fathers and the children, The, 689.
 Where is wisdom? 348.

MISCELLANEOUS

ST. ANDREW'S DAY

Call of St. Andrew, The, 787.

ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST'S DAY

Preaching of the Baptist, The, 779.
 Sincerity in religion, 858.

ST. JAMES THE APOSTLE'S DAY

Cross and the throne, The, 914.

ST. MATTHEW'S DAY

Consecration, 287.
 Divine call, The, 845.

FEAST OF ST. MICHAEL AND ALL ANGELS
 Holy Angels, 963.

EMPIRE DAY

Empire day, 307.

AUTUMN

Fading leaves, 645.

UNIVERSITY SERMON

Friendship of Christ, The, 155.

CHURCH GUILD SERMON

Three hundred men that lapped, The, 183.

SERMON TO CLERGYMEN

Lengthening the cords and strengthening the stakes, 626.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ANNIVERSARY

On keeping young and getting old, 647.

SERMON TO THE YOUNG

Heavenly Guide, The, 651.

SERMON FOR WOMEN

Civic apathy, 671.

HARVEST

Feast of tabernacles, The, 156.
 Gleaning, The duty of, 197.
 God's goodness to man, 397.
 Harvest festival, 34.
 — thanksgiving, 34.
 Parable of harvest, The, 325.
 Sowing and reaping, 550.

NEW YEAR

Future all unknown, The, 167.
 Memory, hope, and effort, 435.
 New Year's promise, A, 116.
 — — thoughts, 5.
 Old paths, 654.
 Portal of a new period, The, 432.
 Presence shall enlighten the way, The, 115.
 Watchwords for a New Year, 162.

FIRST SUNDAY OF THE YEAR

Jacob's retrospect of life, 68.
 Threefold cord, A, 527.
 Way in the wilderness, The, 184.

LAST SUNDAY OF THE YEAR

Remembering the past, 145.

मसूरी
MUSSOORIE

Acc. No. 101620

Please return this book on or before the date last stamped below.

[illegible]

101028
LBSNAA

220.403

Exp

v. 1

अवाप्ति सं० 101028

ACC. No. ~~20821~~

वर्ग सं.

पुस्तक सं.

Class No..... Book No.....

लेखक

Author.....

शीर्षक

Title... Expositor's dictionary..
..... of texts,

निर्गम दिनांक
Date of Issue

उधारकर्ता की सं.
Borrower's No.

हस्ताक्षर
Signature

220.403

Exp

LIBRARY

LAL BAHADUR SHASTRI

National Academy of Administration

MUSSOORIE

V-1

~~20821~~

Accession No. 101028

1. Books are issued for 15 days only but may have to be recalled earlier if urgently required.
2. An over-due charge of 25 Paise per day per volume will be charged.
3. Books may be renewed on request, at the discretion of the Librarian.
4. Periodicals, Rare and Reference books may not be issued and may be consulted only in the Library.
5. Books lost, defaced or injured in any way shall have to be replaced or its double price shall be paid by the borrower.

Help to keep this book fresh, clean & moving